His two sons, after his departure, agreed that each of them should reign alternately one year, and then yield the government to the other; but Eteocles having refused to resign, after he had reigned his year; Polynices went to Argos, where having married Adrastus's daughter, as we have seen in a former section, he engaged that prince to assist him in the recovery of his right: these two came soon after with a powerful army, and besieged Eteocles at the seven gates of his capital. Eteocles at the same time put himself in the best posture of defence, and went and consulted an old blind Theban soothsayer about the success of the war; and was answered, that victory would infallibly fall on his side, if Menæceus, the son of Creon, and the last of the Cadmean race would voluntarily sacrifice himself to the god of war. The brave prince being informed of it, made no delay, but went to the gates of the city and sacrificed his life to the safety of his country^g. This did not however prevent hostilities being carried on with the utmost fury, and with such terrible slaughter on both sides, that it was at length agreed that the contending princes should decide the contest by single combat, which they did with such desperate fury, that both fell by each other's sword. The Argives ventured to give the Thebans a second battle, wherein both sides lost several of their brave commanders, and such a number of men, that though the latter got the victory, yet they were almost ruined by it. A treaty was then expostulated by the Argivian king for burying of their dead, but Creon, who had then taken the government upon him, was so exasperated against them, that he not only absolutely refused it, but caused the princess Antigone to be buried alive, because she had caused the body of her brother Polynices to be decently interred. For this cruel deed he was soon after killed by Theseus, who came with an army against him, and obliged the Thebans to permit the Argives to bury the slain, as we have seen elsewhere.

^f Conf. PLUTARCH. in Thef. DIODOR. SICUL. l. iv. PAUSAN. ubi supra. APOLLON. l. iii. c. 5. & al. ^g Id. ibid. Vid. & CICER. STAT. & al.

(M) Or according to others to have his feet bored, and to be hung up by them to a tree, and to be devoured by the wild beasts.

(N) This was a mischievous monster, which infested the neighbourhood of Thebes: it had a face and body like a dog, and destroyed all the passengers that could not expound her riddle. Creon the father of Jocasta, ruled then at Thebes, and having consulted the oracle, was answered, that there would be no end of this mischief till somebody gave her a solution; whereupon he caused it to be proclaimed through Greece, that the man that expounded it should have Jocasta to wife; and Œdipus proved the person who gained the fatal prize, and from that incestuous marriage had the two sons who were the occasion of this bloody war.

(O) This is at least the account which all the ancient poets except Homer have left us of it, probably to enhance the horror of that marriage, and to raise the greater compassion for that unhappy couple, and their progeny; but Homer on the contrary, who introduces Ulysses, saying, that he had seen in hell the fair Epiclestis, who through imprudence had married her own son, who became at once the unhappy murderer of his father, and husband of his mother, makes him add, that the gods, by hastening this prince's death, prevented the sad effects of that incestuous marriage. For as Pausanias justly observes (17), how could they be said to stop the course of that incest if Œdipus had had four children by his mother?

He adds upon the authority of a poem, intitled, Œdipiad, or the adventures of Œdipus, that he had those children by Euriganthe the daughter of Hyperbas.

(17) In Bæotic. cap. vi.

- a In the mean time the sons of those seven generals who fell before Thebes, resolving to revenge themselves on that city for the ill success of the last expedition, entered into a confederacy, from which they were called Epigoni, and renewed the siege afresh. Laodamas the son of Eteocles, who by this time came to age, and had taken the government upon him, gave them a warm reception, and with his own hand killed Argylaus one of their chiefs. But being himself soon after killed, or forced to fly into Illyria^a, the Thebans began to sue for a treaty, and whilst that was transacting, conveyed themselves away with their families and effects by night, and went and built the town of Hastina, leaving Thebes to the mercy of the Epigoni. Some say that these being apprised of their flight, plundered the city, and quite erased her walls. Others affirm, that Thersander Polynices's son dissuaded them from it, recalled the fugitive citizens, and reigned over them; soon after which he led them to the Trojan war, and in the way signalized himself at Mysia, and was killed by Telepus. His son Tesamenes, being then too young to command the Theban forces, Peneleus was chosen their chief, and was also killed there by Eurypilus the son of Telepus. After his death Tesamenes took the government upon him, and reigned peaceably enough; but the fates which pursued the unfortunate offspring of Oedipus did not prove so favourable to his son Autophon, who, we are told, was seized with such a dreadful phrensy, or, according to the poetic phrase, was persecuted by the furies to such a degree, that he was forced by the oracle's advice to retire among the Dorians.
- c AFTER his departure the Thebans raised Damascibton, the grandson of Peneleus, to the throne, who left it to his son Ptolomeus, and he was succeeded by Xanthus, who was the last who enjoyed the regal dignity in Thebes, and was treacherously killed by Melampus in single combat, as we have seen in the history of Athens. After his death the Thebans, weary of a kingly government, resolved to put it into many hands, and to settle themselves into a commonwealth^b, as we shall see in the next chapter.

^a Conf. PAUSAN. Boeotic. & APOLLOD. I. iii. c. 7.^b PAUSAN. ubi supra.

S E C T. V.

The history of the ancient kingdom of ARCADIA.

- a ARCADIA, so called from Arcas the son of Jupiter and Calisto, was anciently Nemes. called Pelasgia, being inhabited by the ancient Pelasgi, who boasted themselves to be descended from Pelasgus their pretended founder, of whom we have spoken in a former section of this chapter[†], as having been supposed by a late author to be the same with Peleg the son of Eber in scripture. The Pelasgians did also surname him Autochthon^a, which was a name the Grecians gave to those whose original was not known. It is true we find the Pelasgians on several other parts of Greece, as was there observed; but their chief and primitive seat is generally supposed to have been this of Arcadia, whose inhabitants are universally allowed the ancientest people in Greece, and boasted themselves to be older than the moon.
- b THIS country was situate in the heart of Peloponnesus (A), having Elis on the west, Geography. Argolis on the east, Laconia and Messenia on the south, and Sicyon and Corinth on the north^b. Its ground, which afforded excellent pasturage, made it famous for the vast number of herds it bred; for the tuneful strains of its shepherds, who excelled all others in their pastoral performances, and the sweetness of their vocal and instrumental music; and for the extraordinary worship that was paid here to their god Pan. Here was also a famous temple of that deity in the city of Tegea, and an-

[†] See before, Vol. II. p. 345: B.^a XENOPH. STRAB. MEL. & al.^b STRAB. D. SICUL. PAUSAN. MEL. & al.(A) The Arcadians were consequently at a distance from the sea, and accordingly Homer tells us that they had neither ships, nor any knowledge of sailing (1),so that when they are said to have embarked for the siege of Troy, we must understand it of Achilles's fleet, which transported them thither.(1) Iliad. lib. ii.

Natural rarities.

other dedicated to Minerva in the city of Stymphalus, situate at the foot of a ridge of hills of that name. Here also bred upon the lake Stymphalis a kind of fowl, called from it the Stymphalian birds, which grew to such size and number, that they darkened the sun-beams at noon-day, and terribly infested this territory, till they were all either killed or driven hence by Hercules, as we have seen elsewhere.

HERE was also the famed lake Phenaeus, from which springs the river Styx, famous for the coldness of its waters, which chills them to death that drink it; it is also of such corrosive nature that it will eat iron and brass*. The poets feign it to be the river of hell, whose name is so sacred among the gods, that if any of them broke his oath after he had sworn by it, he was deprived of his deity, and of the use of Nectar for a hundred years.

THE Arcadians were at first a rude wild people, living in the woods and fields, and feeding indifferently on the product of the ground, till taught by Pelagrus to build huts, live sociably, to exchange their common food for nuts, acorns, or beech-mast (B), and to cloath themselves with the skins of wild beasts. They began afterwards to give themselves up to feed cattle, invited to it by the fertility of their soil. But as this country abounded with excellent pasture grounds, so it was exposed to continual incursions from those, who were either forced out of their own country, or were discontented with it. And this put them upon the necessity of exchanging the crook for the sword, and to inure themselves to some warlike discipline in their own defence, who would otherwise in all likelihood have preferred a pastoral life to any other. Hence it was that they, especially the highlanders, became such excellent soldiers, that their alliance was very much courted in all the wars between the other estates. They commonly used to come to the wars clad with the skins of wolves and bears, and carried either a little bundle of javelins, or a lance in their hands, which they used with a peculiar dexterity. Their very women became at length such expert warriors, especially in a defensive war, that they have sometimes proved the means of gaining a victory, when it was in all appearance wholly leaning on the other side. Witness that famous expedition of the Lacedemonians against Tegea, when, flushed by a dubious oracle, with hopes that they should take that city, they brought with them chains to bind their future captives, but were in the heat of the battle discomfited by a party of women, who had lain in ambush, and their king Charilaus with a great number of his men bound with those very chains they had brought with them*. Having therefore such brave females to defend their country in case of invasion, they used to be hired as mercenaries by all their neighbouring estates, in the same manner as the Swizzers do now; and this made them some amends for their want of commerce, occasioned by their distance from the sea.

THIS extraordinary change in so rude a nation was as quick as it was surprizing. Lycaon the son of their founder, of whom we shall speak more fully in the following note, improved what his father had done towards civilizing his subjects, by introducing the worship of Jupiter among them, though not with the same prudence that Cecrops had done among his Athenians (C). His sons, of whom he had a considerable number, set themselves on building each of them a city which they called by their own names, and which we shall mention in their proper places*. In these they

* Id. Ibid..

* HERODOT. I. I. & PAUSAN. in Arcad.

* In Arcad. ch. iii.

(B) Which kind of food, Pausanias tells, they continued to live upon a long time after the death of their founder, insomuch that the Lacedemonians, consulting the oracle about a war which they were going to wage against them, received this answer from the pythoness, That though Jupiter and the gods were on their side, yet could they expect no success against a warlike people, whose chiefest dainties were the fruit of the beech (2).

(C) Cecrops, as we have seen in a former section, forbade the sacrificing of any living creature, whereas Lycaon is reported to have sacrificed a youth to him, for which the angry god changed him into a wolf.

The poets have improved this fable, which perhaps took its rise only from the savage nature of that prince implied in his name, Lycaon, signifying a wolf: the account which Ovid gives of him is as follows:

Jupiter, desirous to know whether the wickedness of men answered the report he heard of it, in his travels came one night to Lycaon's palace, where having made himself known, the people were going to sacrifice to him. Lycaon, not believing his guest to be what he gave out, attempted to murder him in the night, in order to undeceive the people. But having missed his blow, he killed and dressed a Molossian youth, whom he kept as a hostage, and set him before his guest to eat, for which the exasperated god, overthrew his palace with thunder and lightning, and turned his inhuman host into a wolf.

(2) In Arcadic. ch. i.

a gathered the people into bodies, and brought them still nearer to a social life; and in the next reign they began to sow corn, make bread, spin wool, and to make themselves garments of it*. Another author adds†, that they learned the use of bees, honey, and milk, of rennet for making of cheese, of oil, and some other conveniencies of life (D). Thus in four generations, the Arcadians from being but one remove from wild beasts, became civilized, industrious, inured to society, husbandry, and a regular government. To all these we may add, that these advantages, which exposed them to frequent invasions from abroad, put them likewise upon the necessity of cultivating the martial arts, first in their own defence, and afterwards for interest and gain, whence they became such brave soldiers, and expert warriors, as we observed they were. Hence it was that most of the Grecian princes courted their alliance above that of any other nation; but especially the Messenians, with whom they seem to have maintained an inviolable friendship. But Hercules, of all the ancient heroes, had the greatest confidence in them, insomuch that we seldom find him engaged in any extraordinary exploit without having some Arcadian forces to assist him. While they thus improved their martial genius, they did not forget to cultivate their pastoral life, for which they have been so highly celebrated by the poets above all other Grecians‡.

THEIR government, like those of all their neighbours, was at first altogether monarchical and arbitrary, yet by degrees the subjects began to claim something like a negative power, especially in matters of great moment, so that their kings could not well undertake any great affairs, such as a war, alliances, or foreign expeditions without their consent. This may perhaps be one main reason why they continued longer under a monarchy than any other estate of Greece; but this will be best seen in the next chapter. We shall confine ourselves here within our epoch, and to that series of kings which that nation pretended to be descended from Pelasgus their first founder, and which Pausanias has given us from their tradition and record. And herein if he differs sometimes from Apollodorus, Justin, and other ancient writers, we may suppose he had his reasons for so doing, and if we except the remotest times which were wrapped up in inextricable darkness, the standing monuments of each country to direct and confirm his judgment. However, they were not always united under one king; for it sometimes happened that the kingdom was divided by the father between his sons, and continued so till want of issue, alliances, or some other circumstance, united it again. Besides this, the several cities built by the sons of Lycaon, seem to have been divided into cantons under their several chiefs; but whether always under one sovereign or not, is not sure. Hence it is that we read of these cantons, as of separate people, who made alliances, not only among themselves, but with foreign estates, and signalized themselves during several centuries under their respective names, such as Tegeans, Trapezans, Mantineans, Peretbeans, and many more, which we shall give our readers in its proper place, to prevent their being mistaken in the sequel of the Grecian history for so many distinct people from the Arcadians.

* Id. Ibid.

† JUSTIN. ex Trog. l. xiii. c. 7.

‡ APOLLOD. D. SICUL. PAUSAN. &c.

(D) This last author says, that Aristæus, who taught the Arcadians all these things, was the son of Jupiter by Cyrene, a beautiful Thessalian princess, whom that lustful goddess carried off to the top of mount Pelion, and of whom he got four sons, the three first of which settled in Thessaly, and the other, viz. Aristæus came and reigned in Arcadia. This story however is contradicted by Pindar and Siculus, who affirm that she had but one son by Jupiter, namely Menius, who was also surnamed Agrius, as being a lover of hunting and feeding of cattle; and Pausanias says, that this Aristæus instructed Arca the 4th king of the country, without taking any notice of his reigning there. We shall have occasion to say something more of this Cyrene when we come to speak of Thessaly.

THE succession of the kings of Arcadia who reigned from their founder to a Aristocrates, who was murdered by his subjects for his treachery to the Messenians^a; is as follows:

1 Pelasgus	8 Aleus	14 Cypselus	20 Eginetes
2 Lycaon	9 Lycurgus	15 Lajus	21 Polymestor
3 Nyctimus	10 Ecbemus	16 Bucolion	22 Echmis
4 Archas	11 Agapenor	17 Phialius	23 Aristocrates I.
5 Clitor	12 Hyppotibous	18 Simus	24 Hicetas
6 Azan	13 Epytus II.	19 Pompus	25 Aristocrates II.
7 Epytus I.

b

It were in vain to expect an exact chronology of this kingdom, considering the uncertainty of its beginning. If Pelasgus, the supposed founder of this monarchy, were the same with Phaleg, or Peleg the son of Eber, in whose days the earth is said to have been divided¹; it must have begun at least as early as Terab's time; but we hope we have sufficiently confuted this opinion heretofore[†], as well as the other conjecture of the same learned man, that Peleg was the father of the *Scythians*². Those who place the foundation of it about Moses's time seem still to have antedated it³, neither would we venture to place it before the expulsion of the Canaanites out of their native land, at which time they were obliged to go in search of some more peaceful habitations. But whether in Josbua's time, or after it, were hard to determine. Sir Isaac Newton is of opinion, that Pelasgus was cotemporary with Inachus, Cecrops I. Lelex, and other chiefs, who brought their colonies out of Egypt; according to him this was about 1120 years before Christ, but according to our chronology, in the year of the flood 1443, or before Christ 1556, at which time we have placed the foundation of Athens by Cecrops. And it can hardly be supposed that Pelasgus could be of recenter date than he, if we consider the rude beginnings of either kingdom, or the successions of their kings; and that Pausanias thinks that Lycaon was cotemporary with the Athenian founder⁴. Upon this supposition therefore that they began near about the same time, it will follow that this of Arcadia lasted in the line of Pelasgus about 880 years, that is till the year of the flood 2351, and first of the 28th olympiad, in which Aristocrates II. and the last of that race was stoned to death. This is the utmost we dare venture to advance concerning an epocha, whose beginning is so dark and remote. We shall in the next place subjoin what we find most material concerning these monarchs.

We have already said all we know concerning Pelasgus and his son Lycaon, except that this last built a city on the mountain Lycaeus, and called it Lycosura, caused Jupiter to be worshipped there under the name of Jupiter Lycaeus, and instituted the Lycaean games in honour of him. As for the cities which were built and peopled by his numerous issue, the reader may see them in the margin (E). Among so many sons, Lycaon had but one daughter named Calisto, with whom Jupiter having ^a PAUSAN. ubi supra. ch. ii. & seq. ¹ Gen. x. 25. vid. & STILLINGFL. Or. Sacr. I. iii. c. 8. [†] See Vol. I. p. 169. d. ² Vol. II. p. 243. & seq. ³ Vid. int. al. RAWL. hist. of the world, I. ii. c. 6. sect. 4. ⁴ ARCAD. c. i.

(E) These cities were Pallantium built by Pallas, Oresthafum, by Orestheus, Phigalia by Phigaleus, afterwards called Phialia from Phialus the son of Bucolion. Trapezonte from Trapezus, and so of the rest which were built by his other sons Daceates, Macareus, Helisson, Acacus, (from whom this last tribe pretends Mercury has that surname, in Hemer, which signifies without evil, implying that the good he doth is without any mixture of ill) and Tibocchus. Hyphus built Hyphantis, Menela, and Thyrea, Menalus, Tegates, and Mantineus, the three cities of their name. The rest of those cantons bearing their founders names, are the Cromians, Charisians, Tricolones, Peretheans, Astadians, Lyceatians, Sumatians, Hercans, and Alipholians. Orcbomenus the father of the Orcbomenians, the richest canton of all in cattle, was the only one who did not call the city of his building by his own name, but by that of Methrydion[†]. The youngest of Lycaon's, called OEnotrius, instead of following the example of the rest, obtained a sum of money and forces from his brother Nisymus who succeeded Lycaon, sailed into Italy, and settled there, and was the first who brought a colony from Greece thither (3.) Hence that of Virgil:

Est locus Hesperiam Graii Cognomine dicunt, Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere glebae (4), OEnotrii coluere viri.

[†] De his Vid. St. Byzant. sub voc. & Pausan. ubi supra. (3) Pausan. in Arcad. ch. iii. (4) Vid. Gei'oyr. Not. in eund. ch. iii.

had

- a had an intrigue, Juno turned her into a she-bear, and Diana, to please that jealous goddess, shot her to death (F). Lycaon was succeeded by his eldest son
3. Nyctimus, and he dying, we suppose childless, left the kingdom to
4. Arcas, the son of Calisto by Jupiter, who gave his name to the kingdom; he it was whom we mentioned above for having introduced and improved husbandry. He had three sons, not by a mortal woman, if we believe the poets, but by a nymph called Erato (G), besides a natural son he had before he married the nymph, and at his death divided his kingdom between them. Azan the eldest called his portion by his name Azania. Apbydas had the canton of Tegea, and Elatus had mount Cyllene (H), from which he went afterwards and settled in Phocis, and built a city
- b which he called by his name.
5. Azan was succeeded by his only son
6. Clitor, who instituted funeral games in honour of his father, built a city which he called by his name, and was the powerfullest prince of his time, but died childless; so that his share of the Arcadian kingdom fell to
7. Epytus eldest son of his brother Elatus, who was bit to death by a venomous serpent, as he was hunting, and left the kingdom to his cousin
8. Aleus the son of Apbydas. This prince made Tegea his metropolis, and built in it a temple to Minerva Alea. He had three sons, Lycurgus, Amphidamas, and Cepheus; and a daughter named Auge, whom he condemned to be drowned for her
- c criminal converse with Hercules, during his abode at Tegea (I). He was succeeded by his eldest son
9. Lycurgus, whose two sons dying before him (K), he left the kingdom to Ecbemus, that great grandson of Aleus.
10. Ecbemus assisted Atræus the son of Pelops, against the Heraclidae, who first entered Peloponnesus with a powerful army, and with Hyllus the son of Hercules at their head. We have spoken of this expedition in a former section, and of the success of Ecbemus against that champion whom he killed in single combat, he left his kingdom to a son of Ancaus the son of Lycurgus, named
11. Agapenor, who commanded the Arcadian troops at the siege of Troy, and in his
- d return thence, being like the rest of the surviving Grecian chiefs, tossed about by contrary winds and tempests, was cast at length upon the coasts of Cyprus, and settled at Paphos, where he built a temple to Venus, who, till then, if we believe Pausanias, was only worshipped at the small city of Golgos^m. From him the kingdom passed to the line of Stymphalus the son of Elatus, who was the youngest son of Arcas.
12. Hippotibous the great grandson of Stymphalus was the person who succeeded him, of whom we have nothing memorable, except that he transferred the seat of the kingdom from Tegea the ancient metropolis to Trapeza; he was succeeded by his son

¹ Arcad. c. ii.

^m Arcad. c. v.

(F) The fable adds that Mercury, out of compassion to the young princess, and by Jupiter's order, saved the infant she was pregnant with, and placed the unhappy mother in Heaven, where she became a constellation, or, if you please, that constellation was called by her name in honour of her.

(G) Not the muse of that name who presides over matters of love; but a wood nymph, such as they called Dryades. Those who inhabited the fields were called Oreades; those of the water Nereides; and those of springs and rivers Najades (5).

(H) Which name it did not receive till afterwards from Cyllen the son of Elatus. This is the same mountain on which Jupiter is said to have begot Mercury on Maja the daughter of Atlas †.

(I) This princess having captivated the famous Hercules whilst he was at Tegea, was left with child by him, which her father no sooner perceived, than he ordered her to be drowned, or, according to others, to be put into a chest with her child, and flung into the sea; she was taken up about the mouth of the Caicus, by Teutbras king of Mysia, who was so charmed with her beauty, that he married her and brought up her son Telephus as her own, and made him his successor (6).

Others say that Aleus committed his daughter to Nauplius, to be drowned in the sea, and that she being delivered in her way to Nauplia an Argolic port, she left her child there, and that he, instead of drowning the mother, sold her to Teutbras. The child was suckled by a deer, from which he was called Telephus, and when of age, having been directed by the oracle who his parents were, went into Mysia, where he was adopted by his father-in-law (7).

(K) These were Ancaus, who being returned from the Argonautic expedition, was killed by the Calydonian wild boar, and Epachus who was carried off by sickness.

(L) Most probably as an auxiliary hired by Agamemnon, by whose Ships they were transported to and from that siege, as we observed in a former note.

(5) Vid. Serv. Comm. in Virg. Pausan. ubi supra. c. iv. (†) See before, Vol. II. p. 263. b. (6) Pausan. ubi supra. (7) Apollod. l. ii. Diod. Sicul. l. iv. Pausan. ubi supra.

13. Epytus II. in whose days Orestes the son of Agamemnon, being warned by a the oracle, retired into Arcadia, and died, and was buried in or near the city of Tegea (M). Epytus was afterwards struck blind for his presumption, in venturing into the temple of Neptune at Mantineia, and dying soon after it, left the crown to his son

14. Cypselus, in whose days Cresphontes having by indirect means gotten the kingdom of Messenia, was murdered with two of his sons. The third named Æpytus, by others Ægyptus, fled to Cypselus, who was his grandfather by the mother's side (N), and by his assistance, regained the Messenian kingdom, revenged his father's death, and killed the usurper Polyphontes. We find nothing considerable during the reigns of his four next successors, Lajus, Bucolion, Phialius, and Simus, b except that in the time of this last, an ancient statue of Ceres, surnamed the Black, was set on fire, which was looked upon as a presage of that monarch's speedy death, which happened accordingly soon after: he was succeeded by his son

19. Pompus. This prince, by the help of the Æginetæ, opened a commerce by land-carriage from his inland towns to the sea-port of Cyllene, to and from which the merchandizes used to be conveyed upon mules. This trade proved so beneficial to the kingdom, that in gratitude to those islanders, Pompus called his son and successor by their name Æginetes. This last was succeeded by his son

21. Polymestor, in whose days happened that fierce invasion we spoke of at the beginning of this section, in which the Lacedemonians being come against Tegea, c were discomfited by the help of the Arcadian women, and both they and their king Charilaus bound with the chains they had brought for the Tegeans; however Charilaus was soon after released, upon his oath and promise that the Lacedemonians should not fight against them any more. The chains were afterwards hung up as trophies in the temple of Minerva Haliea, where they still continued in Herodotus's time *. Polymestor was succeeded by his brother

22. Echmis, who assisted the Messenians, the old and constant allies of the Arcadians against the Lacedemonians, and was succeeded by his own son

23. Aristocrates I. This prince, among other wicked actions, being fallen in love, d with a young virgin, priestess of Diana Hymnia, a deity highly revered by the Arcadians, and having in vain tried to debauch her, went and ravished her at the very altar of the goddess. For this fact he was stoned to death by his subjects, who, to prevent the like sacrilegious attempts for the future, ordained that from thenceforth, none but married women should be admitted to the priestly function.

We know nothing concerning his son Hicetas, except that he was father to

25. Aristocrates II. the last of the royal line of Cypselus, and with whom we shall close this section; he was stoned to death by his own subjects for his treachery to the Messenians his allies, whom he betrayed to the Spartans, with whom they were at

* Vid. HERODOT. l. i. c. 66. PAUSAN. ubi supra. ° HERODOT. ubi supra.

(M) Herodotus tells us, that the Lacedemonians having proved unsuccessful against the Arcadians, were told by the oracle that they would continue so till they had brought back the bones of that prince. The difficulty was to find them out, and here they were forced to consult the oracle again, from which they received the following remarkable answer, as it is englighted by Littlebury.

In the Arcadian plain lies Tegea,
Where two impetuous winds are forced to blow;
Form resists form, mischief on mischief strikes;
Here mother earth keeps Agamemnon's son,
Carry him off, and be victorious.

The solution of this puzzling answer was afterwards accidentally found out by Liches, an eminent Spartan, who being one day at Tegea, and observing with some attention a smith working at his shop, was told by him, that in the sinking of a well, he had found a coffin seven cubits long, and that having had the curiosity to open it, to see if the body answered the length of the coffin, he had found it exactly fitting, and had laid it again where he found it.

Liches comparing the place he was in, and the answer of the oracle, did easily conceive that by the smith's bellows were meant the two winds, by the hammer and anvil the two contending forms, and by the doubled mischief those which are caused by Iron; upon which having acquainted the Spartans with this discovery, it was agreed that he should be banished for some fictitious crime, that he might be the less suspected, and return to Tegea, which he did accordingly, and having with some difficulty hired the smith's inclosure, did privately dig up the bones, and carried them away to Sparta (8).

(N) About the beginning of his reign the Dorian fleet having invaded Peloponnesus, not by the Isthmus of Corinth, as they had done three generations before, for want of taking the right meaning of the oracle; but by landing above the cape of Rhion, Cypselus was forced to make an alliance with Cresphontes, and to give him his daughter in marriage, to help him to make head against them, in consideration of which his son helped Æpytus to regain his father's kingdom (9).

(8) Herodot. l. iv. c. 66.

(9) Pausan. ubi supra.

war.

a war. We shall see the sequel of it in the next chapter : and all that we shall add here is, that the Arcadians, not content with his death, cast his body out of their territories, left it exposed without burial, and, to perpetuate his infamy, erected a pillar in a grove of mount Lycæus, on which they caused an inscription to be engraved, the purport of which you may read in the margin (O), as we find it englished by Mr. Hind in his Grecian history ^{p.}

^p P. 167. Vid. & PAUSAN. ubi supra, & in Messenic.

(O) The base betrayer of Messene's state,
Has met at length a well-deserved fate.

In vain perfidious traitors justice shun ;
Hail, mighty Jove ! save the Arcadian throne.

SECTION VI.

The history of the antient kingdom of Thessaly, with a short account of that of Phocis.

■ THESSALY is supposed to have received its name from Thessalus ^a the father ^b, Name. or, according to others ^c, the son of Græcus, an ancient king of an obscure village, from whom the Greeks are said to have been descended ^d. It was also antiently called Aemonia, either from the famous mountain of that name, or from the daughter of Deucalion, or perhaps rather from Emon the son of Chlorus, the father of Thessalus and grandson of Pelægus ^e. From this last it was also called Pelægia, and Pyræa from Pyræa Deucalion's wife ; but it was most commonly known by that of Thessaly, as it is now by that of Jænna.

It was antiently divided into four districts, or perhaps kingdoms. Thessaliotis, Division. Istiaotis, Pelægiotis, and Phtiotis. Deucalion was king of this last when the deluge which goes by his name happened, which destroyed all the inhabitants of this, and the neighbouring countries, except only such as happily escaped into the high mountains of Thessaliotis, and Deucalion and his wife, who were carried in an ark upon the waters nine days and nights, and rested at length upon Parnassus, from which they are feigned to have repeopled the country by throwing of stones behind them ^f. However the name of Thessaly and Thessalians in time prevailed, and came to signify all the four parts. Sometimes it included Magnesia and Phtiotis, and sometimes not ; sometimes it was joined with Macedonia, and sometimes severed from it, and again rejoined to it.

Thessaly, properly so called, had on the east the provinces of Magnesia and Phtia Situation and extent. ^c abovementioned, and these two were bounded by the Ægean sea. On the west it had Illyricum and Epirus, now Albania ; on the north Macedonia and Mygdonia, and on the south Grecia Propria. It extended from west to east about one deg. 40 min. that is, from 24 deg. 10 min. to 25 and a half east longitude, and from north to south, from 39 deg. 50 min. to about 41 deg. north latitude

It was famous for its twenty-four hills, the most remarkable of which were those Natural rarities.

1. Olympus, celebrated among the poets, for its extraordinary height: 2. Osbrys, where king Pirithous reigned over the Lapithæ: 3. Pelion: 4. Offa, which with Nephele were, according to the fable, inhabited by Centaurs, who were afterwards killed or ^d driven away by Hercules for their lustful attempt upon the women that assisted at Perithous's nuptials. Here were also the plains of Pharsalia, and the delightful valley of Tempea, about six miles in length, and five in breadth, so pleasantly situate between the mountains of Offa, Pelion, and Olympus, so beautified with nature's gifts, and watered by the river Peneus, which ran through the midst of it, that it was reckoned the garden of the muses. On the south borders of Thessaly were seated the Dolopes and Myrmidons (A), whom Achilles led to the Trojan war.

^a STEPH. BYZANT. sub voce Θισσαλ. ^b EUSEB. Chronic. vid. & not. SCALIG. in eund. ^c Vid. BYZANT. sub voce Γραικοι. ^d Id. ibid. & CLUVER. lib. iv. c. 8. ^e BYZANT. sub voce Αἰμω. ^f OVID. Metam. init. APOLLON. l. i. c. 7. ^g CLUVER. ubi supra. MELA, l. 2. c. 3, & 4.

(A) The latter were so called from μυρμήκ a pismire, not, as the poets feign, because Æacus the son of Jupiter, seeing his country dispeopled by a grievous plague, obtained a fresh supply of subjects from his father, by turning ants into men ; but because, as Strabo says, this people were very excellent in cultivating the ground, and imitated the pismires in their diligence and oeconomy, or took the hint of digging, tilling, and other husbandry from that insect.

Rivers. THE whole kingdom of Thessaly was very pleasant and fruitful, being watered a by several great rivers which run quite across the country. The chiefest of them are the Peneus abovementioned, the Aliaemon, Erigon, and Axius; all which empty themselves into the Ægean sea, by the gulph of Thessalonica, anciently called Sinus Thermaicus. This country seems also to have been above others productive of poisonous weeds and drugs. Hence Plantus makes use of the word Thessalus to express a poisonous thing; but upon the whole it was so fruitful and delicious a country, that, like many others of the same rich nature, it was seldom free from foreign invasions, from some neighbouring nation or other.

Cities of note. CITIES of note were; 1. Larissa, famed for giving birth to Achilles, called from thence Larissæus (B). Its situation was excellent, being near the gulph abovementioned, and upon the river Peneus, near the foot of Olympus, and at one end of the valley of Tempea: 2. Demetrias, situate on the Sinus Pelasgicus, now Golpbo dell Armiro, and strongly fortified by art and nature: 3. Pegea on the same gulph, famous for being the place where the ship Argo was built, which carried the Argonauts to their famed expedition of the golden fleece, of which we shall speak by-and-by. Pythion, celebrated for the Pythian games, which were instituted here in honour of Apollo, and, as some say, in memory of his killing the serpent Python (C). The metropolis of Thessaly was, according to Heliodorus^a, called Hypatba, and situated near the Sinus Maliacus, now Golfo de Ziton, and at a small distance from mount Oeta, upon which Hercules ended his life, after he had put on the poisoned shirt.

Rarities. Thessaly was famous among other things, for such an extraordinary breed of oxen, that Nelus king of Pylus refused to give his daughter in marriage to Melampus king of Tiryus, except he procured him some of them, which he soon after did by the help of his brother Bias (D)¹. What fine horses they bred, and how expert they were in the use and management of that noble creature, we need not tell our readers, since the fiction of the centaurs (E) is allowed to have taken its origin from them². This fable however reflects no less a brand upon them for their brutish incontinency, than it commends them for their skill in horsemanship. The attempt which they made upon the women at the nuptials of their neighbours, Pirithous king of the Lapithæ, mentioned a little higher, is a pregnant proof of the one, and the history of their wars with other nations affords us a constant proof of the latter, so that in spite of their debauchery, they have still shewed themselves a warlike nation, and as such, their alliance, as well as assistance, especially that of their cavalry, was ever highly courted by contending powers. And indeed if we consider how liable the pleasantness and fertility of their country made them to foreign invasions, it will be no wonder they should be so well inured to the trade of war.

^a Hist. Æthiop. ap. Heylin. ¹ PAUSAN. in Messenic. c. xxxvi. ² OSOR. SERV. VATTABL. & al.

(B) Others say that he was born at Phthia, especially the poets. This difference might be owing either to the nearness of those two places, or perhaps to his being born in the one, and making his residence in the other.

(C) We have already spoken of some others instituted upon particular accounts, and celebrated in several parts of Greece. The four most considerable were, the Isthmian, the Olympic, Nemean and the Pythian; these made four annual meetings for all the Grecians, who resorted to those places in great number, but which were still much more esteemed for the concourse of the noblest and greatest youths, who came to signalize themselves there, some for their strength, others for their activity, courage, wit, learning, and other valuable Accomplishments.

The prize which was given to the victors at these Pythian games, was originally a garland of oaken boughs, which was afterwards changed into one of laurel. The reader may see the fuller account of all these games in Potter's antiquities (1).

(D) We have already spoken of these two brothers in a former section, and shew how they came to their share of the Argolic kingdom†. Our author adds that Bias, to oblige his Brother, having undertaken to fetch the oxen from Thessaly, was caught in the attempt, and flung into prison. But being a famous diviner, he plied his art so well with Iphiclus the owner of them, by foretelling many surprizing events to him, that he obtained them as a recompence of his extraordinary skill. Bias brought them to Melampus, who presented them to Nelus, and he left them to Nestor, who caused them to be kept in a stable under ground, which was still to be seen in our author's time.

(E) The centaurs were fabled to have the upper part of their bodies, that is, from the navel upwards like a man, and from thence downwards like a horse, and to have been the monstrous offspring of Io, when she embraced a cloud instead of Juno. The ground of this story was, that these people did manage their horses so well, that they were supposed by other nations, to be but one creature with them, and as the most famous of them dwelt in a canton called in Greek Νεφέλη, which signifies a cloud; hence came the fable of their being begotten of Io on a cloud.

(1) ch. xxi. & seq. † See. iii. p. 354. c. de his vid. & Pausan. in Messenic. ch. xxxviii.

^a Nor can it be supposed that any thing but their extraordinary valour could have saved them from being swallowed up by some of their neighbours, considering that their scanty territories consisted only of four small kingdoms or districts, as often disjointed from each other under different princes, as united together under one.

For this reason we shall not pretend to give here a list of their kings, much less of those petty tyrants, who reigned, some over one or more, others over all the four districts; but shall content ourselves with mentioning what we find most remarkable under any of them during this fabulous and heroic epocha (F). At the head of all must be placed the celebrated Argonautic expedition, which happened in the reign of Pelias king of Thessaly about the year of the world 2720, or a hundred ^{Year of the} years before the taking of Troy. We do not however pretend to settle this epocha ^{from 1714.} with any certainty; but have followed that of archbishop Usher, without entering ^{Before Christ} into the difference between Sir Isaac Newton and him. The occasion of this expedition was as follows:

^c Æson the third in descent from Æolus, being either worn out with age, or weary of government, whilst his son Jason, whom he had by Polymela, or according to others by Alcimedea, was yet very young, appointed Pelias his brother by the mother side guardian of the kingdom till his son came of age. Pelias on the other hand, who had resolved to secure the government to himself, sent to consult the oracle about it, and was bid to beware of the man that had but one shoe. It happened some time ^{Argonautic expedition.} after that as he was sacrificing to Neptune, he called his nephew to him, who was on the other side of a rivulet, and Jason, making more haste than good speed to cross the brook, dropped one of his shoes, and gave him occasion to think that he was the person, pointed at by the oracle. He then asked him what course he would take with a person of whom the oracle had bid him beware, and Jason readily answered, that he would send him to Colchis in search of the Golden Fleece (G). His uncle took him at his word, and sent him immediately upon that enterprize¹. Jason made no difficulty to obey, and having engaged a considerable number of young noblemen, the flower of all Greece, to this expedition; he procured a ship to be built for his purpose at Pegasa, by one Argus, from whom he called it Argos, and hence ^d he and his gallant company were called Argonautæ.

THESE adventurers, after many strange difficulties and exploits, which the reader will find in the margin (H), arrived at length at the land of Colchis, where the golden

¹ Lib. i.

(F) Among the fabulous exploits of the gods we must not omit the rape of Cyrene a beautiful virgin, daughter to Hypseus king of Thessaly, by Jupiter, who conveyed her from the mountain of Pelion to that of Cyra, upon which Battus, so called from his stammering, settled a colony, and built a city which he called by the name of that princess, after which he is said to have recovered the free use of his speech, as the oracle had obscurely foretold (2). There is also a fountain of the same name near that city, which was dedicated to Apollo (3).

(G) This fabulous fleece was then in possession of Æetes king of Colchis, a country lying between the Euxine sea and Iberia, and now called Mengrelia. It then had some considerable mines of gold which gave rise to the fable of the fleece. The country abounding also with poisonous drugs and plants, which Medea, king Æetes's daughter, knew how to prepare and make use of; the poets thought fit to turn her into an enchantress. The fable adds that the fleece was hung upon a large oak in the grove of Mars, and was guarded by a dragon who never slept.

(H) The first place they touched at was the island of Lemnos, in the Ægean sea, inhabited by female warriors, who though they had killed their husbands, in order to lead an Amazonian life, yet were so charmed with these brave youths, that they took them to their beds. They sailed next to the country of the Deliones, where they were kindly received by their king Cymeus, but loosing from thence in the night, and being driven back by contrary winds, they were mistaken for Phrygians, with whom they were then at war. A fierce engagement ensued, in which Cymeus, and a great number of his men were killed on the spot. The return of day light having discovered the unhappy mistake, they only stayed to bury the dead, and sailed to Nysia, a country in Asia Minor, near the Hellepont†.

Here Hercules plying his oar with more might than skill, unluckily broke it, and whilst he was gone into the wood to cut himself a new one, Hylas, his beloved boy, was stolen by a nymph, as he was drinking at a fountain, so that whilst he and his brother-in-law's son Polyphemus went in search of him, the Argonautæ left them behind, and sailed into Bithynia.

Here Amicus the son of Neptune, king of the country, a man of prodigious strength, having obliged them, as he did all strange comers, to fight with him at hurlebats, was killed by Pollux one of the Argonautic heroes. The Berbraces seeing their king fallen would soon have revenged his death on the victor, had not his brave companions rescued him from the danger, after which they sailed immediately to Salmydessus a city in Thrace, where they consulted the famous blind soothsayer Phineus, concerning the success of their expedition.

This person, who, according to the fable, was continually infested with Harpyes a monstrous kind of bird, with golden fleece was kept. They went immediately to the metropolis, where Jason acquainted Æetes king of the country with Pelias's command, and demanded the fleece of him. Æetes promised to deliver it to him provided he could yoke together by his own single strength, two fierce and terrible bulls (which had brazen hoofs, and breathed out fire and flame, and had been presented to him by Vulcan) and plow the ground with them, sowing it with the dragons teeth which Minerva had given him, and were the remainder of those which Cadmus had sown at Thebes™.

(2) Justin. l. xiii. c. 7. (3) Pausan. in Lacon. † See before, Vol. II. p. 323. b.

Jason, perplexed how to perform these conditions, was happily relieved by Medea the king's daughter, who was fallen in love with him. She promised him that if he would marry her, she would assist him in it, and he had no sooner agreed to it, than she gave him a medicine, with which having anointed his body and armour, he was to be proof against the violence of the bulls, or, according to others, she taught him how to tame those fierce creatures, so as to be able to yoke and make use of them. She told him moreover, that the teeth which he was to sow, would presently spring up into armed men, which would infallibly destroy him, unless he raised an immediate dissention among them, by throwing stones at them, during which he might easily cut them off. Jason having successfully performed the task, went and demanded the fleece according to Æetes's promise, whilst he, instead of delivering it, was contriving how to destroy him and his company, and burn their ship. To prevent this mischief, Medea went, and by her enchantments, cast the watchful dragon into a deep sleep, stole the fleece, and brought it to her lover, who took her, and, at her desire, also her brother Abfyrus into his ship, and sailed away immediately with his companions. Æetes, who was soon informed of his daughter's treachery, pursued immediately after them, which when she perceived, she cut her brother in pieces, and scattered his mangled limbs about, in hopes to stop his further pursuit, as it actually did. For the disconsolate king, surprized at her unnatural barbarity, stayed to gather up the fragments of his son's body, and buried them in a place called from thence Tomi, and in the mean time she and the Argonauts escaped into Thessaly, not without having first felt the effects of Jupiter's anger for the murder of Abfyrus (I), and after having spent four whole months in this expedition.

DURING his absence, Pelias, who never expected his return from Colchis, had taken some means to cut off his father, in order to fix the kingdom upon himself and his son Acastus, and the old king being apprised of his plots, had poisoned himself by drinking a draught of bull's blood. His queen likewise, oppressed with grief for his death, and the supposed loss of her son and kingdom, had hanged herself, so that Pelias now thought himself secure on his throne, when, contrary to his expectation, Jason with womens faces, and foul long claws, who devoured one part of his provisions, and poisoned the rest, with the stench they left upon it, promised to direct them safely to Colchis, provided they would rid him of that infectious vermin, which they accordingly did. He then, among other directions, bid them beware of the Simpligades, two rocks, or, according to others, two islands, about half a league distant from the straits of Bosphorus, and so near together, that at a distance they seem to run against each other, and which the poets say were often pushed so close by the force of the winds, that they shut up the passage. He therefore advised them to let a pigeon through it, and not to attempt the straight, unless they saw him got safe to the other side; they followed his advice with some success, the pigeon having lost only one part of his tail, and the ship received a small bruise on its hinder part.

™ Id. ibid. Vid. HIND. ubi supra, l. i.

From this straight they sailed to the mouth of the river Parthenius, and were honourably received by Lycus king of that country. Here Idmon the son of Apollo and Asteria, and a soothsayer of their company, was killed by a wild boar. Typhis their pilot did likewise die here, and was succeeded by Ancæus. At length having crossed the river Thermodon, and mount Caucasus, they arrived safe at Colchis, which was the end of their journey*.

(I) The fable adds that Jove, having pursued the Argonauts with dreadful storms, and cast them upon unknown coasts, the ship Argos, to their great surprise, spake to them, and assured them that that god would never be appeased till they were cleansed from their murder by Circe, a famed sorceress, supposed to have been the daughter of Sol by the nymph Perse, who lived in the island of Æea. They had no sooner obeyed this miraculous order, than, sailing by the coasts of the Syrus, they were delivered from the danger of their enchanting music, by the more charming voice of Orpheus. Thence they sailed between Scylla and Charybdis invironed with the fire and smoke, which seemed to issue out of those and the neighbouring rocks. They were however delivered from this danger also, by Tethys and the Nereids at Juno's command, and came at length to Corcyra, the island of the Phæacians, where Alcinous then reigned. Here they were overtaken by the Colchians, whom Æetes had sent in pursuit of them. These went immediately to the king, and demanded Medea to be delivered to them, which he promised to do in case she was not already married to Jason. But his queen being apprised of this promise, went and married them privately and out of hand, so that the Colchians, being forbid to return home a Jason returned successful and victorious, and brought the fleece to him (K). However, he had so well strengthened himself in it, that Jason, brave and well accompanied as he was, did not dare undertake any thing against him openly. Medea was forced to have recourse to her magic to be revenged on the tyrant, and, as some say, restored Jason's father to life. After this she persuaded Pelias's daughter to boil their old father, on pretence she would restore him to life and youthful vigour, but upon her non-performance Acastus mounted the throne, and having performed his father's funeral obsequies, banished Jason and his wife from Thessaly, who went and dwelt at Corinth, where we shall find them again in the next section.

* Apollon. Argonaut. l. ii. Apollod. l. i. Vid. Hind. Hist. Græc.

Acastus is famed for having been a great hunter, and for the incontinency of his wife Hippolyta, or, as she is called by others, Cretbeis; which proved fatal to him. She was in love with Peleus the son of Cacus, and had solicited him in vain for some time, till enraged at length at his constant refusal, she accused him to her husband for having made some attempts upon her honour. Acastus believing her, and endeavouring to kill Peleus, was himself and his unchaste wife slain by him.

THE next Thessalian prince both in time and fame was the celebrated Achilles the son of Peleus, and Tethys the goddess of the sea. This hero was king of Phthya, one of the four provinces of Thessaly, and is feigned to have been dipped by his mother in the river Styx (L) when he was a child, and to have become invulnerable by it in every part, except the heel, by which she held him. After this she sent him to be brought up by the centaur Chiron, where he learned music, arms, and the riding of the great horse. Being afterwards warned by the oracle, that if he went to the Trojan war he should meet with his death there, she dispatched him privately in woman's apparel to Lycomedes king of Scyros, an island in the Ægean sea, and one of the Cyclades, where among other exploits, he debauched Dejanira one of the king's daughters, by whom he begot the celebrated Pyrrhus, afterwards king of Epirus. This transaction, as Pausanias observes, seems to have been designedly omitted by Homer, as unworthy of his hero, though it has been preserved by all the other poets.

In the mean time the Grecian chiefs being likewise forewarned by an old prophecy, d that their enterprise against Troy would prove unsuccessful, unless they had Achilles with them, Ulysses undertook to find him out, and to bring him to that war, which he accordingly did. Tethys finding that her son was determined to prefer a glorious death before the walls of Troy, to an inglorious immortality, prevailed upon Vulcan to make him an unpenetrable armour, with which he went at the head of his bold Myrmidons to the fatal siege. Here he forbore acting for some time upon a pique he had taken against Agamemnon on account of a beautiful female captive; but his resentment being at length swallowed up in the death of his dear friend Patroclus, who had been killed by Hector, Achilles thenceforth sought nothing but to revenge it, which he soon after did. Hector was not only slain, but most barbarously used by him e after his death, he having caused his body to be tied to his chariot, and dragged thrice round the walls of Troy. This inhumanity did not go long unpunished, and home without her, were forced to settle in this island, whilst the Argonauts sailed towards Crete.

Here Medea was again forced to make use of her enchantments to deliver the ship from being sunk by the stones, which Talus, a man of brass, and the present of Vulcan to Minos, then king of that island, threw at it. This extraordinary man is feigned to have had one continued vein from his neck to his heel, the end of which was closed with a brazen pin; hence they pretend that Medea, under pretence of making him immortal, only plucked out the pin and let out all his blood; others say she poisoned him with some deadly potion. From Crete they came to Ægina, an island inhabited by the Myrmidons, whom they were forced to fight to get a supply of fresh water. Hence sailing by Eubœa and Locris, they arrived at length at Iolus, the place whence they first set out *.

(K) We have observed already in a former note, that by this golden fleece was understood some mines in the country of Colchis. These are supposed by some mythologists to have been contiguous to some of those torrents which fall from the neighbourhood of mount Caucasus, and to have brought down with them some quantities of gold dust, which the inhabitants saved by setting fleeces of wool across some of the narrow passages of those currents. This is indeed the most rational account that can be given of that matter, which the fabulous poets afterwards disguised after their custom, and embellished with the stories of dragons, brazen bulls, dreadful seas, dangerous passages, and many such difficulties which attended the search after that precious metal.

As for the account which Suidas gives of it, that it was a parchment book made of sheep's skin, and in which was written the whole secret of transmuting all metals into gold; it scarcely deserves to be mentioned.

(L) We have already spoken of this river in the history of Arcadia.

* Id. ibid. vid. G. Pausan. Pass.

Priam having redeemed his son's shattered remains at an excessive price, Paris, another of his sons, soon after shot Achilles in the heel, the only place in which he was not invulnerable*.

THE two most memorable things which the Thessalians are since recorded for, are, their driving the Bæotians from the country of Arne, a small territory in Thessaly, so called from its metropolis built by Bæotus the son of Neptune, by Arne, the daughter of Æolus (M), the second of that name, who was the son of Hyppotes, and grandson of Mimas king of Æolis; and their constant wars against the Phocians. The former of these happened according to Thucydides sixty years after the taking of Troy, and about a hundred after their first settlement in that territory; when, the Bæotians being driven thence, went and possessed themselves of a country then named Cadmeis, and called it by their name Bæotia. We have elsewhere spoken of that country, and given another etymology of it, to which we refer the reader.

As for their wars with the Phocians (N), it is not easy to guess at the true ground of them, only we find that there was an irreconcilable hatred intailed between those two nations, which proved a constant source of fresh and bloody encounters, in which the Thessalians, though superior in strength, especially on account of their cavalry, were very often worsted by the policy of their enemies, witness those statues of Apollo, Minerva, Diana, and other trophies which Pausanias tells us they set up both on their borders, and at the temple of Delphos, in memory of their signal victories over them. The truth is the kingdom of Phocis was very mountainous, and the avenues to it very rugged, so that the Thessalians, who seem still to have been the aggressors, could receive but little benefit from their horse. On the contrary, the same author gives us a remarkable instance, in which it even proved detrimental to them. We shall give it our readers pretty near in his own words*. The Phocians having got intelligence that the Thessalians were invading them by the road of Hyampolis (a city situate near the mount Parnassus) they strewed all that way with empty pots and pottsherds, which they covered however so well with earth, that the Thessalian horse, who came riding full speed, did not perceive it till they were so intangled in it, that they were all cut in pieces by them*. Their desire of revenge, soon made them raise a more powerful army than the former, which so alarmed the Phocians, who dreaded above all their cavalry, more formidable for their famed dexterity than for their number, that they sent to consult the Delphic oracle concerning the event of this invasion. The answer they received was, That a mortal and a deity were going to engage in a bloody fight; that both would come off victorious; but that the mortal would get the better. Upon receiving this answer, they sent Gelon with 300 men in the night to observe the motions of the Thessalians, but with express orders not to engage with them, but to return by some by-ways. But he falling unfortunately into their hands with his men, they were all either trampled to death by their horses, or put to the sword. The news of this threw the Phocians into such consternation, that they resolved either to conquer or perish to the last man. Their first care was to secure their wives and children, the statues of their gods, and what else they had that was valuable, in a convenient place, near which they reared a large pile of wood. They committed the care of all these to some thirty of their most resolute men, with orders that if they lost the day, they should murder their wives and children, and set fire to the pile of wood, and fling all their other riches into it.

THIS desperate resolution, which gave rise to the proverb of the Phocian despair, was no sooner taken, than they marched directly against their enemies, and the

* See before, Vol. II. p. 321. c. † lib. i. * In Phocid. c. xiii. * Ibid. c. i. Vid. & HERODOT. l. i. & viii. JUSTIN. DIOD. & al. * HERODOT. l. viii. PAUSAN. in Phocid.

(M) This Æolus finding his daughter pregnant, is said to have sent her to Metapontium, a city in Italy (4), where she was delivered of two sons Æolus and Bæotus, the former of whom possessed himself afterwards of the isles in the Tyrrhenian sea, since called by his own name Æolides, in one of which he built the city Lipara. Bæotus went to Æolis to his grandfather and succeeded him in his kingdom, calling the country Arne from his mother, whilst his people retained that of Bæotians from him (5).

(N) The Phocians were a people who inhabited the tract of land which lies between the south border of Thessaly, and the Isthmus of Corinth. It seems therefore that this their neighbourhood was a constant source of their wars, whatever other motives there might be for their invincible hatred. We shall give a fuller account of this warlike nation in the close of this section.

(4) Id. sub voc. METAPONT.

(5) D. Sicul. c. 4.

- a remembrance that the fate of their wives, children, country, and all that was dear to them, depended on the success of this combat, made them engage with such desperate fury, that they gained a complete victory, which soon unfolded the meaning of the oracle. For upon enquiry they found that the Theffalian word for the onset was Minerva Itonia, and that of the Phocians was the name of Phocus their founder; in gratitude therefore to the Delphic god, they erected a statue to him, together with those of their most famous heroes and generals in his temple at Delphos.

- THE Theffalians were still more strangely outwitted, upon another expedition against the Phocians, when having entered their territories, and forced them as far as mount b Parnassus, they were routed by the following stratagem, devised by Telias, a famous diviner, who was then in the Phocian army, and highly esteemed amongst them. They took six-hundred chosen men, and covered their armour and faces all over with plaister, and sent them into the Theffalian camp in the dead of the night, with orders to kill every man they met with, that was not plaistered over like themselves. These in their march being first perceived by the outguard, and afterwards by the whole camp, and mistaken for some strange army of ghosts, threw their enemies into such panick fear, that they killed 3000 of them upon the spot, routed the rest, and got a considerable spoil, the tenth of which they sent to the Delphic Apollo, together with one-half of the shields of the slain; the other half was hung up as a trophy
c in the city of Abas. These frequent foils however did but the more heighten their implacable hatred against them, insomuch that they never ceased their hostilities against each other till each ceased to be a nation. But this as well as their affairs with the other estates of Greece, will be best seen in the following chapter.

- HAVING said so much of the Phocians war against the Theffalians, we shall here subjoin an account of that brave nation, and of their territories, inconsiderable indeed with respect to the smallness of them, yet richly deserving our notice upon several accounts, though not worth being treated of in a separate section, considering how little we do know of its original foundation, succession of kings, d government, and laws, and other such-like particulars.

¶ Phocis was situate in Græcia Propria, and, as we lately observed, between Theff- Situation and limits.
saly and the bay of Corinth, having the former on the north, and the latter on the south. On the west it was bounded by Ætolia, Locris, and Ozolea, and on the east, by Bæotia and Megaris, so that it was hemmed in from the sea on all but the south side. Its greatest length was from north to south, that is from 38 deg. 45 min. to 39 deg. 20 min. or about 35 miles; but very narrow from east to west, scarcely extending 30 miles, that is, from 23 deg. 10 min. to 20 deg. 40 min. at the widest, but about 23 miles towards the Corinthian bay, and much narrower still towards the north.

- e THIS country is generally allowed to have took its name from Phocus the son of Namus. Ornytion, a native of Corinth; but having been soon after invaded by the Egineta, under the conduct of another Phocus, who was the son of Æacus king of Ænopia (O), the memory of the first did insensibly give way to that of the second.

- Phocis* is famed for several celebrated mountains, the three principal of which Mountains.
were, 1. that of Parnassus, sacred to Apollo, and extolled by all the poets. Its height was such, that Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha with many others are said to have saved themselves on the tops of it, from the deluge which happened in that prince's time, and has since gone by his name. 2. Helicon, and 3. Cytæron, both consecrated to the muses, and on that account highly celebrated also by the poets. They are said
f to contend with that of Parnassus for height and bigness. Phocis had no rivers of any note except the Cephisus, which runs from the foot of Parnassus northward, and empties itself into the Pindus, which last was near the boundary of that kingdom.

¶ Id. ibid. 1 HERODOT. ubi supra. 2 STRAB. PAUSAN. MELA, CLUVER. &c. 3 Id. ib. Vid. & VIRG. Ovid. PERS. &c.

(O) This Æacus was the reputed son of Jupiter by Ægina queen of Ænopia, called afterwards from her Ægina. He is recorded to have been a prince of such strict justice, that after his death, Pluto appointed him one of the three judges of hell. It is no wonder therefore if his son Phocus, whom he had by his second wife, who was the daughter of Nereus, one of the gods of the sea, did quite eclipse and obliterate the fame of his predecessor.

It had several considerable cities, the chief of them was that of Delphos, or a Delphi (P), famous for the temple of Apollo, whose oracle was resorted to from all parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa. We have had occasion to speak something of the name, antiquity, richness and magnificence of it in a former section, and there given an account of the manner in which that oracle was consulted and delivered; and shall now add such other particulars as we find recorded concerning the original of it. We have already hinted that Apollo was the deity who presided over it. How he came by it is variously reported, that may be seen in the margin (Q). Its first discovery was owing to some goats who were feeding on mount Parnassus, upon which was a miraculous, deep and large cavern, but with a narrow entrance. These goats having been observed by the goat-herd, whom Plutarch calls Coretas, to frisk b and leap after a strange and unusual manner, and to have uttered strange and unheard-of sounds immediately upon their approach to the mouth of the cavern, had the curiosity to go and view it, and found himself seized with the like fit of madness, skipping and dancing, and foretelling things to come. At the news of this whole multitudes flocked thither, many of whom were possessed with such phrenetic enthusiasm, that they threw themselves headlong into the vorago; insomuch that they were forced to issue an edict to forbid the approach of the cavern. After this they placed the tripod at the mouth of it, upon which a virgin being seated, received and returned the answers of the deity in the manner we have elsewhere described^c. We meet with some different accounts of this wonderful place, which c Pausanias has given us upon the credit of the Phocians, and which the readers may see in that author^d. This miraculous place was soon after covered with a kind of chapel, which the same author tells us was originally made of laurel boughs, and was more like a large hut. This, if we may credit the Phocian tradition, was succeeded by one of wax, and reared up by the bees. After this a third was built of solid copper, and said to have been the workmanship of Vulcan. This last was destroyed by an earthquake according to some, or by fire which melted the copper, according to others, and then a sumptuous one, all of stone was erected by Agamenes and Trochimus.

Delphos among several other cities of Greece, and Peloponnesus contended for being d situate in the middle, or, as the Greek expresses it, the navel of the world (R)^e, because the navel is in the middle of the body. It had so convenient a harbour, and was so excellently well situate, being rather in the heart of Greece than of the world, that it became in time a sessions town for all the Grecian estates. Here sat the court of the Amphictyones, chosen out of the prime cities of Greece, and called so from Amphictyon the first founder of this high court^f. The time of their assembling was in spring and autumn; causes of all kinds were brought before them from all parts of Greece, and their sentence was deemed definitive. We shall have frequent instances of the power of this court in the course of the Grecian history. The following one which relates to the Phocians shall suffice for the present. e

THE Phocians having presumed to plow the territories of Cyrra, which were consecrated to the Delphic god, were summoned by the other Grecian estates before this court, and had a considerable fine imposed upon them for their sacrilege. They

^c Vid. DIOD. SICUL. Biblioth. lib. iv. ^d PAUSAN. in Phoc. ^e Vid. STRAB. Geogr. l. ix. PAUSAN. ubi supra, & Corinth. ^f PAUSAN. in Phocid. ch. ii.

(P) So called, as is supposed from the Greek Ἀδελφοί, brethren, because Apollo and his brother Bacchus were both worshipped there. The fable says, that Bacchus having been terribly torn and mangled by the Titans, was brought to Apollo, who both restored him, and ordered divine honours to be paid to him in this temple.

(Q) Some say that this oracle did originally belong to the earth, and used to give its answers by dreams. Others, that Neptune and the earth were at first partners in it, but that he resigned his share to the earth, who was succeeded by her daughter Themis, the same who was consulted, according to Ovid, by Deucalion and his wife after the flood, and taught them how to repopulate the earth. Themis in time resigned it to her sister Phoebe, and she to Apollo (1).

Some antient poets do indeed tell us that he did not come so fairly by it, but that he took it by main force from the earth, for which she was like to have precipitated him into the infernal regions; had not Jupiter come to his assistance (2), who seems on all hands to have confirmed the possession of the oracle to him.

(R) The fable says that Jupiter, desirous to know the exact middle of the earth, let loose two eagles, Pindar says crows, and others swans, the one from the east, and the other from the west, and that they met in this place. The city of Philus and some others pretend to the same; but Strabo places it in the middle of Greece (3).

(1) D. SICUL. lib. xvi. PAUSAN. in Phocid.
(3) Geogr. l. ix. Vid. & PAUSAN. in Corinth.

(2) Pindar. Euripid. in Iphigen. S. b. li. in Æschyl.

- a refused to pay it on pretence that it was too large, and the next session their dominions were adjudged confiscated to the use of the temple. This second sentence did but exasperate the Phocians the more, who at the instigation of one Philomelus; or, as he is called by Plutarch, Philomedes, went and seized upon the temple, plundered it of its treasure, and held the sacred depositum for a considerable time. This second crime brought all the estates of Greece upon them. A war was decreed against them, which was called the holy war, and lasted ten years, during which the Phocians having hired a number of foreign troops, made a noble defence, and would in all probability have held out much longer, had not Philip of Macedon given the finishing stroke to their total defeat and punishment. The war being ended the
- b grand council assembled again, and imposed an annual fine of sixty talents upon the Phocians, to be paid to the temple, and continued till they had fully repaired the damage it had sustained from them; and till this was done, they were excluded from dwelling in any walled towns, and from having any vote in the grand assembly. They did not however continue long under this heavy sentence; their known bravery made their assistance so necessary to the rest, that they were glad to remit it; after which they continued to behave with their usual courage and gallantry, and soon obliterated their former guilt, as we shall see in the next chapter.

CONSIDERING therefore the great concourse of people which this Amphibolyon court, the Delphic oracle, and the games celebrated in honour of Apollo, brought into

c the city of Delphi; to say nothing of the vast offerings, and presents which were sent from all parts of the world, even by the very Scythians unto that oracle, we shall not need wonder at its having been one of the richest and most opulent of all Greece; though that proved likewise the occasion of its being so often plundered by other nations, as we shall see it was, in the very next chapter.

- THE next in dignity both for its antientness and grandeur was the city of Elatea, situate on the river Cephissus, and said to have been built by Elateus the son of Arcas the fourth king of Arcadia, and to have been peopled by a colony of that antient nation, which came with him into Phocis. Aba was likewise
- d considerable for having Abas the son of Lynceus, and Hypermnestra for its founder, and for having also an oracle of Apollo. This was also the only city that was not levelled with the ground after the holy war, when all the rest were destroyed; but whether spared out of respect to Apollo, to whom it was consecrated, or, as Pausanias affirms, because it had no hand in the plundering of the Delphic temple, we will not affirm. Cirra, on the sea-side of Delphi, was the port-town to it, and Crissa, so called from Crissus the son of Phocus, was another sea-port. These were both situate on the bay of Corinth, which was sometimes called Sinus Crisseus from the latter. The last city of any note was Daulis, not so much for its bigness or richness, as for the tallness and stoutness of its inhabitants, and much more for the inhuman repast which was served there to Tereus king of Thrace, by the women of
- e this city, by whom he was soon after murdered for the double injury he had done to his sister-in-law Philomela, daughter of Pandion king of Athens (S). As for the other exploits of the Phocians, they will be best seen in the next chapter.

* Ibid. c. Vid. & BYZANT. sub. VOC. EARTH.

(S) The fable goes that Tereus after having married Progne, did likewise ravish her sister Philomela, cut out her tongue and cast her into prison, to prevent her discovering his villany, but she found means to acquaint Progne with her double misfortune, by working the whole story of it on a piece of embroidery, which she sent to her. Progne took the opportunity of the approaching feast of Bacchus when they were all to meet together, and having got her sister out of prison, made her kill her son Itis, whom she had by Tereus, and having baked him in a pie, ordered it to be set before him. When Tereus was apprised of this, he endeavoured to kill both his wife and her sister, but they by the help of the Daulian women, got the start of him and killed him. Ovid has since turned him into a lapwing, Itis into a pheasant, his mother into a swallow, and Philomela into a nightingale, who is still bewailing the misfortune of her family.

Pausanias adds, that no swallows do hatch or breed in all that canton, either in chimnies or houses, as they do every where else (4).

(4) Phocid. c. iv.

S E C T. VII.

The history of the antient kingdom of CORINTH.

THIS little estate was situate on the isthmus of Corinth, having the bay of ^a that name, now called Golfo de Lepanto, and the isthmus or neck of land, which joins Peloponnesus to the continent on the north, Sicyon on the west, the gulph of Saron on the east, and the kingdom of Argos on the south. Its utmost extent from east to west was about half a degree, that is, from 23 deg. 50 min. to 24 deg. 20 min. east longitude, and from north to south about half that space, that is, from 38 deg. 21 min. to 38 deg. 36 min. north latitude. It had no rivers of any note, but abounded with mountains, the chief of which was called Acrocorinthium, at the foot of which the city of Corinth, and on the top of which the citadel were built. It was also famed for the mountain Pyrene, sacred to the muses, and supposed by some to be the same that was called Fons Caballinus, in Greek Hippocrene, or the ^b fountain of the horse, which was feigned by the poets to have sprung from the horse Pegasus striking his foot against the rock. Others place this last fountain on the hill Helicon, but the greatest part on that of Parnassus. As for that of Pyrene we shall speak more of it by-and-by.

Corinth is said to have been founded by Sisyphus, the son of Æolus, and grandfather of Ulysses. This Sisyphus is the same who was killed by Theseus for the many robberies he committed in Attica, and afterwards condemned by Jupiter to an endless punishment in hell (A), for having caught that intriguing god in the height of an amour with Ægina, the daughter of Asopus king of Bæotia. The antient name of this city was Ephyra, which it took from a nymph of that name, said to have been ^c the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, or, according to others, of Myrmex, the wife of Epimetheus the son of Japetus, and brother of Prometheus. The time of its foundation by Sisyphus is placed about the year of the world 2490, or six years before Deucalion's flood.

Its new name of Corinth is variously traced, some thinking that it was so called from the Greek κορηδος, satiety or abundance, implying the opulence of the place; others go still farther for its etymon^b; but the antient inhabitants, pretended it had its name from Corinthus the son, as some of them said of Jupiter, or as others of Marathon, and brother of Sicyon (B). But most authors ascribe the name and building, or rebuilding of it to Corinthus the son of Pelops. Among other names ^d it antiently had, we find that of Heliopolis or city of the sun, for which this reason is commonly given, that the poets feign Apollo and Neptune to have contended for it, and that Jupiter having appointed Briareus the cyclop their umpire, he adjudged the isthmus to the latter, and the promontory which commands the city to the former (C).

However,

^a Vid. HIND. hist. of Greece, lib. i.

^b Id. ibid.

^c Vid. APOLLOD. DIO. PAUSAN. & al.

(A) This punishment, as it is feigned by the poets, consists in the rolling of a great stone to the top of a hill, which he has no sooner reached, than it tumbles down again, so that his labour is never to be at an end.

(B) Pausanias quotes an antient Corinthian poet called Eumelos (some fragments of whose poems are still preserved in that author, and in the works of Athenæus) according to whom, Marathon was the grandson of Aloëus, who was the son of the sun. And being for some reason afraid of his mother Epope's anger, he retired into some of the maritime coasts of Attica; but after his father's death, being returned into Peloponnesus, he divided the territories of Sicyon and Corinth between his two sons Sicyon and Corinthus, from whom they took their names. Sicyon being formerly called Asopis, and Corinth Ephyra (1).

(C) If Dion Apollodorus, and other mythologists, may be believed, the gods were so fond of Greece, that in Cecrop's time each of them contended to have, at least, one city, where he might be particularly worshipped. Neptune came the first into Attica, where striking the ground with his trident, he formed a sea. Minerva came soon after, and in Cecrop's presence planted an olive-tree, which the last quoted author tells you was still to be seen in his time (2). These two deities disputing their claims to the country on account of the present each had made to it, Jupiter caused the controversy to be decided by the twelve gods, who adjudged the city of Athenis and all Attica to Minerva.

But whether Corinth was called Ηλιοπολις from its being adjudged by Briareus to Apollo, or from Corinthus's being reputed the great grandson of the sun, or from the height and directness of its situation

(1) Pausan. in Corinthiac. c. i. (2) Apollod. l. iii.

- a However, we meet with a number of other ancient cities of that name, or rather appellative, it being common in those days to dedicate cities to some of the gods; and surname them accordingly, without losing their original name.

Corinth had, besides the abovementioned citadel on the eminence called from it Acrocorinthus, two port towns, namely Lecheum, situate on the bay of Corinth, and Cenchrea (D) on that of Saron. These were the only two havens, and indeed the only two cities of any note next to Corinth, that belonged to this territory. And these were so well situate for naval commerce, and so near the metropolis, that they made ample compensation for the barrenness of the soil. These two naval roads which opened a way into the Ionian and Ægean seas, might easily have gained them a superiority, if not a command over all Greece, had not this advantageous situation inclined them more to a commerce than war. For their citadel being almost impregnable by nature, and commanding both those seas, they could easily cut off all communication from one-half of Greece to the other, so that it was not without reason called one of the fetters of Greece. But their genius leading them to improve these advantages more to navigation and commerce than to martial exploits, they became in time exceeding opulent, so that the little influence they had over the other estates, was rather owing to their wealth, than to their valour.

As their opulence daily increased, not only by their commerce, but by the great numbers of strangers that flocked thither from Europe and Asia, their city became in time one of the finest in all Greece; being adorned with sumptuous buildings, such as temples, palaces, theatres, porticoes, cenotaphs, baths, and other edifices, all of them enriched with a beauteous kind of columns, capitals, and bases, from which the Corinthian order took its name, with numberless statues done by the most famous artists⁴. Insomuch that with respect to its riches (E), greatness, and excellent situation, it was thought by the Romans equally worthy of empire with Carthage and Capua. Among other artificial rarities we may reckon the sumptuous embellishments of the fountain of Pyrene, we mentioned a little higher (F), consisting of several caves in form of grottos all covered with white marble, from which the water of that fountain falls into a large basin, and is very pleasant to drink. 2. The theatre. 3. The stadium or course, both which are of white marble. 4. The temple of Neptune, whose avenue was lined on one side with the statues of all those who had won the prize at the Isthmian games (G), and on the other with stately

⁴ PAUSAN. in Corinth. c. ii. & seq.

tion and territory, is scarce worth enquiring. Only we can't omit a conjecture of the learned Gronovius (3), that it was originally called Ηλοπολις from the ruggedness and barrenness of its situation and territory, for such Strabo tells us (4) it really was.

(D) That this last was a distinct city from Corinth, at least in St. Paul's time, we may gather from Acts xviii. 18, and from his epistle to the Romans, Ch. xvi. p. 1. though it had the epithet of Corinthiaca in the poets for being one of the havens of that little estate, as Corinthus had that of Bimaris, for being so conveniently situated between two seas.

(E) We need not a more pregnant instance of their wealth and luxury than that of the courtesan Lais, who usually exacted 10,000 drachms for every night's lodging, which made the famous Demosthenes say that he did not design to buy repentance at so dear a rate. But she met with a worse fate in Thessaly, whither she went in search of fresh customers; for there the women, envious of her beauty, and jealous of their husbands and sons, put her to death.

(F) Pausanias tells us this fountain owed its first origin to the tears which Pyrene shed for the death of her son Cenchreus, who was unfortunately killed by Diana. He adds, that it was commonly believed that the Corinthians dipped their copper in that water, as soon as it came out of the furnace, to give it a better temper; but he assures us that it was a vulgar error, since they had no copper among them (5).

(G) The origin of these games is variously reported; some say they were instituted by the Corinthians in honour of Melicertes, the son of Athamas and Ino (6). The fable says that Athamas king of the Orchomenians, having taken Ino the daughter of Cadmus in second marriage, after he had had two sons by his first wife Nephele, Ino proved so cruel a step-mother to them that her husband grew enraged at her, and having put Leareus one of the sons he had by her to death, would have killed her and her other son; but that she, to avoid her husband's fury, having thrown Melicertes down into the sea, and herself after him (7), a dolphin took the young prince upon his back and swam with him to Corinth, where the Corinthians received and highly honoured him, changing his name into that of Palæmon, and instituting these games in memory of his deliverance. The victors were, according to our author, crowned with pine leaves.

But the generality attribute them to Theseus in honour of Neptune; the reader may see what we have said of that hero in a former section †.

They were afterwards obliged to appoint new games accompanied with sacrifices in honour of the sons of Medea, whom they had unjustly put to death, and for which it seems they had been punished by the gods with the death of their own children, who used to expire unaccountably in their cradles, till

(3) Not. in Byzant. sub voc. Corinth.
(7) Apollod. l. i. † Vol. II. p. 366. c.

(4) Geogr. l. vii.

(5) Corinth. c. iii.

(6) Id. ibid.

stately pines set in regular rows. The temple itself, which was not very spacious, ^a was adorned with a multitude of brazen Trytons, or Sea Gods. Here were also the chariots of Neptune and of his wife Amphitrite, both drawn by horses covered all over with gold, except their hoofs, which were of ivory. The two deities were carved in a standing posture, and Neptune had young Palæmon riding on a dolphin by his side. The bases of the chariots were likewise adorned with curious bas-reliefs, and the temple with a multitude of other embellishments. It were endless to describe all the other edifices, and master-pieces of architecture, carving, and painting, with which this small spot of ground was enriched, the reader, if he please, may see them described more at large by Pausanias abovementioned.

BUT while the Corinthians seemed so wholly given up to traffick and luxury, ^b that they neglected the encouragement of the liberal arts and sciences, and even that noble thirst for glory and conquest, for which their neighbours did so much value themselves; they did not forget to cultivate a good discipline, both in peace and war, their wealth and opulence, which made them insolent at home, and envied abroad, made both indeed very necessary. And though they seldom, if ever, engaged in any war with a view of enlarging, but chiefly either of defending their territories, or to protect some neighbouring estate, or to maintain the liberty of Greece; yet has this little kingdom furnished many brave and experienced generals to the rest of the Grecian cities, insomuch that it was common for these to prefer a Corinthian general to one either of their own, or of any other estate. The truth is, the Co- ^c inthians were of all others the greatest assertors of liberty, and though they continued some centuries under a monarchical government, yet they always shewed an aversion to tyranny, and a readiness to assist those who groaned under it.

THE Corinthian monarchy did not however continue in the lineal succession of their founder Sisyphus, who is supposed to have began it about the year of the world 2490; above seven or eight generations, or about 470 years, when his line became extinct, or, as others affirm, was dethroned, and expelled the kingdom by Aletes, one of the Heracidae, about the year of the world 2920. From him we meet with a long succession of kings of his line, concerning the greatest part of whom little else remains but their names, and the years they are said to have reigned; for this ^d reason we think it needless to give here a list of those monarchs, whose names the reader may see in Eusebius's chronicle, and shall content ourselves with mentioning the most remarkable transactions that happened during this epocha. After the ending of Sisyphus's line, the kings who descended from Aletes affected to call themselves Heracidae, he being the great grandson of Antiochus the son of *Hercules. This name however they changed for that of Bacchiade, from Bacchis the fifth in descent from Aletes, whom we may therefore suppose to have been upon some account or other more famous and esteemed than his ancestors. These Bacchiade held the kingdom of Corinth near as long as the Heracidae, by which time they grew so numerous on the one hand, and on the other so weary of kingly government, that they ^e intirely dissolved it in the reign of Telestes their last king. This prince being become very odious to his subjects, his two kinsmen Arieus and Perantas formed a conspiracy against him, and at once deprived him of his kingdom and life, after he had reigned twelve years', and in the year of the world 3104. After his death two hundred of the principal Bacchiade seized upon the government (H), and shared the administration of affairs among themselves, electing a supreme magistrate out of their own body whom they called Prytanis, to preside over the rest. Corinth continued under the Bacchiadal aristocracy till the year 3349, when Cypselus descended from them by the mother's side (I), having received some obscure hint from the oracle

Year of the
flood 1915.
Before Christ
1084.

Year of the
flood 1099:
Before Christ
1900.

* PAUSAN. ubi supra, c. iv. † Id. ibid. vid. & DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.

till the murder was, by the advice of the oracle, expiated by those annual ceremonies. In further memory of this murder they erected a statue representing fear, in honour of Medea, and their children used to go in black, and with their hair cut, and this custom lasted till all the old race of the Corinthians was extirpated with their city (8).

(H) Some antient authors do indeed tell us that Automenes, the son of Telestes, did reign one year after the death of his father (9), and it is not unlikely that he made some vain effort to keep the crown; but Pausanias takes no notice of him, but tells us the dissolution of their monarchy did immediately follow the murder of that king (10), but whether in the last year of this or in the first of that, 'tis agreed that the government was then changed into an aristocracy.

(I) His mother Labda the daughter of Amphion, one of the Bacchiade, was lame, and so deformed, that none of her tribe cared to marry her. Wherefore her father gave her to one Eetion, a man descended at a great distance from the Lapithæ, contrary to the settled maxim of the Bacchiade, who had a oracle that he would be king of Corinth, and that he should be succeeded by his son, but not by his grandson; found means to wrest the power out of their hand. The time of this usurpation, which according to the oracle continued only in Cypselus and his son, happened about the 30th year after the annual archontat of Athen, and is therefore beyond our present epoch. From Sisyphus the first founder, to this Cypselus, the Corinthian government had stood almost 860 years, or 430 years in the line of Sisyphus, 130 in that of Altes, 130 in that of Bacchis, and about 150 under the Aristocratic government of the 200 Bacchiadae.

(8) Vid. Pausan. Cor. c. iii. (9) Euseb. D. Sicul. & al. (10) Corinth. c. iv.

Sisyphus is generally allowed the first founder of the Corinthian kingdom (K), he was the son of Aeolus, and was killed by Theseus for the many inroads which he made into Attica, as we hinted at the beginning of this section. He left several sons, and amongst them Glaucus who succeeded him, and Ornythus, or, as he is generally called, Ornytion the father of Phocus, who carried a colony into Phocis, and called the country after his name, as we have shewn before.

Glaucus called by Euripides Creon (L), received Jason and Medea into Corinth, after they had been both expelled Thessaly by Acastus the son of Pelias. Here they lived about ten years quietly enough, till Creon having married his daughter Glauc to Jason, the slighted sorceress Medea was so enraged at it, that she set the palace on fire, murdered all the children she had had by Jason, and fled to Athen^b. Pausanias adds, that Glaucus having assisted at the funeral games, which Acastus had instituted in memory of his father, was trampled to death by his own horses^c, and that Glauc flung herself into a fountain in hopes that the water of it would preserve her from Medea's enchantments, and that that fountain was since called by her name^d.

Bellerophon, so called from his killing a man named Beller, was the son of Glaucus or Creon. We have seen in a former section how he was forced to retire into Argos, for that manslaughter, and there falsely accused by Stenoboea of an attempt upon ^a Vid. APOLLOD. l. i. c. 9.

D. SICUL. Bibl. Hist. l. iv. & EURIP. in Medea.

^b ELID. c. iii.

^c Id. in Corinth. c. iv.

had till then refused to intermarry with other families the better to secure the government to their own.

This Eetion having no children, went to consult the oracle of Delphi, where he was told, though in very obscure terms, that he should have a son by his lame wife that would prove a scourge to Corinth. On the other hand the Bacchiadae having likewise been forewarned by the same oracle, and in the same intricate terms, against Eetion's offspring, sent ten men of their own body to murder the boy, Labda had lately brought forth; and as these were going to Eetion's house, they agreed that he to whom the child was delivered should kill him. Their pretence was to congratulate Eetion on the birth of it in the name of their whole body, and Labda, ignorant of their real intent, readily gave him to the first that asked for it; but the infant at that instant smiling in his face, and he not having the power to strike the blow, gave it to his next companion, and he, moved with the same pity, gave it to a third. The child was thus handed through all the ten, and restored unhurt to the mother, after which they withdrew.

They were no sooner got out of the house, than they began to blame each other for not performing the deed, and agreed to go in again and be equal sharers in the murder; but the mother, who had overheard their discourse, took care to convey the child under a bushel or corn-measure, called in Greek Κυψέλη Cypsel, from which he afterwards took his name. Pausanias calls it a coffer or chest, and adds, that it was made of cedar, and adorned with some fine carvings in gold ivory, and that it was afterwards consecrated by his descendants to Juno

Olympia, in memory of his wonderful escape (11). However that be, the bloody deputies having searched the whole house in vain, returned to their brethren, and being ashamed to own their weakness, made them believe that they had executed their orders, and Cypselus thus wonderfully preserved, became in time the tyrant of Corinth, as shall be shewn in the next chapter (12).

(K) Pausanias doth indeed quote an antient poet named Eumelos, who pretends that this country had been given by the sun to Aetes, and that he, accompanying Jason in the Argonautic expedition, left the government to Butus the son of Mercury, from whom it having pass'd in time to Corinthus the son of Marathon, who died without issue, or according to Apollodorus left only one daughter, the Corinthians invited Jason and Medea to come and reign over them; and that Jason having taken a dislike at Medea, and gone away from her, she appointed Sisyphus her successor (13).

But there are two solid arguments against this poetic fiction, the one that Sisyphus was the brother of Cretheus, and this the grandfather of Jason, so that these two could not be cotemporary. The other is that Sisyphus must have been dead some time before Jason came to Corinth, since Euripides tells us in his Medea, that Creon did then reign there, who is supposed to be the same with Glaucus the son and successor of Sisyphus (14), as we shall see immediately.

(L) The author above quoted supposes him to be so called, not as it was his real name, but as it implied his regal dignity, Creon in Greek signifying the same as reigning or governing.

(11) Pausan. in Elid. c. xvii.

(12) Id. in Corinth. c. iv. Vid. & Herodot. l. v.

(13) Corinth. c. iv.

(14) Vid. Paulmier. & Gedoy. in eund. ibid.

her, for which he was sent by Prætus to Jobates king of Lycia, to be put to a death (M). The first dangerous expedition which the Lycian king sent him upon, was to subdue the Solyms, a neighbouring people, against whom he sent him with a very small number of forces; but that defect being supplied by his bravery, he overcame them; and, as the learned Bochart supposes, their three gods, which they painted on their ensigns^k, one in the shape of a lion, a second of a goat, and the third like a dragon, and which he probably joined together in his own in memory of this conquest; gave birth to the fable of his killing the monster Chimæra (N). His next expedition was against the Amazons, from which he not only came off victorious, but extricated himself also from an ambush of Lycians, which Jobates had set to way-lay, and murder him in his return; and killed every one of b them. Jobates at length, struck with admiration at his bravery and success, sought no more how to be rid of him, but how to reward his services, which he did by giving him his daughter Philonoe in marriage, and declaring him his successor^l.

ALL these achievements however, if we may believe the poets, were not done without an extraordinary assistance. For Minerva, who took pity of the innocent prince, lent him the famous horse Pegasus (O), after she had been at the pains to tame and break him to his hands, to whose help he is affirmed to have been beholden for the most signal of his exploits, especially that of killing the Chimæra^m, against which Neptune was likewise pleased to give him his assistance. After these successes and great change of fortune, he is said to have grown so insolent and presumptuous, that it c brought a new series of mischiefs upon him, which gave occasion to the fable mentioned in the last note, of his having attempted to fly up to heaven upon Pegasus, by whom he was flung down into the valley of Cilicia, where he died blindⁿ.

WE took notice above that Thoas the son of Ornytion, succeeded Creon or Glaucus; from him the crown descended to his son Demophon, to his grandson Propidas, and lastly to his two great grandsons, Doridas and Hyanthidas. It was in the reign of these two that the Dorians invaded the kingdom, with Aletes one of the Heraclidae at their head, who forced the two brothers to yield the crown to him, and to lead a private life at Corinth. Aletes was the son of that Hippotes, who had been banished Peloponnesus for ten years, by order of the Delphic oracle for killing one Carnus an Arcanian d prophet in the war of the Epigoni against Thebes, mentioned in a former section.

He met however with an obstinate resistance from the Corinthians, who shewed upon that occasion a great reluctance to submit to a foreign prince; but unfortunately for them, Aletes and his brave Dorians proved too strong, beat and expelled them out ^k Phaleg. lib. i. c. 6. Sicul. &c.

^l PAUSAN. ubi supra.

^m APOLLOD. l. ii. c. 3.

ⁿ Id. ibid. PAUSAN.

(M) It is likely, as Pausanias observes (15), that Bellerophon never reigned at Corinth, and that he was forced to fly into Argos before his father's death; but what the same author adds, that both he and the Corinthians were then subject to the Argives, doth not so well appear. It is true those Corinthian troops that went to the siege of Troy, are said by Homer not to have been led thither by one of their kings, but to have marched under the ensigns of Agamemnon. But might they not have gone as mercenaries under him, as did also the Arcadians?

However, as Bellerophon never returned from Lycia to Corinth, we find Thoas his cousin, the son of Ornytion on the throne there; and 'tis likely that he ascended it after Glaucus's death, and during Bellerophon's absence.

As for the exploits of this hero, they have been so blended with fable, that we hope our readers will be contented with a bare mention of them, divested as much as possible from the poetic fictions, with which those writers have disguised them.

(N) This monster the poets feigned to have had the head and breast of a lion, the body of a goat and the hinder parts or tale of a dragon, and that it spit out fire and flame (16). We have seen what the learned Bochart thought of it. The reader may see his arguments, which are far from despicable, in the place above quoted. Others think that it was a mountain in Lycia, which had some volcano on the top; that the upper part of it was only frequented by lions, the middle by goats, and the foot by serpents, and that our hero having cleared it of all that vermin, gave rise to the fable of this Chimæra (17).

Others again suppose it to have been a noted pirate among the Lycians named Chimarras, who had the lion, goat, and dragon, painted on his ship, and was overcome by Bellerophon, after having infested those parts a considerable time, and done great damage to Lycia and all the neighbouring kingdoms (18).

(O) This famous winged creature is feigned to have sprung from Medusa's blood. The Corinthians had a temple dedicated to Minerva, whom they surnamed Chalinitis, from the Greek Καλνις, a bit or curb bridle, because she had clapp'd one in his mouth, in order to break him for our hero's service.

The fable adds, that Bellerophon being got on the back of Pegasus, was so affrighted at his mounting in the air, that he fell down, and that the horse, finding himself without a rider, flew up to heaven, where he was turned into the constellation that still bears his name.

(15) In Corinth. Comm. in Virg.

(16) De hac vid. Hesiod. Theogn. Lucret. Horat. Ovid. &c.

(17) Vid. Serv.

(18) Plutarch. de virtut. Mulier. & Hind. Hist. Græc.

a of that metropolis, and got at length the quiet possession of the kingdom. From him it passed through a succession of his descendants, under the names of Heraclide and Bacchiade, till Telestes the ninth from him. This prince being very young when Aristomedes his father died, had been left to the care of his uncle Agemon, who soon after mounted the throne, and not only held it from him sixteen years, but left it to his own son Alexander, who reigned also twenty-six years; but was at length killed by Telestes, whom it seems they had still suffered to live during this long usurpation, and who then seized upon his right, and enjoyed it till he was himself killed by a faction, as we hinted above; immediately after which followed the aristocracy of the 200 Bacchiade under their annual Prytanes *.

* PAUSAN. ubi supra. EUSEB. Chron. l. i. D. SICUL. ubi supra.

S E C T. VIII.

The history of the antient kingdom of Lacedemon or Sparta.

a THE original name of this country was Laconia, a name which this nation still prided themselves in, after it was afterwards changed into those of Spartans and Lacedemonians. As for those of Sparta and Lacedemon, though they be often confounded by writers antient and modern, yet in propriety of speech, the former was only the name of the metropolis, so called, according to the tradition of that people, from Sparte the daughter of Eurotas, and the latter of the kingdom or nation, and so called from Lacedemon the husband of Sparta, and heir and successor of Eurotas. The same tradition adds, that Eurotas was the grandson of Lelex, surnamed also Eutychtos, because he was supposed to have been originally a native, and from him his subjects bore the antient name of Leleges. Lelex was succeeded by his eldest son b Myles, and this by his son Eurotas, who finding the country very unhealthy and incommo-dious, by reason of the bogs and marshes, with which it was covered, cut a spacious channel through it, into which such quantities of waters drained themselves, that it became a large river, which he called by his own name. Eurotas having no male issue, married his daughter Sparte to Lacedemon, the supposed son of Jupiter by Taygeta (A), and appointed him his successor, from which time they agreed to call the kingdom by his name, and the city which he built soon after, and made the seat of the kingdom by that of his wife *. Thus far the Laconic tradition, others, however, derive the name of Sparta from Spartus the son, according to some, or, according to others, the brother of Phoroneus b, the son of the great Inachus the founder of Argos. Others make him the son of Anydas c; Stephen of Byzantium d tells us of one Sparton, who is in all likelihood the same person, whom others call Spartus, and this is by some reckoned the brother, and by others the son of Phoroneus e; but this last is confuted by Pausanias, who tells us that he doth not believe that Phoroneus had any son of that name, and that the Lacedemonians themselves did not acknowledge any such person. We omit that monstrous account which some give of Sparta's being so called from Cadmus making an irruption into Laconia with his Sparti, who were said to have had that name given them, because they sprang from the teeth of the dragon which he had sown, and which we have mentioned elsewhere. This monstrous story is even rejected by the Greeks d themselves as a fiction. Under this variety and uncertainty of opinions we think it would be vain to make further inquiries concerning the original of that name; as

* PAUSAN. in Laconic. ch. i. Vid. & St. BYZANT. sub voce Sparta & Laconia. b EUSEB. Chron. c EUSTAT. in Iliad. B. d Sub voce Lacedemon. e Idem in voce Mycenas.

(A) This princess was the daughter of Atlas, king of Mauritania, and uncle of Jupiter, and is said to have been ravished both by him and by his brother Neptune; from her the mountain Taygetus had its name, on which was a noble monument erected in honour of her son Lacedemon. Near this place was also a village called Aleſies, from the Greek Alaw, to grind, because Myles the son of Lelex is reported to have found the first mule there, and to have made use of it for grinding of corn (1).

This mountain was likewise famous for furnishing huntsmen with a great variety of wild beasts, such as bears, boars, deer, and vast quantities of wild goats (2).

(1) Pausan. in Laconic. c. 20.

(2) Id. ibid.

for that of Lacedemon, it is generally agreed to be from the Lacedemon mentioned a above (B).

Geography.

Laconia was situate on the south-east nook of Peloponnesus, having Argos and Arcadia on the north, Messenia on the west, the bay of Argos on the east, and the Mediterranean on the south. Its extent from east to west, where it reached furthest, was 1 deg. 45 min. that is, from 23 deg. 20 min. to 24 deg. 55 min. east longitude; but it grew still narrower, as it extended itself northward. The extent of it from north to south was about fifty miles, that is, from 26 deg. 50 min. to 27 deg. 40 min. north latitude^a. We do not pretend to say that this extent of their dominions was such from the beginning; it is likely, on the contrary, that their boundaries were antiently contained within a much narrower compass, and that a great number of those cities both maritime and inland, which we find in this kingdom, were originally governed by kings of their own, and were not brought under the Spartan government till a long time after. Of this nature were the Heliots, Gythians, and many others, which were forced to yield to the superior power of the Lacedemonians, especially after the Ephori had so far clipped the royal prerogative, and enslaved the people, that they were glad to make war a trade, and to fall foul upon all those neighbouring estates, rather than live an idle and slavish life under those upstart and tyrannic magistrates.

As all the south part of this kingdom was incompassed by the sea, and the east and north-east part by the Argolic bay, it had a great number of promontories, the chief of which were those of Malea and Tanara (C), now Capo Malia, and Capo Matapan. These two being situate on the Mediterranean, form the large Laconian gulph which lies between them, and is now called the Golfo de Colochina, into which the famed river Eurotas mentioned a little higher, and now better known by the name of Basilipotamo, vulgarly Vasilipotamo, or royal river, discharges her waters with an easy and gentle course.

Sea-ports.

ALL the sea-coasts of Laconia were likewise furnished with a considerable number of sea-ports, towns, and commodious harbours. The greatest and most convenient were those of Trinassus and Acra, situate on each side the mouth of the Eurotas; and Gythium, at a small distance from Trinassus. This last Pausanias tells us had the remains of a castle still standing, which might be at first built to guard the mouth of that river which was navigable quite up to Sparta, if not beyond. Gythium was famous, according to the tradition of its inhabitants, for having been built by Apollo and Hercules (D); but the most noted of all was Epidaurus, now Malvesia, seated on the gulph of Argos, now Golfo de Neapoli, a town well built and well peopled, and famed among other things for its excellent wine called Malvesy, or Malmesy, which grew round the neighbourhood of it, and with which it supplied other parts of Greece. There were about twelve more sea-port towns along the Laconian coasts, and what made these still more famed, was a kind of shell-fish caught in that neighbourhood, whose blood was of excellent use for dying of purple, and was inferior to none except that which was caught in the Red-Sea^e.

INLAND towns did likewise abound in this kingdom, the most considerable of which was Sparta the metropolis, called also improperly Lacedemon, and situate upon ^a In Corinth. Vid. & BOCHART. Phaleg. lib. i. c. 22.

^e Vid. STRAB. MELA, PAUSAN. & al.

^b PAUSAN. in Laconic. ch. xxi.

(B) Besides the names of Lacedemonia, Sparta, and Laconia, we find in antient geographers those of Lelegia, from the Leleges, whom Strabo makes the first inhabitants; so that that of Laconia is posterior to it according to him. It was afterwards called Oebalia from Oebalus the sixth from Eurotas. It had also the name of Hecatompolis from the hundred cities which it is said once to have had (3). It is now called Taenonia.

(C) This cape which juts out a great way into the sea, had two ports, one named Achilleus, and the other Pjamatheus. Here was also the famous temple of Neptune built in form of a grotto, falsely supposed by the poets to be the passage out of which Hercules brought Pluto's dog Cerberus, since there is no subterranean place under it; but what seems to have given rise to this fancy was, that here was bred a most dreadful serpent, whose bite was so mortal, that it was thence called hell-hound, and which was afterwards killed by Hercules, and carried by him to Ereäbens (4).

(D) They pretend that these two, having disputed a long while about a tripod, and at length amicably ended their quarrel; agreed to build this city at their common charge, for which reason the inhabitants of it pretend themselves not to be sprung from mortal men, and had the statues of those two gods in their market-place, as of the authors of their origin (5).

(3) Vid. Strab. Geogr. lib. viii.

(4) Id ibid. Pausan. Mela, &c.

(5) Pausan. ubi supra.

th:

a the river Eurotas, at about thirty miles distance from the mouth of it. This city, if not founded, was at least beautified by Lacedemon, the first king of it. The next for antiquity and grandeur was Amyclæ, built by Amyclas the son of Lacedemon, and famed afterwards for the birth of Castor and Pollux the sons of Tyndareus, eighth king of Lacedemon, and distant about eighteen miles from the metropolis. It was afterwards famed for sending a considerable colony of its own inhabitants into upper Calabria, who built there a city which they called by the same name. This city was afterwards destroyed by the Dorians, and turned into an inconsiderable hamlet, in which however there were seen some of the ruins of its antient grandeur. One of the finest buildings that escaped the common ruin was the temple and statue of Alexandria, whom the inhabitants pretended to be the same with Cassandra the daughter of Priam. 3. Helos ruined by the Spartans (E). 4. Tbulana, near to which is the famous lake of Lerna, where Hercules slew the Hydra. 5. Leuclrum, upon the bay of Messenia, and situate near the sea. We find two other cities of this name, one in Arcadia, and the other in Achaia; but this was the most remarkable of the three¹.

MOUNTAINS they had in great number, the country was divided from Messenia, by one ridge of them, and from Arcadia by another; and this latter was a very long one², besides those which were in the heart of it. The greatest part of them however, were more celebrated for some fabulous exploits of their gods and heroes, than for any thing else they were remarkable for, and may therefore be passed by. c Rivers of note, besides the Eurotas abovementioned, were the Smenus, which had its head near the foot of the mountain Taygeta, and thence empties itself into the sea, and whose waters are famed for their sweetness and pleasantness. The Thiasus, said to have had its name from the daughter of Eurotas. The Scyras, where Pyrhus the son of Achilles, landed, after he came from Scyros to marry Hermione. This river having till then no name, was from thenceforth called Scyras. We omit some others of less note.

THE soil was very rich, especially in the low and flat grounds, and their being so well watered by rivers, and from the mountains, made it excellent for pasture-ground; but their being so overthwarted with hills and mountains, hindered them d from being so well tilled as they might have otherwise been. But the country was much better situated for trade and navigation, by having the sea round above half the kingdom, and so many fair havens upon it. How well they improved these advantages, how powerful they became, and what noble fleets they entertained, and brave experienced admirals they bred, will be seen in the sequel of their history. The truth is, the Lacedemonians were a brave courageous people, hardy, and inured to the trade of war both by sea and land, averse to sloth and luxury, jealous of their honour and liberty, as well as of their neighbours power; they were wanting in no civil or military discipline in order to secure the one, and curb the other. And by these means it was that they became so powerful, and came to make so e considerable a figure in Greece.

THEIR government was like all others originally monarchical. Their kings had indeed some magistrates under them, whose advice and council they made use of upon all emergent occasions; but as these were chosen by the prince, and might be turned out at pleasure, they seldom had courage enough to contradict him in any thing, so that his will was still the supreme law. In this manner it passed through a succession of twelve princes, from Lacedemon the son-in-law of Eurotas, and founder of this monarchy. Not indeed constantly in the male-line, which being extinct in Castor and Pollux the sons of Tyndareus their seventh monarch, it passed to Menelaus, then king of Messenia, in right of his wife Helena, Tyndareus's daughter. From him f it passed to his sons by a former wife, after which it returned again to the descendants of Helena, in Orestes the son of Agamemnon, whose son Tisamenus being outed

¹ De his Vid. PAUSAN. ibid. & BYZANT. sub voce. * MELA, lib. ii. c. 4. & alibi. STRAB. ubi supra.
² Vid. THUCYDID. l. ii. PAUSAN. in Laconic. PLUTARCH. in Lycurg. DIODOR. SICUL. &c.

(E) These people whose city had been built by Helius the son of Perseus, had a worse fate than any of the rest. For having refused to pay the tribute imposed upon them by Agis, the third king of the Heraclian line, the Lacedemonians fell upon them with an army, took them prisoners, reduced them to the lowest and most miserable slavery, and, to complete all, made a law, which forbid their masters either giving them their liberty, or selling them into other countries (6).

(6) Strab. ubi supra, p. 363. & 365.

by the Heraclidae, went and reigned in Acbaia, leaving the kingdom of Lacedemon a to the sons of Aristodemus, Eurysthenes, and Procles. For, though some have placed their father at the head of the Herculean list, yet it is more likely that he had been dead before they had finished the conquest of this kingdom, if not even before they entered into Peloponnesus (F).

HOWEVER, whether under him, or his twin-sons, Eurysthenes and Procles (G), abovementioned, the government took a quite new form, and instead of one sovereign, became subject to two. For these two brothers did not divide the kingdom between them, as had been done at Argos, Messenia, Arcadia, and elsewhere; neither did they agree to reign alternately, as Eteocles and Polynices had done at Thebes; but, whether pursuant to their father's will, or by virtue of some mutual contract, b they resolved to govern jointly, and with equal power and authority; both bearing the title of king of Lacedemon, and both being acknowledged and obeyed as such. Pausanias adds, that the Delphic oracle being consulted about this new form of government, the pythones did not make any objection against it*. What is still more surprising is, that this biarchy, if we may be allowed the expression, did not end with those two brothers, though from their mutual jealousy and antipathy, one would hardly have expected it to have outlived even them, but continued in this condition under a bipartite succession of thirty princes of the line of Eurysthenes, and twenty-seven of that of Procles, and ended in both near about the same time (H).

BUT though this title and succession continued thus long in those two lines, yet c was the power and authority soon curtailed through the discords which must inevitably have reigned between them. Eurysthenes was succeeded by his son Agis, from whom all the descendants of that line were surnamed Agidae, as the other line took the name of Eurytionide from Eurytion the grandson of Procles. These two soon came to divide themselves into two distinct parties, under which the people who are not always the dupes of those that govern them, did list themselves according as their affection or interest led them; and this obliged their heads to court them by largesses, by some new privileges, and other such-like condescensions, which though they served the present purpose, yet could not but prove in the end prejudicial to the d royal prerogative. This the Lacedemonians soon perceived, and being become conscious how impossible it would be for either side to hold the reins of government under such disadvantageous circumstances; they became the haughtier and more insolent, as they found their affection and assistance necessary to either competitor. This gave birth to fresh complaints, murmurs, and every pretence or stratagem which did but weaken the regal power. The consequence of all this was, that the people instead of becoming more tractable by any concession, grew the more turbulent and headstrong, taking every advantage they could against those, who thro' e either their easy nature, or through necessity, were glad to court their affection, and vexing and blackening those, who had courage enough to curb and use them with any severity. By these divisions the regal dignity was brought into such contempt, that the government was upon the brink of falling into anarchy and confusion, when the great Lycurgus took the reins of it during some part of his nephew Charilaus's minority.

* PAUSAN. ubi supra, c. i.

(F) We have already taken notice that this prince who was the son of Aristomachus, and brother to Cressphontes and Temenus, is said to have been killed by lightning at Naupactus in Ætolia, whilst their navy was getting ready for this expedition; here it was that he left his twin-sons Eurysthenes and Procles, whom he had by Argea the daughter of Austeson, his successors, both to the expedition and to all the conquest they should make in it.

Pausanias says he was killed by the sons of Pylades and Eletra, who were cousin Germans to Tisamenus the son of Orestes, before this expedition. And the Lacedemonians pretended that Apollo had shot him to death at Delphos, because he came thither, not to consult the oracle, but to advise with Hercules, who was there at that time, about the means of invading Peloponnesus; so that upon the whole it appears that he was dead some time before the conquest of that peninsula by the Heraclidae.

(G) This last is sometimes called Procles, and sometimes Protocles by Strabo. Plutarch calls him Patrocles; but Herodotus, Apollodorus, Cicero, and Pausanias, always call him Procles; it is likely, this difference is owing to the inadvertency of copyists, some of whom were used to abridge words and names, and others to write them at length.

(H) When Cicomenus III. the last of the first line, having killed his copartner Eurydamidas, was shortly after vanquished by Antigonus, as shall be seen in the following chapter.

- a THIS great patriot and lawgiver was the son of Polydectes the sixth king of the Eurytionian line, but by a second wife. However, his elder brother dying without children, the right of succession remained in him, and he accordingly took the administration upon him, waiting however to see whether his sister-in-law was with child. This princess finding herself pregnant, acquainted him with it privately, and with a promise that if he would marry her, she would take some effectual method to destroy the embryo. Lycurgus, though shocked at the proposal, yet gave her some distant hopes that he would comply with it, but withal used all proper means to prevent her miscarrying, till the time of her delivery was come, when he sent for some persons of note to be present at her labour. She was soon after brought to bed of a son, the news of which being sent to him whilst he was at supper with some noble Spartans, he came immediately, and taking the child in his arms, said to those who were present, This is your king, laid him on a chair of state, and gave him the name of Charilaus. This generous action did not however satisfy all the Spartans; the incensed queen, by the help of her brother Leonidas, persuaded many of them, that he was only acting a game in order to seize and make himself the more sure of the crown by the death of the young prince. To prevent therefore so vile an insinuation, and so far from his intention, from gaining credit, Lycurgus withdrew himself into a voluntary exile, from which he returned not till Charilaus was married, and had had a son to succeed him. This last action having at once put an end to all those unjust surmises, which had been raised by his enemies, and procured him the esteem of all those that wished well to their country; he met with less difficulty in the prosecution of his more glorious design of new modelling the government. Another circumstance which facilitated this change was, that during his absence, such depravity of manners, and corruption in the government, had crept into that miserable estate, that not only his friends, but even those who had been his most zealous enemies, were glad to repeat their embassies, to entreat him to come back and save his country from ruin.

These were the inevitable consequences of that fatal division of the regal authority between two competitors, which however Lycurgus took a quite different method of remedying, than by confining it again to either of the lines, which might have proved too dangerous a task. He contented himself therefore with reducing their authority, by constituting a senate endowed with the supreme power in all civil matters, and leaving to the kings, besides the title and honour, only the management of military and religious affairs, as shall be shewn in the next chapter, in which we shall give a more particular account of the form of government which he established, the body of laws which he framed, and the extraordinary method which he took to give both a sure and lasting sanction.

Thus was the Spartan monarchy changed into a commonwealth, after it had continued in the line of Lacedemon 610 years, that is from the year of the world 2290, in which we place the building of Sparta according to the chronology we have hitherto followed, to its becoming subject to the Heraclidae about A. M. 2900, and continued in the double line of these last during seven reigns, making in all about 280 years more. In the following list therefore of those kings, we shall begin it only from Lacedemon the son-in-law of Eurotas, who may be properly looked upon as the founder of that estate. As to his supposed predecessors, Lelex, Myles, and Eurotas, we shall content ourselves with having mentioned them in the beginning of this section.

And as for those of the Herculean family, who reigned after the change of government made by Lycurgus, besides that they are all out of our epocha, they are more to be looked upon as generals of the Lacedemonian army, than as royal sovereigns, and consequently their names need not be mentioned here.

* Vide Aust. sup. citat.

a

A LIST of the royal Lacedemonian line.

1 Lacedemon	5 OEbalus	9 Menelaus
2 Amyclas	6 Hippocoon	10 Nicostrotus and Megapenthes
3 Argalus	7 Tyndareus his brother	11 Orestes the son of Agamemnon
4 Cynorta	8 Castor and Pollux	12 Tisamenes.

The Herculean line.

1 Eurysthenes	1 Procles
2 Agis	2 Sous
3 Echestratus	3 Eurytion
4 Labotas	4 Prytanis
5 Doryffus	5 Eunomus
6 Agcilaus	6 Polydectes
7 Archelaus	7 Charilaus.

b

1. CONCERNING Lacedemon, we know little more besides what we mentioned at the beginning of this section, except that he built a temple or two of the graces whom he called Phaenna and Clete, celebrated by an ancient poet*, and that his descendants raised a stately monument to him near the town of Alester, where Myles c is said to have found the first mule.

2. Amyclas his successor is still more unknown (I), except for building the city of his name, mentioned a little higher, concerning which there goes a story, that whether by reason of its situation, or any other cause, it was so subject to frequent and strange noises, as of enemies coming upon them, when there was really nothing like it, that the Amycleans made a law that none should dare to alarm the town upon any such occasion. The Dorians taking the advantage of it, came upon them on a sudden and took the town; and hence came the old proverb, I will speak, knowing how the Amycleans were ruined for bolding their peace; and the old saying of Amyclas vivere, was used to signify to see and hear, and say nothing. The people d of this city became afterwards famous likewise for their strict adherence to the Pythagorean doctrine, which forbids the killing of any living creature, and which they did so strictly keep, that they forbore the destroying even of those very serpents which annoyed and destroyed them. We have very little left concerning Amyclas's three successors, Argalus, Cynorta, and OEbalus, except that this last gave his name to a canton of Lacedemonia, which he had either conquered, or which he divided afterwards from the rest, and gave to his son Hippocoon, whilst the rest of the kingdom was assigned to his other son Tyndareus. OEbalus married Gorgophone the daughter of Perseus; by whom he had this Tyndareus, to whom he left the kingdom; but his brother, who reigned in OEbalia, came soon after and deprived e him of it.

WHILST Hippocoon reigned in Sparta, Hercules happened to come thither to be expiated for the murder of Iphitus. Hercules, it seems, after having put away Megara, went to OEbalia, where he won Iole the daughter of Eurytus, king of that country, at shooting against him and his sons, an exercise which that king always proposed to those who came to court his daughter. But the king and his sons, remembering how he had used Megara, refused to give Iole to him, in revenge of which affront he drove away Eurytus's horses, and taking his son Iphitus, who was ordered to go in search of them, up to the top of a high tower, under pretence of shewing him where they were, threw him down headlong and killed him. Hippocoon there- f fore and all his sons did stoutly oppose his being expiated, because they thought the

* ALCMAN. ap. PAUSAN. LACON. c. xviii.

(I) The fable says, that of all the sons he had, he was most excessively fond of Hyacinthus the youngest, because he excelled all the rest in beauty, insomuch that Apollo and Zephyrus became enamoured with him at the same time. Apollo being one day at play, unfortunately slew him with a quoit, and from his blood cauled the flower of his name to spring up.

His disconsolate father erected a stately tomb with his statue, both which outlived the ruin of that city, and appointed a feast to be kept in memory of him. Ovid in his metamorphoses makes this youth the son of OEbalus; but Pausanias, who had seen his monument, says he was the son of Amyclas (7).

(7) LACON. c. i. & xix.

action

^a action too black to deserve such a favour^e, and Hercules stayed only for an opportunity of being revenged on him for his refusal.

He did not wait long for it; for a first cousin of his, named Æonus, who was come with him to Sparta, walking one day along the streets of that city, past by chance before the house of Hyppocoon, out of which a mastiff came and flew upon him. Æonus flung a stone at him, which being perceived by Hyppocoon's sons, they rushed out upon him with cudgels in their hands and beat him to death. There wanted no more to rouse the fury of that sanguine hero, he fell upon them with what men he had about him, but being wounded in the scuffle, he was forced to retire, but came not long after with a strong reinforcement, and gave the battle, ^b killed Hyppocoon and ten of his sons. besides a great number of Lacedemonians; and having taken the metropolis, he recalled Tyndareus, and left the kingdom, which was now become his conquest, to that banished monarch in trust for his own posterity, as we have elsewhere hinted (K).

Tyndareus, or, as he is otherwise called, Tyndarus, more glad to accept the Lacedemonian kingdom upon any conditions, than solicitous about the performance of them, was no sooner resealed upon his throne, than he began to find out means to secure it to himself and descendants against the Heraclide. He had two brave sons by his wife Leda, Castor and Pollux, and two daughters, the famous Helena and Clytemnestra, whose strange birth, as it is fabled by the poets, the reader may find in the margin (L). Helen's fatal beauty had caused her to be stolen away ^c by Theseus as we have seen before, and after she was recovered by her two brothers, Tyndareus, still afraid lest she should be carried off again, had obliged all her suitors by an oath to leave it to her to make choice of the man she liked, and that in case she should be stolen by any other, they would all join their forces to bring her back to her husband. She chose soon after Menelaus the son of Atreus, after which she being stolen away again by Paris, her husband, encouraged by his bro-p Id. ibid. c. xv.

(K) Hercules having succeeded so well in this expedition, is reported to have built a temple to Juno, because she had not thwarted him in it, as she had formerly done upon all occasions, and for want of a better victim, offered her a goat, from which she was afterwards worshipped by the Lacedemonians under the name of Juno Epophaga, or Goat-eater, and that creature became the constant victim which they offered to her there (9).

His last exploit, and with which this is a proper place to finish the History of that renowned hero, was against Eurytus, who retained, as he thought unjustly, Iole from him. He went therefore against him, slew him and his sons, and carried off his daughter with him. Coming soon after to the Ceraean promontory in Eubœa, to offer some sacrifice there, he sent his servant Lychnas to Trachin, to his wife Dejanira for the shirt and coat in which he used to perform that ceremony.

This princess had sometime before been attempted by the centaur Nessus, as he was ferrying her over the river Enneus, and Hercules beholding it from the shore, had given him a mortal wound with an arrow. The monster finding himself dying, advised her to mix some oil with the blood which flowed from his wound, and to anoint her husband's shirt with it, pretending that it would infallibly secure him from loving any other woman; and she, too well apprised of his inconstancy, had actually prepared the poisoned ointment accordingly (10).

Lychnas coming to her for the garments, unfortunately acquainted her with his having brought away Iole, and she, in a fit of jealousy, failed not to anoint his shirt with the fatal mixture, which had no sooner touched his body, than he felt the poison diffuse itself through all his veins; the violent pain of which caused him to disband his army, and to return to Trachin. His torment still increasing, he sent to consult the oracle for a cure, and was answered that he should cause himself to be conveyed to mount Ossa, and there rear up a great pile of wood, and leave the rest to Jupiter.

By that time he had obeyed the oracle, his pains being become intolerable, he dressed himself in his martial habit, flung himself upon the pile, and desired the by-standers to set fire to it; others say that he left the charge of it to his son Philotes, who having performed his father's command, had his bow and arrows given him as a reward for his obedience.

At the same time Jupiter, to be as good as his word, sent a flash of lightning which consumed both the pile and the hero, insomuch that Iolans, coming to take up his bones, found nothing but ashes, from which they took up the notion that he was passed from earth to heaven and was joined to the gods. A fit son indeed for such a father, and a fitter god for such votaries, who could deify, raise altars and temples, offer sacrifices, and institute feasts to a mortal, who had sullied his best actions with, so many murders, rapes, and adulteries. Hercules bequeathed Iole to his son Hyllus; as for Dejanira she hanged herself as soon as she was apprised of the fatal effects of the pretended philtre.

(L) The fable goes, that Jupiter having had an amorous intrigue with her in the shape of a swan, soon after her matrimonial commerce with her husband, the result of these amphibious embraces was, that she was brought to bed of two eggs, out of one of which came Pollux and Helena, and out of the other Castor and Clytemnestra; whence Pollux, as Tyndareus's son, was mortal, but Castor, as the son of Jupiter, is said to have been immortal, and to have divided his immortality with his brother.

The Greeks however, according to Pausanias (8), pretend that Helena was the daughter of Nemesis, and that Leda was only her nurse, and brought her up as her own, but this is a piece of Grecian mythology, not worth disproving.

ther Agamemnon, challenged all those princes who had been her admirers, to the a performance of their promise, and engaged them to the Trojan war, of which we have spoken at length in a former chapter.

Tyndareus, vexed at the incontinency of his two daughters, (for Helena was carried off by her own consent, and Clytemnestra, as we have seen elsewhere, not only lived in adultery during her husband's absence, but murdered him immediately after his return, is said to have built a temple to Venus (M), and erected a statue of cedar to that goddess, with a veil over her face, and chains about her legs, either, as some think to expose her as the cause of their unlawful love, or, as Pausanias thinks, to intimate to posterity the indissoluble tie of wedlock^d. He began likewise to build a stately temple to Minerva, whom he surnamed Poliuchos, or guardian of the city, b but died before he could finish it, and left both that that work and his kingdom to his two sons, after he had reigned about forty years^e.

8. Castor and Pollux went on with the building, designing to have enriched it with the spoils of the city Aphidne, out of which they had rescued their sister Helene, but left it likewise imperfect. The Lacedemonians did afterwards build a new one in that place which was of massive brass, from which it was called Chalciaecos. These two heroes likewise signahed themselves in the Argonautic expedition, and when they came home, they built a temple to Minerva Asia, in acknowledgment of their success, and safe return from Colchis, from which they are also said to have brought away a famous statue of Mars. They had likewise a bloody combat with the sons c of Aphareus, Ida, and Lyncæus, the latter of whom is said to have had such piercing eyes, that he could see even into the trunk of a tree (N). The occasion of their quarrel is variously reported, Theocritus says that they had stolen the daughters of Leucippus the brother of Aphareus, but Pausanias and Pindar say it was only about a herd of oxen. However, in this combat Pollux killed Lyncæus, and Ida was struck dead with lightening. The remainder of their exploits is too fabulous to deserve a place here, we shall give a specimen of them in the margin (O)^f.

9. Menelaus the son of Atræus succeeded them in the kingdom in right of his wife. We have spoken of the war which her rape occasioned, and the success of it in a former chapter. At their return from the Trojan war, being upon some dif- d ference, parted from his brother Agamemnon, after having weathered many violent storms he arrived safely in Egypt with his wife Helene, whither Homer tells us he was driven by contrary winds. Herodotus gives us quite a different account of his going into Egypt, and gives us his reasons for it; but as it contradicts most of the ancient

^g LUCAN. c. xvi. Ch. xvii. De his vid. PLUTARCH. in Theseo. DIOD. APOLLOD. & PAUSAN.

(M) Pausanias adds, this temple, which himself saw, was built after a particular manner, being rather two temples reared the one upon the other, the upper of which was called Morpho, which is but another name of Venus (11), and signifies form or figure, implying that she was the goddess of beauty.

(N) Hence the saying of Lyncæan eyes, and Pindar tells us that he could discover Castor hid in the trunk of a tree from mount Taygetus (12).

(O) These two famous brothers are celebrated by the ancient poets under several names, such as Amalthei from the Greek Amalthe, which signifies a king or prince, such as were originally all the Heathen gods. Amalthei, most probably likewise from the Greek Amalthea, procrastination, delay, to imply their lengthening of life. Jupiter is also called by that name. They were also called Aphorrei, as supposed to preside over the lists; but the name they were most commonly known by was that of Dioscuri, from dei and scuri, because they were reputed the sons of Jupiter.

They are reported to have cleared the country of robbers, and the sea of pirates, and from this last they were worshipped as gods of the sea, and are said to have appeared to mariners in storms, and the notion was that if one was only seen, it betokened shipwreck, but if both together, it was taken for a good omen.

They are likewise said to have appeared at land upon several occasions: they once facilitated the escape of the Lacedemonians under their king Alexander, when they were closely pursued, and likely to be cut in pieces by Aristomenes and his Messenian troops. At another time they came to the very house, where they had lived when upon earth, and begged of Phormio, who was then in possession of it, to take them in for that night, pretending they were strangers come from Cyrene. They asked moreover to lie in one particular chamber, which they had been formerly fond of; but Phormio told them that the whole house was at their service except that chamber, in which was a young woman whom he kept. They seemingly agreed to accept of any other apartment, but on the morrow both the young woman and those that waited upon her, were gone as well as the guests, and nothing found in her chamber but the two statues of the Dioscuri, and a table with some sweet gums upon it (13).

The fable adds that when Castor died, his brother Pollux, who was immortal, prayed to Jupiter that he might share his immortality with him, which being granted, they are said to have lived and died by turns, and to have been at length transformed into the sign Gemini, of which two of the stars are called by their names, and one of which goes down when the other rises.

(11) In Lucan. c. xv. (12) Nemæen. Ode 10. (13) Pausan. ubi supra. c. xvi.

a poets and historians, we shall relate it in the margin (P). Menelaus was succeeded by his two sons by a former wife, or rather by a slave, namely, b 11. Orestes the son of Agamemnon, king of Messenia, came to the Lacedemonian crown in right of his mother Clytemnestra, the other daughter of Tyndareus. We have already mentioned in the history of that kingdom, how he revenged his father's murder on his faithless mother, and her paramour, and ascended the Messenian throne *. He was however accused of that parricide, not, indeed, by his grandfather Tyndareus, who must have been dead long before, but by his uncle Perilaus the son of Icarus, and cousin-german, and consequently the nearest relation of Clytemnestra. He it was who cited him before the great Athenian court called Areopagus, after he had recovered his senses. What their sentence was our author doth not inform us †, but tells us elsewhere, that he had seen an old building which was called Orestes's mansion, in which he was forced to live separate from the rest of mankind, except that they took care to supply him with food and other necessities, till he had quite expiated his crime ‡. He died and was buried in Arcadia, whither the oracle advised him to retire, as we have seen in a former section.

10. Nicostratus and Megapenthes, but the Lacedemonians, unwilling to submit themselves to a spurious offspring, Orestes easily obtained the kingdom, and without any blood shed.

c 12. Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, by Hermione the daughter of Menelaus and Helena, succeeded him both in this kingdom and those of Argos and Messenia, and was soon after ousted out of all by the Heracleidae, who, having by this time invaded Peloponnesus, claimed the latter as being of the line of Perseus, and he only of that of Pelops; and the former, because Hercules having conquered it from Hippocoön, had only left it in trust with Tyndareus, as we have lately seen. What became of Tisamenus is variously reported, some say he was killed as he was defending the kingdom of Argos §; others, and with more probability, say, he escaped into Achaia and reigned there; some time after which he was killed one of the first in a combat against the Ionians, and was buried in the city of Helice, whence the Lacedemonians, by the oracle's advice, afterwards fetch'd his bones and buried them in Sparta ¶. However that be, Philonomus betrayed that metropolis to the sons of d Arifodemus, who, with their forces, entered it with the sound of the flute, an instrument then reckoned very martial, and proper to inspire the soldiers with courage, as well as to keep them in their ranks, for which reason the Lacedemonians made use of it from that time, whenever they sounded to battle ††.

*Eurysthene*s and Procles having thus obtained the kingdom, at first divided it into six parts, every one of which they endowed with all the privileges of the city of Sparta, where they still kept their residence. This, though for the present it had the desired effect of ingratiating themselves to the Lacedemonians, yet in the following reigns proved the cause of many grievous disturbances. For Agis the son and successor of *Eurysthene*s, finding that the people were grown headstrong by it, endeavoured to curb them not only by depriving several cantons of those privileges but by e laying a tribute upon all the Lacedemonians. They did indeed all submit to it, except the Heliois, who were made a severe example to the rest; but these severities failed not to alienate the affections of the people from him.

On the other hand his copartner Sous, the son of Procles, a valiant and warlike prince, gained their esteem by his bravery and new conquests. We have an instance of his conduct recorded very much to his honour, which is as follows; that prince

* See before Vol. II. p. 357. d. † PAUSAN. Arcad. ch. xxiv. ‡ Id. Corinth. c. xxi. § APOLLON. l. ii. c. 8. ¶ Vid. PAUSAN. Achaic. c. i. & STRAB. Geogr. l. viii. † STRAB. ibid. † POLLYAN. Strategem. l. i. c. 10.

(P) He tells us, upon the credit of the Egyptian priests, that as Paris was carrying off that fatal beauty, they were driven by contrary winds upon the coasts of Egypt, where he was accused of the theft by some of his servants who went and took sanctuary in the temple of Hercules. Proteus, then king of the country, having examined the story, detained the woman and the goods she had brought with her till her husband came to demand them, and let the ravisher go as being a stranger.

When therefore the confederate Greeks, who were ignorant of this, came to demand her of the Trojans, and were answered that she was left in Egypt, they believed it mere pretence, and carried on the siege; but when the city was taken, and she not found in it, then Menelaus went to demand her of the Egyptian king.

What inclined our author to believe that this was the real truth of the story is, as he tells us, that if Helene had really been in Troy, it had been madness in Priam to have sacrificed that noble city, and the lives of so many noble Trojans, only to defend Paris in the Possession of another man's wife, since he was neither heir to the kingdom nor equal in worth to many of those that fell in the defence of that city (14)

(14) Herodotus. l. ii. c. 113. & seq.

Being besieged by the Chlorians in a dry stony place, where his army suffered very much for want of water; he was at length reduced to make a treaty with the enemy, by which he obliged himself to restore to them all the places he had taken from them, upon condition that he and all his men should drink of a spring at a small distance from his camp. After the mutual ratifications of the treaty on both sides, Sous having called his soldiers together, offered the kingdom to him that would forbear drinking; but they being oppressed with excessive thirst, not one could be tempted to accept his offer upon that condition. As soon therefore as he had seen them drink their fill of the water, he took some of it in the hollow of his hand, and sprinkled his face with it without drinking one drop, and marched off in the face of the enemy. The consequence of which was, that his abstinence having made the contract void, seeing he and all his men had not drank at the spring, he could safely refuse to resign his conquests to them^a.

Agis, from whom the descendants of that line had the name of Agide, or Agiade, for they are indifferently called by both, was succeeded by his son Echestratus, and Sous, not long after, by his son Eurytion, otherwise also called Eurypon and Euryphon; from him, this line, which had till then took the name of Proclide, exchanged it for that of Eurytionide or Eurypontide, &c. In this reign, some seeds of discord between the Lacedemonians and Argives, began to appear, which were however stifled by the prudence of those two monarchs. The Cynosureans, who were a colony of Argives, and settled in the neighbourhood of that kingdom by Cynosurus the son of Perseus, were complained against by the Argives for not only suffering a parcel of banditti to ravage their frontiers, but likewise for doing the same themselves, and sometimes leading their plundering troops as far as their metropolis. For this the Lacedemonians banished all the Cynosureans that were able to bear arms out of their territories, and by that severity, not only prevented all such ravages for some time, but restored a good understanding between the Argives and them.

BUT this peaceful disposition did not last but till the next reign, when Labotas (Q), the son of Echestratus, and Prytanis, the son of Eurytion, declared war against them. The ground of it was, that though the Lacedemonians possessed the town and territories of Cynosura, by right of their late conquest, yet the Argives were still incroaching upon some part of it, and endeavoured to withdraw their confederates from their alliance and friendship. It doth not appear however that this war was of any duration, at least we find not that any thing remarkable was done on either side. After this, things continued in a peaceful state, at least with their neighbours abroad, though they grew worse within doors through the jealousies and misunderstandings of the princes, both between themselves, and between them and the people. Labotas was succeeded by his son Doryssus, and Prytanis by his son Eunonus, the former of these, as well as his son and successor Agefilaus, are by some said to have reigned but a short while^d, and yet a modern critic hath proved from the authority of Eusebius and St. Jerom, that the former reigned twenty-nine, and the latter forty-four years^e. As for Eunonus, he enjoyed a long reign, and lived to a good old age, but was at length stabbed, as he was endeavouring to quell a riot, in which the parties were come to blows, and left two sons behind him, Polydectes by a former, and Lycurgus by a second wife. He was succeeded by the former, and he dying soon after, left the kingdom to Lycurgus, who only kept it till his brother's wife was delivered of a son, to whom he immediatly resigned it, and banished himself out of Lacedemon, during which time he meditated that new form of commonwealth into which he afterwards modelled that government.

^a PLUTARCH. in Lycurg. vid. & Apothegm. Laconic. ap. HIND. ubi supra. ^b PAUSAN. MEURS. &c. ^c PAUSAN. ubi supra. c. ii. & iii. ^d PAUSAN. ubi supra. c. ii. HIND. hist. Græc. l. ii. p. 97. ^e MEURS. ap. Gedoy. in loc.

(Q) Herodotus, who calls him Leobatus, tells us in his history of Craesus, that the great Lycurgus had been his tutor, but he was certainly out in his chronology, as a learned critic has since shewn (15), since that prince had been dead some time before that lawgiver was born.

(15) Meurs. antiq. Lacedem. ad. Gedoy. in Pausan. Lacov.

S E C T. VIII.

The history of the ancient kingdoms of Elis, Ætolia, Locris, Doris, and Achaia.

^a WE shall join these ancient kingdoms together in one section, because they made but a small figure in the world, in comparison of those that have gone before, and because they have been either conquered by, or blended with them; whilst their being so often mentioned in the foregoing sections, and in the following history of Greece, will not permit us to pass them by without taking notice of their situation, original, antiquities, and history, as far as it can be got out of ancient authors, their wars and exploits, and other such particulars, for which they were formerly remarkable, and are worth our notice here.

THE principal of them is the kingdom of Elis, at first peopled, as is reasonably supposed, by the descendants of Elishab the son of Javan, and grandson of ^b Japhet, if not by Elisha himself, from whom this territory at least, if not the whole peninsula, was called Elis (A), and in the Chaldean Hellas, and by the prophet Ezekiel Elisha, where he celebrates its fine purple dye ^b (B). According therefore to this supposition, which is far from improbable, that this country was peopled by that patriarch, or some of his immediate descendants, it was not without good reason, that the inhabitants of this country and of Arcadia boasted themselves to be Aborigines of Peloponnesus, whereas the others were looked upon as interlopers, which came from more remote parts to settle there, and by degrees elbowed them out of the greatest part of that peninsula ^c.

Elis was situate on the western side of Peloponnesus, having the Ionian sea on that ^c side, Arcadia on the east, Achaia on the north, and the bay of Cyparissos, or Chaloniates, now Capo di Tornese, with Messenia on the south: its extent from east to west was at the widest about forty-eight miles, that is, from 22 deg. 10 min. to almost 23 deg. east longitude; and from north to south about 60 miles, or from 27 deg. 20 min. to 28 deg. 20 min. north latitude ^d.

ITS chief cities were, 1. Elis, situate on the river Peneus, and almost in the heart ^c of the kingdom, and the metropolis of it. It was famous among many other things for a large spacious place called the Xylos (C), where the candidates for the olympic games were obliged to initiate themselves for some time by diet, exercise, and other such preparatives, before they were admitted to appear on the olympic plains ^e. In ^d this place their senate did likewise use to assemble themselves, and the candidates for all kind of dignities and employments, came to give proofs of their abilities and merit. In this city was likewise a temple dedicated to fortune, with the statue of that blind goddess of a surprising bigness, and made of wood, covered all over with

^a Gen. x. 2, & 4. ^b Ch. xxvii. 7. Vid. & BOCHART. Phaleg. l. iii. c. 4. ^c PAUSAN. Elid. c. i. & seq. ^d Conf. STRAB. Geogr. l. viii. MELA. l. ii. c. 4. CLUVER. WELLS, & al. ^e PAUSAN. Elid. c. xxiii.

(A) The poets derive that name from Eleus the son of Neptune, whom they make the first founder and king of it (1). Pausanias tells us that Æthlius the son of Jupiter, and Protonia the daughter of Demalion, was the first who reigned here, and gives some other etymons of the word not worth notice, since we have a much ancients one, and clearer from fiction, in the patriarch Elishab.

(B) It is true, the prophet here speaks of isles, and not of a continent; but we have often shewn that that word in the language of scripture doth not strictly imply an island, but the maritime countries, especially those about the Mediterranean †; and we have the testimony of several ancient authors that the coasts of Elis, and quite up to the Corinthian bay, were famous for a shell-fish which they used in this die, and in which they exceeded all nations except Egypt (2).

(C) So called from the Greek ξύα, to trim or polish. This place was surrounded with a wall, and lined on the inside with plantane-trees of great height, to cast an agreeable shade on the course. Here Hercules, in order to inure himself to hard labour, is said to have spent some time every day in clearing it from weeds, thorns and briars. Near the inclosure of this place was a famous cenotaph or monument erected in memory of Achilles, by the advice of the oracle, to which the women used to repair about sun-set during the time of the olympic games, and to lament the death of that hero by several mournful actions, especially by smiting upon their breasts (3).

(1) Vid. ins. al. Ovid. Metam. & Steph. Byz. sub voce Eleus & Gronov. not. in eund. † Vid. supra, Vol. I. p. 166. & Vol. II. p. 241. (2) Pausan. in Laconic. Vid. & Bochart. ubi supra, & auctor ab eo citat. (3) Pausan. in Elid. c. xxiii.

gold, except the face, hands, and feet. They had likewise several others dedicated a to Diana, Minerva, Jupiter, and Bacchus. This last deity was held in the greatest veneration, and the Eleans pretended that he appeared to them, on the day in which his feast was celebrated (D). Elis had likewise a citadel, in which was a temple of Minerva, and on the helmet of that goddess was carved a cock, because he is supposed the most courageous of all winged creatures f. Here was also the palace of Augeas one of their kings, and the famous stables, the cleansing of which proved a task fit only for the great Hercules (E).

Olympia.

2. THE city of Olympia was the next in dignity; situate on the famous Olympian plains, on which were celebrated the olympic games, instituted by Pelops in honour of Jupiter, and after some suspension, restored again by Atreus and Hercules. b

Olympic games.

They were celebrated every fifth year, and during five days, but with much greater solemnity, and a vaster concourse of people, than any of these we have hitherto mentioned; and from them came the computation of time by olympiads, to be introduced in Greece (F). This city is famed likewise for its magnificent temple of Jupiter Olympus, said to have been built from the spoils which the Eleans got from their neighbours the Piseans; in which was a famous statue of that god 50 cubits high, and reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world, near which is also the famous Olympian wood or grove dedicated to the same deity. As for its ancient name of Olympia, it hath long since changed it for that of Sconri. 3. Pisa, situate on the river Alpheus (G), and near the mouth of it, said to have been founded by Pisus c f PAUSAN. ubi supra.

† See before, Vol. II. p. 356. Not. I.

(D) This feast-day they called Thys. The chapel where they celebrated it was about a mile from the city. Thither his priests repaired on the night before, with three empty flasks which they left there, shut up the temple, and sealed the locks of it, every by-stander being permitted to clap his own seal to them; and on the morrow they attended thither, accompanied with Eleans and strangers, and having first shewed to them that the gates were safe and just as they had left them, they opened them and went in, and found the flasks filled with wine (4).

(E) It is said to have held three thousand oxen, and to have been thirty years with cleaning, so that when Hercules undertook to do it one day, upon condition that he gave him his daughter in marriage, he only turned the river Alpheus, or Penens, according to others, into it, which carried off all the filth in the time prefixed. How that monarch rewarded him for this work we shall see in the sequel.

(F) This solemnity which had been so often interrupted and renewed again by Endymion, Neleus, Pelias, Lycorgus, and others, but without any settled time, was at length restored by Iphitus, and fixed to be celebrated once every fifth year, so that between every celebration, four complete years expired, which some have mistaken for five. Hence every four years was called an olympiad, which computation was afterwards observed for a considerable number of centuries, as well as the solemnity of those games during many generations, without any interruption.

The time of celebrating them was at the full of the moon, whose change immediately preceded the summer solstice. Against that time the priests of Jupiter Olympus, who belonged to the temple of that deity, were to take care to regulate the form of the year, and to observe every new moon, especially that after which the solemnity was to be celebrated, and to cause it to be proclaimed. They were likewise intrusted with the registering of the names of all the victors at those games, and recording every material occurrence which happened between each olympiad.

We must however observe here that this exact and ready way of computing by olympiads, did not begin immediately after the first of them, but commenced only from the first year of the 28th, in which Corabus of Elis obtained the victory in the race, after which the Grecian accounts began to go on in a regular order of time, and from that Epocha the times began to be reckoned historical, whereas those which preceded it, up to the deluge, are called fabulous and heroic, because mixed with fable (5), as those who preceded it were deemed unknown.

(G) This river doth run quite through Arcadia, Elis, and along the city of Pisa, soon after which it is swallowed up in the earth. From thence it is supposed to run, by a subterranean channel under the sea without mixing with the salt water, and so to pass quite into Sicily, where it mixes itself with the fountain Arethusa near the city of Syracuse, inasmuch that any thing that is thrown into it on the Elis's side, is said to come out at the fountain above-named (6). Hence the poetic fiction of Alpheus's love to Arethusa, which tells us that this last, to avoid his amorous pursuit, hid herself underground, and that he was forced to do the same in order to get at her by some subterraneous passage, which he at length accomplished near the place where that river and fountain mix their streams.

Pausanias adds that the Eleans had a law which condemned any woman to death that should either appear at the olympic games, or even cross this river during that solemnity: and the Eleans add, that the only woman who transgressed it, had disguised herself in the habit of a master or keeper of those games, and conducted her son thither; but when she saw him come off victorious, her joy made her forget her disguise, so that her sex was discovered. She was however spared on account of her father, son, and husband, who had gained the olympic prize; but from that time an order was made that the keepers should appear there naked.

(4) Id. ibid.
Hind. & al. plur.

(5) De his vid. Plutarch. Pausan. Var. Scalig. de Emendas. temp. Potter Archaeolog.

(6) Id. Diod. Pausan. & al.

(7) In Elid. cb. vi.

a the grandson of Æolus, and whose inhabitants signalized themselves under Nestor at the Trojan war. This city was afterwards destroyed by the Eleans, because the Piseans took upon them to celebrate the olympic games by their own authority; for this, the Eleans, jealous of their privilege, raised a war against them, and after many battles fought, in which they had still the advantage, they took, plundered, and razed their city, and banished its inhabitants.

It were fruitless to dive into the chronology of this kingdom, since we cannot tell whether the patriarch, from whom it has its name, was the real founder of it, or some of his descendants. As to what profane authors say of it, it is so mixed with fable that there is no receiving any light from it. However, as this is b a fabulous epocha, we shall give our readers a short sketch of what we find about it, which is as follows:

Ætoli is pretended to have been the founder of this little monarchy, which was Kings of Elis. at first distinct from that of Pisa; this last having kings of its own for a considerable time. He was succeeded by his Son Endymion, who married Asterodia, or, according to others, Chromia, the daughter of Itomus, and grand-daughter of Amphistyon (H), by whom he had three sons, Pæon, Epeus, and Ætolus. When these were grown up, he promised his kingdom to him that should win the prize at the olympic race, and Epeus proved the happy victor. Ætolus however stayed with him Ætolus. at Elis, but Pæon, unable to brook the loss of such a noble prize, went to seek his c fortune elsewhere, and settled in that canton on the river Ælus, which took from him the name of Pæonia. Epeus went to the siege of Troy, and is supposed to have been the architect of the Trojan horse. It was in his reign that Pelops, the Lydian, or, according to others, the Papblagonian, came from Asia, killed Ænomaus king of Pisa, seized on his kingdom, and took the city Olympia from the Eleans. Epeus died without male issue, and was succeeded by his brother Ætolus.

THIS prince had not reigned long, before he had the misfortune to kill Apis the son of Jason at the funeral games, which were celebrated on the tomb of Azan king of Arcadia, and was forced to leave Peloponnesus, and went to settle in Ætolia, where we shall find him in the sequel. He was succeeded by Eleus, who is said to d have been the son of Neptune by Eurycyde the only daughter of Endymion, and the father of Augeas, who succeeded him in the kingdom (I).

WE have already mentioned more than once the large stable which this prince is said to have had, and its being cleansed by Hercules. The truth of the story, if we may believe *Pausanias, was, that he kept such large quantities of oxen and sheep, that they had quite covered the earth with their dung, so that it was become incapable of producing either grass or corn. Augeas therefore hired Hercules to clear his grounds of it, who for his reward was to have his daughter and some part of his kingdom. When Hercules had performed the task, by turning the river over them (K), e Augeas refused to give him his hire, pretending that he had done the job more by cunning than by labour. The quarrel was referred to Phyleus, Augeas's eldest son, and he having given it against his father, was banished the kingdom, together with his client. Augeas being afraid of that hero's resentment, was forced to strengthen himself by a double alliance, one with Astor the son of Phorbas, by Hymene the daughter of Epeus; and the other with Amarynceus, a Thessalian, a man well versed in the art of war, whom he invited into Elis. To bind these two the faster to his interest, he made them his associates in the kingdom, so that when Hercules came afterwards with a powerful army against him, he met with such stout resistance from them, particularly from Astor and his sons, that he was forced to return, and wait for a more favourable time. Not long after, being informed that these brave youths

* Elid, c. i.

(H) The fabulous poets add that he was beloved by the moon, and that he had fifty daughters by her.

(I) This is he who, the Greeks pretend, gave his name to this kingdom, which was before called Epea from Epeus mentioned a little higher.

Others, willing to do Augeas a greater honour, make him the son not of Elean, but of Eliau, or the sun.

(K) This river which some pretend to have been the Alpheus, and others the Peneus, as we observed in a late note, is by our author here called Minyus, which name Strabo, who says it was the Peneus, thinks was given it by the long stay which its waters made upon the ground. This etymon is something forced, and it seems more reasonable to suppose that that river had those two names, as we find many others to have had (8).

(8) Pausan. in Elid. cap. ii. Vid. Æt. Gedyon. Not. in enid.

WERE

were to go to the Isthmian games, he went and laid in ambush against them, and a killed them all, and with such privacy, that it cost the Eleans some time and trouble to find out the murderer. But when they knew that it was Hercules, who by that time was retired to Tyrinthus, they sent ambassadors in vain to the Argives to punish him, and to the Corinthians, to interdict the Argives from the Isthmian games, for suffering the assassin of those who were going to them, to live unpunished in their territories. They could prevail on neither to comply with their request; and Hercules having raised a powerful army of Argives, Thebans, and Arcadians, came and besieged them, took and sacked the city of Elis, and was going to let fly his resentment against the Piseans for assisting them, had not the oracle prevented it. Hercules, who would not sit down contented, till he had conquered b the whole kingdom, made a present of it to Phyleus the son of Augeas, who had formerly decided the quarrel in his favour, and with the kingdom restored him all the prisoners he had taken (L), and among the rest Augeas, whom he pardoned upon this account, according to Pausanias; others say he killed him and Eurytus, another of his sons *.

Phyleus, thus recalled to the kingdom, did however stay in it but as long as was necessary to settle the affairs of the state, after which he retired to the island of Dulichium (M). And Augeas dying soon after, the crown fell to his next son Ligajibenes, whose son Polyxenus having succeeded him, went to the Trojan war, and was one of those who returned from thence, and was succeeded by his son Eleus II. c It was in this prince's reign that the Dorians and Heraclidae made their last but successful attempt against Peloponnesus under Hippotes their general, after having formerly made several fruitless ones against it. We have already had occasion to speak more than once of this expedition, for the success of which, having consulted the oracle, they were bid to make choice of a three-eyed general to head them, and met with Oxylus an Ætolian, whom they supposed to be the person pointed at by the oracle, because his horse and he had but three eyes between them.

Oxylus, of the race of Endymion, had been forced to leave his native country a year before for having accidentally killed, some say his brother Thermius, others say Alcidocus the son of Scopius, as he was playing at quoits. He was then upon his d return to Ætolia, when the Heraclidae met him, and invited him to be their general. The conditions upon which he accepted this office was, that when they had conquered Peloponnesus they should allot him Elis, not only as a reward for his services, but because he had a title to that kingdom as being the sixth in a lineal descent from Endymion, the second king of it. They agreed so much the more readily to his demand, as he was moreover related to them by the mother's side, his great-grandmother being sister to Dejanira the mother of Hyllus the son of Hercules. The success of this expedition we have seen in some former sections, as well as the manner in which they divided their conquests between them, in which they did not fail to give their general the kingdom of Elis according to their agreement i.

Oxylus, who expected to have taken possession of it without any opposition, found himself mistaken, and Dius, who was then upon the throne, refused to resign it to him. However, to avoid exposing their troops to a battle, they agreed that each should chuse a champion, who should decide the right of it by single combat, and Pyrechmes, an excellent Ætolian slinger, having won the victory in favour of Oxylus, he was immediately proclaimed king of Elis. We find nothing remarkable concerning either his reign or those of his successors; he had two sons, Ætolus and Lajas, the former of whom dying young, was buried under the gate of the city, the oracle having ordered that he should be buried, neither within nor out

^b Conf. DIODOR. SICUL. l. iv. & PAUSAN. Elid. c. iii. Geogr. l. x.

ⁱ Id. ibid. & APOLLOD. l. ii. STRAB.

(L) These prisoners must have been very few in comparison of those that were killed, since Pausanias tells us that the Eleian women, finding their country almost stripped of male inhabitants, prayed to Minerva that they might conceive at the very first matrimonial intercourse; and that the goddess having granted their request they built a temple to her, and called it Minerva, the mother of mankind.

And moreover, in memory of this signal favour, they called both the place and the river than runs by it Badu, which in their dialect signifies the same as adu, sweet, to express the pleasure of that matrimonial intercourse (9).

(M) It is but a small inconsiderable island on the Ionian sea near that of Cephalonia, it is now called Dulichia and Tziakki.

(9) Id. ibid. c. iii.

a of it. His son Lafus succeeded him, after which we hear no more of his race, nor indeed of any material transactions in this kingdom, if we except some of their wars with their Arcadian neighbours, and with some other estates of Greece, till we come to the reign of Iphitus, the reviver of the olympic games, and cotemporary with the great Lycurgus mentioned at the close of the last section.

BEFORE his reign, Greece had been almost ruined by wars and pestilence. Elis seems to have suffered more than any other estate, so that those games had been interrupted for a considerable time. Iphitus sent to consult the oracle concerning the means of appeasing the angry gods, and obtaining a remedy against these calamities, and was answered, that the restoration of those games would prove the safety of Greece, to procure which he and his subjects were exhorted to set about it immediately, and with all their might. He began with offering a sacrifice to Hercules, whom the Eleans believed to have been upon some account or other exasperated against them (N). He next caused the olympic games to be proclaimed all over Greece, with a promise of free admittance to all comers, and fixed the time for the celebration of them, as we hinted before; he likewise took upon himself to be sole president and judge of those games, a privilege which the Piseans, by reason of their neighbourhood, had often sharply disputed with his predecessors, and which continued in his descendants as long as his line, and the regal dignity continued. After this the people took upon them to appoint two presidents whom they chose by vote, and which in time increased to ten, and at length to twelve. We have spoken a little higher of the place where they sat, their office was to examine and admit the candidates, and to judge of all disputes that arose concerning the victory in all the several exercises which were performed in them.

Restores the olympic games.

§ Ætolia was so called, as we have seen a little before, from Ætolus the son of Endymion, and brother of Epeus, whom he succeeded in the kingdom of Elis, and from which he fled into this country after he had accidentally killed Apis the son of Jason, at some funeral games. What people inhabited this country before his coming, and what names they had, is not to be guessed at, only this we find, that both they and their neighbours on both sides, of whom we shall speak by-and-by, were the greatest robbers in all Greece, and continued so, during many centuries, after Hercules, Theseus, and other heroes, had extirpated those vermin every-where else.

Ætolia.

THIS slip of ground, for such it was, had on the east the Locrians, Pbocians, and Ozoleans, from whom they were parted by the river Evenus, or Licormas. The Acaruanians on the west, were also parted from them by that of Achelous, on the north it had the Dorians, with part of Epirus, and on the south the bay of Corinth: its utmost extent from north to south was about forty-eight miles, that is, from 38 deg. 40 min. to 39 deg. 28 min. north latitude; and from east to west, where it was widest, something above twenty miles; that is, from 22 deg. 40 min. to 23 deg. 10 min. but exceeding narrow, as it extended northward and southward, especially the latter, where it scarcely reached 10 miles, and had but one sea-port of any note on the Corinthian bay, namely Cenias, situate on the mouth of the Achelous abovementioned.

Its situation and extent.

IT had no other rivers but the two we have just spoken of, the former of which was that on which Hercules killed the centaur Nessus, and the latter, which was also called Thoas from its rapidity, descended from mount Pindus in Macedonia, into the Ionian sea. Concerning this last the poets have feigned many stories, or blended the history with many fables which the reader may see in the margin (A).

Rivers.

VOL. II. N° 6.

5 M

As

*THUCYD. l. i. PLUTARCH. in Theseo. & al.

†Vid. STRAB. MELA, CLUVER, & al.

(N) Pausanias tells us there was a kind of dispute between the Eleans and the rest of the Greeks, whether Iphitus was lineally descended from Oxylus; if he was not, it was not without reason that he feared the resentment of that god, whose particular kindness to all that were related to him, as Oxylus was, would hardly suffer such a wrong to go unpunished: and this was probably the motive that induced that monarch to begin with appeasing his anger by this sacrifice.

(A) This famous river is feigned by the fabulous poets to have been the son of Oceanus and Tethys, and a competitor with Hercules for Dejanira, the king of Calydonia's daughter. These two having engaged in a duel, and Achelous, finding himself likely to be worsted by him, changed himself first into a serpent, and then into a bull. Hercules broke both his horns, and gave one of them to Plenty, the companion of Fortune. Hence the story of the Cornucopia. Achelous, finding himself still inferior

As for its name, some think it received it from Achelous one of the kings ^a of Ætolia, and others derive it from the Greek, and think it was given it by reason of the salubrioness of its waters ^c; but as we meet with three rivers of this name ^d, and in three different countries, it is not likely they should all have it upon this last account; however this of Ætolia is by far the largest and most considerable, inasmuch that Homer calls it the king of rivers.

THE country is very craggy and mountainous, which rendered several of their cities almost impregnable, and the people so stout, turbulent, and unruly, that the more polite estates of Greece, and even the Macedonians, tried in vain to tame them. The most noted of those cities were those that follow. Thermus or Thermius, situate almost in the heart of the kingdom, and which became in time the metropolis of ^b it, surrounded at some distance with such high and craggy mountains, that though it was the place where the states of the country assembled, and the repository of all their wealth and treasure in times of danger, yet was it not so much as fortified with a wall, the difficult ascents and narrow passages of the neighbouring mountains, being deemed sufficient to guard it both from surprise or invasion. It had its fairs and markets, was inhabited by the noblest and wealthiest Ætolians, and had the surname of Panætolium, upon account of the senate holding their meeting there ^c. 2. Calydon, situate near the forest of that name, where Meleager, accompanied with the noblest youths of Greece, slew the famed Calydonian boar (B). Hither it was also that Hercules came after he had left Peloponnesus, and though he had a numerous spu- ^c rious brood scattered over all Greece, yet wanting legitimate issue, married Dejanira the daughter of Æneus, king of the country, and father to Meleager; and to ingratiate himself to the Ætolians, either turned the current of the river Achelous, or made some improvements upon it, as gave rise to the fable we mentioned in a late note. This city which seems to have continued for some time, the seat of the antient Ætolian kings, was built by Calydon the son of Ætolus ^d, from whom the kingdom was for some time called Calydonia, but resumed its antient one in some following reign. The situation of this city was very pleasant and commodious, being seated upon the river Evenus, which ran quite through the midst of it, and having some pleasant plains round it, and the Calydonian forest at a small distance from it: but their continual wars with their neighbours obliged them in process of time to remove the seat of the kingdom and senate to Thermus abovementioned. 3. Pleuron, which gave name to a territory, whose inhabitants were surnamed Curetes, because they shaved the fore-part of their heads, lest their enemies should lay hold on it, but let the hinder part to grow, that they might be caught by it if they offered to run away. Some few more cities of less note they had, but fewer in proportion than the more noted states of Greece.

THE Ætolians were in general a stout, warlike people, always inured to the trade of war and plunder, seldom at peace with any of their neighbours, and having in to his rival, turned himself into the river of his name, in which form he has continued ever since, or, as others have it, for grief and spight flung and choaked himself in it, after he had bribed his rival with the horn of Amalthea, or plenty.

^c EUSTAT. ^d Vid. PAUSAN. in Arcad. c. xxxviii. & Auct. sup. citat. ^e Vid. STRAB. Geogr. l. x. POLYB. BYZANT. sub. voce Θαυρος & Gronov. not. in eund. ^f Vid. BYZANT. sub voce.

This poetic hodge-podge of serpents, bulls and horns, seems to have taken its rise from the serpentine turnings and windings, and likely also from the rapidity and noise of this noble river, which like all others are properly enough said to be the offspring of the ocean and earth. His two horns were its two streams, where it divided itself, and the plenty which these brought after they were either confined within due bounds, or by some other way made serviceable to fertilise the neighbouring plains, might be not inelegantly figured by the cornucopia.

(B) This fierce and monstrous creature had done so much mischief about the neighbourhood, that Meleager king of the country, who kept his court at Calydon, was forced to call to his assistance a great number of the flower of Greece to destroy it. The chief of these were, Theseus, Telamon, Peleus, Pollux, and Iolans, all of them the faithful companions of Hercules, besides a number of other heroes. To these we may add the famous Arcadian prince Atalanta, who behaved with such uncommon courage and intrepidity upon this occasion, that Meleager became enamoured with her and married her.

If we may guess at the bigness of this monstrous boar by the length of his tusks, Pausanias, who tells us that one of them was still preserved in the temple of Bacchus in the imperial gardens, says it was above a yard long (10).

The poets pretend that it was sent by Diana as a punishment to Æneus, for having forgotten her when he sacrificed to all the gods besides at the close of the harvest. Pausanias adds, that he was driven out of his kingdom by a faction, and went to Argos, whence he returned again with an army and recovered it again, but was persuaded by the Argolic king to return thither and died there.

a general the advantage over them by reason of their situation. It was chiefly in such excursive exploits that they signalized their courage, without striving to enlarge their territories, till some of the Grecian wars invited them out of their dominions, particularly the Theban war, as we shall see by-and-by.

It were however needless here to give a list of their kings, many of whom have been known to ancient authors by little more than their names. We have already had occasion to mention some of the descendants of Ætolus, namely Calydon. Oeneus the father of Dejanira, and his son Meleager (C); and to these we shall only add the two heroes of his race, who signalized themselves, the one in the Theban, and the other in the Trojan war.

b THE first of these was Tydeus another son of Oeneus, by Althea. We have already had occasion to mention him in the histories of Argos and Thebes. In the first of these kingdoms, to which he fled to be expiated for manslaughter, he and Polynices having married the two daughters of Adrastus, these three princes went jointly against Thebes to recover Polynice's right; and here it was that Tydeus performed such glorious exploits against Æteocles, as we have given an account of in that famous war between the two contending brothers*. He was there at length mortally wounded by Menalippus, but before he expired, he had the satisfaction to see his enemy's head brought to him by the brave Amphiaraus, and took the brutal revenge of cutting out his brains and swallowing them†.

c His son Diomedes was one of those who signalized himself at the Trojan war, he had indeed the good fortune to return safe from it, but meeting with a worse enemy at home in his faithless wife Ægiale, and her paramour Cometes, he was forced to retire into Apulia, where he shared that kingdom with Dawnus, as we have seen above†. From this time we meet with nothing considerable in the history of this nation, except a few warlike excursions which they made in conjunction with some of the great estates of Greece, in which they assisted sometimes as allies, and sometimes as auxiliaries, and which have been already interspersed in the history of the foregoing kingdoms, till the famous Acbean league which proved so fatal to them, and of which we shall give an account in its proper place. The rest of their time was spent in mutual excursions between them and their neighbours the Dorians and Lucrians, of whom we are to speak next, and especially with the Ozoleans and Acarnanians, whose territories did lay on each side Ætolia. These two last being more obscure and inconsiderable than any of the rest, the reader will find all that we think needs be said of them in the following note (D).

THE

* See before, Vol. II. p. 357. F. & seq. 374. & seq. † See before, ibid. p. 359. c.

* APOLLOD. l. iii. c. 7.

† See before,

(C) The fable says, that when Althea this prince's mother was brought-to-bed of him, she saw the three fatal sisters sitting by the fire, one of whom taking a billet out of it, said, the boy should live as long as it remained unburnt: as soon as they were gone, she got up and quenched the stick, and repositied it in a safe place.

When Meleager was come to the kingdom, he unfortunately chanced to quarrel with his two uncles at the killing of the boar mentioned in the last note. That young prince having presented the head of it to Atalanta, who had given it the first wound, and they endeavouring to take it from her, the contention rose to such a height, that the exasperated prince killed them both. Althea seeing her two brothers killed, fell into such fury, that she ran to the fatal brand which she had saved, and flung it into the fire, upon which her son was immediately seized with a burning fever in his bowels, and soon after expired.

Pausanias, who tells us that this fabulous story was devised by an ancient tragic poet, named Phrymonius (supposed to have flourished about the 67th olympiad) doth not give us a much better account of this prince's death, when he tells us upon the credit of two other poets, that Apollo killed him with his own hands, because he had taken the part of the Ætolians against the Cometes, mentioned a little higher, and in whose favour that god had declared himself (11).

(D) The Ozoleans, as we observed in the geography of Ætolia, were situate on the east of that kingdom. It was a small territory lying on the north coast of the bay of Corinth, and extending itself above twelve miles northward, where it was contiguous with Locris. On the west, it was bounded by the river Evenus, which parted them from Ætolia, and on the east they had the kingdom of Phocis, spoken of in the close of the sixth section of this chapter. Its chief towns were Naupactus, situate on the mouth of the river abovementioned, which was often contended for by the Ætolians, and at length became wholly theirs. It was called by that name, from the Hiracida building their navy there, with which they invaded Peloponnesus, but is now known by that of Lepanto, and was taken from the Vesuriens by Bajazet.

The Ozoleans bid fair for being some of the ancientest inhabitants of these parts, if we admit the etymon which some give us of their names, and that they were called so from the σκηψ, which their cloathing (which was the raw hides of wild beasts, (11) In Phocid. c. xxxi.

Locris

THE Locrians were either the same people with the Ozoleans, mentioned in the last note, or so blended with them, that they are not easily to be distinguished by their names, or indeed by any thing but their situation. In this respect they were divided into the Locri Ozolæ abovementioned, which inhabited the southern or maritime parts. 2. The Locri Epicnemidii, so called from the mount Cnemis; these were situate in the middle: and 3. The northern Locri, surnamed Opuntii from their chief city Opus, or Opoes, near the coasts of the Ægean or Eubæan sea; authors however are not so well agreed in the placing of the two latter, as the former of these ancient nations ^a. Ancient indeed, if we consider that Homer tells us they came to the Trojan war armed with bows and slings, and that the Ozoleans carried an early colony into Italy under the conduct of their princes Evas and Ajax, and built a city there near the Sephyrian promontory, from which they were called Locri Epizephyrii ^b.

Their three tribes

THE Ozolean Locrians were divided from the other two by the whole kingdom of Phocis, of which we have given an account in a former section. Their chief city was Amphissa, situate on the Evenus. Herodotus calls it Amphicea, and the inhabitants Amphiclea. It was afterwards taken by the Phocians, and destroyed with the rest of the Phocian cities in the holy war formerly mentioned, and when it was rebuilt, Pausanias tells us it took the name of Ophitea, if the text has not been corrupted by his transcribers ^c (E). Epicnemidian Locrians were the only ones of all the three.

^a De his vid. PTOLOM. STRAB. MELA. CLUVER. & al. sup. Citat. ^b PAUSAN. Achaic. c. xxxiii. & Phocid. xxxviii. ^c Id. ibid. vid. & BYZANT. sub voce Αμφικια & Gronov. not in Loc.

beasts without any dressing gave to their bodies; for this was all the dress which the first inhabitants of Greece used, till Pelasgus and some other founders taught them a better, as we have seen at the beginning of this chapter, and in the history of Arctidia.

Others think that this stinking name was owing to the stench of their rivers and marshes, and others again to their quantity of Asphodel or Daffadil which grew in those parts, one sort of which has an ill smell, and used to be sowed anciently over graves; a third affirm that this stench was caused by the blood which the centaur Nessus scattered upon the earth, when he was wounded by Hercules.

A more fabulous account of this name, though not so ill-scented is, that in the reign of Orestheus the son of Deucalion, his bitch brought forth instead of whelps a stick of wood, which that prince caused to be put into the ground, from which, when the spring came, a vine sprang forth. Hence they pretended that that name of Ozoles, came not from ὄζω, to stink, but from ὄζω, a branch or sprout: however that be, Pausanias tells us the Locrians who were likewise called Ozeles, were so ill pleased with that name, that they changed it for that of Ætolians (12), we shall speak of them in the next place above.

As for their Acarnanians, the territories were parted on the east by the river Achelous, and surrounded by the Ionian sea on the west and south, and on the north joined to Epirus, and became afterwards a province of that kingdom (13).

They were anciently known by the name of Curetes, but whether of the same race with those of the Celtic nation mentioned in a former chapter †, or, whether so called, because like the Pleurones they cut off their fore-locks, or whether both were not originally of Celtic extraction, is not easy to determine.

Their name of Acarnanians they afterwards received from Acarnanus the son of Alcmon. This last was the son of Amphiaraus the noted soothsayer, whose wife Eripyla had been bribed by Polynices with a rich necklace, to determine him to go to the Theban war, for which reason he left orders with his son to murder her, as we have seen elsewhere †. He having executed his father's commands, was so tormented with furies, that he was forced to apply to the Delphic oracle for relief, and was answered that if he could find out some country which had sprung up out of the sea, since his parricide and did settle there, he should be freed from his mothers avenging ghost. After much seeking he found this spot of ground, which the Achelous had thrown up, and settled himself there.

(12) Ibid. c. xxxviii. (13) Strab. Mel. & al. † Ibid. p. 358. b. (14) Pausan. in Arcad. c. xxiv. s. xxxiv. (17) Vid. Sylburg. Palmier. & Gedoy. in eund. ibid.

He soon after married Callirhoe, the pretended daughter of that river, by whom he had two sons, Acarnanus and Amphoterus, the former of whom gave his name to this country. (14). Some think that the difference between the Acarnanians and Curetes, was that the latter shaved the forepart of their heads, and the others did not. Again, some derive the name of Curetes from the mount Curinus, and others from the Greek κῦραι maidens, because they affected to go dressed like young women, though in this latter sense it should properly be writ κῦραι. We have nothing material concerning this nation, except their constant wars with the Ætolians, at least during this epocha. The remainder of their history will be best seen in that of Epirus of which they afterwards became a Province.

(E) This last is more likely to be the case, both because Herodotus no where calls it by this new name, but always Amphicea, and more particularly because this last name doth better agree with the etymon which Pausanias himself gives of it, which is as follows (16).

A petty king of that country, out of some fear for his young son, had caused him to be brought up privately in a very retired place, where he was one day in danger of being killed by a wolf, but was saved by a serpent who twined about, and defended him. The father coming at that instant, and in a fright misjudging the matter, let fly an arrow which killed both the serpent and his son, and when he was better informed by some shepherds, who had beheld the encounter, he caused them to be both burnt upon the same funeral pile.

It seems therefore more probable that the place was called from thence Αμφικια, from Αμφικια and κῦραι, both being carried to the same pile, than Ophitea, which has no allusion to that or any other part of the story (17).

* Vid. sup. Vol. II. p. 251 & seq. & sub not. A. (15) Vid. Byzant. sub voce Acarnania. (16) Phocid.

who

a who had a right to send deputies to the grand Amphibitionian court at Delphos. Their metropolis was Thronium, mentioned by Homer, Ptolemy, and other ancient authors¹. They had another city called Cnemis, built at the foot of the mount of that name, from which they took their appellative. Those who desire to know more of these ancient cities, as well as of that of Opus or Opoes, belonging to the other Locrian tribe, may see an ample description of them in the authors above quoted†. How they came by their common name of Locrians, whether they were colonies of one another, and if so, which was the ancientest, is past our skill to find out. As for their countries they afford little worth our farther notice, and all that we can add concerning their inhabitants is, that they were a brave warlike nation; and we shall in the sequel see b that they signalized themselves as much as any others, in maintaining the liberty of Greece.

§ Doris was situate on the south of Thessaly, being parted from it by mount Oeta, and a ridge of other hills. It had on the south Phocis and part of Ætolia. On the east it was parted from the Locri Epicemidæ by the river Pindus, and on the west from Epirus by that of Acbelous. Other rivers of note they had not. Mountains they had in great number, and those not inconsiderable ones: the most famed were Oeta and Pindus, often mentioned in this chapter, which with some others of less note, surrounded them on the north, as the Callidromians did on the west; yet they abounded with spacious plains, and very fruitful; the air was sweet and healthy, and their soil
c capable of being improved to all the advantages of husbandry. Their territories were not large, they extending only at most about forty miles in length, that is from 39 deg. 10 min. to 39 deg. 50 min. and about 20 miles in breadth at the widest, or from 23 deg. 10. min. to 23 deg. 30 min. east longitude^m.

THIS country was called Doris, and the people Dores, from Dorus the son of Hellen, and grandson of Deucalion, who first peopled, or rather conquered it, at least that part of it which lies below the mountains Oeta and Pindus: they were afterwards driven from it by the Cadmeans, and forced to inhabit for some time about Macednum, and the neighbourhood of Pindus, but returned soon after to Dryopis (F), and the country about *Oeta*ⁿ, where they continued till they made that famous d descent into Peloponnesus with the Heraclidæ, of which we have spoken in some former sections, and whither they carried also their dialect called from them Doric (G). Their chief city was called Doris from the founder of this kingdom. We find this metropolis mentioned by Homer, Herodotus, and others^o.

2. Erineus, situate on the most northern verge of the kingdom, near the foot of the hills which part Doris from Macedonia, and mentioned by all the antient geographers and historians. 3. Lilea on the southern frontiers, and adjoining to Phocis. 4. Bium, as it is called by Ptolemy, or Bojon, as Strabo and others call it, with some few of less note.

We have nothing remarkable left concerning these people before their naval e descent into Peloponnesus, the particulars and success of which have been seen in the former sections, and need not to be repeated here. After their conquest of and

† Vid. & PALMER. antiq. Græc. l. iv. & alib. pass. ¹ POLYB. LIVY, PAUSAN. vid. & PALMER. Antiq. Græc. l. v. & Byz. sub voce. ^m Vid. PTOLEM. STRAB. MELA, &c. ⁿ HERODOT. l. i. APOLLOD. l. i. c. 7. PAUSAN. &c. ^o De his vid. PTOLEM. STRAB. &c. BYZANT. & PALMER. Ant. Gr.

(F) A country situate in the neighbourhood of the mount Oeta and Parnassus, and called Dryopis from Dryope the daughter of Enrypylus, or, as the poets feign, a nymph ravished by Apollo; but more probably from δρυς, an oak, and οψ, voice, from the quantity of oaks that grew about the mountain, and the rustling of their leaves.

However, the Dryopes valued themselves very much upon their fabulous origin, and called themselves the sons of Apollo; wherefore Hercules having overcome them in fight, took them prisoners and carried them to Delphos, where he presented them to their divine progenitor, who commanded that hero to take them back with him into Peloponnesus, which he accordingly did, and gave them a settlement there near the Asmean and Hermionian territories; hence the Asmeans came to be blended with and to call themselves Dryopes (18).

(G) The Dorians gave their name, 1. to this dialect of theirs, which became much in vogue among the Greeks, but was preserved most pure by the Messenians, even through all their various transmigrations: 2. to the Doric order, one of the five in architecture: and 3. to the Doric music, in opposition to that of the Lydians and Phrygians.

These three kinds of music used to be played upon three different kinds of flutes, particularly adapted to each of them, till the celebrated Pronomus invented a fourth sort, upon which he could play them all indifferently (19).

settlement in that Peninsula, in conjunction with the Heraclide, they built a stately a temple to Jupiter Tropeus, in memory of this great event. Such indeed it was, and answerable to the surname given to that deity, since it almost overturned the whole state of affairs in all the different kingdoms and estates of Peloponnesus, whose cities were now forced to receive a garrison of Dorians, and to submit to a foreign government.

Achaia its names.

§ Achaia Propria (H), so called from Achaus the son of Xutus, was originally called Ægialea from Ægialeus the first king of Sicyon, as some affirm †; others think it comes from the Greek Ægialos, sea-shore, because above half of it was surrounded with the sea ‡, but whether it was originally a part of the Sicyonic kingdom, or was under its own kings, is not certain; the latter indeed seems the more probable, because the king who reigned there when Ion the brother of Achaus came to invade it, is called Selinus by the last quoted author, whereas there was no Sicyonian king of that name, in the list we have left of them, unless perhaps Selinus be the same with Telchin, or Selchin, as he is also called, the grandson of Ægialeus. However that be, the country took then the surname of Ionian, and the people were called Ægiatean Ionians; and it is likely that that of Achaia was not given to it till the sons of Achaus came and invaded it, and drove the Ionians out of it.

Situation and extent

Achaia had Sicyon on the east, and the Ionian sea on the west; the kingdom of Elis and that of Arcadia on the south, and the bay of Corinth on the north: its utmost extent was from east to west, somewhat above fifty miles, but from north to south about half that distance §, being within the 38th deg. of latitude, and 23d of longitude. Rivers of note it had not except the Pieræus which discharged itself into the Ionian sea, at the mouth of which was the city of Olenus, a famous sea-port mentioned by ancient authors, and so called from Olenus its founder, the supposed son of Jupiter, or, according to others, of Vulcan. We find another city of the same name in Ætolia ¶. We shall have occasion to mention the rest of their cities in the following sketch of their history.

Xutus, one of the sons of Hellen, the son of Deucalion, having been banished by his other brothers out of Thessaly, after their father's death, under pretence that he had embezzled the royal treasury, came to Athens, where Ereätheus gave him his daughter Creusa, by whom he had two sons, Achaus and Ion. After Ereätheus's death, a dispute arising between his sons, Xutus was chosen umpire between them, and having adjudged the succession to Cecrops II. who was the eldest, the others drove him out of the kingdom, whence he came and settled in Achaia , and died there. His son Achaus did soon after raise a small number of Athenian and Ægiatean forces with which he went into Thessaly, and recovered his grandfather's kingdom. He had not reigned long there, before he was forced to fly for manslaughter, and went into Laconia, where he died, and his posterity continued, till they were expelled from it by the Dores and Heraclide.

But in the mean while his brother Ion, who was grown very great at the Athenian court, obtained a number of forces, and with them invaded this country, then called Ægialea. Selinus, then king of it, having but one only daughter, instead of repulsing him, gave her to him in marriage, and appointed him his successor. Ion having succeeded his father-in-law, built a city and called it by his wife's name Helice, and from him the Ægiateans were surnamed Ionians; but the country seems to have retained its ancient name, since Homer in the list of Agamemnon's forces, makes mention both of it and of the city Helice.

Ion was soon after chosen general of the Athenian forces in their war against the Eleuthians and was either killed in it, or died soon after, and was buried in a small town of Attica. The crown however passed to his descendants, who enjoyed † it undisturbed for a considerable time. In the mean while, those of his uncle Achaus, and known by the name of Achaens, had spread themselves in several parts of Greece, particularly in the kingdom of Argos and Lacedemon. When therefore

† See before Vol. II. p. 349. P PAUSAN. Achaic. c. i. § STRAB. MELA, &c. Vid. BYZANT in voce. * See before. Vol. II. p. 363. d.

(H) It is called Achaia Propria to distinguish it from the general name of Achaia, by which Greece itself was sometimes called, and which was afterwards given by the Romans to one of the provinces of it, after they had divided it into two, viz. Macedonia, containing Macedonia, Thessaly, and Epirus, and Achaia containing all the remainder of Greece, both inland and the islands about.

- a they came to be driven out of these two countries by the Dores and Heraclidae, they bethought themselves of laying claim to Achaia, and of driving the Ionians out of it. They had their brave king Tisamenes the son of Orestes at their head, and pleaded a superiority of kindred, being descended from the eldest son of Xuthus; but what they trusted would give them a better title was, that they had a good number of troops, and among them some Dores, who agreed to assist them in this expedition. Accordingly they came against them with this army, and sent a herald to them to demand that they might be amicably received into their territories, without being put to the trouble of invading them by force. The Ionians, surprized at such an unexpected message, resolved however to oppose their entrance with all their might.
- b They knew that if they were once suffered to settle in their territories, they would not let any one reign there except their prince Tisamenes, whose noble extraction and known valour would hardly brook a competitor in the government: they therefore resolved to march against the invaders, and on the very first onset the Achaens lost indeed their prince, but gained the victory and pursued it to the very gates of Helice. The Ionians thus overpowered, were glad to capitulate, and to obtain the liberty of retiring whither they thought fit, which being granted to them, they went into Attica, where Melanthus then reigned, and gave them a kind reception; not perhaps so much in consideration of the great services which their progenitor Ion had done to that kingdom, as to make use of their assistance against the Dores whom he
- c now began to fear. Here they stayed no longer than till the first archontat, when Medon's brethren, unwilling to submit to their lame brother, invited them among other Grecians to go and seek their fortune elsewhere *.

As for the Achaens, their prince being dead, and the Ionians gone off, his sons agreed to divide their new conquest by lot; this kingdom chiefly consisted of the twelve following cities, well known to all the Greek writers; namely 1. Helice mentioned above: 2. Ægion or Ægium, to which the assembly of the estates was removed after the submersion of Helice, as being the next in dignity and bigness: 3. Olenus: 4. Phares: 5. Rhyphes: 6. Tritia: 7. Cerynea: 8. Bura: 9. Dymea: 10. Æges: 11. Ægira: 12. Pellene. These twelve cities were at first divided between the four sons of Tisamenes, Diamenes, Sparton, Telles and Leontomenes; for as to his fifth son Cometes, he was already gone into Asia. These, together with their cousin Damastias, the son of Pentbillus, and grandson of Orestes, having jointly reigned over this new Achaian state for some time, agreed again to take into partnership Preagenes and his son Patrus, who were the sovereigns of those Achaens, who had been banished out of Lacedemon, and gave them the sovereignty and territories of a city which was called from the last of these Patra. By what appears from this division of the Achaian government, it seems as if it then became a kind of aristocracy, rather than a seven-fold monarchy, each under a particular prince; but what share the subjects had in it we cannot find out; only it seems from the short sketch Pausanias gives us of it, that all those cities abovementioned, except Pellene, were in some measure free cities, and that the estates of Achaia ceased not to assemble themselves, even when the rest of Greece was terribly harassed with wars and pestilence. In this assembly it was that the famous Achaean league was formed, into which the Sicyonians came the very first, and were followed by all the other estates, not only of Peloponesus, but by those on the other side of the Isthmus; even at length by all Greece, except the Lacedemonians, who soon after entered into a war against them, as shall be seen in the next chapter.

* See before. Vol. II. p. 369. d.
sup. citat.

* Vid. PAUSAN. in Achaic. pass. & PLUTARCH. D. SICUL. & AUGT.

CHAP. XVIII.

The History of the ATHENIANS.

SECT. I.

Of the state of ATHENS from the establishing annual archons, to the Achæan league.

THE Athenians acquired that mighty renown which rendered them the most glorious nation in Greece, when Greece was in her greatest glory, and which makes the Athenian name venerable, even in these distant times, under a democratic government, of the beginning of which we are now to treat. Though Athens, as we have already shewn, was in ancient times, as indeed most nations were, governed by kings, yet those kings were far from being absolute. The best of them prescribed bounds to themselves, and the people prescribed bounds to the worst. For the Athenians were always friends to liberty, and reserved even in the days of Theseus, such an authority in their hands, as engaged Homer to difference them from the other nations of Greece^a. The glorious death of Codrus, who sacrificed himself for his subjects, and his sons disputing the succession, furnished the Athenians with a pretence^b for ridding themselves of kings. It was improbable, they said, that ever they should have so good a prince as Codrus, and to prevent their having a worse, they could have no king but Jupiter^b. However, that they might not seem ungrateful to his family, they made his son Medon their supreme magistrate, with the title of Archon; they afterwards rendered that office decennial, but continued it still in that family. The extinction of the Medontidæ at last left them without restraint, upon which they not only made this office annual, but created nine Archons^c; by the latter invention they provided against the too great power of a single person, as by the former expedient they took away all apprehension of their Archons having time to establish an optimacy, and so change the constitution. In one word they attained now what they had long sought, the making their supreme magistrates dependant on the people.

THAT these magistrates might however retain as much authority and dignity as might be sufficient to preserve the order and peace in the commonwealth, they had high titles and great honours annexed to their offices. The first was styled by way of eminence The Archon, and the year was distinguished by his name. The second was called Basileus, i. e. king. He too had his peculiar function, and his particular tribunal. The third had the name of Polemarchos; war was his province especially, though he had the direction of many things besides military affairs. The other six had the title of Thesmothetæ, common to them all, and were looked on^d as the guardians of their laws, and conservators of the constitution. We shall speak of all these offices distinctly in their proper place; at present we intend only to give a general idea of that form of government which took place on the abolition of the decennial magistracy in Athens. As to the reasons on which the names of the three first magistrates and their distinct officers were founded, they are variously and not very clearly reported. It may be, their chief end was to transfer that reverence which the common people had for their old magistrates to these new ones, by leaving the latter as much of the exterior pomp of the former as was consistent with the ends for which this change was made. As the Romans allowed their consuls to have fasces carried before them, and bore with the word Rex, when it implied no more a than a supreme sacrificer. This change happened at Athens in the twenty-fourth olympiad, but in what year of that olympiad is not well settled. Creon was the first of the new Archons, and the names of his successors, at least such of them as are recorded in history, the reader will find the following table, which also shews the years in which they bore that office (A).

^a Iliad. lib. v. ^b Schol. in Nub. ARISTOPHAN. ^c DIONYS. HALICARN. Antiq. Rom. lib. i. EUSEB. Chron. PAUSAN.

An exact TABLE of such of the annual archons of Athens as are mentioned in history

b	A. a. Cb.		Olymp.		A. a. Cb.		Olymp.
			xxiv.
	684	Creon	—	1	598	Phisombratus	— 3
	683	Tlefius	—	2	597	Solon	— 4
	682	Lyfius	—	3			xlvi.
			xxvii.		596	Dropides	— 1
	670	Antosthenes	—	3			xlvi.
			xxix.		591	Euorates	— 2
	663	Archimedes	—	2	590	Simon	— 3
			xxx.				xlvi.
	658	Miltiades	—	3	582	Damafias II.	— 3
			xxxiii.				li.
	645	Dropis	—	4	576	Archeftatides	— 1
			xxxv.				lii.
	639	Damafias I.	—	2	569	Aufomenes	— 4
			xxxvi.				liv.
	634	Epanetus	—	3	561	Hippoclides	— 4
			xxxix.				lv.
	623	Draco	—	2	560	Comias	— 1
			xliii.		559	Hegestratus	— 2
	608	Aristocles	—	4			lvi.
			xliv.		552	Euthydemus	— 2
	599	Megacles	—	2			lviii.
					547	Euxiclides	— 2

(A) The Athenian history takes up so great a part of those volumes which are left us for the ancient writers of Greece, that though little has been said by them in a regular manner of the form of that republic, and the power of its magistrates; yet the industry of such of the learned as have laboured in this way, and by collecting the scattered passages of Græcian writers, have formed treatises of the Athenian government under its several mutations, have given us such lights on this important subject, that it would be unpardonable in us not to set it clearly and distinctly before our readers. But previous thereto, it will be necessary to give some account of those last mentioned authors, that if such as peruse this work should be desirous of entering more deeply into the Athenian policy, than the construction of this history will permit us to do, they may not be at a loss for guides. William Postel, who flourished in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and was deservedly famous for his extensive learning, hath written a very curious treatise of the Athenian republic, consisting of thirty-five chapters; wherein he handles, concisely, the functions of the Athenian magistrates, the rights of the people, and the dependancy of the several parts of the Attic constitution on each other (1). But if the succinctness of Postel leaves any doubt on the minds of his readers, Sigonius's four books with his scheme of the Athenian history, will sufficiently supply it. Sigonius was a man of much reading, vast diligence, and had a mighty affection for this kind of writing, as appears from the many other works of the same kind which he composed (2). This excellent person was a professor in the university of Modena, and by that time he was twenty years of age, had acquired such a stupendous knowledge in history and politics, as rendered him the wonder of all who knew him. As Sigonius exceeded Postel, so Sigonius himself hath been transcended by Ubbo Emnius, rector of the university of Groningen, who having resolved upon a work of the same nature, made his description extend not only to the Athenian, but to all the republics of Greece, and ordering it so, that this description made but one third part of his work; the two former parts containing an exact description of ancient Greece, and a regular history of its inhabitants collected in the words mostly of original writers (3). If to these we add the almost numberless treatises of the very learned Mossius on every part of the Athenian government (4), there can be no question be made, but that this point may be as thoroughly understood as any thing of the same nature can be. But as things are never perfect at first, so we held it more reasonable to refer the particular account of the power of the archons, and the construction of the Athenian democracy to its settlement by Solon, than to perplex the reader with anticipations or repetitions.

(1) Trahaeus de repub. seu Magistratibus Atheniensium. 1565, 8vo.

(3) Vetus Græcia Opus distinctum in Tomos tres.

(2) De Republica Atheniensium, Venetiis

(4) Themis Attica, Ceteropis, Lection.

A. a. Ch.		Olymp. lix.
543	Alcæus	2
		lxii.
532	Heraclides	1
		lxiv.
523	Miltiades	2
		lxviii.
	Ifagoras — an. incert.	lxix.
	Acestorides — an. incert.	lxx.
	Myrus — an. incert.	lxxi.
496	Hyparchus	2
495	Philippus	3
494	Themistocles	4
		lxxii.
492	Diognetus	2
491	Hybrilides	3
490	Phænippus	4
		lxxiii.
488	Aristides	1
487	Anchises	2
486	Acratides	3
		lxxiv.
484	Leostratus	1
483	Nicodemus	2
482	Aphephron	3
		lxxv.
480	Callias, qui & Calliades	1
476	Xanthippus	2
478	Timotheus	3
477	Adimantus	4
		lxxvi.
476	Phædon	1
475	Dromocles	2
474	Acestorides	3
473	Menon	4
		lxxvii.
472	Chares	1
471	Praxiergus	2
470	Demotion	3
469	Phædon	4
		lxxviii.
468	Theagenides	1
467	Lyfistratus	2
466	Lyfianias	3
465	Lyfistheus	4
		lxxix.
464	Archidemides	1
463	Tlepolemus	2
462	Conon	3
461	Euippus	4
		lxxx.
460	Phaciclides	1
459	Philocles	2

A. a. Ch.		Olymp.
458	Bion	3	a
457	Mnesitides	4
		lxxx.
456	Callias	1
455	Sofistratus	2
454	Ariston	3
453	Lyfocrates	4
		lxxxii.
452	Chærephanes	1	b
451	Antidotus	2
450	Eutydemus	3
449	Pedieus	4
		lxxxiii.
448	Philiscus	1
447	Timarchides	2
446	Callimachus	3
445	Simachides, qui & Lyfimachides	4 lxxxiv.
444	Praxiteles	1	c
443	Lyfianias	2
442	Dipbilus	3
441	Timocles	4
		lxxxv.
440	Myrichides sive Marichidas	1
439	Glaucis	2
438	Theodorus	3
437	Eutbimenes	4
		lxxxvi.	d
436	Naufimachus, qui & Lyfimachus	1
435	Anticbides	2
434	Charis	3
433	Apfendes	4
		lxxxvii.
432	Pythodorus	1
431	Eutbydemus	2
430	Apollodorus	3	e
429	Epamion	4
		lxxxviii.
428	Diotimus	1
427	Euclides	2
426	Scytodorus, qui & Eutbydemus	3
425	Stratocles	4
		lxxxix.
424	Ifarchus	1
423	Aminias	2	f
422	Alcæus	3
421	Aristo, qui & Aristion	4
		xc.
420	Aristophilus, qui & Astyphilus	1
419	Archias	2
418	Antiphon	3
417	Euphemus	4
		xc.
416	Aristomnestus	1

A. a. Cb.	Olymp.
415 Cbabrias	2
414 Pyfander	3
413 Cleocritus	4
xcii.
412 Callias	1
411 Theopompus	2
410 Glaucippus	3
409 Diocles	4
xciii.
408 Euctemon	1
407 Antigeneſ	2
406 Callias	3
405 Alexias	4
xciv.
434 Pythodorus	1
403 Euclides	2
402 Micio	3
401 Zenetetus, qui & Epeneius	4
xcv.
400 Laches	1
399 Aristocrates	2
398 Itycles	3
397 Lyfiades	4
xcvi.
396 Phormio	1
395 Diophantus	2
394 Eubulides	3
393 Archies, qui & Demoftratus	4
xcvii.
392 Philocles	1
391 Nicoteles	2
390 Demoftratus	3
389 Antipater	4
xcviii.
388 Pyrrbio, qui & Pyrgbium	1
387 Theodotus	2
386 Myſticbides	3
385 Dexiteus	4
xcix.
384 Diotrephes	1
383 Pbenoftratus	2
382 Menander, qui & Evander	3
381 Demophilus	4
c.
380 Pytheas	1
379 Nikon	2
378 Naufidicus	3
377 Callias	4
ci.
376 Chariander	1
375 Hypodamus	2
374 Socratides	3
373 Aſteus five Aſteus	4
cii.
372 Ariſtbenes five Alciſtbenes	1

A. a. Cb.	Olymp.
371 Phraſclides	2
369 Dyſnicetus	3
369 Lyſiſtratus	4
ciii.
368 Naufegenes	1
367 Polyzelus	2
366 Cephiſodorus	3
365 Chion	4
civ.
364 Timocrates	1
363 Characlides	2
362 Molio five Molon	3
361 Nicophemus	4
cv.
360 Callimedes	1
359 Euchariftus	2
358 Cephiſodorus	3
357 Agathocles	4
cvi.
356 Elpines feu Elpinus	1
355 Calliſtratus	2
354 Diotimus	3
353 Eudemus	4
cvii.
352 Ariſtodemus	1
351 Theſſalus	2
350 Apollodorus	3
349 Callimachus	4
cviii.
348 Theophilus	1
347 Themiſtocles	2
346 Archius	3
345 Eubulus	4
cix.
344 Lyſiſcus	1
343 Pythodorus	2
342 Sofigenes	3
341 Nicomachus	4
cx.
340 Theopbraſtus	1
339 Lyſimachides	2
338 Charonas feu Charonides	3
337 Phrynicius	4
cxii.
336 Pythodorus	1
335 Euenetus	2
334 Cleſicles	3
333 Nicocrates	4
cxiii.
332 Niceratus	1
331 Ariſtophanes	2
330 Ariſtophon	3
329 Cephiſophon	4
cxiiii.
328 Euthycritus	1
327 Hegemon	2
326 Chremes	3
325 Anticles	4

A. a. Cb.	Olymp.	A. a. Cb.	Olymp.
	CXIV.		CXIX.	a
324 Hegesias ———	1	304 Pherecles ———	1
323 Cephisodorus ———	2	403 Leosthratus ———	2
322 Philocles ———	3	302 Nicocles ———	3
321 Archippus five Apol- lodorus ———	4	301 Calliarchus ———	4
	CXV.		CXX.
320 Neachmus ———	1	300 Hegamachus ———	1
319 Apollodorus ———	2	299 Eutemon ———	2	b
318 Archippus ———	3	298 Mnesticus ———	3
317 Demogenes ———	4	297 Antipbates ———	4
	CXVI.		CXXI.
316 Democles ———	1	296 Nicias ———	1
315 Praxibulus ———	2	295 Niebostratus ———	2
314 Nicodorus ———	3	294 Olympiodorus ———	3
313 Cheophrastus ———	4	293 Philippus ———	4
	CXVII.		CXXII.
312 Ptolema ———	1	290 Philippus ———	3
311 Simonides ———	2		CXXV.
310 Hieromnemon ———	3	279 Gorgias ———	2
309 Demetrius Pabereus ———	4	278 Anaxicrates ———	3	d
	CXVIII.	277 Democles ———	4
308 Charinus five Cæ- rinus ———	1		CXXVII.
307 Anaxicrates ———	2	271 Pytharatus ———	2
306 Corabus five Cory- bus ———	3		CXXIX.
305 Xenippus five Euxe- nippus ———	4	264 Diognetes ———	1 clx.
		140 Antitheus ———	1
			clxxx.
		60 Herades ———	2	e

As we are obliged to gather the history of Athens at the entrance of this period from such passages in far later historians as have a retrospective view thereto, the reader cannot expect that it should be very exactly connected. He will see from the foregoing table that the names of many of the archons are lost; and of several which remain, we know nothing more than that they were archons in such a year, which is frequently discovered from writers of other nations, who, for the better settling the facts of which they wrote, referred them to the years in which such and such persons were archons; because anciently the Athenian story was better known than that of any other people, and therefore served the purpose of historians in this respect perfectly well. If the people laboured for power in Athens, the nobility were likewise desirous of preserving it to themselves, and tho' they frequently found it necessary to give way to popular humours, yet they generally fell upon expedients which in the end defeated the designs of the people, and hindered them from attaining that measure of authority they sought. The archons were from the beginning of the democracy chosen by the people, but they were chosen out of the nobility, and they still retained one privilege of the ancient magistrates, which very probably bore hard upon the people, viz. that of deciding all causes that came before them, according to their own notions of right or wrong; for as yet the Athenians had no written laws, but every magistrate acted according to the principles of natural equity^d.

THE more populous the city grew, and the greater wealth its citizens acquired, the less easily were they governed. Merchants from Syria and Egypt, very probably gave them first to understand the expediency of written laws, which might serve to rule the magistrates as well as the people. This once inculcated, the Athenians would not be at rest without them; the same spirit which had compelled former alterations in government, made it necessary now that laws should be compiled, a and therefore the nobility pitched upon Draco to undertake this arduous employment (B).

^d Suidas in Δικαιο.

Draco was archon in the second, though some say in the last year of the thirty-ninth olympiad, when it is supposed he published his laws. Though the name of this great man occurs frequently in history, yet we nowhere find so much as ten lines together relating to him and his institutions, which is certainly the reason that the collectors of Greek history have written so superficially about them. We cannot pretend to supply their deficiencies; but from the scattered fragments relating to him, we will give the reader the best account of him and his laws that we can. He was without doubt a man noble by birth, and endowed with high qualifications. He was learned, virtuous, and a true lover of his country, but at the same time severe in his temper, and extremely rigid in the rules which he laid down for the government of Athens. He esteemed the taking of life away so high a crime, that to imprint a deep abhorrence thereof in the minds of men, he ordained that process should be carried on even against inanimate things, if they had accidentally caused the death of any person. So that for instance a statue which had fallen upon or killed a man, was banished, it being rendered criminal for any one to keep it in Attica. Happy had it been for himself and for his country, if the same spirit of humanity had reigned throughout his institutions; but so it was, that he punished all things with death, even indolence, and the taking an apple was as severely punished as sacrilege, for which he himself assigned this reason; small faults seem to me worthy of death, and for the most flagrant offences, I can find no higher punishment. The care of executing these laws he intrusted chiefly with the Ephete, a court we have heretofore mentioned, which he took upon him to reform in many respects, whence he is by some said to have instituted it, but that is a mistake. He did indeed make it superior to the Areopagus, to which it was before inferior, and Solon restoring the precedence of the last-mentioned court, has been by a like mistake reported to be the institutor thereof. Draco was far in years when he gave laws to Athens; some have been of opinion that he borrowed most of his principles from the books of the Phanicians, but this can hardly be proved; certain it is that his institutions were not stiled Nomoi, but Thesmoi, i. e. not laws, but sanctions, as if they proceeded from more than human wisdom; but this did not hinder their falling into dislike with the Athenians, even in his life-time; and as their dislike was always fatal, he was obliged to retire from Athens, from whence he went to the island of Ægina, where he was received with the highest respect; but the favour of the inhabitants of that country proved more fatal to him than the hatred of the Athenians. For coming one day into the theatre, the audience, to shew their regard for him, threw, as the custom of that age was, their bonnets and cloaks upon him, and the multitude of these being very great, they stifled the old man, who was too weak to disengage himself from that load, their inconsiderate kindness cast over him. Aristotle tells us that Herodicus was wont to say, That his institutions seem rather to have come from a dragon than a man, alluding to his name, and Demades rendered himself famous by observing, that Draco's laws were not written with ink, but blood. It may be the violence of the age in which he lived, and the natural turbulency of the Athenian people, made that legislator have recourse to so harsh a method; for that he was not of altogether so savage a temper as he is generally represented may be probably conjectured from those fragments of his laws which are yet undevoured by

* A. GELLIIUS Noct. Attic. lib. ii. c. 18. TATIAN. Orat. cont. Græcos. CLEM. Strom. l. i. PAUSAN. Attic. PLUTARCH. in vita Solon. POTTER'S Archæolog. Vol. I. p. 102. JOSEPH. contr. Apion. * ÆLIAN. hist. var. l. viii. c. 10. HESYCH. Illust. de Philof. Rhet. l. ii. c. 23. PLUTARCH. in vit. Solon.

(B) When it is said that Draco first gave laws to the Athenians, it must be understood in an extensive sense, for otherwise it is certain that Ceres was the first who taught the Athenians to lead a social life, and to become subject to the wisest amongst them that their wisdom might be made generally beneficial. It is commonly believed that Ceres gave these laws by her favourite Triptolemus, and we are farther told what those laws were, the whole body of them being comprized in one line; Honour your parents;

Worship the gods; Hurt not Animals (5). These precepts were retained likewise by Draco, and made the very foundation of his institutions, yet notwithstanding all this, he was, in the sense we usually take the word in, the legislator of the Athenians, since he first restrained the magistrates from pronouncing arbitrary judgments, and declared what actions were criminal and in what manner such as committed them should be punished.

(5) Porphyry. de Abstinentia.

Year after the
flood 2397
Before Christ
606.

time, and from the knowledge we have of his being strongly inclined to poetry, a study seldom agreeable to cruel minds* (C).

NOTHING considerable happened at Athens from the time of Draco's archonship till that republic engaged herself in a war with the Mytilenians about the city of Sigeum, which was seated near the mouth of the river Scamander; the Athenian army was commanded by Phrynon, a person equally remarkable for the comeliness of his form, and the generosity of his mind. The Mytilenians were commanders in chief by Pittacus, one of the famous sages of Greece; as these commanders looked on the honour of their several countries to be engaged in this business, they exerted their utmost abilities with equal success. At last these chiefs met in single combat, wherein Phrynon depended on his valour only, but Pittacus made use of craft; for concealing behind his shield a net, he therewith suddenly entangled Phrynon, and easily slew him; but this not putting an end to the war, Periander, tyrant of Corinth, interposed, and both parties having submitted the dispute to his arbitration, he decreed that Sigeum should belong to the Athenians. This happened in the third year of the forty-third olympiad† (D).

Year after the
flood 2104
Before Christ
599.

ABOUT seven years after this war was ended, Athens was torn by civil dissensions; Cylon, a man of a most ancient family, son-in-law to Theagenes, tyrant of Megara, whose affable behaviour had gained him many friends, and whose great riches procured him many dependants, for med in his own mind a design of seizing the supreme power; this he communicated to such as he thought were fit to be trusted with so important a secret, and they concurring with him in his undertaking, it was agreed to consult the oracle of Apollo, when would be the fittest time for them to put this design in execution. The oracle answered, When the citizens were employed in celebrating the highest feast to Jupiter. Cylon and his associates waited therefore for the forty-fifth olympiad, and when many of the citizens were gone to the olympic games, the conspirators made themselves masters of the citadel. Megacles, who was at that time archon with his eight associates, and the whole power of Athens, immediately besieged them therein, and Cylon and his party found themselves so exceedingly distressed, especially for provisions and water, that they knew not what to do. Their chief and his brother found means to make their escape, but the meaner sort were left to shift for themselves‡. In this extremity they fled to the temple of Minerva, and took sanctuary therein; Megacles persuaded them with much ado to come down from thence, and to put themselves upon their country; when they assented to this, they tied a cord to the image of the goddess, and carried the clew with them to demonstrate that they were still under sanctuary; but unfor-

* Vide Note C. † POLYÆN. Strateg. lib. i. c. 25. PLUTARCH. de Malign. HERODOT. ‡ HERODOT. L. V. THUCYD. lib. i.

(C) Aristotle speaks very slightly of Draco's laws. He says they had nothing extraordinary in them except their cruelty (6), which expression, as I apprehend, hath given occasion to the censures of many other authors. With respect to Draco's laws, what fragments still remain put is not in our power to decide either for him or against him. Porphyry hath preserved a part of one of his laws, which runs thus: It is an everlasting law in Attica that the gods are to be worshipped, and the heroes also, according to the customs of our ancestors, and in private only, with good words, first-fruits, and annual libations (7). This seems to have been a commentary on Triptolemus's laws, and is declarative only of the manner in which the gods and heroes ought to be worshipped. Hesychius (8) mentions a law, whereby a person easing himself in the temple of Apollo, was adjudged to suffer death. It is highly likely, that amidst the disturbances which made laws necessary, Draco saw, or at least thought he saw, a necessity of punishing very severely, since the licentiousness of the people was grown to such a pitch, that nothing but harsh measures could force them within their former bounds. After all, the extravagant severity of his Thesmoi of Sanctions, like an edge too finely ground, hindered them from striking deep, so that by degrees they grew into dissolutude, so that the commonwealth stood more in need of new laws, than ever she stood in need of Draco's.

(D) The war between the Mytilenians and the Athenians about the city of Sigeum hath cost the learned a good deal of trouble. Herodotus doth not say any thing of Pittacus in the account he gives us of this business; but Plutarch alleges this as one instance of his malignity, and the little inclination he had to do any but the Athenians justice (9). But then Plutarch in commending excessively Pittacus's ensnaring Phrynon, seems to speak him a little prejudiced on that side, at least as the rules of honour are now settled. Polyænus tells this story without making any farther comment thereon, than that Pittacus was undoubtedly the first inventor of the art of net-fighting (10), which was afterwards common among the Romans in their slews, but with this difference from Pittacus's behaviour, that the Retiarius fought openly with his net and his dagger, whereas Phrynon thought nothing of a net till he found himself intangled in it.

(6) Arist. Polit. lib. ii. c. 10.
(9) Plutarch. de Malign. Herodot.

(7) De Abstinent.
(10) Polyæn. Strateg. lib. i. c. 28.

(8) Ap. Ant. Thys. Coll. leg. Ath. & Rom.

a tunately, as they passed the temple of the furies, the line snapt of itself, and Megacles and his officers construing this into a renunciation by the goddess, fell upon them without mercy, and put them to death as fast as they could: such as were without the temple were immediately dispatched: such as retired thither again were killed at the feet of the altars. In a word, none escaped but such as bribed the wives of the officers of justice. But this did not put an end to the sedition, the remains of Cylon's faction created great disturbances, not by pretending to domineer over their countrymen, but by insinuating that the violation of Minerva's sanctuary had drawn down the anger of heaven, of which all the crosses that happened to the republic were cited as indubitable proofs. These discourses had such an effect, that b Megacles and his officers were stiled execrable, and held to be persons under the peculiar displeasure of the gods¹. What happened in consequence of this we shall shortly see: In the mean time, let us observe that the oracle of Apollo justified itself by declaring that Cylon and his adherents mistook the feast; that intended by the oracle being the Diasia held in Athens to the honour of Jupiter, and not the olympic games² (E).

WHILE Athens was in this confusion the Megarensians attacked Nisea, and having taken it afterwards, drove the Athenians out of Salamis, which the latter endeavoured to recover, but in vain, for the Megarensians, continually victorious, cut off such numbers of them, that at last, despairing of success, and afflicted with the mighty c loss they had received, the Athenians made a law that it should be capital for any one to propose to attempt the recovery of *Salamis*³. About this time also the city was exceedingly disturbed with superstitious fears, and frightful appearances, this moved them to consult the Delphic oracle, and the answer they received was, that the city must be expiated. Upon this Nicias was sent to Crete to bring from thence Epimenides the Phœstian, who was reputed a holy man, beloved of the gods, and one who had deep skill in the mysteries of religion. He coming to Athens took some sheep that were all black, and others that were all white; these he led into the Areopagus, and turning them loose there, directed certain persons to follow them, who should mark where they couched, and there sacrifice them to the local deity.

d This being done, altars were erected in all these places to perpetuate the memory of this solemn expiation. Epimenides directed also many temples and chapels to be erected without the city, two of which have been particularly noted, viz. the chapel of Contumely, and the chapel of Impudence. He is reported to have looked wistfully on the port of Munychia for a long time, and afterwards to have said to those who were near him, *How blind is man to future things, for did the Athenians foresee what mischief will one day be derived to them from that place, they would eat it with their teeth*⁴. This prediction was fulfilled two-hundred and seventy years after, when Antipater constrained the Athenians to admit his garrison into that place. During his stay at Athens he became intimately acquainted with Solon, who was

e already taken notice of for his shining parts and admirable moderation. As for Epimenides, the Athenians were highly satisfied with what he did for them, and in token of their gratitude, offered him presents of great value and considerable

¹ PLUTARCH. in vita Solon. ² DACIER. in Plutarch. ubi supra. ³ PLUTARCH. ubi supra. ⁴ DIOGEN. LAERTIUS, in vita Epimen.

(E) There was for a long time after the democracy took place a strong party against it, who left no measures untried in order, if possible, to restore their ancient form of government. Cylon, as a man of quality, repined at the sudden change of the magistrates, and at the thoughts of asking that as a favour which he apprehended to be due to him as his birth-right. The design of seizing the citadel, if it had succeeded, would in all probability have ended the dispute in his favour; but the number he drew together proving far inferior to those who were under the direction of the archons, obliged him to set otherwise than he expected, and to endure a siege where he hoped to make a conquest (11). In the citadel there were two temples to Minerva, that seated in the middle was stiled Parthenion, alluding to her constant preservation of her virginity: it was afterwards burnt by the Persians, but repaired by Pericles with such skill as well as magnificence, that the remains thereof are to this day admirable, and shew it to have been one of the finest structures in the world (12). As to the proceeding against Cylon's confederates it was against the common custom of Greece, and might very well alarm a nation so prone to superstition as the Athenians were; for though they had the quickest wits of all the inhabitants of Greece, yet in these respects they were more scrupulous than any other people, as we shall see in the sequel of this history, when we come to speak of the ordinances relating to their religion.

(11) Herodot. Thucyd. Plutarch. in vit. Solonis

(12) Ciceron. Wheelin's Voyages.

honours; but he requested only a branch of the sacred olive, and this being given a him; he returned well satisfied to Crete^x (F).

It was about this time that Solon, whom we before mentioned, began to shew himself to his countrymen, and to display those rare qualities which rendered him so deservedly beloved while living, and which have preserved uninjured for so long a tract of time, the fame which he acquired. He was in every respect formed to make a figure in the Athenian commonwealth. He was noble by birth, if not more, for he descended lineally from Codrus; his mother was nearly related to the mother of Pisistratus, and he had a brother whose name was Dropides, who was archon the year after himself^y. We are told that he was born at Salamis, however we think that may be doubted from certain verses of his which we shall have occasion to quote. As honourable as his family was, the generosity of his father b left Solon in no very happy condition; this, as it is generally believed, engaged him to merchandize, though he might otherwise have subsisted well enough by the assistance of his friends; but this did not suit that greatness of soul which he inherited, he chose therefore to travel, and to merchandize, that he might live independently at home on his return, and not suffer that house to receive kindnesses, whose custom it had been to bestow them. It is plain both from his actions and his writings, that he was a disinterested patriot. The shameful decree that none under pain of death should mention the recovery of Salamis, grieved him to the heart; he therefore composed an elegy consisting of an hundred verses, to inflame the minds of the people against the Megarensians, who had taken from them that island. Having digested this elegy thoroughly in his mind, he ran into the market- c place as if he had been mad, with his night-cap on his head. and ascending the stool

^x PLUTARCH. in vita Solon.

^y DIOG. LAERT. vit. Solon.

(F) This Epimenides was a very extraordinary person, as we shall have occasion to shew in the history of Crete. Here we have nothing to say of him farther, than what relates to lustrating or cleansing cities, Diogenes Laertius, tells us, that he was the inventor of this art, or rather that he was the first that lustrated houses or fields, which, if spoken of Greece, may be true, for Moses had long before taught something of this nature to the Jews. This was practised on the great day of atonement, which might very well be called the annual lustration of Israel. Upon that day the priest took for himself a young bullock, and for the people two goats; the bullock the priest offered for himself; then he cast lots upon the goats, one was called the goat of Jehorah, and was offered; the other Azazel, or, as we translate it, the scape goat; the latter was presented also before the altar of God, and the priest laying his hands upon him, confessed all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions, which Moses calls putting them upon the head of the goat, which was then sent away into the wilderness, because he bore upon him all their iniquities unto a land of separation (13). The reader will easily see that we have given this account of the scape-goat here, that he might apply it to what is said of Epimenides's method of cleansing the city of Athens, which has a visible resemblance thereto, and was in all probability copied therefrom, or from the custom of some other eastern nations which originally borrowed it from the Hebrews. There were however other ceremonies practised for the same purpose. Thetæus in his poetical chronicle has given us a very remarkable account of the manner in which lustrations were made, their causes and effects.

Thus was in ancient times lustration made:
When any city groan'd beneath the weight
Of famine, plague or worse calamity,

Forthwith a grateful victim was prepared,
Which at the holy altar when they'd placed,
They cast upon the pile, cheese, cakes, and figs;
Then striking quick seven times its genitals
With sea leeks, and wild figs, and other fruits
Rude nature's product without help of art,
Burn it with wood cut from unplanted trees,
Next towards the wind the sportive ashes cast
Upon the sea; thus they the dreadful ills,
With which the city labour'd, drove away (14).

As to Epimenides, Strabo reports that he made a great use of verses and of hymns in his purifications (14), and Suidas tells us that he wrote in verse many rules and instructions for these sort of rites (16). Laertius reports that as he was about to mark out a place for a temple to three nymphs, a voice from heaven gave him this direction, not to the nymphs, but to Jupiter. Besides the prophecy beforementioned relating to the haven Munychia, Epimenides uttered another during his stay at Athens; for hearing that the citizens were alarmed at the progress of the Persian power at sea, he advised them to make themselves easy, for that the Persians would not for many years attempt any thing against the Greeks, and when they did, they would receive greater loss themselves than they would be able to bring upon the states they sought to destroy (17). Having related such strange things of this prophet and philosopher, it will not be amiss to close this note with observing, that the sacred olive mentioned above, was the tree produced by Minerva when she contended with Neptune, and that Aristotle was a downright infidel with respect to the stories of Epimenides's foretelling future events; that famous sage being of opinion our lustrator's talents lay quite another way, viz. in discovering what old crimes had produced present punishments, and how atonement might be made, and those ills taken away.

(13) Levinæus xvi.
(16) In vit. Epimenid.

(14) Thetæus. Chil. Hist. v. xxiii.

(15) Geogr. lib. x.

(16) In voce Epim.

^a of the common cryer, he repeated with great vehemence the elegy he had composed to the people who had gathered round him; that poem began thus:

From Salamis, behold a cryer come,
Who brings you news, in nervous verses home.

But the most moving strokes in this celebrated poem were contained in the following verses:

Rather than Athens, would I ow'd my birth,
To Pholegondrian, or Sicilian earth;
Since men will say where-ever I am tost,
He's of that dastard race, who Salamis have lost.

^b It ended thus:

To Salamis let us renew our claim,
And with the isle restored, restore our fame.

Pisistratus, who, as we before observed, was his near relation, mixed himself with the crowd which gathered round this pretended madman; he, by his persuasive eloquence, heightened that martial rage which Solon had kindled by his verses, so that of a sudden the sentiments of the Athenians were wholly changed, and they determined to assert their right to Salamis, and decreed a war accordingly. It is not easy to say who was appointed commander in chief of this expedition, some say Solon, and that Pisistratus accompanied him; others say that Pisistratus went general, and that Solon assisted him with his advice.

^c THERE are various accounts of the manner in which Salamis was again reduced under the Athenian power; the most current story is, that Solon coming with Pisistratus to Colias, and finding the women busy there in celebrating according to the custom the feast of Ceres, sent a confident of his to Salamis, who pretending to be no friend to that people, told the inhabitants that, if they had a mind to seize the fairest of the Athenian ladies, they might do it by passing over to Colias. The Megarensians giving easy credit to what this man said, presently fitted out a ship, which Solon perceiving from the opposite shore, immediately dismissed the women, and having dressed a sufficient number of beardless youths, in female habits, under which they concealed every one a dagger, he sent them to the sea side to dance and divert themselves as the women were wont to do. When those who came from Salamis drew near the coast, and saw these young people skipping up and down, they strove who should leap first out of the vessel, and running one and all to catch these damsels, their ship was surprized, themselves murdered, and the Athenians embarking on board their vessel, sailed immediately to Salamis and took it. Polyænus has inserted this relation, and Plutarch also admits that it was the current account of this business; he tells us however that others had related it after this manner: The

* PLUT. DIOG. LAERT. PAUSAN. &c.

(C) The name of Solon's father was Euphorion, or, as most writers affirm, Execestides, and we know nothing more of him, than that notwithstanding his liberality, and the nobility of his descent, he was far from being considerable in Athens. Aristotle reckons Solon himself among the inferior citizens, and quotes his own works to prove it; the truth is, that Solon was never rich, it may be because he was always honest: something of this sort seems to be implied in the following verses, which are accounted excellent:

Many unjust grow rich, and pious poor;
We would not change our virtue for their store;
For constant virtue is a solid base,
Riches from man to man uncertain pass (19).

In his youth he was mightily addicted to poetry, and as he was in those days unconfined, and had no very weighty affairs upon his hands, he wrote and published a great many poems; certain it is that all he did in this way deserves the highest commendation; his language is always pure, his thoughts alike delicate and clear, his subjects useful and sublime, and therefore Plato had just reason to say that if he had finished all his poems, and particularly the history he brought out of Egypt, and had taken time to revise and correct them as others did, neither Homer, Hesiod, or any other ancient poet would have been more famous (20). As he was an excellent poet himself he had a just and high idea of the power of verse, which he thought capable of making the strongest impressions on the mind of man; yet he was a great orator, and wrote in prose with peculiar neatness of expression and perspicuity. It is evident both from the life and writings of this great man, that he was a person not only of exalted virtue, but of a most pleasant and agreeable temper. He loved society, and made it his business to promote the welfare thereof, he considered men as men, he kept both their capacity for virtue, and their proneness to evil in his view, adapting his laws so as to strengthen and support the one, and to check and keep under the other; hence his institutions are as remarkable for their sweetness and practicability, as those of Lycurgus are for harshness and forcing human nature. The reader will excuse this short digression as to the character of Solon, since it is absolutely necessary for the framing a right idea of his conduct as a legislator.

(19) Plutarch. in vita Solonis.

(20) In Timæo.

first thing Solon did after he was appointed director of this expedition, was to consult the oracle of Apollo at Delpbi, from whom he received this response;^a

Let sacrifice be to those heroes paid,
Who under the Asopian ground are laid,
And dead, are by the setting sun survey'd.

Solon took upon him to explain this dark prediction, and was so happy as to interpret it right. He guessed that the heroes mentioned by the oracle were Periphemus and Cybris, he sailed therefore by night to Salamis, and offered at their tombs. This being performed, he gat eed a body of five-hundreded Athenian volunteers, who in case they succeeded, were to have the government of the island. These imbarqued in a galley of thirty oars, and in a considerable number of fishing^b boats, and setting sail in the evening, arrived the day following in a bay of the isle of Salamis which looked towards Eubaa. The next morning the whole island was alarmed, though they did not well know on what account; at last the Athenian gally was descried, the Megarensians thereupon manned out a stout ship, which doubling the cape in order to attack the galley, was on a sudden surrounded by Solon's armed boats, and quickly taken. The Athenians having put to death all the men surprized in this vessel, filled it with their choicest youth dressed in the Megarensian habits, which procured them an easy entrance into the port, where, when they arrived, they made all imaginable haste on shore, and attacked those who came to welcome them as their friends. In the mean time the remainder of the Athenians marched by land and attacked the city on the other side with such fury, that it was speedily^c taken. In memory of this extraordinary event, they instituted a solemn feast, during which an Athenian ship came as it were privately into the harbour, and the people running down to meet it, an armed man jumped on shore, and ran towards the promontory Sciradium as if to join his companions, who had marched by land. Near this place there stood a temple to Mars which was supposed to have been erected by Solon in memory of this victory which put the Athenians in possession of the whole island, the rest of the Megarensians retiring to their own country in virtue of a treaty concluded with Solon. The Megarensians so highly repented the loss of Salamis, that, notwithstanding the treaty, they presently sent new forces thither, against whom the Athenians fought, sometimes with good, sometimes with ill fortune. At last it was decreed to leave this dispute to the Lacedemonians, who commissioned the five^d following persons, viz. Critolaidēs, Amompharetus, Hypsechidas, Anaxilas, and Cleomenes, to hear both parties. Solon pleaded on this occasion the cause of his country, and some have suggested that he practised a little fraud to make it go the better, they say, that finding the following verse in Homer,

Ajax from Salamis twelve frigates brought,

he added thereto,

And rang'd his troops where the Athenians fought.

FROM whence he would have inferred, that Salamis even at that time belonged to the Athenians. But the friends of Solon assert that this is an idle story, and that their great orator made use of quite another proof; he made it appear, say they, that Phileus and Euryfaces the sons of Ajax settled at Athens, and being received into the number of citizens, gave up that island to the Athenians, Phileus becoming so considerable a person, that one of their wards took its name from him. He urged farther the persons buried in Salamis lay with their faces to the west agreeable to the custom of the Athenians, and directly contrary to that of the Megarensians, who turned the faces of their dead towards the east, and that moreover only one person was laid in a grave, which likewise corresponded with the practice of the Athenians, and differed from the Megarensian custom, which was to bury three or four in one grave^e. It would be needless to trouble the reader with any farther circumstances of this debate; let it suffice then to say that we are informed by Ælian, Solon carried his cause, not by the arts of a fallacious eloquence, but by the force of strong argument, urged in plain and perspicuous terms^f.

ON the return of Solon to Athens he was highly extolled by the people, to whom he quickly afforded a new occasion of admiring his wisdom. It happened that the inhabitants of Cirrha, a town seated in the bay of Corinth, after having by repeated incursions wasted the territory of Delpbi, besieged the city itself from a greedy

^a PLUT. IN VITA SOLON. DIAGEN. LAERT. ^b Var. Hist. lib. vii. cap. 19.

- a desire of making themselves masters of the mighty riches contained in the temple of Apollo. Advice of this being sent to the Amphictyons, who were the states-general of Greece, Solon advised that this matter should be universally resented, and that all the Greek states should immediately join in saving the Delphic oracle, and punishing the impiety of the Cirrheans; with which the council immediately complied and decreed a general war against that people. Solon was not however appointed general of this expedition, as Hermippus from another author relates, nor did he command the Athenian troops. Clysthenes, tyrant of Sicyon, commanded in chief, and Alcmaeon was general of the Athenian quota, Solon went however as counsellor or assistant to Clysthenes, and it was by his advice that the war was conducted to a prosperous issue. For when the Greek army had besieged Cirrba some time without any great sign of success, Apollo was consulted, who answered,

In vain you hope to take the place before
The sea's blue waves roll o'er the hallow'd shore.

- THIS response struck the army with surprize, from whence Solon extricated them by advising Clysthenes to consecrate solemnly the whole territories of Cirrba to the Delphic Apollo, whence it would follow that the sea must wash the sacred coast^c. Pausanias tells us that he made use of another stratagem, which was this, he caused the channel of the river Plisus to be turned, which run thro' the city of Cirrba, hoping thereby to have distressed the inhabitants for water; but they having a great many wells, his scheme did not thoroughly succeed, which as soon as he perceived, he caused a great number of hebeore roots to be sliced and thrown into the Plisus and when the water was thoroughly impregnated with the juice of these roots, he caused the river to be turned back into its old channel. The Cirrheans, overjoyed at the sight of running water, came down in troops and drank eagerly thereof, upon this an epidemic flux ensued, and the citizens being no longer able to defend the walls, the place was presently taken. Some authors have attributed this to Clysthenes, but that was because he commanded in chief, and Solon was no more than his counsellor. On the reduction of this place the inhabitants were severely punished, and Cirrba became henceforward the arsenal of Delphi^d.

- d WHEN Solon returned home from this expedition he found all things out of order, the remnant of Cylon's faction began to gather strength, and to excite mighty disturbances in the city. The pretence of religion enabled them to do all this. They gave out confidently that all the misfortunes the republic had met with had their source from the anger of the gods, occasion'd by the impious cruelty of Magacles and his faction. It happened that the loss of Salamine a second time concurred with this clamour, and now, as many writers report, Epimenides came and lured the city, which indeed is highly probable, if there were but sufficient authority to fix his arrival at Athens so low as this sedition must have happened. But to return to the proper subject of our history: Solon interposed on this occasion, and persuaded those who were stiled execrable to abide a trial. To this when they had consented, three-hundred persons were chosen to judge them, one Myron of the Phlyensian ward taking upon him to prosecute, which he did with such effect, that the three-hundred condemned such of Magacles's faction as were living, to perpetual banishment, and caused the bones of such as were dead to be taken up and cast without the limits of their country; thus this sedition was appeased, and Athens became once more at rest^e.

- THE turbulent disposition of the inhabitants of Attica would not suffer them to remain long in quiet, they therefore began to be out of humour with their constitution, though they could not agree how it should be mended. These disputes divided the Athenians into three parties, the Diacrii, Pediei, and Parali; the first of these were the inhabitants of the hilly country, who declared positively for perfect democracy; the second dwelling in the lower part of the country, and being far more opulent, were for an oligarchy, supposing that the government would then be for the most part in their hands; the third party living on the coast were men of moderate principles, and in consequence thereof desired a mixt government. In the midst of these debates there sprung up a new cause of trouble, the rich taking advantage of the laws, oppressed and enslaved the poorer sort in such a manner, that they were unable to bear it. The meaner people, as Plutarch tells us, ^a being indebted to the rich, either tilled their grounds, and paid them the sixth part of the produce, or engaged their bodies for their debts, so that some were made slaves at home, and many sold abroad; nay, to such a pitch was this mischief grown, that many sold their children to pay their creditors, and others in despair quitted Attica and went elsewhere. Such however as had more spirits than the rest were for throwing off a yoke too heavy to be born; these began to look about for a leader, declaring openly enough that they intended to make a thorough change in the government to free such as their creditors had brought into bondage, and to make a repartition of lands. In this desperate situation the citizens in general cast their eyes upon Solon. Those who were in greatest fear of what might happen from present troubles were for exalting him to sovereignty; nay, the most prudent Athenians, when ^b they considered how difficult a thing it would be to reform so disordered a commonwealth by law and reason, inclined to have him created prince. It was likewise asserted that the oracle of Delphos advised the same thing in the following response directed to Solon:

^c PLUT. in vita Solon.

^d PAUSAN. in Phocicis. POLYÆN. Strat. lib. iii. p. 7. SUIDAS in voce

Solon. ^e PLUTARCH. in vita Solon. DIOGEN. LAERT. in vita Solonis.

Assume the helm, the ship with prudence guide,
And thousands will assist to stem the tide.

WHAT rendered Solon so popular was a saying of his which all liked, and few understood; it was this, Equality breeds no strife; the rich interpreted this of dignity and power, the poor of riches and estate. Those therefore who agreed in nothing else, were unanimous in their respect towards him; the rich were contented to submit to his decisions, because he was himself a man of fortune, and the poor ^c dreading nothing from one so mild in temper, and so remarkably honest. The private friends of Solon encouraged him to lay hold of so fair an opportunity, and to assume the regal dignity, adding that it was a shame so wise a man should be frightened with a name, and reject a legal sovereignty, because it resembled tyranny. This great man withstood alike the desires of the many, and the persuasions of the few: he assured the former that he would never become master of his countrymen, and he told the latter, that how fair a spot soever tyranny might seem, it had this misfortune, that it had no passage out; and when his intimates laugh'd at this resolution of his, and quoted the example of Tyrondas tyrant of Eubœa, and Pittacus, at that time ^d prince of Mytilene, he contented himself with writing thus to Phocæus, who it seems pressed him most, to shew that he was steddy in his resolution:

That I have Athens spar'd, preserv'd my fame,
Nor soil'd my glory with a tyrant's name:
That when I might have kill'd, I chose to save,
I blush not, for I think the action brave:
And that I have done more than most men have.

It was upon this occasion that Solon shewed a spirit of patriotism which perhaps never had its equal: He condescended so far as to make use of fraud for the good of others, and with a prodigious greatness of soul dissembled with and cheated both parties, that he might save all. If he would have accepted the tyranny, he would immediately have acquired whatever he could wish, and might have done his country good too; he refused this as far as it might have benefitted himself, and yet took upon him all the care and trouble of a prince to benefit the people; thus he demonstrated that neither fear nor indolence had any share in his resolution ^e.

He was chosen archon without having recourse to lots, and when he was chosen he disappointed the hopes of both parties; where-ever he found things tolerable well under the old constitution, he refused to alter them at all, and was at extraordinary pains to explain the reason and necessity of those changes he did make, laying this down as a maxim, That those laws will be best observed which power and justice equally support. He was a perfect judge of human nature, and sought to rule men by shewing them it was their interest to obey, and not by attempting to force them upon whatever he esteemed right, and therefore he answered a person who asked him whether he had given the Athenians the best laws in his power; I have established the best they could receive; knowing well that it was an impossible thing to please all, he made it his utmost care not mightily to displease any, whence it followed, that none sought to abrogate the laws he gave them.

^f PLUTARCH. ubi supra. DIOGEN. LAERT. ubi supra.

- a As to the main occasion of the sedition, viz. the oppressed state of the meaner sort, he certainly took it away in a great measure by a contrivance which he stiled Sisachthia, i. e. a discharge; but what this was, authors are not agreed on; some say that he released all debts then in being, and prohibited for the future the making any man's body liable for a debt. Others affirm that the poor were eased, not by cancelling their debts, but by lowering the interest, and increasing the value of money, a Mina which before was worth seventy-three drachms only, being by him made equal to a hundred, which was of great advantage to the debtor, and did the creditor no hurt at all. But after all, it is more probable that the Sisachthia was a total discharge or remission, otherwise Solon would hardly have boasted in his verses, that by this means he had removed the many marks of mortgages which were every-where frequent; for the Athenians had a custom of hanging up billets to shew that houses were engaged for such or such a sum of money; that he had freed from apprehension, such as were driven to despair; called home exiles, whom the dread of their creditors had kept abroad till they forgot their native language, and delivered from bondage such as were slaves in their native soil. In the midst of all his glory an unlucky accident befel him, which for a time hurt his reputation, and had almost overturned all his schemes. Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus, his intimate friends, having been consulted by him on an oration; he had prepared to engage the people to consent to the discharge of debts, on a promise that he would attempt nothing as to lands; these men betraying the trust he reposed in them, borrowed great sums of money, and purchased estates before the edict came out; this was at first thought to have been the effect of connivance, but this aspersions was presently wiped off, when it appeared that Solon himself was a sufferer, as some say, five talents, others seven, others fifteen, which he had lent out at interest, and which in consequence of his own law he lost: his friends however could never recover their credit, but were for ever stigmatized with the opprobrious appellation of Cbreocopide, i. e. Debt-Sinkers.

THE Athenians were as little pleased with Solon's management as with the former condition, the rich and the poor were equally dissatisfied; the former thought he had done too much in cancelling their debts, the latter thought he had done too little, because he had not divided the lands of Attica equally amongst them. It is from Solon himself that we have this account, and we have it in his usual manner, that is, in verse:

I was your darling heretofore, but now,
You look upon me with contracted brow;
Had any man but I obtain'd your grace,
He would have had a sal'ry with his place.

In a short time however they had wit enough to discover that they were in the wrong, and Solon in the right, and they gave at least a more public, if not a more general token of their repentance, than they had shewn of their displeasure; for they instituted a solemn sacrifice in testimony of their acquiescing under his institution, and called it Sisachthia, at the same time they unanimously elected Solon legislator of Athens, giving him power, not only to make laws, but to alter and new-model their constitution as he thought proper.

THE first thing this great man did after his country had conferred upon him so extraordinary an office, was to cancel the laws of Draco, excepting only those relating to murder. A proceeding perfectly right, since there is nothing more dishonourable, and at the same time more dangerous to a state than latent laws, i. e. such as are disused, and yet in being, which was the case of Draco's; their severity rendered them hateful, but Solon took away their authority; nor would he suffer his institutions to bear the same name, as we have already shewn. It was the desire of Solon to act in all respects moderately, he therefore resolved to place the dernier resort, as we phrase it, or supreme power, in the people, and to leave the execution of the government to the nobles; with this view he divided the people into four degrees or ranks, the first of these consisted of such whose stock amounted to five-hundred Medimni, or measures of fruit, these he stiled Pentacosiomedimni, these paid a talent to the publick treasury. The second class consisted of such as were able to keep a horse, or were worth three-hundred measures, they were stiled Hippodamelountes, i. e. bound to find a horse; the third class was made a up of such as were worth two hundred measures, they were stiled Zengite, which implies a middle rank, because they stood between the knights of the lowest order of the people, who were stiled Thetes; these were not admitted to any office, but each of them had his vote in the general assembly of the people, which was thought at first a matter of little consequence, so that the nobility gave themselves no pain about it, though in after times it was found of the highest consequence, as Solon fore-saw it would be; the reason of it was this: Solon purposely drew up his laws in obscure terms, and allowing in all cases an appeal to the people, doubts often arose, appeals were consequently frequent, and hence, though the common sort could not attain to magistracy, yet they had a mighty power in the state. Solon himself was so well satisfied with what he had done in this matter, that he celebrates it in these words, which shew at once what they regard he had for their ancient constitution, and for the people in general:

^E PLUTARCH. ubi supra.

^H PLUTARCH. ubi supra, &c.

The commons I sufficient weight allow'd;
Honour from none I took, on none bestow'd;
In power or wealth, those who the rest outshin'd,
Within just bounds I by my laws confin'd;
Thus I preserv'd, what did to each belong;
That neither high, nor low, might suffer wrong.

HEREIN consisted the ancient democracy of Athens; but because that kind of government is in its nature more apt to change than any other, Solon, in order to secure it, established two checks, or, if we may be allowed to make use of his metaphor, threw out two anchors to secure it. The first of these was the court of Areopagus, which though settled long before, had lost much of its power by Draco's preferring the Ephetae. In ancient times, and till Solon became legislator, it consisted of such persons as were most conspicuous in the state for their wealth, power, and probity; but Solon made it a rule that such only should have a seat therein as had served the office of archon; this had the effect he designed, it raised the reputation of the Areopagites very high, and rendered their decrees so wonderfully venerable, that none contested or repined at them through a long course of ages. The second stay of the Athenian commonwealth was the senate, which Solon made to consist of four-hundred, a hundred out of each tribe. These had the prior cognizance of all that was to come before the people, and nothing could be proposed to the general assembly till digested by them, so that, as far as he was able, he provided against a thirst of arbitrary power in the rich, and a desire of licentious freedom in the commons; the Areopagus being a check upon the former, as the senate was a curb on the latter¹.

The general frame of the republic thus settled, he gave the Athenians next a body of laws, of which we have still some remaining; these were so much esteemed that the Romans sent ambassadors of Athens to transcribe them for the use of their state. As these transcribed laws became the basis of the Roman Jurisprudence, which has since been received almost throughout Europe under the name of the civil law; we may with reason affirm, that many of Solon's constitutions are yet in force. Such as are ascribed to him by ancient authors we shall give a concise account of in this place.

WE will begin with one of the most extraordinary statutes enacted by this law-giver, and which has given politicians the most trouble to understand; we are obliged to A. Gellius for preserving to us the very words of this law. It runs thus: "If through discord and dissension any sedition or insurrection rend the people into two parties, so that with exasperated minds they take arms and fight against each other; he who at such a time, and in such a case shall not engage himself on one side or other, but shall endeavour to retire and separate himself from the evils fallen on his country, let such a one, losing houses, country, and estate, be sent out an exile²". Cicero, speaking of this law, by some slip of his memory, makes the penalty capital³. Plutarch explains the reason of it⁴, as does the author first cited, who highly commends it, and says, that though at first sight it may seem dangerous to the public peace, yet in truth it was calculated to support it; for the wise and just, as well as the envious and wicked, being obliged to chuse a some side, matters, were easily accommodated; whereas if the latter only, as is generally the case in other cities, had the management of factions, they would for private reasons be continually kept up to the great hurt, if not the utter ruin of the state^a.

¹ POLLUX lib. viii. cap. 10. PLUTARCH. ubi supra. POTTER'S Archeologia. MEURSIUS. SOLON, &c. ² Noct. Attic. lib. ii. cap. 12. ³ Ad Attic. lib. x. E. 1. ⁴ Ubi supra.

THE rules which Solon gave for bestowing of heiresses have been very harshly censured; we will put them together, that the reader may see the general intent of the legislator. The next of kin to an heiress may require her in marriage, and she may likewise require him; if he refuses, let him pay five-hundred drachms for her dowry. If he who possesseth such an inheritrix by law, as her lord and master, be impotent, let it be lawful for her to admit any of her husband's nearest kindred, b and let him who has married an heiress be obliged to visit her thrice a month at least. The intent of these injunctions was, that neither a rich heiress might carry the estate out of her family, nor a poor one be in danger of marrying below her birth; as to allowing a woman to make choice of her husband's nearest relation, it might possibly be made in terrorem, to prevent persons who knew themselves to be impotent from marrying rich heiresses, whereby such a one defrauded him, to whom by this law the woman was to have recourse of his due^c.

He enacted that a bride should bring no more with her than three gowns, and some slight household goods of little value, and that the bride and bridegroom should be shut into a room together, and there eat a quince; the bride likewise brought an c earthen pan, wherein barley was parched, to the house of her husband. The meaning of all this was, that Solon desired, as much as in him lay, to render marriage no longer a mercenary business, but a contract of minds founded upon mutual affection; the eating of a quince implied that their discourses ought to be pleasant to each other, that fruit making the breath sweet; the earthen vessel, which was called Phrogeteon, signified that she undertook the business the house, and would do her part towards providing for the family^d.

He ordained that none should revile the dead, even though provoked by the children of the deceased. This law procured him great applause, and had certainly in it much both of humanity and policy. He directed that none should revile any living d person at sacred solemnities in the courts of justice, or at publick spectacles, on pain of paying three drachmæ to the person reviled, and two more to the public treasury. He likewise made a law against slander. This great man knew very well that a general law against anger could never be put in execution. He therefore contented himself with providing that the passions of private men should not dishonour religious ceremonies, the justice of the state, or publick diversions, and that no passion should excuse calumny^e.

BEFORE Solon's time citizens had not the power of making wills, but a man's goods and estates went, whether he would or no, to his heir at law; but Solon, having abrogated this custom, enacted that such as had no children might leave their estates to whom they pleased, preferring friendship to family, and the ties of affection to consanguinity; but then he added this proviso to his law, that the maker of such a will should be in the full possession of his senses, not wrought upon by sickness, potions, bondage, or the blandishments of a wife. Wherein he shewed his great wisdom by making no distinction between actual constraints and those imposed by art, both having the same power of putting a man out of his right mind. He likewise ordained that adopted persons should make no will, but as soon as they had children lawfully begotten, then they were at liberty to return into the family whence they were adopted, or if they continued in it to their death, then they were to return back the estates to the relations of the persons who adopted them^f.

WITH respect to women and their expences he made the following laws; when a woman travelled, he permitted her not to carry with her above three gowns, nor to carry any provisions above the value of an obolus, her panner or basket was not to be above a cubit in bigness, nor was she allowed to travel in the night, but in a chariot, and with the torch-light. He forbade them likewise to tear their checks to procure mourning and lamentation at the funerals of such as they had no relation to: he allowed not that an ox should be sacrificed at funerals, nor that more than three garments should be buried with them, and he forbade women to approach the monuments of persons not related to them, except at the time of their interring; these laws were particularly transcribed by the Romans ^a.

^a A. GELLIIUS ubi supra. ^c PLUTARCH ubi supra. DIOD. SICUL. lib. xii. TERTENT. Hecyr. Act. 1. Gen. ii. ^d PLUTARCH ubi supra. POLLUX lib. i. cap. 12. 15. ISIDOR. Epist. lib. iii. E. 243. ^e PLUTARCH ubi supra. DEMOSTH. in orat. Leptin. ^f PLUTARCH ubi supra. DEMOSTH. ubi supra.

THE liberty and other emoluments which were enjoyed at Athens drawing thither a great concourse of people from other parts, Solon foresaw that this would have bad consequences, if some means were not devised to make these people industrious; he therefore established by law that a son should be released from all obligation to maintain an aged father, in case that father had not bred him up to some trade. He vested the court of Areopagus with a power of examining how people lived, and of punishing idleness: he allowed every man a right to prosecute another for that crime, and in case a person was convicted thereof thrice, he suffered Atimia, i. e. Infamy. Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus agree that a law of this kind was in use in Egypt. It is probable therefore that Solon, who was thoroughly acquainted with the learning of that nation, borrowed it from them, a practice for which the Greeks were famous, though at the same time they styled those nations barbarous from whom their own laws and policy were borrowed ^b.

THE husband who surprised his wife in adultery was allowed by Solon to kill the adulterer; whoever ravished a free woman was to be fined a hundred drachmæ. He who debased himself so low as to become a pandar, except to a common woman, suffered a fine of twenty drachmæ; a man was forbid to put either his daughter or sister to the scandalous trade of prostitution, unless he first surprised her with a man: he enacted that no adulteress should be permitted to adorn herself, and in case she did, he gave liberty to any that thought fit to tear her cloaths of her back, and beat her into the bargain ^c.

To the victor at the Isthmian games, Solon adjudged the reward of five-hundred drachmæ. To the victor in the Olympic, he ordered that one hundred should be given. He contracted the rewards bestowed upon wrestlers, esteeming such gratuities useless and even dangerous, tending to encourage idleness by putting men upon wasting that time in exercises which ought to be spent in providing for their families ^d.

HE directed five drachmæ to be given to him who caught a he-wolf, and one to him who took a she one, the former being the price of an ox, the latter of a sheep. Attica was at this time extremely infested by these creatures, of which this law occasioned a speedy destruction.

WATER being extremely scarce at Athens, and in its neighbourhood, he ordained that where there was a public well, all who lived within a Hippicon, i. e. four furlongs of it, should have leave to use it. They that lived further off were bound to dig wells for themselves; but if a man digged ten fathom, and met with no water, then he might fill a pitcher of six gallons twice a-day at his neighbour's well, and whoever sunk a well was to take care that it was as far distant from his neighbours as it was deep. If a man planted a tree, he was to see that it was five foot distant from his neighbours, and if a fig or olive-tree, nine, a hive of bees was to be thirty feet distant, all these tended to the same end, viz. to prevent one man from trespassing on the property of another ^e.

HE enacted that whoever refused to maintain his parents, or had wasted his paternal estate, should be atimos, i. e. infamous. It seems Solon did not conceive that a man could be privately bad and publicly good, that one who neglected his duty to his parents should preserve it to the state, or be frugal of his country's revenue when he had spent his own ^f.

SUCH as commonly frequented infamous women, he forbade to make orations, believing that men without shame were not to be trusted to speak to the people: Demosthenes highly commended this law, and exhorted the Athenians to take care that it was put in execution, as the surest means to preserve the peace and honour of the republic ^f.

HE forbade a guardian to marry the mother of his ward, and permitted not the next heir to be admitted guardian of the infant; some say that he forbade likewise a guardian to marry his son to the mother of his ward ^b. All these were beyond a question made to hinder collusion, and to bar as far as possible the scandalous practice of cheating minors.

^a PLUTARCH. ubi supra. CICER. de Legib. lib. ii. ^b PLUTARCH. ubi supra. VITRUVIUS. Pizfar. lib. vi. HERODOT. lib. vii. DIOD. SICUL. lib. i. ^c PLUTARCH. ubi supra. LYSIAS. Orat. de ead. Erat. ^d PLUTARCH. ubi supra. ^e PLUTARCH. ubi supra. CAIUS de Legib. lib. iv. ^f LYSAN. Declam. xviii. DIOD. HALYC. lib. ii. ^a ÆSCHIN. in Timarch. DEMOST. in Androt. ^b DIAGEN. LAERT. ubi supra.

He enjoined gravers to keep no impressions of the seal-rings they sold; if a man put out the eye of another who had but one eye, he directed that he should lose both his; as to theft, Demosthenes gives us Solon's law in these words; "If any man steal in the day-time, he may be carried to the eleven officers; if he steal any thing by night, it shall be lawful for any to kill him, or in the pursuit to wound him, and to carry him to the eleven officers. Whosoever is convicted of such offences as are liable to chains, shall not be capable of giving bail for his theft, but his punishment shall be death; and if any one steal out of the Lyceum, b "or the Academy, or Cynosarges, a garment or a small vessel of wine, or any other thing of little value, or some vessel out of the gymnasia or havens, he shall be punished with death; but if any man shall be convicted privately of theft, it shall be lawful for him to pay a double value, and it shall be also at the pleasure of the convictor, besides payment of money, to put him in chains five days, and as many nights, so as all men may see him bound^c."

By his laws, an archon taken in drink was to be punished with death, Solon wisely conceiving that a magistrate guilty of such an offence must be rendered vile and contemptible in the eyes of the people. He decreed that in case a man surprized his wife in adultery, and lived with her afterwards, he should be deemed infamous; c he compelled children to be dutiful to their parents, permitting the latter in case of disobedience to disinherit and turn them out of doors: he condemned such as avoided going to war, fled from the army, or shewed any other flagrant sign of cowardice, to be expelled the sanctified precincts of the forum, to be for ever debarred from wearing a crown or wreath, and from being allowed to enter any places of public worship. He appointed it for a statute, that a citizen of Athens should be tried nowhere but at Athens, and that the eldest citizens should first make orations, but with the greatest modesty, and without any endeavours to stir the passions of the people; afterwards he ordered that all should speak according to their seniority, and have leave to deliver their opinions freely on any matter in debate; but he prohibited young d men, however wise they might be esteemed, either to become magistrates, or to make orations to the people^d.

It was a maxim established by this wise legislator, that the common people should be punished slowly, but magistrates and persons in authority suddenly, assigning for it this reason, that the former might be punished at any time, but that in correcting the latter there ought to be no delay. As to funerals, the expence of which were in his time excessive, Demosthenes recites his directions in these words; "Let the dead bodies be laid out within the house, according as the deceased gave order, and the day following before sun-rise carried forth; whilst the body is carrying to the grave, let the men go before, the women follow: it shall not be lawful for any woman to enter upon the goods of the dead, and to follow e "the body to the grave under threescore years of age, except such as are within the degree of cousins^e." Cicero reports that, with respect to sepulchres, he enacted no man should demolish them or bring any new thing into them, and that such should be punished as demolished any monument erected to the memory of the dead^f. From these laws of his instituting, it appears that his philosophy did not lead him to trespass on those notions of humanity commonly received in his country; he fought to moderate the extravagance of their funerals, but at the same time permitted all reasonable honours to be paid to the memory of such as were defunct.

We will conclude our account of Solon's laws with two or three which had more regard to the society, than to the interest of private persons. He ordained that if one citizen injured another, any Athenian might have his action against him^g; hence it is evident, he regarded each individual as a member of the body politic, which could not be hurt without affecting all the other members; and thus he provided against the power of the great; for though a poor man who was injured might think fit to acquiesce, yet a person of equal rank with the aggressor, might, either out of a principle of justice or of rivalry, commence a prosecution on that account. Solon instituted feasts in the common halls under the title of publick Meals, but he forbid that the same person should be entertained often, and ordered such to be fined as did a not come in their turns, ascribing the former offence to greediness, the latter to a contempt of the public^b. He forbade any strangers to be naturalized at Athens, who were not either perpetual exiles from their own country, or, out of love to Athens, had brought their whole families to settle there, so as to have no interest in another placeⁱ: he provided for the children of such as were slain in the service of the state, by directing that they should be brought up and instructed at the public expence, till they were twenty years old^k. He made but few laws relating to religion, and against parricides he made none, assigning for it this reason, that he scarce believed any Athenian would be so wicked^l.

^a DEMOSTH. in Timocr.^d DEMOSTH. ubi supra.

ÆSCHIN. in Chrytip.

^e Orat in Macart.^f De Legib. lib. ii.^g PLUT. ubi supra.

He shewed the excellence of his knowledge by correcting the irregularity of months; for considering that the course of the moon did not agree with the rising and setting of the sun, but that sometimes she overtook and passed him in the same day, he ordered such a day to be called the last and the first, attributing that part of the day which preceded the conjunction to the old moon, and that which succeeded it to the new. The next day he ordered to be called Noumenia, i. e. the new moon, and for these alterations he is reckoned by Plutarch to have been the first who understood a verse in Homer, wherein mention is made of a day wherein one month ended, and the next began (H).

He

^bId. ibid. ⁱMEURS. in Solon. ^kARISTIDES in Panathen. ^lMAXIM. TYR. Dis. xxxix. CICER. Orat. pro Rosc.

(H) It is a point worthy of observation, that the ancient heroes gained their reputation as much from the strength of their wits as of their arms, and that though some excelled in valour, others in wisdom, yet in all there was a happy mixture of both. Hercules, so famed for his labours, instructed the Greeks in astronomy, which he learned from Atlas, and is thence said by the poets to have borne for a time the heavens upon his shoulders. Numa, as he gave laws to Rome, reformed the Roman calendar, and in succeeding times, Julius Caesar, when he had reduced his enemies, purged away those errors which were grown hoary among his countrymen, and is celebrated not as a lover only of this science of astronomy, but as a consummate master therein. Such also was Solon for the times in which he lived, for though some have pretended to ascribe the honour of introducing astronomy into Greece to Oenopidas of Chios, or Anaxagoras the Clazomenian, yet it is certain that they were no more than the improvers of it; the first principles of this art came certainly into Greece with its first planters, and were from time to time cultivated by such as either came out of Egypt, or the east, and settled in Greece, or had at least travelled into those countries. Thales the Milesian, and Pythagoras the Samian, were the two great masters who brought the undigested notions of the heavenly system, which hitherto had amused the Greeks, into tolerable form; and this they did by dint of their acquaintance with the learning of foreign nations. As to Homer, in whose poems we meet with the first seeds of all the various kinds of ancient literature, we find that he describes the heroical year, as divided not into months, but by the seasons. The returns of seed-time and harvest the constant revolutions of labour and rest in consequence of the annual returns of fair and foul weather served well enough to mark the succession events, and therefore it was an act of judgment in this great poet to make use of these characters in his account of a battle (21), as he elsewhere introduces Achilles measuring the day, not by hours, but by the more obvious division of morning, noon, and evening (22). We are not to infer from hence that years and months were not known in the time of Homer; the contrary appears from several passages in his poems, and particularly from this very line which Solon is said to have been the first who penetrated its true sense:

Τὸ μὲν φθιμένο μὲν τὸ δ' ἱστανόμην,

When one month ended, and the next began (23).

Thales divided the year into twelve months, making each month consist of thirty days, and the year consequently of three hundred and sixty days; but finding that this year did not answer the motion of the sun, he intercalated thirty days at the end of two full years; which intercalation, because it happened at the beginning of the third year, some have mistaken for a triennial period. It is easy to perceive that this method of Thales must in a short time have introduced great confusion, there being a redundancy of almost ten days in a year (24). Solon discovered this, and not only discovered it, but discovered its cause, or at least its principal cause, which was Thales's maxim, that the moon performed her revolution in thirty days, which Solon found to be false, and that the true time was twenty-nine days and a half. This account sets what has been said above in a clear light, and shews with what justice Solon was applauded for his skill as an astronomer; let us see with what dexterity he applied that skill as a legislator: he did not alter the number of months which Thales had fixed, but directed that each of them should be accounted twenty-nine or thirty days alternately; by this means a lunar year was formed of three hundred fifty-four days; but perceiving that this would leave things still in confusion, he invented a method of reconciling it to the solar year, which was thus; at the end of two years he directed a month of twenty-two days to be intercalated, and at the end of a second two years, he ordered that a month of twenty-three days should be intercalated; now if we take all these sums together we shall find that the number of days in Solon's cycle of four years was one thousand four hundred sixty-one, the fourth part of which is three hundred sixty-five and a quarter, the true solar year, as it was then accounted. Solon likewise engaged the Athenians to divide their months into three parts, styled the beginning, middling, and ending; each of these consisted of ten days, when (21) Iliad. λ. v. 84.

vir. Thal.

(22) Iliad. φ. v. 3.

(23) Odysseus. ε. v. 161.

(24) Diag. Laws. in.

^a He procured his laws to be ratified for a hundred years, and caused them to be conserved in different tables. Such as related to private actions in parallelograms of wood with cases which reached from the ground, and turned about upon a pin like a wheel, from whence they were called Axones, placed first in the citadel, and then in the Prytaneum, that his people might see them when they pleased, and some remains there were of them in Plutarch's time. Such as concerned public orders and sacrifices were contained in triangular tables of stone called Cyrbes^m; the Athenian magistrates were sworn to observe both; in time, these monuments of his wisdom became so famous, that all public arts were from them named Axones and Cyrbes, as we are informed by Harpocration and *Suidas*ⁿ.

^b AFTER his laws were promulgated, some or other were coming to him daily to have them explained, to know the reasons on which they were founded, and to advise him to alter this or that according as their humour or interest led them, which importunities made him so uneasy, that to avoid them he resolved to travel. For he considered that not to answer these people would argue pride, and that the answering them would beget great inconveniences: with this view he bought a ship, and pretending an inclination to trade, prevailed on the Athenians to permit him to be absent for ten years, during which space he hoped his laws would become familiar to them^o.

It will not be amiss to interrupt the Athenian history here in order to insert our promised account of the republic, a thing so necessary, that we could not proceed farther without confounding the reader. For the sake of perspicuity we shall not tie ourselves to the form settled by Solon, but give a concise history of the Athenian government, as it subsisted in succeeding times, that we may not be obliged at every turn to insert notes for the explaining those terms which may once for all be rendered familiar by introducing such an account of the Athenian commonwealth in this place.

^c In the first place it will be necessary to take a short view of the city of Athens. In the most early times, that which was afterwards called the citadel was the whole city, and went under the name of Cecropia from its founder Cecrops, whom the Athenians in after-times affirmed to have been the first builder of cities, and called this ^d therefore by way of eminence Polis, i. e. The city. In the reign of Erichthonius it lost the name of Cecropia, and acquired that of Athens, on what account is not certain; the most probable is, that it was so named in respect to the goddess Minerva, whom the Greeks called Athene, who was always esteemed its protectress^p. This old city was seated on the top of a rock in the midst of a large and pleasant plain, which, as the number of inhabitants increased, became full of buildings, which induced the distinction of Acro and Catapolis, i. e. of the upper and lower city; the extent of the citadel was sixty stadia, it was surrounded by olive-trees, and fortified, as some say, with a strong palisade; in succeeding times it was encompassed with a strong wall, in ^e which there were nine gates, one very large one, and the rest small. The inside of the citadel was adorned with innumerable edifices, concerning which the curious reader may thoroughly inform himself from the treatise written expressly on this subject by a learned person already mentioned^q (1). The most remarkable of these were when the month was thirty days long, and the last of nine, when it was nine and twenty days long. In speaking of the two first parts they reckoned according to the usual order of numbers, viz. the first day of the moon beginning, the second day of the middling moon, but with respect to the last part of the month they reckoned backwards, that is, instead of saying the first day of the ending moon, they said the tenth day of the ending moon, and instead of the second the ninth day, and so on to the last. This is a circumstance that must be carefully noted; for without being aware of it, it is impossible to understand many passages in ancient authors. As for instance, in Arglephane's comedy of the clouds, a man speaking of the manner in which interest became due, reckons the days thus; five, four, three, two, and the most abominable of all days, that of the old and new moon. Thus much as to Solon's knowledge in astronomy, we shall in its proper place give a farther account of the Attic year (25).

^m PLUT. ubi supra. POLLUX, viii. 10. ⁿ In vocibus Axones & Kyβες. ^o PLUTARCH. ubi supra. ^p ARISTID. Panathen. STEPHAN. VOCE Aθηναι. ^q PLUTARCH. in PERICL. PAUSAN. Attici. HARPOCRAT. ARISTID. ubi supra.

(1) This learned person is the celebrated John Meursius, to whom the learned world stands indebted for the most laboured peices which perhaps ever came from the pen of a critic; he was by birth a Dutchman, but he studied the civil law at Orleans, where he became very early remarkable for his love, or rather for his passion towards Greek were, the magnificent temple of Minerva, stiled Parthenion, because that goddess ^a was a virgin; the Persians destroyed it, but it was rebuilt with still greater splendor by the famous Pericles, all of the finest marble, with such skill and strength, that in spite of the rage of time and barbarous nations, it remains perhaps the first antiquity in the world, and stands as a witness to the truth of what ancient writers have recorded of the prodigious magnificence of Athens in her flourishing state. The temple of Neptune and of Minerva, for it was divided into two parts, one sacred to the god, in which was the salt fountain said to have sprung upon the stroke of his trident, the other to the goddess potestress of Athens, wherein was the sacred olive which she produced, and her image which fell down from heaven in the reign of Erichthonius both which edifices are still remaining. At the back of Minerva's temple ^b was the public treasury, which was burnt to the ground through the knavery of the treasurers, who having misapplied the revenues of the state, took this short method of making up accounts^c. The lower city comprehended all the buildings surrounding the citadel, the fort Munychia, and the havens Phalerum and Piræus, the latter of which was joined to the city by walls five miles in length; that on the north was built by Pericles, but that on the south by Themistocles; but by degrees the turrets which were at first erected on these walls were turned into dwelling houses for the accommodation of the Athenians, whose large city was now become too small for them. The city, or rather the lower city had thirteen great gates, with the names of which it is not necessary to trouble the reader. Among the principal edifices which adorned it, ^c we may reckon the temple of Theseus erected by Conon, near its centre adjacent thereto the young people performed their exercises. It was also a sanctuary for distressed persons, slaves or free: it remains intire to this day, and is used as a church, being dedicated to St. George. The Olympian temple erected in honour of Jupiter, the honour of Athens, and of all Greece, the foundation of it was laid by Pisistratus, it was carried on but slowly in succeeding times, seven-hundred years elapsing before it was finished, which happened under the reign of Adrian, who was particularly kind to Athens; this was the first building in which the Athenians beheld pillars. The pantheon, dedicated to all the gods; a most noble structure, supported by 120 marble pillars, and having over its great gate two horses carved by Praxiteles; it is yet remaining, as we shall have occasion to shew hereafter when we come to speak ^d of the present state of this famous city. In several parts of it were Stoas or portico's, wherein people walked in rainy weather, and from whence a sect of philosophers were denominated stoics, because their master Zeno taught in these portico's^e. There were at Athens two places called Ceramicus from Ceramus the son of Bacchus and Ariadne; one within the city containing a multitude of buildings of all sorts, the other in the suburbs, in which was the academy, and other edifices. The Gymnasia of Athens were many, but the most remarkable were the Lyceum, Academia, and Cynosarges. The Lyceum stood on the banks of Ilissus, some say it was built by Pisistratus, others by Pericles, others by Lycurgus. Here Aristotle taught philosophy instructing such as came to hear him as they walked, whence his disciples are ^e generally thought to derive the name of peripatetics^f. The Ceramicus without the city was at the distance of six stadia from its walls, the academy made part thereof, as to the name of which there is some dispute; some affirm that it was so called from Academos an antient hero, who, when Helen was stolen by Theseus, discovered the place where she lay hid to Castor and Pollux, for which reason the Lacedemonians,

(25) Cœsarin. de die Natal. Hen. Dodwell. de An. vet. Græc. Stanley's life of Solon cum multis. al.

^a PAUSAN. ubi supra. HARPOCRAT. &c. SIR GEORGE WHEELER'S TRAVELS. I. viii.

^b SUIDAS, &c. al.

^c ATHENÆUS Deip.

Greek learning. Amongst other pieces he wrote that referred to in the text under the title of Cecropia, or the citadel of Athens, and its antiquities in one book; this treatise consists of thirty-two chapters, and contains a prodigious display of its author's learning; almost every passage in the Greek authors relating to the subject, is there to be found in the proper words of the author, with a very exact Latin translation, which was added, as the author tells us in the second edition, at the desire of several ingenious persons in Spain and Italy, who had requested it by letter. Upon which Mensius makes this reflection, that, as things stood, it was indeed reasonable and necessary, since there were not many who affected the Greek learning, and of those the greater part rather loved than understood it. The inquisitive and intelligent reader may find a multitude of curious particulars accurately digested in this laboured history; or if he is not inclined to take so much pains, he may peruse a very succinct abridgment of Mensius's book in Dr. Potter's excellent antiquities of Greece, to whom we are in a great measure beholden for this part of our history of Athens (26).

a when they invaded Attica, always spared this place ^u. Dicæarchus writes that Castor and Pollux had two Arcadians in their army, the one named Echedemus, the other Maratbus; from the former of these he says this place took its name, and that the borough of Marathon was so called from the other ^x. It was a marshy unwholesome place till Cimon was at great pains to have it drained, and then it became extremely pleasant delightful, being adorned with shady walks, where Plato read his lectures, and from thence his scholars were styled academics ^y. The Cynosarges was a place in the suburbs, not far from the Lyceum; it was famous on many accounts, but particularly for a noble gymnasium erected there appointed for the special use of such as were Athenians only by one side; in after times Themistocles derived to himself ill-will, by carrying many of the nobility to exercise with him here, because being but of the half blood he could exercise no where else; in this gymnasium Antisthenes instituted a sect of philosophers, who from the name of this district, as many think, were stiled Cynics ^z. The havens of Athens were three, first the Pyræus about 35 or 40 stadia from the city, till joined thereto by the long walls beforementioned, after which it became the principal harbour of the city; it had three docks, Cantharos, Aphrodisium, and Zea; the first was so called, from an ancient hero, the second from the goddess Venus, who had there two temples, and the third from bread corn. There were in this port five portico's, which joining together formed one great one called from thence Macra Stoa, or the grand portico; there were likewise two great markets or Fora, one near the long portico, the other near the city. The second port was Munichia, a promontory not far distant from Piræus, a place very strong by nature, and afterwards rendered far stronger by art. It was of this that Epimenides said, if the Athenians foresaw what mischief it would one day produce to them, they would eat it away with their teeth. The third was Phalerum distant from the city according to Thucydides 35 stadia ^a, but according to Pausanias only 20 ^b. This was the most ancient harbour of Athens, as Pyræus was the most capacious. As to the extent of this city and other particulars, the reader will meet with them at the bottom of the page (K)

THE people of Athens were freemen, sojourners, or slaves, the citizens called in Greek Politai, were never very numerous, but what may seem strange were as many in the time of Cecrops, as in the most flourishing state of the commonwealth, hardly ever exceeding twenty-thousand ^c. It was Solon, who decreed that none should be accounted free but such as were Athenians both by father and mother. After his time it fell into disuse till revived by Pericles, and again at his instance repealed. After the expulsion of the thirty tyrants Solon's law was restored. A person born of a stranger was stiled Nothos, a bastard, whereas the son of a free woman was called Gnesios, i. e. legitimate. There was in the Cynosarges a court of judicature, to ^u PLUT. in vit. Thef. ^x Poem. apud Gronov. Thef. Græc. vol. IV. ^y HORAT. Ep. lib. ii. l. ii. PLUTARCH. in vit. Thef. ^z PLUTARCH. in vit. Themist. DIOD. LAERT. in vit. Antisthen. ^a Bel. Pelop. lib. ii. ^b In Arcad. ^c PLUT. in vit. Periclis. ATHENÆUS. Deipnos. lib. vi.

(K) If Athens eclipsed other cities by her fame for arms and arts, she was no less conspicuous for her beauty, as appears from two authentic testimonies, the accounts given us by ancient authors and the relations exhibited by modern travellers; we had once an intention of comparing these, but considering that it would have taken up a great deal of room, and have interrupted too much the course of the history, we have chosen to refer the description of Athens as it now stands, till we come to speak of the present state of the Mores. It may not however be amiss to observe, that Aristides, an author who wrote expressly on this subject, affirms that Athens in her glory was a day's journey in compass; those who have thought this account too general, inform us that it was one hundred seventy-eight stadia in circumference, that is, something more than twenty-two Roman miles. After it fell from its ancient splendor, it endured great variety of fortune. Sylla destroyed it without mercy, made its streets overflow with blood, and taught its most superb buildings to submit to the flames. It provoked Julius Cæsar by an obstinate resistance, but when it submitted at last, he contented himself with saying, That he pardoned the living for the sake of the dead, and neither hurt the city nor its inhabitants. They sided with Brunus against the Triumvirate, and with Anthony who called himself a Lover of Athens, against Augustus. Tiberius, or at least his son Germanicus favoured them, but it was to Adrian who had been archon of their city, that the Athenians owed the revival of their ancient lustre. The succeeding emperors took a pleasure in adorning it, but the Goths in the reign of Arcadius and Honorius destroyed it as they did the other cities of Greece. Theodosius the second out of respect to his empress caused it to be re-edified. This may serve to make the description in the text perfectly intelligible; for as to its fortune in later times, that must be referred to the subsequent part of this history, of which it will be the proper subject; the curious reader may however, if he pleases, consult the very learned Meyers in his elaborate work referred to at the bottom of the page (27).

which causes of illegitimacy properly belonged, and the utmost care was taken to prevent any from being inrolled Athenian citizens, who had not a clear title thereto^d. The citizens, for at present we will not meddle with the strangers and slaves, were divided by Cecrops into four tribes, the first called Cecropes from Cecrops, the second Autochthon from a king of that name, the third Alai from Aleus another king of Athens, or rather from Ale, which signifies a shore, the fourth Purania; these names were altered by Cranæus, and again by Eriethonius. In the reign of Eriethus they were again changed, the soldiers were called Oplitai, the craftsmen Ergatai, the farmers Georgoi, the graziers and shepherds Aigicorai; in this state they were when Solon settled the commonwealth, and appointed the senate to be composed of four hundred, one hundred out of each tribe^e. Clisthenes encreased the number of the tribes to ten, and made the senate consist of five hundred taking fifty out of each tribe; in succeeding times two other tribes were added, each tribe was subdivided into its Demoi or wards, and with respect to these it was that Solon instituted the public feasts before-mentioned, at which sometimes the whole tribe assembled, sometimes several wards, and sometimes only the inhabitants of one ward. The second sort of inhabitants we mentioned were called Metoicoi, i. e. sojourners; there were persons who lived always at Athens, yet were not admitted free denizens; as for such as did not constantly reside in Athens, they were stiled Xenoi, i. e. strangers. The sojourners were obliged to chuse out of the citizens Protektors who were stiled Patrons, they paid several services to the state, and besides these an annual tribute of twelve drachms for every man, and six for every woman; but such as had sons, and paid for them, were exempted; if people fell to poverty and were not able to pay this tribute, they were seized by the tax-masters, and actually sold for slaves, which as Diogenes Laertius tells us was the fate of Xenocrates the philosopher^f; the sojourners in Attica were under the same law as those in Athens; as to servants they were free-men, who through indigency were driven to receive wages, and while they were in this state had no vote in the assembly; as to slaves they were absolutely the property of their masters, and as such were used as they thought fit; they were forbidden to wear cloaths, or to cut their hair like their masters, and, which is indeed amazing, Solon prohibited them to love boys as if that had been honourable: they were likewise debarred from anointing or perfuming themselves, and from worshiping certain deities; they were not allowed to be called by honourable names, and in most other respects were used like dogs. They stigmatized them at their pleasure, that is branded them with letters in the forehead and elsewhere; however, Theseus's temple was allowed them as a sanctuary, where if they were exceedingly ill used they might fly and thereby oblige their masters to let them be turned over; in this and many other respects the Athenian slaves were in a much better condition than those throughout the rest of Greece; they were permitted to get estates for themselves, giving a small premium to their masters, who were obliged to make them free if they could pay their ransom; they likewise obtained the same favour from the kindness of their masters, or for having rendered military services to the state; when they were made free, they were obliged to chuse patrons, and had likewise the privilege of chusing a curator, who, in case their patrons injured them, was bound to defend them^g. Having thus spoken of the people in general, let us return to the consideration of the Athenian citizens in their political capacity (L).

THE

^d PLUTARCH. ubi supra. POLLUX lib. iii. ^e PLUTARCH. in vit. Solon. POLLUX lib. viii. c. 9. ^f In vit. XENOCR. ^g PLUTARCH. in vit. Solon. ARISTOPH. in Avibus, &c. POLLUX lib. vii. PLAUTUS, &c.

(L) In Cecrops's time the citizens were, as we have said above, twenty thousand; under the administration of Pericles, when the Athenian power was at its greatest height they were not so many (28). When Demetrius the Phalerean presided over them there was an exact account taken of the several sorts of inhabitants within the city, as we are informed by Athenæus, from whence it appeared that there were twenty-one thousand citizens, ten thousand sojourners or foreigners, and four hundred thousand slaves (29). The knowledge of this is a material thing, for, without it, it would be a difficult matter to account for the smallness of the Athenian armies. At the time of Cecrops's poll the whole number of his subjects was without doubt included; in early times they were glad of citizens; but when Athens rose in power and glory, she set a high value upon this dignity. Menon, who sent them a supply of two hundred horse, was refused the freedom of Athens when he desired it (30). Perdiccas king of Macedonia, who had done them great services, could obtain no more than a right of dwelling in the city with an exemption from taxes; but though they were thus stiff in respect to persons

(28) Plutarch. in vit. Periclis.

(29) Dignof. lib. vi.

(30) Potter's Arch. Vol. I. p. 44.

- a THE general assembly of the people which Solon, as we have shewn before, made the dernier resort, was called Ecclesia, and consisted of all the freemen of Athens, excepting such as were atimoi or infamous. The meetings of these assemblies were either ordinary or extraordinary. The ordinary were such as were appointed by law, the extraordinary such as necessity required. Of the first there were four in five and thirty days, for reasons which will be hereafter given. In the first assembly they approved or rejected magistrates, heard proposals for the public good, and certain causes. In the second they received petitions, and heard every man's judgment on the matters that were before them. In the third they gave audience to foreign ambassadors. The fourth was employed altogether in affairs
- b relating to the gods and their worship. The extraordinary meetings were appointed by the magistrates when occasion required, whereas to the ordinary assemblies the people came of their own accord. The first were held either in the market-place in the Pnyx a place near the citadel, and in the theatre of Bacchus; as to the latter the magistrates who appointed the extraordinary meeting appointed also the place, where it should be held. If any sudden tempest rose, or an earthquake happened, or any sign notoriously inauspicious appeared, the assembly was immediately adjourned, to prevent the people from apprehending unhappy consequences from their deliberations. But if the weather was fair and serene, and nothing happened out of the ordinary course of things, they proceeded to purify the place where the
- c assembly was held, which was done by sprinkling it round with the blood of young pigs, then the cryer made a solemn prayer for the prosperity of the republic, and that heaven would bestow a happy issue on their councils and undertakings; he then pronounced a bitter execration against any who should in that assembly propound what might be disadvantageous to the state; these ceremonies over, they proceeded to business. There were several magistrates who had the overseeing and regulating these assemblies; these were first the Epistates, or president of the assembly, who was chosen by lot out of the Proedri, his office was to give the signal for the peoples voting; next to him were the Prytanes, i. e. a committee of the senate, who of course were present on this occasion; by their order a Programma, or scheme of
- d the business to be proposed at the assembly, was previously set up in some public place, that every man might know what business to apply his thoughts to. The Proedri were nine in number appointed by lots out of all the tribes to which the Prytanes did not belong; they had the right of proposing to the people what they were to deliberate upon, and their office ended with the assembly; there sat with them assessors to were to take care that nothing they proposed was detrimental to the commonwealth; the first step to business was the cryer's reading the decree of the senate whereon the assembly was to deliberate; when he had finished this, he made proclamation in these words; Who of the men above fifty will make an oration? When the old men had done speaking, the cryer made proclamation again that any Athenian might then offer his sentiments whom the law allowed so to do, that is, all such as were above thirty years old, and were not infamous. If such a one rose persons of high quality, they were more pliable towards men of distinguished merit. Hippocrates the physician was readily admitted a citizen of Athens, and the same favour was granted to all the inhabitants of Plataea for their seasonable assistance in the Persian war. It was only the general assembly of the people which could confer this privilege. Nay, when it was conferred, the grant was not valid unless ratified in a second assembly, wherein six thousand citizens were present. And as this honour was generally sued for by persons of eminent distinction, the people gave their votes privately by putting little stones into vessels that no sort of undue influence might reach them; if, after all these ceremonies, it appeared that the person on whom it was conferred was unworthy, there was a power lodged of taking it away in the court of Areopagus, nor are instances of this sort wanting in the Athenian story (31). As to the foreigners or sojourners, though they were incapable of the honours belonging to free citizens, yet if they manifested an extraordinary love towards the state by any shining action, they had a sort of half freedom bestowed upon them, whereby they were exempted from the taxes they bore before, and in respect to pecuniary matters were on the same foot with free denizens; this they stiled Atelieia (32). Such Athenians as thro' poverty became servants were stiled Pelessa; except the right of voting, they enjoyed all the rights of free citizens, they changed their masters when they thought fit, and in case they found themselves in a condition to live in a state of independency, they were restored to their votes, and their servitude was no more imputed to them as a bar to their preferment (33). As to slaves they on their coming to a new place had a handsome entertainment given them, and sweet-meats thrown over their heads, as it were to welcome them to their service, which if they fell into good hands was sometimes easy enough, but for this they were obliged not to the gentleness of their laws, but of their masters.

(31) Demost. Orat. in Nearchum. (32) Suidas. Harpocration. Hesychius. (33) Pollux, lib. iii. c. i. 8.

rose up to speak, the Prytanes interposed, and bid him be silent, and if he did not obey them, the Litōrs pulled him down by force. When the debates were over, the president permitted the people to vote, which they did by casting first beans, but in aftertimes pebbles into certain vessels; these were counted, and then it was declared that the decree of the senate was either rejected or approved, after which the Prytanes dismissed the assembly ^a.

HAVING spoken of the people, their privileges and assemblies, let us now proceed to the senate, which as we have already shewn, was instituted by Solon to prevent the dangerous consequences of leaving the supreme power in the people; at the time of his institution, it was to consist of four hundred, a hundred out of each tribe, it was increased to five hundred, when the tribes were augmented to ten; and when they came to twelve, it was also swelled to six hundred. They were ^b elected by lots after this manner: At a day appointed, towards the close of the year, the president of each tribe gave in a list of such persons belonging thereto, as were fit for and desired to appear for this dignity; these names were engraven on tablets of brass, and a number of beans equal to the number of the amount of them, among which were a hundred white ones put into a vessel, then the names of the candidates and the beans were drawn one by one, and such as were drawn by the white beans, were received into the senate ^c. After the senate was elected, they proceeded to appoint the officers who were to preside in the senate: these were the Prytanes beforementioned, and they were elected thus; the names of the ten tribes were thrown into one vessel, and nine black beans and a white one into another ^c vessel. Then the names of the tribes were drawn with the beans. The tribe to which the white bean answered, presided first, and the rest according to the order in which they were drawn. The time in which they presided was thirty-five days, and was called Prytania, the Attic year being by this means divided into ten parts. Some authors say that the first four Prytania contained thirty-six days in order to make the lunar year complete, which according to their computation consisted of 354 days, but others affirm, that these four days did not belong to any of the Prytania, but were spent in the election of magistrates, and that during this space the Athenians were without magistrates ^d. The Prytanes while the senate consisted of five-hundred were fifty in number; for the farther avoiding of confusion therefore, ten of these presided a week, during which space they were called Proedri, and out of these an epistate or president was chosen, whose office lasted but one day, and by law no man could hold it more than once; the reason of this was, that he had in his custody the public seal, the keys of the citadel, and the charge of the exchequer ^e. The reader must distinguish between the Epistates and Proedri last mentioned, and those spoken of in the former paragraph, because, though their titles were the same, their office were perfectly distinct. The senate assembled by direction of the Prytanes once every day, excepting festivals, and sometimes oftner, in the senate house, which was thence called Prytanium. When a member of the senate made a motion for a new law, it was immediately engraven on tablets, that the members when they came next might be prepared to speak to it; at the subsequent assembly the epistates opened the matter, after which every senator that pleased delivered his sentiments, then any of the Prytanes drew up the decree, and repeated it aloud; after which they proceeded to vote, and if there was a majority of white beans, then it became Psephisma, and was afterwards propounded to the people; if they approved it, it became a law, otherwise it was of no force longer than the senate, who decreed it, subsisted. The power of the senate was very great, for they took the account of magistrates at the expiration of their offices; they directed the provisions made for poor citizens out of the public treasure; they had the superintendancy of public prisons, and a power of punishing such as committed acts morally evil, though not prohibited by any law; they had the care likewise of the fleet and besides all these they had many other branches of authority, which it is not necessary for us to mention. Before they took their seats they were constrained to undergo a very strict examination, wherein the whole course of their lives was enquired into; and if the least slur on their reputation appeared, they were set aside. When this examination was over they took an oath, whereby they bound themselves to promote in all their councils the public good, to advise nothing contrary to the laws,

^a Vide SIGON. & URB. EMMIUS. Rep. Athen.
c. 9. HARPOCRAT.

ⁱ STEPH. BYZANT. de Urb. ^k POLLUX l. viii.

^l POLLUX ubi supra.

a and to execute their functions exactly. The highest fine the senate could impose was five hundred drachms; if they thought the offender deserved a heavier mulct, they then transmitted the cause to the Thesmothetæ, who punished them as they thought fit. The senators, when their year was out, gave an account of their management to the people, but that they might have the less to do, they always punished such of their number as they found offended, by expulsion, and in this they were mighty exact; yet an expelled senator was notwithstanding eligible to any other office, the most trivial omission being sufficient to procure a dimission from the senatorial dignity, and therefore when the tribes chose their senators they also chose a certain number of subsidiaries, out of which when a senator was expelled, another was substituted in his place^m. Each senator was allowed a Drachm every day, for it was a constant rule with the Athenians, that the publick ought to pay for every man's time, and therefore such of the poor Athenians as thought fit to demand it, had three Oboli for going to the assembly. If during their administration any ships of war were built, the senators had crowns decreed them; but if not, they were forbid to sue for them. The senate, as we have before remarked, was looked upon as one anchor of the Athenian state, we will now speak of the other.

b THE court of Areopagus was so called, because it assembled on a hill not far from the citadel called Arious Pagos, i. e. Mars's bill. Some say that Mars was the first criminal tried in this court. It is not agreed who instituted this court; some ascribe it to Cecrops, others to Cranæus, and many to Solon, among whom, though Plutarch and Cicero are reckoned, yet it is certain that they were mistaken, for Aristotle affirms directly the contrary; nay, Plutarch himself cites a law of Solon's, wherein the sentences of the Areopagi are mentioned as things of an old dateⁿ. The source of this error seems to be Solon's restoring the power of this court, and making it superior to the Ephetæ, whom Draco had made superior to it. It is very difficult to ascertain the number of which this court consisted, because authors are much divided about it. Such of the archons, though some say only such of the Thesmothetæ, as had given an account of their administrations before the Logistæ, and had obtained their approbation, were received into this senate; this was Solon's institution, and was strictly observed for a long course of years, whence it became d the most sacred and venerable tribunal in Greece. A senator in this court was an officer for life, unless he was guilty of any immorality, and then he was immediately expelled; to laugh while the court was sitting was an unpardonable offence, and the members thereof were forbidden by law to write a comedy; nay, if an archon was seen to be sitting in a tavern or publick house, it was sufficient to bar his admission. Demosthenes affirms, that to his time no judgment of that court had ever been questioned^o. They had cognizance of all capital causes, and with them the intent to murder was punished as severely as if it took effect; 'till Pericles lessened their power they were a check upon the people; they could, if they thought fit, cancel e the sentence of an assembly where a criminal had been acquitted contrary to evidence; and they likewise rescued innocent persons in danger from the rash sentences of the people; they had the custody of the laws, the direction of the public fund, the direction of youth, for which reason they were present at marriages and sacrifices to see that all things were transacted with decency and sobriety; they had the power of punishing of idleness, and, in consequence of this, they sent for any body they pleased, and examined him what he spent, and how he came by it, so that it was impracticable for a man to live dissolutely in Athens on ill-got wealth, since on the first appearance of profusion such a person would have been convened before the Areopagi. Matters of religion, blasphemy against the gods, contempt of mysteries, all sorts of impiety, the consecration of new gods, the erection of temples and altars, and the introduction of new ceremonies into divine worship, belonged wholly f to this court. Plato therefore having learned in Egypt that there was but one God, was forced to conceal his knowledge for fear of being questioned by the Areopagites^p; and St. Paul was on this account arraigned before them as a setter-forth of strange gods, when he preached Jesus and Anastasis, i. e. the resurrection^q. As to state affairs, the court of Areopagus rarely meddled in them unless in times of publick calamity, when the citizens, fled to them as to their last refuge. They met three times every month, viz. on the 27th, 28th, and 29th days thereof, if a any sudden occasion required their assembling, they were wont to meet in the royal portico. It is observable that this court always sate in the open air; secondly, that they decided all causes in the dark, that seeing neither plaintiff nor defendant their passions might be uninfluenced. Causes of murder were introduced by the Basileus, or second archon, who in right of his office had a seat amongst them; but before he took it, he was obliged to lay aside his crown, which as the mark of his dignity he wore at all other times. As to the form of tryals before the Areopagus, we shall not detain the reader here, but take a proper occasion to insert it in a note. All the great men of Athens paid a high regard to this venerable tribunal, till Pericles rose, who, because he could not become a member thereof, ha- b ving never been archon, took such a pique to them, that he left no means unessayed to diminish their authority, and sink their credit, which by the help of Ephialtes he in a great measure effected, causing most of his business which had been before them to be transferred to other courts, to which some authors, not without reason, have ascribed the sudden degeneracy of the Athenians, and, in consequence thereof, the ruin of this state^k.

^m Æschin. in Timarch. ARISTOPH. Avibus. POLLUX, ubi supra. DEMOST. Timocrat. ⁿ MEURS. in Areop. ^o Aristocrat. ^p JUSTIN. MARTYR. ^q Acts xviii. 18, 19.

W^e come now, having spoke of the Athenian people, the senate and court of Areopagus, to the magistrates. The chief of these were the Archons or Archontes; they were, as we observed, nine in number, and were chosen by lot; but after they were chosen they were obliged to undergo two examinations, one in the senate- c house, called Anacrisis, the other in the Forum, called Docimasia; in these they were asked who were their ancestors, whether by three descents they were Athenian citizens, of what tribe and ward they were, whether related to Apollo Patrius, or Jupiter Herceus, whether they had been dutiful to their parents, had served the appointed times in the wars, had the estate required by law, and whether they were perfect in all their limbs; these questions some think were put to every other magistrate: These demands being satisfactorily answered, they were conducted to the royal portico, where each of the archons took an oath in these words; I will be punctual in the observance of the laws, and if I am deficient in this respect, I will for every such default consecrate a statue of gold as big as myself to the Delphian d Apollo^l. These ceremonies over, the archons entered on their charge, some parts of which they executed separately, others belonged in common to them all; they had all the power of punishing with death such malefactors as deserved it; they were all crowned with wreaths of myrtle, had the power of appointing certain under-officers, and of enquiring into the conduct of other magistrates. As the reward of their labour in the service of the public, they were free from all taxes whatsoever, and if any was so hardy as to strike or affront them, he was punished with infamy^m. The first of them was sometimes stiled Eponymos, because the year took its denomination from him; to him it belonged to determine all causes between men and their wives, all matters relating to posthumous children, dowries, legacies, and e testaments. He had a right to appoint tutors and guardians to orphans, to decide such disputes as arose among neighbours, and many other things. The celebration of certain feasts, and the regulation of stage plays were also within his province, and he had a particular court of judicature, wherein he heard causes: If even by accident he was overtaken with liquor, he suffered deathⁿ. The second archon, who was stiled Basileus or king, had his court of judicature in the royal portico; he decided all controversies among priests, took information on impiety, blasphemy, and such-like crimes; he presided in all the great feasts, and assisted in all the public sacrifices for the prosperity of the republic. It was required that his wife should be a citizen of Athens, and a virgin, and she too was stiled by the Athenians, Basilissa. f Accusations of murder were first lodged in this court, and then he introduced them into the court of Areopagus^o. The Polemarchos, a third archon, had all sojourners and strangers within his jurisdiction; he was bound also to offer a solemn sacrifice to Mars, and another to Diana, and to take care that the children of such as lost their lives in the state should duly receive the maintenance settled on them by law. As it often happened that these three magistrates, by reason of their youth, were not so well skilled in the laws and customs of their country, as to be able to execute punctually all the branches of their respective offices; they chose each of them two a grave and distinct persons who underwent the like examinations with themselves, to sit with them as assessors, and they were accountable as well as the archon for their behaviour in their posts^p. The other six archons were stiled Thesmotetæ; they had one common tribunal where they heard causes of various kinds; they ratified all public contracts and leagues, settled the court days in the several judicatures of Athens, took care that no laws should be passed contrary to the interest of the public, and prosecuted such as endeavoured to persuade the people to give their consent to any such laws; they were likewise obliged every year to examine the whole Corpus Juris in order to discover whether there were any laws that contradicted each other, whether there was a multiplicity of statutes about the same thing, or whether there were any so doubtful as to render it impossible to know their true sense; which if there were, then the Thesmotetæ drew up a report, wherein was briefly contained the state of the case; this was hung up in a publick place, and the next assembly of the people voted which of the laws should be preserved, and which repealed or altered^q. Inferior to the archons there were many public magistrates; 'twill be necessary to mention some of them, because they will frequently occur in the course of this history. In the first place they had Nomophylaces, who were also stiled the eleven, because they were so many in number, one chosen out of each tribe, and a clerk or secretary who made up the eleventh. Their duty it was to look to the execution of the laws, they had authority to seize robbers and other capital offenders, and if they confessed, to put them to death. Dr. Potter thinks they resembled our sheriffs^r. The Phylarchi were the presidents of the Athenian tribes; but in time this became a military title. The Philobasileus was an officer in each tribe, who did the same things within his jurisdiction as the Basileus did with respect to the state. The Demarchi were the principal magistrates in wards; the Lexarchi were six in number, and were bound to take care that the people came duly to assemblies; in their custody was the public register of the citizens names; they had under them Toxotæ, who were lictors or bailiffs; they were sometimes a thousand in number; these men were necessary, but like most of their sort were in a manner infamous, as may be gathered from the comedies of Aristophanes; they were generally Scythians, raw-boned, brawny fellows, ready to execute any thing they was commanded^s. The Nomotetæ were a thousand in number, their business was to watch over and inspect into the laws. There were two sorts of orators in the service of the state, some were appointed to defend an old law, when a motion was made to repeal it; these had their fee from the state, but the same man was incapable of being elected twice. Besides these, there were ten settled orators called Retores, elected by lots; their business was to plead public causes in the senate-house; for this they had their stated fees, and with respect to their qualifications the laws run thus; "Let no one be a publick orator who hath struck his parents, denied them maintenance, or shut them out of his doors, who hath refused to serve in the army, who hath thrown away his shield, who hath been addicted to lewd women, notoriously effeminate, or has run out his patrimony. If any man who has been guilty of these crimes dare to deliver an oration, let him be brought to trial upon the spot^t. Let an orator have children lawfully begotten, and an estate within Attica"; if in his oration he talks impertinently; makes idle repetitions, affects an unbecoming raillery, digresses from the point in question, or, after the assembly is over, abuses the president, let the Proedri fine him fifty drachmæ; and if that is not thought enough, let him be brought before the next assembly and fined again^u". We shall conclude this draft of the Athenian government with an account of their courts of justice, which, exclusive of the Areopagus, were ten in number; four had cognizance of criminal, and six of civil causes. These ten courts were numbered with the ten first letters of the alphabet, and were thence stiled, Alpha, Beta, Gamma, &c. When an Athenian was at leisure to hear causes he wrote his own name, that of his father, and the ward to which he belonged, upon a tablet; this he presented to the Thesmotetæ, who returned it again to him with another tablet, with the letter which fell to his lot; then he went to the cryer of the court who presented him a scepter, and gave him admission. When the causes were over, every judge went and delivered his scepter to the Prytanes, and received a stated fee for every cause that was tried. But as this was intended only to compensate their loss of time, so that there might be no appearance ^a of covetousness, a man was forbid to sit in two courts on the same day^y. The first criminal court, after the Areopagus, was that of the Ephetae, of the institution of which the reader has already had account; it consisted of fifty-one members, all upwards of fifty-one years old; Draco gave it a very extensive jurisdiction, but Solon took away from them the power of judging in any other causes than those of manslaughter, accidental killing and lying in wait to destroy; the Basileus entered all causes in this court^z. The second criminal court was called Delphinium, because it was held in the temple of Apollo Delphinus, it had cognizance of such murders as were confessed by the criminal, but at the same time justified under some pretence or other^a. The Prytaneum was the third criminal court; it held plea of such cases where death ensued from inanimate things; causes were heard here with the same solemnity as in other courts, and on judgment given, the thing, whatever it was, that had occasioned the death of a man, was thrown out of the territory of Athens. This judicature was as ancient as the reign of Erichtheus, and the first thing tried therein was an ox, wherewith Jupiter's priests killed an ox which had eaten some of the consecrated cakes, and who, as soon as he had committed the fact, secured himself by flight^b. The last criminal court was stiled Pbreasum, it sat in a place not far from the sea-shore, and such persons were brought before this court, as had committed murders in their own country, and fled to Attica; the proceedings of this court were so severe, that they did not permit the criminal to come on shore, but obliged him to plead his cause in his vessel, and if he was found guilty, he was committed to the mercy of the winds and seas^c. Of the judicatures for hearing civil causes, the first was the Parabastion, so called, as some think, because in it no matter could be heard, if the cause of action was above one drachm^d. The Cainon or new court was the second tribunal^e. The third was stiled the court of Lycus, because it assembled in a temple dedicated to that hero, whose statue, which was represented with the face of a wolf, was set up in all courts of justice^f. The Trigonon was so called, because it was triangular in its form^g. The court Metidius derived its appellation from the architect who built it^h. The sixth and last court was called Heliea, it was by far the greatest, and is generally conceived to have ^d derived its name from the judges sitting in the open air exposed to the sun. All the Athenians, as we observed before, who were free citizens, were allowed by law to sit in these courts as judges. But before they took their seats were sworn by Apollo Patrius, Ceres and Jupiter the king, that they would decide all things righteously, and according to law, where there was any law to guide them, and by the rules of natural equity, where there was none. The oath taken by the judges, who sat in the court last mention'd, is reported by Demosthenes in these words; "I will give " sentence according to the laws and the decrees of the people of Athens, and the " counsel of five hundred; I will not consent to place the supreme power in the ^e " hands of a single person, or a few; nor permit any man to dissolve the com" monwealth, or so much as to give his vote, or make an oration in defence of such " a revolution. I will not endeavour to discharge private debts, nor to make a " division of lands or houses: I will not restore persons sent into banishment, nor " pardon those that are condemned to die, nor expel any man out of the city con" trary to the laws and decrees of the people and council of five hundred, nor permit " any other person to do it: I will not elect any person into any public employ,

^k PLUTARCH. in vit. Periclis. MEURSIVS AREOP. ^l POLLUX, lib. viii. cap. 9. ^m DEMOSTH. in Midian. ⁿ POLLUX, ubi supra. ^o DEMOST. in Neer. & in Lærit.

^p POLLUX, ubi supra. ^q ÆSCHIN. in Ctesiph. ^r CICERO de Legib. lib. iii. ^s ARISTOPHAN. ejusque Schol. Acharn. & Thesmoph. ^t ÆSCHIN. in Timarch. ^u DINARCH. in Demosthen. ^v ÆSCHIN. ubi supra.

 " and particularly I will not create any man Archon, Hieromnemon, embassador, " public herald or synedros, nor consent that he shall be admitted into any of those " offices which are elected by lots, upon the same day with the archons, who ^f " has undergone any former office, and not given in his accounts; nor that any " person shall bear two offices, or be twice elected into the same office in one year:
 " I will not receive gifts myself, nor shall any other for me; nor will I permit " any other person to do the like by any means, whether direct or indirect, to per" vert justice in the court of Heliea: I am not under thirty years of age: I will " hear both the plaintiff and defendant without partiality, and give sentence in all
 " the causes brought before me: I swear by Jupiter, Neptune, and Ceres; if I

^y ATHEN. Deipnos. lib. vi. ^z POLLUX lib. viii. c. 10. ^a POLLUX ubi supra. ^b ÆLIAN Hist. var. lib. viii. c. 3. POLLUX ubi supra. ^c SIGONIUS de Repub. Athen. lib. iii. c. 3. ^d PAUSAN. Atticis. ^e ARISTOPH. Vesp. ^f POLLUX, SUIDAS, ARISTOPH. ubi supra. ^g SIGON. ubi supra. ARISTOPH. ubi supra. ^h POLLUX, HARPOCR.

^a " violate this oath, or any part of it, may I perish with my whole family; but if I religiously observe it, may we live and prosper ¹." The Heleastic court consisted at least of fifty, but its usual number was five-hundred judges; when causes of very great consequence were to be tried, a thousand sat therein, and now and then the judges were increased to fifteen hundred, and even to two thousand; there were many inferior courts in Athens for the decision of trivial causes, but of these there is no necessity of speaking, since we design no more than a succinct view of the Athenian republic, as it was settled by and in consequence of Solon's laws.

We left that great lawgiver at his departure from Athens to visit foreign climates for the sake of acquiring wisdom. He went first to Egypt, where he conversed with Psenophis the Helopolitan, and Sonchis the Saite, the most learned priest of that age and country, from these he drew the knowledge of a multitude of things unheard-of by the Greeks, and particularly the situation and condition of the atlantic isle, of which he wrote an account in verse, which Plato continued. From Egypt he went to Cyprus, where he was extremely well entertained by one of the petty kings thereof; this prince reigned in a little city called Apeia, i. e. high, built by Demophoon the son of Theseus on an eminence near the river Clarius put in a soil craggy and barren. Solon observing that there was a very pleasant plain below, engaged the king to remove his people thither, and to build a new and larger city for their reception. Solon himself assisted in the execution of the undertaking which he had projected, and his scheme succeeded so well, that numbers of people, invited by the beauty of the place, came to settle themselves therein, whence the king, whose capital it was, changed its name out of gratitude, and called it Solos. He is thought to have visited about this time Thales the Milesian, with whom it is certain he had an intimate acquaintance; Plutarch hath recorded a very singular passage which happened at this time; Solon enquiring of Thales, why, considering the happy situation of his affairs, he had neither wife nor children, Thales for the present made him no answer. A few days after he introduced a stranger properly instructed, who said that he came ten days ago from Athens; Solon immediately asked him what news he brought from thence: " I know of nothing extraordinary (replied he) except that the whole city celebrated the funerals of a young man, the son of a citizen most eminent for his virtues, who, it seems went abroad upon his travels." Miserable man, cried Solon: but did you not bear his name? I did, returned the stranger, but I have forgot it; this I remember, that he was particularly famous for his wisdom and his justice; Was it Solon? (said our philosopher) It was, answered the stranger. Upon this our legislator began to beat his head, to weep and to bemoan himself. But Thales interposing with a smile, addressed him thus: " These, O Solon, are the things which make me afraid of marriage and children, since these are capable of affecting even so wise a man as you; be not however concerned, for this is all a fiction ¹." Whether on this occasion, or on the real loss of a son, is uncertain, Solon being desired by a person not to weep, since weeping would avail nothing; he answered, with much humanity and good sense, And for this cause I weep. At Delfi he had an interview with the rest of the sophists, and the year following at Corinth by Periander's invitation; some think that at this time also he went to Crete and visited Epimenides, he likewise conferred with Craesus king of Lydia, as has been before related in the history of that prince ^k (M).

VOL. II. N^o. 6.

5 X

WHILE

ⁱ PLUTARCH. & DIOGEN. LAERT. in vit. Solonis. HERODOT. lib. i.

^k Vol. II. p. 335.

(M) As to the interview between Solon and Craesus, there were in Plutarch's time many who thought it a fiction; and this great Writer himself, though he thought it necessary to insert it in Solon's life, owes that none who mentioned it as a fact were able to solve the difficulties in chronology which attended it. The very learned M. Dacier has the following note upon that passage; " Solon, they say, was archon the third year of the forty-sixth olympiad, and Craesus was overthrown by Cyrus the second year of the 58th, which makes it impossible for Solon to be living at that time, that is to say, 47 years after his archonship. This they prove more strongly, by making it appear that Solon died when Hegestratus was archon, in the second year of the 51st olympiad. Now Craesus was not king till the first year of the 56 olympiad, which was twenty-two years after the death of Solon. How then are we to make this voyage of Solon into Lydia fall in with the reign of Craesus; especially if according to Plutarch, this voyage was performed even before the tyranny of Pisistratus? This is so full of difficulties and contrarities, that it is impossible to reconcile them, unless we agree with Plutarch that the ancient chronological tables are by no means exact, notwithstanding the great labour and pains several persons have been at to regulate them (28)". Mr. Stanley (following (28) In vit. Solonis.

WHILE Solon was abroad, Athens fell all into confusion again. The three factions a beforementioned began to be more troublesome than ever; Lycurgus put himself at the head of the country people; Megacles the son of Alcmeon was the chief of those who lived upon the coast, and Pisistratus placed himself at the head of the poorer sort of people in the city, to protect them, as he pretended, from tyranny. The laws of Solon were indeed observed, because none of the factions found it for their interest to subvert them, but all looked for a change, and were uneasy till it was effected, though how to change for the better, none of them knew, nor pretended to know; in the interim Solon returned, and his return seemed propitious for his country. All the factions paid their court to him, and affected to shew him the deepest reverence and respect, beseeching him to resume his authority, and to compose the disorders b of the state. But this however he declined on account of his age, which, as he said, rendered him unable to speak, and act for the public benefit, as he was wont. However, he sent for the chiefs of each party, and spoke to them in the midst and most pathetic terms, beseeching them not to ruin their common parent, but to prefer the public good to their private interest¹.

Pisistratus, among all the principal persons of Athens, seemed to be most affected with Solon's discourses. They were relations, intimate friends, and had a great similitude in their dispositions. Pisistratus was exceedingly courteous and affable, and as he was blessed with a fair estate, so he was generous without profusion, and beneficent without ostentation. He had always two or three slaves near him with c bags of silver coin; when he saw any man look sickly, or heard that any were dead insolvent, he comforted the one with a proper sum, and buried the others at his own expence; if he perceived people melancholy he enquired the cause, and if it was poverty, he furnished them with what might enable them to get bread, but not to live idly; in a word, he had, or seemed to have, all the virtues which could adorn a nobleman: he could not so much as suffer his servants to shut his garden, or orchard gates, but allowed every body to go in and take what they pleased. His looks were easy and sedate, his language smooth and modest; he seemed a great lover of equality, and a zealous friend to the constitution. Solon penetrated all these appearances, yet he did not immediately break with him, but endeavoured d to shew him the iniquity of his dissimulation, and would often tell him, Sir, were it not for your ambition, you would be the best citizen in Athens; and when he found this made no impression upon him, Solon said the same thing to others, that men might beware of his designs, and not suffer his virtues to be fatal to his country^m.

ABOUT this time Thespis, who is generally esteemed the inventor of tragedy, either introduced or reformed it at Athens, with which the people were mightily charmed. Solon, who piqued himself upon learning, even in his old age, went to see this new divertisement, and after the performance was over, addressed himself to Thespis in these words: "I wonder you are not ashamed of telling lies before so great an audience"; Thespis replied, That there could be no harm in giving a specious n form to falsehood, so that it were in jest; Ab, cried Solon, striking the ground violently with his staff, if once we are pleased with your falsehoods in jest, we shall soon have them creep into our more serious affairs".

Pisistratus assumes the sovereignty. Years after the flood 2439. Before Christ 560.

THE mischief which Solon apprehended his kinsman Pisistratus would bring upon the state was not long before it came to pass; that great politician perceiving how much the people were at his devotion, resolved to seize the present opportunity to cheat them out of that liberty they neither knew how to use or to keep. With lowing Laertius) and many others have thought that the placing this interview, not before, but after Pisistratus made himself master of Athens, would set this business quite right, and accordingly Sir Isaac Newton places this conference in the year after Pisistratus assumed the sovereignty, or rather in the same year, and makes this the year before the death of Solon (29). But to return from so perplexed a subject to the mention of a point or two, not taken notice of in the account before given of this conference in our history of Lydia: Plutarch says, that Æsop the fabulist was at the court of Croesus at the same time with Solon, and that he was extremely concerned when he saw how much the king slighted so great a man. He could not therefore forbear giving Solon the following short piece of advice, Let your visits to kings be as seldom or as pleasant as you can. To which our Athenian answered, No, rather let them be as seldom or as profitable as you can (30). The love of liberty was so strong in Solon, that he could not gain say so much as in a compliment.

¹ PLUT. ubi supra. DIAGEN. LAERT. ubi supra. HERODOT. lib. i. ^m DACIER. Not. in vit. Solon. PLUT. ubi supra. CICER. de Orat. lib. iii. ⁿ PLUT. ubi supra.

(29) Short Chronicle, p. 40.

(30) Plutarch ubi supra.

a this view having wounded himself, (and as Herodotus says) the mules that drew his chariot^o, he lashed into the market-place, as if pursued by his enemies, and shewing his bleeding body, besought the people to protect him from those whom his kindness to them had rendered his implacable enemies; they testifying loudly their concern, Solon, who was by this time come to the place, drew near him, and said, Son of Hippocrates, you do not act Homer's Ulysses well, since you deceive your fellow citizens; whereas he, when he had wounded himself, practised only on the enemies of his country. A general assembly was presently convened, wherein Ariston moved that Pisistratus might have a guard of fifty persons armed with clubs. Solon opposed it; he told the citizens that if misfortunes befel them, they must not charge the gods b with them, but themselves, for that evils were not accidental, but punishments; that crafty persons knew how to dress lies in the vestments of truth, and that before they made innovations they should well consider the consequences. After him Pisistratus spoke, and the people receiving all he said with loud applause, Solon contented himself with saying,

You doat upon his words and soothing speech.

The meaner sort of people adhering unanimously to the proposition of Ariston, and the richest Athenians remaining silent, when they saw how things would go, Solon took his leave, saying, that he was wiser than some, and stouter than others; wiser than those who did not penetrate Pisistratus's design, and stouter than those who c did not oppose it. When he was gone the assembly proceeded to vote Pisistratus a guard, but what number is not easily settled; it should seem from Plutarch's account that he had but fifty¹. Herodotus does not mention any number at all². Polyanius makes them three hundred³, but Solon himself in his letter to Epimenides, says expressly there were four hundred⁴; however it was, he made use of his guard to seize the citadel, which having performed, he without more ado, according to *Herodotus*⁵ and *Plutarch*⁶, assumed the sovereignty. But Polyanius hath given us a very singular account of the method which he took to put it out of the power of the Athenians to defend themselves, even against the small number of men under his command. He summoned an assembly to be held at the Anacium, and directed d that the people should come thither armed; when they were accordingly come together, Pisistratus harangued them, but in a very low voice; the people complaining that they could not well hear what he said, he pretended that it was the clangor of their arms which drowned his voice, and advised them to lay them down in the portico of a temple. This they did, and Pisistratus then entertained them with a long and eloquent oration, to which, while they listened with deep attention, Pisistratus's guard conveyed away their arms, so that when he had done speaking, the Athenians saw themselves naked, and all power of resistance taken from them⁷. All historians agree, that amidst the confusion which followed this transaction, there was an assembly held, wherein Solon made a speech, inveighing against the e meaness of his countrymens spirit, and exciting them to take arms in defence of their liberty. When he found nothing would do, he set down his own arms, and contented himself with saying, To the utmost of my power I have striven for my country and my laws. Plutarch says that he refused to leave his country, and that on Pisistratus's sending to know what it was that inspired him with boldness enough to treat him in such a manner, he answered, *My old age*⁸. But other authors say, and with greater probability, that he immediately left the dominion of Athens. About this time it is most likely that he wrote the following letter to his friend in *Crete*⁹.

f

Solon to Epimenides :

" NEITHER are my laws likely to benefit the Athenians long, nor have you done the city much good by your lustration. For sacred rites, and wise lawgivers, cannot alone benefit cities, since it is of great consequence, of what disposition those are, who influence the common people; sacred and civil laws, if such men execute them well, are profitable, but if not, are of little use. My laws are now in a very indifferent condition, those in whom the government was lodged, making no opposition to Pisistratus's designs, abandoned the state; this, when

^o HERODOT. lib. i. ¹ ubi supra. ² lib. i. ³ Strateg. lib. i. c. 21. ⁴ Vide Epist. Solon. ad Epimen. post. ⁵ ubi supra. ⁶ ubi supra. ⁷ Strateg. lib. i. c. 21. sect. ii. ⁸ ubi supra. ⁹ DIOGEN. LAERT. in vita Solon.

" I fore-

"I foretold, I could not be believed, the Athenians crediting rather his flatteries^a than my truth. Perceiving this, I laid down my arms before the magazine, and said, that I was wiser than those who did not see Pisistratus aimed at tyranny, and stouter than those who were afraid to resist him. For this they looked upon Solon as a madman; however I hesitated, not to make this protestation before I departed; Behold, O my country, Solon ready to vindicate then in word and deed; they again cried out that I was mad. Thus, finding myself alone in opposing Pisistratus, I left them; let them still, if they please, guard with their arms this their tyrant, for you must, my friend, that the man very artfully possessed himself of the sovereignty; he complied at the first with the democracy, b afterwards wounding himself, he came into the Elioea, exclaiming, that he was thus wounded by his enemies, desiring that they would grant him a guard of four hundred men, which they, regardless of all I could say, complied with; after this he dissolved the popular government. In vain I laboured to bestow freedom on the meaner sort of people, since now the people of all sorts are become Pisistratus's servants."

Pisistratus, in possessing himself of the supreme power in Athens, did not overturn the laws established by Solon; on the contrary, he did all that in him lay to provide for their better execution, and lost nothing of that moderation for which he had been before remarkable^a. With respect even to Solon himself, he preserved for him the highest veneration, and was so much disturbed at his leaving his country, c that he wrote to him the following letter to engage him to return^b.

Pisistratus to Solon:

"I AM not the only person among the Greeks who have acted in this manner, nor am I without right to the kingdom I possess, being the descendant of Codrus. That which the Athenians swore to preserve to Codrus and his heirs, and yet took away, I have recovered. I offend neither against God nor man: I take care to see those laws you framed for the Athenians strictly put in execution, and suffer none to do wrong. I claim no other privileges, though a tyrant, d than the honour and dignity, and accept no more than what was thought due to the ancient kings. The Athenians indeed pay the tenths of their estates, not to me, but for the defraying the expences of the public sacrifices, the other charges of the commonwealth, and that we may have wherewithal to carry on a war if we should be engaged in one. I do not at all blame you for discovering my intention; you did it out of regard to your country, rather than out of hatred to me; you were ignorant of the form of government I meant to establish; had you known it, you would perhaps have born it, and not have gone into banishment; however return, and believe me, without an oath, Solon shall never suffer hurt from Pisistratus; my very enemies have nothing to charge me^e with of that kind. If you will be of the number of my friends, you shall be the first, for I never observed any thing of fraud or falsehood in you; if you are resolved to continue otherwise, live at Athens as you will, only for our sake, do not deprive yourself of your country."

Solon to Pisistratus.

"I BELIEVE I shall not suffer any harm by you, for before you were a tyrant, I was your friend, and at present am no more your enemy than any other Athenian who dislikes tyranny. Whether it be better they be governed by a f single person, or by a democracy, let both parties determine. I pronounce you the best of tyrants; but to return to Athens, I think not fitting, least I incur censure, who settled an equality in the Athenian commonwealth, and would not accept of the tyranny; by returning, I should comply with thy actions^g."

Solon kept strictly to his word, and returned no more to Athens, but died abroad. How old this great man was at the time of his decease was not agreed even in the days of Plutarch^c, who says that Heraclides Ponticus affirmed, that Solon lived a long time after Pisistratus assumed the sovereignty, whereas Pbanias the Ephebian reported that he did not live after it quite two years; Ælian agrees pretty well ^aPLUTARCH. ubi supra. ARIST. Polit. lib. v. c. 12. ^bDIAGEN. LAERT. ubi supra. ^cIn vite Solonis, prope fin.

- ^a with this computation^d, for he says he died a little after, being decrepid with age; Diogenes Laertius informs us that he reached the age of fourscore^e, but Lucian however will have it that he lived a hundred and upwards^f; where he died is another very disputable point; some say it was in Cyprus^g, others not^h; Diogenes Laertius informs us that he directed that his bones should be burnt, and their ashes carried to Salamis and scattered over the islandⁱ. Plutarch treats this as a fable, but acknowledges at the same time that many eminent writers had given into it, and mentions particularly Aristotle^k. The Athenians, after the death of Solon, paid him the highest honours, and erected for him in the forum and at Salamis, a statue in brass with his hand in his gown, the posture in which he was wont to speak; which he certainly deserved, for the mighty services rendered by him to his country (N)^l. But to return to Pisistratus:

At the very beginning of his administration, Megacles and his family retired out of the territories of Athens, but they did this with a view only to preserve themselves from being cut off to render his principality the surer. They did not renounce all hopes of returning to their country, or all correspondence with their countrymen; on the contrary, he and his associates entered into a treaty with Lycurgus and his party, and having brought them into a scheme for overturning Pisistratus, they prosecuted this with such effect, that he found himself obliged to retire, and seek, as they had done, shelter in a foreign clime; and the Athenians, notwithstanding all the instances of love they had shewn him, were so far wrought on by his enemies, as to order his goods to be publickly sold. However, though this resolution was not only taken, but put into execution, there was nobody but Callias who would venture to buy any of them; from an apprehension, no doubt, that one time or other he would be restored^m.

As Megacles and his party had negotiated with Lycurgus the ruin of Pisistratus, so some time afterwards, finding that Lycurgus and his faction were not implicitly governed by them, they began to treat with Pisistratus, and to offer him, in case he would marry the daughter of Megacles, to reinstate him in his principality, to which Pisistratus readily assented. It is easy to conceive that this affair required rather fraud than force for its being conducted with success. Pisistratus and Megacles

^d Hist. var. lib. viii. c. 16. ^e ubi supra. ^f In Longævis. ^g DIOGEN. LAERT. ubi supra. VALER. MAX. lib. v. c. 3. ^h PLUTARCH. ubi supra. ⁱ ubi supra. ^k ubi supra. ^l ÆSCH. in Timarch. ^m PLUT. ubi supra. HERODOT lib. i.

(N) We have already said so much of the genius of Solon, that it would be tedious to dwell upon it here; we shall therefore take notice only of some remarkable passages which are related concerning his death, give a succinct account of his writings, and of the praises bestowed upon him by the most eminent among the ancient Romans as well as Greeks. The very last day of his life some friends of his sitting in the chamber fell into a discourse, to which he listened with great attention; being asked the reason, he answered, I do this, that when I have learned whatsoever it is you dispute about, I may die (31). A little before his last agonies, hearing his brother singing an ode of Sappho, he was so well pleased with it that he called the young man, and bad him teach it him; and the reason of this being also demanded, It is, returned he, that I may learn while I am departing out of this life (32). As to his writings, we stand indebted to Laertius for the following account; his laws; orations to the people; poems; the Atlantic history, which was his last work, and left unfinished; again attempted by his kinsman Plato, and by him also left unfinished. Occasional epistles; amongst these there is the following one preserved by Laertius addressed to the tyrant of Corinth, who was esteemed one of the seven sages of Greece; it is very short, and therefore we did not think fit to omit it.

Solon to Periander.

"You send me word there are many who plot against you; if you should put them all to death, it would advantage you nothing; some one there may be of those whom you suspect not, who plots against you, either fearing himself, or daining you, or desirous to ingratiate himself with the city, though you have done him no injury. It is best, if you would be free from jealousy, to acquit yourself of the cause; but if you will continue in tyranny, take care to provide a greater strength of strangers than is in your own city; so shall you need to fear no man, nor put any to death (33)."

Plato in various places commends the wisdom, learning, and genius of Solon (34), so also does Aryllides (35); Dion Chrysostom speaks of him with the greatest respect (36), as an orator and legislator, as a warrior, and a patriot; Demosthenes has in few words celebrated his praises (37); Cicero affirms that before the times of Solon and Pisistratus eloquence was unknown (38); Seneca mentions Solon with great respect (39), and Valerius Maximus, as he records many things relating to himself, so he fails not greatly to commend him. In fine, ancient and modern writers agree, that without flattery Solon might be stiled brave, wise, and honest; how shall we commend him more?

(31) Valer. Maxim. lib. viii. c. 7. (32) Stob. Serm. xxix. (33) Diogen. Laert. Vis. Solon. (34) In Amator. de Repub. Græc. (35) Orat. Parasth. (36) Orat. xxi. (37) In Amator. (38) De Orat. (39) Epist. xc.

resolved to rest all upon an expedient which Herodotus stiles a ridiculous project; but a ridiculous as it appeared, it succeeded. They found out a woman whose name was Phya, the daughter of Socrates, a man of mean family and fortune; this woman was it seems of prodigious stature, and otherwise very handsome; her they dressed in armour, placed her in a chariot, and having disposed all things so as to make her appear with all possible advantage, they conducted her towards the city, sending heralds before with orders to speak to the people in these terms, "Give a kind reception, O Athenians, to Pisistratus, who is so much honoured by Minerva above all other men, that she herself condescends to bring him back to the citadel;"
when the heralds had published this in several places, the report was universally spread, that Minerva was bringing home Pisistratus, and in the city the multitude, believing this woman to be the goddess, addressed her with prayers, and readily re- b ceived Pisistratus. When he had recovered the sovereignty, he married, as he had promised, the daughter of Megacles, and out of gratitude to Phya, gave her in marriage to his son Hipparchus^a.

It was not long Pisistratus enjoyed in quiet that authority to which he had been so oddly restored; we have already observed that he kept his word to Megacles in marrying his daughter, and it seems Pisistratus conceived that his word bound him to nothing more. But considering that he had children by a former wife, and that Megacles's family were held by the Athenians to be execrable, he never conversed with this new wife of his as a wife, which for a time she concealed; but at length, mentioning of it to his mother, the family so highly resented his proceeding, that c Megacles instantly began to negotiate with the malecontents, which Pisistratus perceiving, and seeing what an effect it produced on the minds of the people, he once more quitted Attica voluntarily, and retired to Eretria. There, as soon he found himself in safety, he consulted with his sons what course was fittest to be taken in the present situation of their affairs. Hippias proposed the reducing Athens by force, which was agreed to, and immediately Pisistratus applied to several of the Grecian cities to furnish him with men and money for the carrying this design of his into execution. Several yielded him their assistance as they desired, but the Thebans ex- d ceeded all others in their liberality. Some troops of Argives were quickly levied by the help of these subsidies, and all things were much forwarded by the kindness of Lygdamis, a Naxian, who, as a volunteer, joined them with a considerable number of men, and advanced also a large sum of money. In the eleventh year of their banishment, says Herodotus, Pisistratus with his family, and the army he had drawn together, marched from Eretria and entered Attica. The first place they possessed themselves of was Marathon, and when they were incamped there they were joined by multitudes of Athenians, who loved the government of Pisistratus better than a democracy. It seems the government of that city had not taken any very vigorous steps, though they knew that Pisistratus was raising men, and borrowing money; but when they heard he was marching directly towards Athens, c they assembled all their forces to defend themselves, and to repel the invader. In the mean time, Pisistratus advancing with his army from Marathon, arrived at the temple of the Pallenian Minerva; and after they had placed their arms before the gates, Amphilytus, a prophet of Acarnania, by divine impulse, went to him and pronounced this oracle in Hexameter verse:

The net is spread, and dexterously thrown,

By the clear moon-light shall the tunnies come.

When the prophet had delivered these words, Pisistratus comprehending the oracle, and saying, he accepted the omen, broke up with his army. In the mean time the Athenians having drawn their forces out of the city, and taken their dinner, f betook themselves afterwards to dice or sleep. So that the army of Pisistratus falling upon them by surprize, soon put them to flight; and as they were endeavouring to make their escape, Pisistratus contrived an artful stratagem in order to disperse them so intirely, that they might not rally again. He commanded his sons to ride before with speed, and in his name to inform all those they should overtake, that they had nothing to fear, and that every man might return to his own habitation^e. Thus Pisistratus became a third time possessed of the sovereignty of Athens, out of which that he might be no more driven, he took a method directly

^a HERODOT. ubi supra. POLYÆN. Strateg. lib. i. c. 31. VALER. MAX. lib. i. c. 5.
lib. i. c. 61.

^e HEROD.

a contrary to that which Theseus had made use of for aggrandizing his kingdom; for whereas that prince made the inhabitants of Attica retire from the country, and live together in the city, Pisistratus obliged them to addict themselves again to agriculture, that they might not meet together in the market-places, and cabal against him. By this means he greatly mended the state of the Athenian territories, and procured great plantations of olives to be made all over Attica, which before was not only almost void of corn, but also bare of trees¹. He likewise commanded that in the city men should wear a certain kind of sheep-skin vest reaching only to the knees, which in succeeding times became proverbially the habit of slavery². The Athenians being so nice in respect to liberty, that if things right in themselves were commanded by persons void of lawful authority, they

b looked on obedience as the greatest misery. On this account it was that Pisistratus's laws against idleness were held tyrannical, though they were enacted merely in support of those of Solon. He received as prince of Athens the tenth part of every man's rents, and even of the fruits of his grounds, which, though applied, as the ancient revenues were, viz. to the service of the state, seemed to the Athenians an intolerable grievance. It happened once that Pisistratus being in the country, perceived an old man busy in creeping over the rocks, and picking something; Pisistratus asked him what he was doing in that uncouth place, and what were the fruits of his labour. Troubles and a few plants of wild sage, replied the old man, and of these Pisistratus must have the tenth: to which Pisistratus made him no reply, but on c his return to the city, discharged him from paying this duty³. He endeavoured by all means possible to eradicate the fierceness of the Athenians, but to little purpose, for as he was averse to severity, so it was a difficult thing for them to learn submission. Some young men who had been drinking at a feast, in their return met his wife and insulted her grossly; the next day, however, when their spirits were cooler, they went in the most humble manner to ask him pardon. Pisistratus heard their apology very graciously, and when they had done, I would advise you, gentlemen, said he, *to behave for the future more modestly; but as for my wife she was not abroad yesterday*⁴. He adorned the city with fine edifices, particularly the temple of the Pythian Apollo; and when the Athenians, to shew their aversion to him, went and eated themselves there he first endeavoured by gentle means to reclaim them from so scandalous a practice, and finding this had no effect, he commanded a herald to make proclamation, that such as for the future were guilty of that offence should suffer death⁵. He laid the foundations of the famous temple of Jupiter Olympius, mentioned before in our description of the city of Athens. He was the first who built a library for public use, and directed that Homer's poems should be digested into regular order, as we have them at present. In all other respects he was a great encourager of learning, and conversed familiarly with Crotoniates the epic poet, who wrote the adventures of the *Argonauts*⁶. As to his military virtues, we have already shewn what a share he had in the reduction of Salamis; he is also reported by Herodotus to have conquered the island of Naxos, which he put into the hands of Lygdamis; he also conquered the city of Sigeium, and purified the island of Delos; so that on the whole it seems he wanted nothing but a legal title to have rendered him an excellent prince⁷. He not only maintained the laws as became him in his station, but when he heard he was accused in the court of Areopagus of a murder, he came like a private man, and submitted himself to judgment⁸. At another time having some way offended certain Athenians of principal dignity, and they retiring to the castle of Phyla, he went thither the next day with a cloak-bag on his back; when they asked him what he meant, Either, said he, *to engage you to go back with me to Athens, or to stay with you myself, and therefore you see I am come provided*⁹. From the time of his first possessing himself of the sovereignty to his death, there intervened thirty-three years, of which he reigned but seventeen, as we learn from Aristotle, and consequently his first and second exile included sixteen years; as to the latter, Herodotus tells us expressly, that it lasted eleven years; consequently his first exile was five years only¹⁰. He left behind him, amongst other children, two sons, both men of great capacity, viz. Hippias and Hip- parchus, but which of these was the eldest is a point never to be determined; Thucydides ^a more than once affirms that it was Hippias, and charges such as believe the contrary with being in a gross error ^b. Polyænus says the same thing ^c, yet Plato is as positive that Hipparchus was the eldest ^d. Ælian follows him, and Heraclides Ponticus seems to be of the same opinion. Thucydides supports his account of the matter by some arguments, which in the opinion of the learned Meursius are not very conclusive. Without troubling the reader farther with so perplexed a business, we will proceed to the relation of facts better asserted (O).

¹ DION. CHRYSOST. Orat. vii. MAXIM. TYR. Dissert. xiii. ² SUIDAS in voce ΚΑΤΟΙΚΗ. ³ ZENOBIUS Cent. iv. Prov. 76. ⁴ PLUTARCH. Apothegm. ⁵ ANT. SCHOT. Append. Vatic. Prov. Cent. i. p. 82. ⁶ SUIDAS. VITRUVIUS. Pict. lib. vii. A. GELLIIUS Noct. Attic. lib. vi. c. 17. ⁷ HERODOT. lib. i. ⁸ ARIST. Polit. l. v. c. 12. ⁹ PLUTARCH. Apophthegm. Polit. l. v. c. 12. HERODOT. l. i.

THE

^b Bell. Pelop. lib. i. & lib. vi.^c Stratagem. lib. v. c. 14^d In Hipparch.

(O) It would have interrupted the current of our history too much to have dwelt therein on the family affairs of Pisistratus, and yet it is necessary, in order to have a perfect comprehension of the affairs of the Athenians during this space of time, that all the circumstances mentioned in ancient authors relating to the Pisistratida, should be somewhere preserved and explained. As to the descent of Pisistratus himself, we see from his own letter to Solon that he was of the house of Codrus, the last king of Athens. Ancient authors assure us that he was of the same family with Nestor (40), so that it point of nobility of birth few princes have had greater cause to value themselves than Pisistratus. His father's name was Hippocrates, as we are more than once told by Herodotus; and as the ancients were very circumspect in noting whatever had relation to the birth of their children, so as to the nativity of Pisistratus something very extraordinary is recorded. Hippocrates being at the celebration of the Olympic games, caused a victim which he had slain there to be put into a cauldron of water, which immediately began to boil without the assistance of fire. Chilon the Lacedæmonian being present when this prodigy happened, immediately addressed himself to the Athenian, advising him not to marry any woman by whom he might have children; in case he was married to such a one to divorce her, or, if he had a son to abdicate him; but Hippocrates did not take his advice, for his wife being not long after delivered of Pisistratus, he educated the child with great care; nor is it unlikely that Hippocrates apprehended why the Lacedæmonian gave him this advice, since he called his son after the name of the son of Nestor, that he might continually remember his lineage, and be from thence excited to hope and to do great things (41). As to his mother we are not acquainted either with her name or family, or indeed with any thing relating to her, except the following passage, which shews that she lived to be pretty far in years. When her son was possessed of the principality of Athens, she fell in love with a young man, with whom she conversed secretly, and with great caution; however Pisistratus had intelligence thereof, he therefore invited the young man to an entertainment, and when they rose from table, What think you, my friend, said Pisistratus, of your treatment to day? This is most excellent, Sir, answered he, Why then, replied Pisistratus, you may be assured that you shall meet with the like fare every day, as long as you please my mother (42). As to his affability and generosity we have spoken sufficiently already; but it may not be amiss to note that the wisest both of the Greeks and Romans have left us high panegyrics on the eloquence of Pisistratus, which they agree was the chief instrument he used in acquiring the dominion of his country (43). And that it was wondrously great, appears from another testimony still stronger than the former, viz. from the mighty apprehensions the Athenians were in, that Pericles would attempt to make himself a prince, because in his countenance and manner of speaking he was said to resemble Pisistratus (44). Cicero writing to Atticus concerning Cæsar's conquest of the commonwealth, tells him, that it was yet uncertain whether the victor would prove a Phalaris or a Pisistratus (45), whereby he plainly means to delineate the worst of tyrannies and the best. It may therefore be affirmed of Pisistratus, that of all the sovereigns who illegally acquired their principalties, he governed with the greatest justice, since both Solon and Cicero testify as much, and since it was thought the highest compliment that could be paid Cæsar, that he governed like another Pisistratus. We have seen many instances of his humanity; there is yet another which ought not to be suppressed. Thrasibulus or Thrasimedes, was in love with Pisistratus's daughter, and it seems was not hated by her. When therefore she was going in a public procession to sacrifice, the young man imprudently kissed her, with which Pisistratus's family was so much disgusted, that they entreated him to punish severely this insolent offender; to which Pisistratus mildly answered, if we are severe to those who love us, what shall we do to those that hate us? Thrasimedes, either encouraged by this, or distracted by his passion, drew in some young men of his acquaintance to assist him in carrying off the lady; this they performed as she came to the shore to offer sacrifice to the sea, and having conveyed her into a bark, made all the sail they could for Ægina. Hippias being at that time employed in scowling the seas of pyrates, without knowing any thing of what happened, boarded this bark, and recovered his sister. When the delinquents were brought before Pisistratus and threatened with death, they could by no means be induced to acknowledge their offence. Pisistratus, when he had while a considered them, told Thrasimedes that he bestowed on him his daughter in marriage, that no broils might be created among the Athenians on account of his family; and by this means bound the relations and friends of that young man for ever to his interest (46). Amongst the worthy acts of this great man, his collecting the works of Homer is generally looked upon as one of the chief. We think it therefore necessary to inform our reader how this was performed, the rather because it is contained in an extract from a Greek book, the whole of which is hitherto unpublished; and this very extract not easily met with. Our author says, that Pisistratus, considering the various ways by which Homer's poems had been corrupted, and fearing lest in the end they should be totally lost, he caused public notice to be given throughout Greece, that all who were possessed of any genuine works of Homer should bring them to him, promising to give them so much a line, which he punctually performed, even where several persons brought the same verses; because to the first

(40) Herodot. lib. v. c. 65. Eustath. ad Iliad. γ.
(41) Plutarch. Apophtheg.
(42) Plutarch. in vita Periclis.
(43) Diog. Chrys. Orat. xxii.
(44) Cicero. de Orat. lib. iii. c. 34.
(45) Horat. in Panathen.
(46) Poljan. Strateg. lib. v. 1. 4.

(41) Herodot. lib. i. Diog. Laertius in vit. Chilonis.
(42) Plutarch. Apophtheg.
(43) Diog. Chrys. Orat. xxii.
(44) Cicero. de Orat. lib. iii. c. 34.
(45) Horat. in Panathen.
(46) Poljan. Strateg. lib. v. 1. 4.

- a THE brothers Hipparchus and Hippias shared, as most think, the supreme authority between them, some say that the former only had the title, and others, that Pisistratus bequeathed his authority, not only to these two, but also to his third son Thestalus ^b; clear it is that Hipparchus and Hippias lived and reigned together; as to the former, he was a person of great sweetness of temper, a mighty favourer of learning, and also himself a very learned man. He directed that the rhapsodists, a sort of bards by profession, should at the great feast stiled Panathenea sing all the poems of Homer, that the Athenians might be generally instructed both in the sciences, and in the moral conduct of life. He treated Simonides the poet with great kindness, and kept him always near his person, and sent a galley on purpose to bring the celebrated Anacreon to Athens ^b. Onomacritus was another of his favourites, but he having been caught in the fact of interpolating the oracles of Museus, Hipparchus not only dismissed him the court, but banished him Athens ^c. So assiduous was this prince in cultivating the minds of the people, that he caused in city and country, but especially in the latter, statues of Mercury to be set up, and certain wise counsels in Elegiac verse to be inscribed on both sides of them. Sometimes there was only a short saying such as, This is the precept of Hipparchus, be thou strictly just, or deceive not thy friend. On account therefore of these shining virtues, he was greatly admired by his citizens, and the principality of the Pisistratidæ seemed to be thoroughly and quietly established ^k. But when it was least expected, a conspiracy was formed
- c for taking off both the brothers, which succeeded in respect to Hipparchus, and narrowly missed with regard to Hippias. Several authors report this fact with variety of circumstances; as to the most material, however, they are pretty well agreed, and they are these: There were two young men in Athens, Harmodius and Aristogiton; the former was exquisitely beautiful in his person, and on that account, according to the infamous custom of the Greeks violently beloved of the other; this Harmodius was also beloved by Hipparchus, who, if we may believe Thucydides, forced him; Aristogiton grievously resented this, and with the injured youth determined to revenge it. Another accident concurred to heighten their resentment: Hipparchus finding that Harmodius endeavoured to avoid him, publickly affronted him by
- d not permitting his sister to carry the offering of Minerva, as if she was a person unworthy of that office. The two young men, not daring to shew any public signs of resentment, consulted privately with their friends, among whom it was resolved at the approaching festival of the Panathenea, when the citizens were allowed to appear in arms, to attempt, by the death of both the tyrants, to restore Athens to liberty; the conspirators believing that the people would be unanimous in support of a design so manifestly calculated for their advantage. When the day came appointed for putting this design in execution, and the conspiracy appeared as it had been agreed on near the person of Hipparchus, they perceived at a distance one of their own number talking very familiarly with Hippias; this amazed them, they
- e were afraid that he had discovered to him the conspirators, taking courage therefore from their supposed desperate state of their affairs, they instantly fell on Hipparchus, and with a multitude of wounds dispatched him. The people however did not se-

^b ATHENÆUS Deipnos. lib. xiii. THUCYD. ubi supra. HERAC. PONT. Fragm. ^b PLATO ubi supra.
ⁱ HERODOT. lib. vii. ^k PLATO, ubi supra.

first the money was due, and the latter he said deserved it for their good will; he caused the whole to be reviled by the most experienced critics, amongst whom Zenodotus and Aristarchus were the chief (47). He is said to have had three wives, two before he arrived at the sovereignty, and the third the daughter of Megacles, whom, as we have shewn, he married merely to keep his word. By the first he had Hipparchus, whom Justin calls Diocles, and Hippias, but her name is not known; the second was called Timonassa, an Argive by birth, by whom he had Jophon and Thestalus; when he was about to marry this woman, his sons came to him and asked him, If any misbehaviour of theirs had induced him to think of another marriage? No, answered he, I approve your conduct so much, that I would have more children like you (48). Yet he refused to have children by his last wife, because her family, though noble, was stained with an indelible mark of infamy among the Athenians. The name of his daughter is not known. Besides these children by his wives, he had a bastard son by an Argive woman whose name was Hegistratus, to whom he left the principality of Sigæum, whither his son Hippias retired when expelled by the Athenians (49). As to the dates when the several memorable transactions above-recited happened, authors are not thoroughly agreed about them; we shall therefore postpone what we have to say to them, till we come to the death of Hippias, and then consider the whole matter together.

(47) Diomed. in Comment. Dionys. Thrac. de Arte Gram. apud Meyf. in Præfat. Gronov. Ihes. Grec. Vol. IV. (48) Plutarch de vitiis. Caton. (49) Herodot. Thucyd. etc. ubi supra.

cond them in this great exploit, but suffered Harmodius to be killed upon the spot by a Hipparchus's guard, and having seized Aristogiton themselves delivered him up^a. Herodotus, who was very curious in picking up strange stories, relates a very odd one in relation to this transaction; Hipparchus, he tells us, in the night preceding the day on which he was killed, beheld in a dream a tall handsome youth standing by him, who repeated distinctly these obscure lines;

Lion unmov'd, sustain the greatest ill;
For punishment attends injustice still.

At break of day he acquainted such as had skill in dreams with what he had seen: what their interpretation was, Herodotus does not inform us; he adds that at length Hipparchus despising this omen, went to celebrate the feast, and was there b slain in the manner we have related^c. Hippias behaved on this occasion with great prudence; he dissembled his grief for his brother's death, that he might the better preserve himself and family; he approached the great croud of people with his guards, and having picked out such as either their looks or their wearing daggers engaged him to believe conspirators, he dismissed the rest^d. As for the Athenians in general, though they seemed to have a high esteem for the Pisistratida, and had been governed by them with great gentleness for the space of a long series of years, and had not made any general insurrection in order to favour the attempt of Harmodius and Aristogiton, yet they carried their respect for them after their deaths to a height scarce to be accounted for; they caused their praises to be sung at the Panathenæa, c they forbid any citizen to call his slave by either of their names^e; they erected brazen statues for them in the forum, which statues, as Pliny informs us, were the work of Praxiteles^f; these statues Xerxes afterwards carried into Greece from whence they were sent back to Athens, either by Alexander^g, Antiochus^h, or *Seleucus*ⁱ; for authors do not agree which. They likewise granted several immunities and honorary privileges to the descendants of these patriots, and did all in their power to make their memory venerable, as we shall see elsewhere^j (P).

THE supreme power being now in the hands of Hippias, he began to alter his conduct towards the people, and to treat them with a severity unknown to his family before, and which was the worse borne, because himself had been so mild a d prince. The first effects of this change in his temper fell upon those concerned in the late conspiracy; he ordered Aristogiton to be put to the torture in order to extort from him the names of those who were privy to this transaction. This man, as soon as he began to feel the torments which were prepared for him, named some of Hippias's best friends, who were immediately put to death. He then named more, who received the same fate, and when Hippias asked him if there were not still some others, he replied smiling, I know of none now, but your self that deserves to suffer death^k. But it was not Aristogiton only who triumph'd over the cruelty of Hippias; a woman he kept whose name was Leana, behaved with no less intrepidity than he. Hippias having directed her to be tortured in order to extort discoveries, she e bore it patiently as long as she was able; but when she found she could endure it no longer, she bit off her tongue, and spit it out, that it might not be in her power to declare any thing to the prejudice of the man she loved. The Athenians con-

^a THUCYD. lib. vi. PLATO, ubi supra. ÆLIAN. var. Hist. lib. xi. 8. ^c HERODOT. lib. v. PTHUCYDID. lib. vi. ^d DION. CHRYS. Orat. xi. PHILOST. in vit. Apoll. lib. vii. c. 2. ^e LEBAN. Declam. xxix. ^f H. N. lib. xxxiv. c. 8. ^g ARIAN. Exped. Alex. lib. iii. ^h PAUSAN. in Atticis. VAL. MAX. lib. ii. c. 10. ⁱ DEMOST. Orat. in Leptin. ^j POLYÆN. Strateg. lib. i. c. 22.

(P) The history of Hipparchus's murder is variously reported. Thucydides says expressly, that Harmodius, who was in the flower of his age, was beloved by Aristogiton, a citizen of the middle rank, and ascribes the murder of Hipparchus to his rival's hatred (50). Aristotle calls Harmodius and Aristogiton lovers (51), and so does Maximus Tyrius (52). Justin differs from every body, and gives quite another turn to the whole affair. After Pisistratus's death, Diocles, one of his sons, says he, having ravished a virgin, was killed by the brother of the maid (53). He had this probably from Trogus Pompeius, whose work he abridged; but where he had it, is not known. Aristogiton is by some authors said to have been an humble dependant on Harmodius, and his mistress Leana no better than a singing woman who used to attend at feasts (54). On the whole therefore, whatever honours the Athenians thought fit to decree these men, their conspiracy seems rather the effects of passion, than any desire to do their country good; or at best the latter was pretended to cover the former; but it suited the Athenians, who were violent enemies to the government of a single person, to magnify this action as glorious, and to give the actors therein the title of heroes.

(50) Thucyd. lib. vi. (51) Rhetor. lib. ii. (52)

(53) lib. ii. c. 9.

a ceiving it indecent to set up the statue of a lewd woman in their citadel, contented themselves with erecting that of a lioness without a tongue, alluding to her name, on which was engraven these words, Her tongue herself bit off^a. This conspiracy being, as Hippias conceived, thoroughly quashed, he took all the measures which human policy could suggest to secure himself in the possession of his dignity; he contracted leagues with foreign princes, he encreased his revenues by various methods, though till then he had been contented with the twentieth part of every man's annual income; he obliged the Athenians to bring in their silver coin at a certain price and coined new. These violent methods soon put an end to a government, the lenity of which had alone preserved it so long. Hippias held the sovereignty only three years after b the demise of his brother, and in the fourth was expelled^b (Q).

We have already observed that Megacles, who was of the family of Alcmeon,<sup>The Pisistratus was expelled
Athens, and the democracy
restored.</sup> left his country, when Pisistratus was a second time restored, but he and those who were with him carried away a great sum of money; the Alcmeonidae, for so the family of Megacles from their great ancestor Alcmeon were stiled, settled at Lipsydrum in Paonia, and there gave refuge to all who fled from Athens, which were not a few; for Pisistratus, as some say, or, as others report, Hippias, banished all that depended on that family, and suffered not so much as the dead to rest in their graves on the old superstitious account, it may be, of their being thought execrable^c. This family residing, as we have said, at Lipsydrum, busied themselves intirely in contriving means c for expelling the Pisistratidae, and at last devised a method which proved not unsuccessful. They agreed with the Amphictyons or states-general of Greece to rebuild the temple of Delphi; as they were possessed of great riches, they executed what they undertook with much greater magnificence than they were tied to by their contract, and particularly faced the frontispiece with Parian marble instead of common stone, to the use of which only they were obliged. While they were thus employed in the public service of Greece, they served themselves too a little, for they corrupted the Pythia, i. e. she who gave out the oracles, and engaged her to exhort all the Lacedemonians who came to consult the oracle, either on behalf of the state, or on their private account, to deliver Athens. This had the effect they d expected, for the Lacedemonians finding this admonition incessantly inculcated, sent Anchimolius, a man of great quality, at the head of an army into Attica to perform what the oracle had directed, notwithstanding the Pisistratidae were at that time their good friends and allies^d. Hippias however, receiving advice of these proceedings, sent to the Thessalians, who were his confederates, to demand their assistance, who readily sent him a thousand horse under the command of Cineas one of their princes. A short time after, Anchimolius with his fleet arrived on the Athenian coast, and immediately after the army landed and encamped. The Pisistratidae did not however abandon Athens, but Hippias having cleared the adjacent country in such a manner, that the Thessalian horse might act with ease, attacked the Lacedemonians suddenly,

^a PLUT. de Garr.^b HERODOT. lib. v. c. 45.^c SUIDAS. 3^d HERODOT. ubi supra.

(Q) It may seem a little strange, that in speaking of the government of the Pisistratidae we have asserted that they did not greatly violate the laws or constitution of their country. In order to explain this, we must descend a little into the particulars of Pisistratus's policy. He pretended, as we see in his letter to Solon, to act as a lawful monarch, yet he did not degrade any of the magistrates of the commonwealth, but suffered them to continue vested with the same power they had before, taking care however that the archon should be either of his family, or one whom he could depend on, so that he at once preserved that superiority over his countrymen which he affected, and that form of rule which was so pleasing to them. That all the family of Pisistratus had in their turns a share in the administration might be made appear from various testimonies; at present we will insist only on one. Pisistratus the son of Hippias and grandson of the great Pisistratus, as we learn from Thucydides, placed, during the time that he was archon, an altar in the forum of the twelve gods, and another in the temple of the Pythian Apollo; the inscription on the former the Athenians demolished, but that on the latter they suffered to remain, which run thus: This monument, during the time of his magistracy, Pisistratus the son of Hippias placed in the temple of the Pythian Apollo. It is true his name is not found in the table of archons, because the year in which he was archon could not be settled, however the authority before produced may be assuredly relied on. The excesses committed by Hippias after the death of his brother are evident proofs of the mildness of the administration preceding it; for few things that he did, would have been thought extraordinary in another king. We will conclude this note with observing, that Augustus Caesar affected, like Pisistratus, to leave the popular magistrates and the senate in the nominal possession of their authority, tho' at the same time he held the supreme power himself.

routed them with a great slaughter, slew their general Anchimolius, and obliged the shattered remains of his army to betake themselves to their ships. The body of the Spartan general was honourably interred near the temple of Hercules in the Cynojarges. The Lacedemonians, incensed at this unfortunate expedition, determined to send another army into Attica, which accordingly they did under their king Cleomenes, who marched by land, and having at his entrance into the Athenian territories defeated the Theffalian horse, who thereupon retired precipitately into their own country, he made use of this opportunity to besiege Hippias who had retired within the Pelasgic wall; this siege however could not have produced any great matter, Hippias and his forces being well provided with all things within, Cleomenes and his army destitute of all things without; but an accident changed the scene, and contrained Hippias to abandon Athens. The Pisistratide were so careful of their children that, to prevent any unlucky accident from befalling them, they attempted to send them out of Attica; which measure of theirs, though intended for the preservation of their offspring, proved the ruin of themselves, their children falling into the hands of the Lacedemonians. The Pisistratide retaining still the same affection for their children, agreed by treaty to retire in five days out of Attica in order to redeem them^a. This accordingly they did, nor were they in any danger of wanting a place of refuge, the princes of Theffaly invited them into their country, the king of Macedon offered them a city and a territory if they would retire into his dominions^b. But Hippias and his family chose rather to go to the city of Sigeum, which Pisistratus had conquered and left behind him to his posterity, Herodotus says to Hegistratus his natural son. From this time forwards the Athenians pursued this family with implacable hatred, retaining such a sense of their usurpation, that lest other eminent persons should imitate them, and through their interest in the people assume the sovereignty; they were most ready to banish even the most worthy of their citizens, that at all events they might be safe, as we shall have frequent occasion to shew in the succeeding pages of this history.

THE Athenians did not enjoy an uninterrupted quiet as they expected, after the expulsion of the Pisistratide. The people were quickly divided into two factions, at the head of the one was Clysthenes the most eminent of the Alcmeonide, and at the head of the other Isagoras the son of Tirfander, a man of great quality, and in high esteem with the nobility of Athens. Clysthenes, who was a person of great parts, as we may guess from his having a principal hand in corrupting the Pitbia, which was the prime cause of Hippias's expulsion, applied himself chiefly to the people, and in order thoroughly to engage them in his interest, sought by all methods possible to encrease their power. With this view he altered many things in Solon's scheme of government; for whereas till this time the Athenian tribes had been but four in number, he augmented them to ten, and encreased the senate from four hundred to five. Isagoras penetrating his design, and readily conceiving that by this course he would get the better of him and his faction, immediately resolved to seek aid from the Lacedemonians. This seemed to him the more easy, because in their last expedition he had contracted a strict friendship with Cleomenes their king; he likewise devised a very proper expedient for the expulsion of his rival, viz. the so often mentioned story of the putting to death Cylon's associates after their taking sanctuary in the temple of Minerva; but as we have heretofore observed, the Alcmeonide were of the same family with Megacles, who was principally concerned in that transaction: the Lacedemonians readily came into Isagoras's proposition, and Cleomenes suddenly dispatched a herald to Athens with a declaration of war in case the Alcmeonide were not immediately banished. The Athenians either dreading the Lacedemonian power, or being tired already of Clysthenes, made no great difficulty of the thing; but to avoid a war, banished their benefactors. The worst of it was, that this did not answer their end, for Cleomenes, at the head of a Spartan army soon after entered Attica. On his arrival at Athens he drove seven hundred families into banishment, exclusive of those whom the Athenians had before banished with Clysthenes; after this he would have dissolved the senate, and have veiled the government in three hundred of the principal persons of Isagoras's faction; this was pushing the matter too far; the Athenians perceiving that either they must submit to slavery, or resist the Lacedemonians, they therefore immediately took up arms, and contrained ^aARISTOPH. Lystr. PAUSAN. in JACOB.

HERODOT. ubi supra.

- a Cleomenes and his troops to retire together with Isagoras and his friends into the citadel, where they besieged them for two days. On the third the king of Lacedæmon being now convinced that force would do nothing with the Athenians, surrendered upon these terms, that all who were in the citadel should have leave to retire out of Attica unmolested. The Athenians however fell upon such as were separated from the army, and put them to death without mercy; amongst these was Timestibæus the brother of Cleomenes, so that the Athenians no longer kept any measures with the Lacedæmonians, looking upon them as avowed enemies, who above all things sought to subvert that democracy of which they were so fond, and to constitute an aristocracy which in truth was ever the aim of the Spartans, b who, where-ever they had authority, set up that form of rule. One reason of which among others was this, that they could better depend on the friendships of such states than such as were governed by the people, who very seldom know their true interest; and are frequently prevailed on to change their counsels. But to return to the current of our history.

- Cleomenes* and his Spartans had no sooner quitted the Athenian territories, than the people of that country recalled Clisthenes and all the families they had sent into exile, that they might be the better able to support a war which they foresaw they should be engaged in. Their conjectures were perfectly well founded, Cleomenes raised forces throughout all Peloponnesus, though without declaring positively c his intention, which was to make Isagoras, who was still with him, tyrant of Athens; when all things were ready, the Lacedæmonian king engaged the Bæotians on one side, and the Chalcidians on the other to attack the Athenians, while he at the head of the grand army entered the country of Eleusis. The Athenians, knowing that it was impossible for them to set on foot armies sufficient to look all their enemies in the face, resolved to leave their territories to the mercy of the Bæotians and Chalcidians, and with all the forces they could draw together to march against Cleomenes. This resolution of theirs they carried accordingly into execution, but before the armies were ready to engage, the Corinthians, who were among the forces of Cleomenes, began to doubt the justice of their cause; and thinking it safest not to act where they d were doubtful, marched back to their own country. Damaratus the son of Ariston, the other king of Sparta, and colleague of Cleomenes, was also against this expedition; and his opposition was the more remarkable, because till then he had never differed with his colleague. The confederates observing that neither the Lacedæmonian princes could agree amongst themselves, or prevail upon the Corinthians to remain with the army, began to distaste this business, and dropping off by degrees, put the Athenians out of fear.

- WHEN the Spartans and their allies were withdrawn, the people of Athens determined to revenge themselves upon the Chalcidians, against whom the army marched immediately; but finding the Bæotians had assembled a considerable body of forces e between them and the Euripus, they determined to attack them, which they did accordingly with such success, that the Bæotians were intirely routed, a great number of them slain, and seven hundred taken prisoners. This victory having opened a free passage into Eubæa, whither the Athenians passed over the same day, and falling upon the Chalcidians, obtained a glorious victory over them, taking a vast number of prisoners, who with the Bæotians they carried back with them to Athens, leaving in Eubæa four thousand men. All the prisoners taken in this battle the Athenians put in irons, though they afterwards set them at liberty on receiving two f Minæ for each man by way of ransom. The fetters however they hung up in the citadel, and having consecrated the tenth part of what they received for their ransom, they purchased therewith a chariot with four horses a-breast, which they set up in the portico of the citadel with this inscription:

Warm with just rage, when the Athenian youth
 O'ercame Bæotian, and Chalcidian bands;
 Their foes, in fetters bound, to Pallas then,
 These, as the tenth of all their spoils, they plac'd.

THIS happy success of the Athenian arms falling out in a short time of the expulsion of the Pisistratide, Herodotus, makes the following observation thereupon;
 " thus the affairs of the Athenians flourished, yet they are not the only example " of this kind. For all places abound in instances of the prosperity that attends " an equal distribution of power. Under their tyrants indeed they were not Vol. II. N^o 6. 6 A " inferior

“ inferior in war to any of their neighbours: But they had no sooner freed themselves from that servitude, than they far surpassed all the rest, and became the principal nation of Greece; which manifestly shews, that as long as they were oppressed they acted remissly, and would not exert their courage to the utmost, because they knew their victories could only redound to the advantage of their masters; whereas, after they had recovered their liberty, every man contended who should do best, because they fought for themselves. And such was the state of the Athenian affairs”^a. That Herodotus had reason to introduce this reflection here, appears from the subsequent conduct of the people of Athens, who, no longer passive under any affronts, took up arms frequently against her insulting neighbours, and forced them to be both quiet and submissive.

The war with Æginatians.

THE Baotians, stung with the indignities offered to their countrymen, when made prisoners by the Athenians, resolved to revenge themselves; and, as the custom of those times was, before they began the war, sent to consult the oracle at Delphos. Having received its answer, and having spent a considerable time in consulting on its meaning, they at last resolved to engage the inhabitants of Ægina to invade Attica at the same time, which it was easy for them to do, lying but a few miles from that coast. This nation having an hereditary hatred to the Athenians, and being elate on account of their great wealth, readily embraced the proposal; and while the people of Athens bent all their attention towards the Baotian war, landed a considerable army on the opposite side, and wasted all the sea-coasts. The Athenians immediately took fire at this, but sending to and fro to Delphi before they equipped a fleet against Ægina, they had suddenly a new affair upon their hands.^b

Cleomenes when he returned to Sparta, after his unsuccessful expedition, produced certain oracles, which he said he had found in the citadel of Athens, while he was besieged therein; the purport of these oracles was, that Athens would in time rival Sparta. On the back of this came out the discovery of Clisthenes's confederacy with the priests of Apollo, whereby the Lacedemonians had been engaged to drive the Pisistratide out of Athens, or, in other words, to sacrifice their fast friends to such as by their interests were bound to be their enemies. The Spartans repenting sorely of the folly they had committed, sent for Hippias from Sigeum, in order to restore him to his principality. He readily obeyed their summons, and though it cost him a long voyage by sea, came in person to Lacedemon, where the kings of Sparta, and the deputies of the states in alliance with them, were in deep consultation. Soficles the Corinthian made a long harangue against the proposition for restoring Hippias, which had such an influence on the deputies from the rest of the confederates, that the Lacedemonians found it impossible to engage them in this design, and were therefore constrained to abandon it themselves, so that Hippias was obliged to return to Sigeum, without relinquishing however his hopes of one day reducing Athens.^c

The Ionian
war.

Aristagoras the Milesian having set on foot a revolt in Ionis, and having failed in his attempt to engage the Lacedemonians to abet it, came to Athens, and, as Herodotus observes, found it easier to manage all the citizens thereof by his eloquence, than to persuade the Lacedemonian king. In consequence of his fine speeches, they decreed that twenty ships should be sent to the assistance of the Ionians under the command of Melantbius, an Athenian nobleman universally esteemed; by the assistance of which fleet the Ionians did many great exploits, and amongst the rest sacked Sardis, of which when the Persian king had advice, he declared himself the sworn enemy of Athens, and solemnly besought God that he might one day have it in his power to be revenged of them. This was the source of those wars which followed afterwards between the Persians and the Greeks, and which were so fatal to both nations. In the end however, the Ionians were unsuccessful, and the Persians reduced them again under their yoke.^d

WHEN the Ionian war was ended, the Persian king sent to demand Earth and Water, as tokens of submission from the Greeks, to which, out of fear of his mighty power at sea, most of the islanders yielded, and amongst the rest the inhabitants of Ægina. The Athenians, as soon as they received notice of this, took it into their heads that this nation had submitted themselves to the great king, that they might a be at liberty to act against the Athenians under colour of their being subject to the Persian crown. On this account they, that is, the Athenians, sent ambassadors to Sparta to accuse the inhabitants of Ægina of treachery towards the Greeks. The Spartans upon this complaint sent their king Cleomenes to Ægina, who on his arrival attempted to seize the persons principally concerned in making their submission to the Persians. But when he attempted this, Crius the son of Polycritus interposed, and told him he should not carry away any of his countrymen, because he apprehended what he did was of his own head, and not by any commission from the Lacedemonians. This exceedingly irritated Cleomenes, who notwithstanding was constrained to return without effecting what he designed; his colleague Demaratus having accused him at home. But having after he came back procured his colleague to be deposed, and his own kinsman Leutychides to be crowned in his stead, he brought the last mentioned prince with him into the island of Ægina, and having seized ten of the principal persons of that island, and amongst them Crius before mentioned, he brought them away prisoners, and delivered them up to the Athenians. Not long after having in his phrenzy kill'd himself, all his tyrannical acts were disapproved by the Spartans, who, on the inhabitants of Ægina's accusing Leutychides for the injury he had done them, delivered up that prince to them, who however desired nothing more of him, that that he would go with them to Athens in order to solicit the release of Crius and his associates. When they arrived there the Spartan king made a long oration, in which he endeavoured to shew that the hostages were only deposited by him and his colleague in Athens that they might be safe, and that now when he came again to demand them, it was their duty to deliver them up. But this either the Athenians did not or would not understand, so that the war between them and the people of Ægina, was still carried on with various success. The latter being informed, that the Athenian galley which went annually to Delphi, lay at anchor at Sunium, they resolved to intercept it, which they did, and took many persons of distinction aboard it. The Athenians, to revenge this indignity, entred into a treaty with one Nicodromus, a person of great interest in Ægina; he had been formerly banished his country by those who then governed it, and in order to be revenged on them, resolved to betray it to the Athenians.

d The Athenians for this purpose fitted out a considerable fleet, but not thinking it sufficient for their purpose, Ægina being then mistress of those seas, they had recourse to the Corinthians for their assistance; this state being the fast friend and ally of Athens, did not give her a denial, but alledged a law of theirs, whereby they were forbidden to lend their ships; but with much ado an expedient was found, whereby the Athenians obtained what they wanted; and yet the Corinthians did not break their law, the latter yielding to the former five of their ships in consideration of their paying them five drachmæ for each. The length of this treaty frustrated the Athenian hopes, for Nicodromus depending on their arrival, on the day prefixed, seized on the old town, and declared for the Athenians; but he and his party not being able alone to resist the whole force of the island, they were obliged to secure themselves by flight, which they did the very day before the Athenian and Corinthian fleet appeared before Ægina. This defection of Nicodromus however proved very beneficial to the Athenians, for they having assigned to him and his associates land on the shore opposite to Ægina, they from thence committed continual piracies and depredations upon their countrymen. What the issue was of this war, Herodotus does not inform us: It is generally conceived that its continuance was a thing fortunate for the Athenians and for Greece in general, for it exercised that people in maritime affairs, and taught them the use and consequence of a naval force, which hitherto they had little understood. When the first news came that the Persian had in view the conquest of Greece, the Athenians and the inhabitants of Ægina, as well as the rest of the Grecian states, compromised their differences, that they might be the better able to resist the power of the great king, who threatened at least the liberties of the Greeks in general in revenge for the Athenians assisting the Ionians, when they sought to recover their freedom.
f

We have already taken notice of the displeasure which Darius had taken against the Athenians on account of the sacking of Sardis; but we hitherto forbore to mention the intrigues of Hippias in order to obtain by force the principality of Athens,

Hippias endeavours to be restored to the principality of Athens.

HERODOT. ubi supra.

from

from whence, as we have before related, through the assistance of the Lacedemonians,^a he had been expelled. This old man, after his returning from Lacedemon to Asia, went to Artaphernes, governor of the adjacent provinces for the Persian king, and excited him to make war upon his country, promising that himself would be obedient to Darius, and greatly further all his designs in case he could be restored to that authority which formerly he had enjoyed at Athens. The Athenians were not ignorant, either of his journey, or of the propositions he had made to Artaphernes; they therefore sent ambassadors to this nobleman, to entreat him not to give any heed to Hippias's proposals, but to suffer the people of Athens to remain free and quiet as they were. But Artaphernes conceiving that it would be more for his master's interest to have a prince governing Athens, than to leave it under a democratic form^b of rule, answered the Athenians haughtily, that if they would have peace with the great king, they must receive Hippias, and obey him; but this was so distasteful to that generous people, that they immediately resolved to give the enemies of Darius all the assistance they could, and to endeavour, if it were possible, to cut him out so much work near home, that he might have no opportunity to attempt any thing either against them or Greece. At last however, Darius commissioned Mardonius to revenge him of the insults which he conceived had been put upon him by the Greeks, but Mardonius and his troops, through a storm at sea, and other accidents, having been able to do nothing, Darius and Artaphernes the son of Artaphernes were commissioned to do what he was to have done^c.

The Persian
War.

THE misfortune which the Persians had had in suffering shipwreck, when their fleet doubled the promontory of Athos, made such an impression on the commanders last mentioned, that they resolved to avoid that dangerous navigation, by drawing their forces into the plains of Cilicia, and passing over from thence through the Cyclades to Eubœa in order to destroy Eretria; and from thence to proceed to Athens, they having it in charge from Darius to ruin both places, and to bring away the inhabitants, that they might be at his disposal. The Eretrians, as soon as they had advice of the arrival of the Persian fleet among the Cyclades, sent to demand assistance from the Athenians. That state, with a magnanimity scarce to be paralleled, ordered the four thousand men whom they had left in the Chalcidian territory to advance to the aid of the Eretrians, which they did. But the inhabitants of that city were neither steady nor honest; one party was for receiving the Athenian succours into the city, and holding out to the last extremity; a second was for abandoning the city, and retiring to the mountains of Eubœa: A third party sought to betray their country to the Persians for the sake of private advantage. Æschines the son of Notbon, a man of principal authority among his countrymen, perceiving the situation things were in, generously informed the commanders of the Athenian troops, and advised them to return home: in consequence of which advice they immediately retired to Oropus, and thereby escaped that total destruction which would have befallen them, if they had remained in the neighbourhood of Eretria. For^e that city being betrayed to the Persians by some of its inhabitants, was pillaged, burnt, and its inhabitants sold for slaves, according to the command of Darius.

THE Athenians, who as we have often remarked before, were generally divided among themselves, and persecuting one another when they wanted foreign wars to employ them, united now with great zeal and earnestness, when they heard that the Persians were so near them. They raised with the utmost expedition all the forces they were able, and yet could not draw together above nine thousand men. These with a thousand Platœans who afterwards joined them, were commanded by ten general officers, who had equal power. Among these were Miltiades, Aristides,^f and Themistocles, all men of distinguished valour, and great abilities. But it being generally conceived that it would be impossible for them, with their small forces, to give any interruption to the Persians, they sent Phidippides to Sparta to intreat the immediate assistance of that state. This man, as Herodotus informs us, affirmed afterwards to the Athenians, that passing by mount Parthenius, he heard himself loudly called by his name, upon which, turning about, he beheld the god Pan, who, after asking him why the Athenians held him in no greater esteem, assured him that he had deserved very well of their state and would continue to do so; of which when the People of Athens had information, they caused a temple to be erected to his honour near the citadel and honoured him thenceforward with annual sacri-

^a Id. Ibid.

a fices, and a lamp continually burning. Phidippides, after this strange adventure, arrived on the second day at Sparta, where he communicated his business to the senate in the following terms: Men of Lacedemon, the Athenians desire you to assist them, and not to suffer the most ancient of all the Grecian cities to be enslaved by the Barbarians. Eretria is already destroyed, and Greece consequently weakened by the loss of so considerable a place. The Lacedemonians readily agreed to what he proposed, and ordered their troops to be ready to march, but at the same time declared that they would not depart in less than five days, one of their laws forbidding them to begin an expedition, but at the full of the moon, of which it was then but the ninth day. The Persians in the mean time being informed by Hippias that the plains of Marathon would be the most advantageous place for them to engage in, because it would afford them room to act with their horse; they following his advice, after the destruction of Eretria, made all the haste they possibly could thither, of which when the Athenians had advice, they immediately ordered their forces to march to Marathon also. An act of amazing confidence, considering the mighty disproportion between the Persian and Athenian army.

THE Athenians being encamped at the temple of Hercules, were there joined by a thousand men, the whole strength of the little city of Plataea, which she now hazarded in the cause of Athens out of gratitude for former favours (R). A council of war being held there, the generals were very much divided in their opinions; some were for fighting, others not; Miltiades observing this, and considering the great importance of the matter in debate, addressed himself to Callimachus of Apbidna, who was Polemarch, and whose power was equal to that of all the other generals, in these words; "You alone, O Callimachus, must now determine, either to see the Athenians reduced to the condition of slaves, or by preserving the liberty of your country, have an eternal monument of your fame, surpassing the glory of Harmodius and Aristogiton. For the Athenians were never in so great danger from the time they were first a people. If they fall under the power of the Medes, one may easily imagine what usage they must expect from Hippias: But if they conquer, Athens will be the principal city of Greece. To let you know then by what means these things may be effected, and from what cause the fate of Athens is now in your hands, I shall acquaint you, that we are at this instant divided in opinion touching a battle; some of us propose to fight, and others advising the contrary. If we decline a battle, I foresee some great dissension will shake the fidelity of the army, and induce them to a compliance with the Medes. But if we fight before the corruption slides into the hearts of the Athenians, we may hope from the equity of the gods to obtain the victory. All these things are in your power, and entirely depend upon the resolution you shall take. For if you would support my opinion with the ac-

The battle of Marathon.
Ten years after the
Flood 2500.
Before Christ
490.

(R) The city of Plataea was in old times free. Herodotus has given us a very full account of the reasons which reduced its inhabitants to raise their utmost force in the cause of Athens. We cannot therefore deliver it better to our reader than in his words; "The Plataeans were already under the protection of Athens, and the Athenians had gone through many dangers in their defence. For when the Plataeans saw themselves oppressed by the Thebans, they first offered their submission to Cleonemes the son of Anaxandrides, and to the Lacedemonians. But they rejected the offer in these terms: We are placed, said they, at such a distance from you, that in time of necessity our succours will prove ineffectual. For your country may be frequently ravaged before we can be informed of your danger. We advise you therefore to put yourselves under the protection of the Athenians, who are your neighbours, and sufficiently able to defend you. This counsel the Lacedemonians gave, not out of any good will to the Plataeans, but because they were desirous to see the Athenians weakened by a war against the Boeotians. However, the Plataeans approving their advice, went to Athens, and arriving there, when the Athenians were met

"to sacrifice to the twelve gods, they sat down by the altar in the posture of suppliants, and made their submission to that place. Which when the Thebans heard, they sent an army against Plataea, and at the same time the Athenians marched to assist the Plataeans. But as they were ready to engage in battle, the Corinthians apprehending the consequences, interposed their good offices to reconcile the contending parties, and with the consent of both sides, determined the dispute on this agreement; That the Thebans should permit all those Boeotians who would no longer be accounted members of Boeotia, to do as they thought most convenient for themselves. After this reconciliation the Corinthians returned home, and as the Athenians were retiring likewise, the Boeotians fell upon them in their march, but were repulsed with loss. Upon which success the Athenians enlarged the frontiers of the Plataeans, and instead of that appointed by the Corinthians, fixed the limits of the Thebans at Asopus and Elysia. In this manner the Plataeans came under the protection of the Athenians, and joined their forces at Marathon (55)."

(55) Herodot. lib. vi.

“cession of your vote, you will see your country free, and Athens the most illustrious city of Greece : But if you join with those who would dissuade us from a battle, you can expect no other consequences, than such as are most contrary to these hopes.” Callimachus, whose voice was decisive according to the Athenian laws, joined directly with Miltiades, and declared for giving battle immediately. Each of the captains commanded in chief by turns, but Aristides giving up his day to Miltiades, the rest did so too. That excellent person accepted this compliment for the good of his country, but he would not fight till his own proper day of command came about, for fear that through any latent sparks of jealousy and envy, any of the generals should be led not to do their duty. But when the day beforementioned came, he, without waiting for any farther succours, disposed the troops in order of battle, placing the chief of his strength in the wings. Callimachus, as Polemarch, commanded on the right, the Plateans were posted on the left, and the sacrifices being offered, they began instantly to advance with inexpressible order towards their enemies. The Persian army was ranged in battalia near a mile off, and when they beheld the Athenians running towards them, they imputed it to folly and ignorance of military discipline, and were convinced of this, when they observed that they had neither horse nor pikemen. However they soon found their error when the charge began : For the Athenians and Plateans fought with such obstinate valour on the right and left, that the Barbarians were forced to fly on both sides. The Persians and Sacæ however perceiving that the Athenian center was weak, charged with such force that they broke through it : This those on the right and left perceived, but did not attempt to succour it, till they had put to flight both the wings of the Persian army ; then bending the points of their wings towards their own centre, they enclosed the hitherto victorious Persians, and cut them to pieces. This put an end to the engagement, for the remains of the army fled, as fast as they could, to their fleet, whither the Athenians pursued them. When therefore the Persians in haste hurried on board the booty they had acquired in Eretria, and sought to escape by sea that ill fate which attended them on shore ; the Athenians, in order to hinder this, began to set the ships on fire, and to board such as lay nearest the shore ; in which bold attempt, though they had some success, yet the Persians at last got under sail, and bore away for *Athens*¹. It was reported in those times, that the Alcmeonidæ encouraged the Persians to make a second attempt, by holding up, as they approached the shore, a shield for a signal ; however it was, the Persian fleet endeavoured to double the cape of Sunium with a view to surprize the city of Athens before the army could return. But Miltiades seeing the danger his countrymen were in, leaving Aristides with a thousand men to guard the prisoners and the spoil, marched at the head of the other nine thousand with such diligence, that they arrived at the temple of Hercules in Cynosarges, which was but at a small distance from the city, before the Barbarians were in a condition to attack it. Which when the Persian admiral had notice of, he sailed from the port of Phalerum for Asia, and so put an end to a very unfortunate expedition².

THE battle of Marathon makes deservedly a great figure in history ; Cornelius Nepos assigns a just reason, because never before had so small a body of forces overcome so vast a host¹. Herodotus tells us, that six thousand three hundred of the Persians were slain there, and of the Athenians one hundred ninety two^m, which is infinitely more probable than what Justin relates of the Persians losing two thousand thousand men in the battle and by shipwreckⁿ. The same author says that the Athenians took many of the ships, and destroyed many more ; Herodotus says there were only seven ships taken. Certain it is that the Athenians behaved with amazing intrepidity, and that several amongst them distinguished themselves in a most extraordinary manner. Callimachus the Polemarch, after having done all that a brave and wise officer could do, lost his life in the field ; Stasileus the son of Tbrasyllus, one of the ten commanders, was also killed ; Cynegyris the son of Euphorion laid hold on the prow of one of the Persian ships with both his hands, and having them struck off by an ax, died of his wounds ; this is Herodotus’s account. Justin carries matters much farther ; he says that Cynegyris having done wonders in the fight, pursued the Persians to the shore, and laid hold of a ship ready to a fail with his right hand, when that was cut off he seized it with his left, of which being likewise deprived, he caught hold of it with his mouth, his spirit being such, that, untamed by long fatigue, and the loss of both his hands, he with the rage of a wild beast, fought at last with his teeth. Herodotus, who speaks so modestly of Cynegyrus's bravery, tells us a very extraordinary tale of one Epizelus the son of Cepbadoras; he says, that fighting in his rank with a becoming valour, he of a sudden lost his sight without receiving any blow, and continued blind all the rest of his life. This would not have been worth repeating, if Herodotus had not affirmed that he heard this man declare that he thought he saw a man of uncommon height standing by him in complete armour, holding a shield, which was covered by his beard; and that this phantom afterwards passing by him, killed the person who b was posted next to him. Whatever we may think of the Athenian story, this must be admitted an indubitable proof, that Herodotus's account of this battle deserves credit to all probable circumstances, since what he relates he had from the mouths of those who were eye-witnesses. The numbers of the Persians is very differently reported; Justin says that they were six hundred thousand, Cornelius Nepos makes them ten times the number of the Athenians, that is one hundred thousand, which is probably not far from the truth *.

¹ HERODOT. ubi supra. PLUTARCH. in vit. Arist. CORN. NEPOS in vit. Miltiad. VALER. MAX. &c.
² PLUTARCH. in vit. Arist. ¹ ubi supra. ^m ubi supra. ⁿ lib. ii. c. 9.

AMONGST the many eminent persons who were present in this famous engagement, was Hippias the son of Pisistratus, who hoped through the power of the Persians to be restored to the principality of Athens. He it was, who, as we have said
c before, conducted the Barbarians into the plains of Marathon, when, as Herodotus tells us, he dreamt one night that he lay with his mother, and from thence concluded that he should be restored, and die peaceably at home in his old age; but a day or two after, when he was busy giving direction as to the disposal of the booty taken at Eretria, and putting the Persian troops in order on the shore, he was seized with such a fit of coughing and sneezing, that most of his teeth grew loose, and one of them fell out of his head upon the strand, for which, when those about him had long sought in vain, Hippias fetching a deep sigh, said, This country neither belongs to us, nor will ever be subdued by us, and I shall have no other part here than that where my tooth lies. This was his second, and, as it happened, the more just d construction of his dream †. As to what became of him in the battle, both Herodotus and Thucydides are silent thereupon, Justin ‡ and some other later authors say that he was killed there; if he was, the Athenians lost in him an implacable enemy, very capable of contriving mischiefs against them, and one who was alike indefatigable in thinking and in acting (S).

* In vit. Miltiad.

† ubi supra.

‡ ubi supra.

(S) We have more than once in the text promised to speak of the family of Hippias; he married Myrrhine the daughter of Callias, by whom he had five children (56); he had also another wife of extraordinary beauty, the daughter of one Chabrias (57). Amongst these children was Pisistratus junior, whom we have before mentioned; he had also a daughter whose name was Archidice, who married the son of the tyrant or prince of Lampacus. This lady was honoured with a fine tomb, whereon was an inscription to the following effect; This earth covers Archidice the daughter of Hippias, a man in his time famous throughout Greece, who, tho' her father, husband, and brothers were princes, suffered not her mind to be elated therewith (58). Hippias visited her before he went to the Persian court, in order perhaps to take his leave of her, from an apprehension that the expedition in which he was about to embark, might some way or other prove fatal to him. The dream above recorded was, certainly, according to the usual rules of interpretation fortunate, and so it was accounted to Julius Caesar (59); but it may be that this interpretation was with a restriction, that the person dreaming was to have been on good terms with his country, whereas Hippias at the time of this dream was in the Persian host warring against his country. There is yet another account of this matter, if a dream deserves any farther account, viz. that among the Persians it was held ominous, and a sign that a man would repent what he was about (60). As to his death, Cicero speaks of it in these terms, Nesarius Hippias Pisistrati filius, qui in Marathonis pugna cecidis arma contra Patriam ferens (61). Tertullian speaks of it likewise (62); yet Suidas tells us quite another story; he says that the Barbarians being routed, Hippias retired to Lemnos, and there laboured under a very grievous malady, which at length made him blind, and the blood flowing through his eyes, brought on a miserable and painful death, which he reckons a punishment for his having conducted the Persian forces into the plains of Marathon. The reader will pardon the length of our history of the Pisistratide when he considers that from the time of Pisistratus, his assuming the sovereignty, to the death of Hippias, at the battle of Marathon, there intervened upwards of fourscore years.

(56) Thucyd. lib. vii. (57) Clidem ap. Athen. lib. xiii. (58) Thucyd. ubi supra. (59) Suetonius in vit. J. Caesaris. cap. vii. (60) Achem. Oenocris. cxxviii. (61) Ad Attic. lib. ix. c. 10. (62) Adv. Gentes.

Aristides, who remained on the field of battle while Miltiades marched back to a Athens, discharged the trust reposed in him with the greatest integrity; for though there was much gold and silver in the Persian camp, and though the tents and ships they had taken were full of riches of all sorts, yet he neither took any thing himself, nor omitted to the utmost of his power the necessary precautions to prevent other people's meddling therewith. Yet some there were who in spite of his orders and his care, found means to enrich themselves by private plunder, particularly Callias the torch-bearer, Aristides's cousin german (T). For this man having long hair, and a fillet about his head, one of the Persians took him for a king, and falling down at his feet, discovered to him a vast quantity of gold hid in a well; Callias not only seized it, and applied it to his private use, but most inhumanly put to death the poor b man who shewed it him, to prevent his discovering what he had done. By this action he not only blemished his own reputation, but transmitted infamy to his posterity, who notwithstanding their eminency in the state, were stiled by the comic poets Laccopluti, i. e. *enriched by the well, an example which merits consideration perhaps as much as any other recorded in history. The Athenians in token of their respect towards those brave men who fell in this engagement, erected for them public monuments in the field of battle, with inscriptions containing their names, and the names of their tribes and families. At some distance they erected other monuments for the Plataeans, Bæotians, and slaves, who were slain here. They likewise caused this battle to be painted in the Pæcilian portico, where the Plataean c auxiliaries were represented, as well as the Athenian soldiers, and at the head of these their ten captains, Miltiades holding the first place*, which was all the reward they bestowed upon them.

It cannot seem strange that the Athenians were highly elate on this victory. In the first transports of their joy, they granted all the Plataeans the freedom of their city; as for Miltiades, Aristides, and Themistocles, who had exceedingly distinguished themselves in the service of their country, they were for the present treated with all the marks of gratitude and respect they could have wished, though in their turns we shall see them all slighted, prosecuted, and condemned. While Miltiades was thus high in the people's favour, he proposed in a general assembly of the d people, that he should be intrusted with a fleet of seventy ships well manned and provided, promising them that he would put them in possession of great riches, and make the expedition in other respects turn to vast account. The Athenians readily embraced this project, and fitted out such a fleet as he desired, of which Miltiades taking the command, sailed to Paros. The reason he pretended for invading this island was, that the inhabitants thereof had assisted the Persians with ships in the expedition of Marathon, but the true ground of his hatred to that people was, that one Lyfagoras a Parian had done him ill offices with Hydarnes the Persian. As soon as he arrived on the island, he sent heralds to the capital thereof, requiring a hundred talents to be paid him, threatening in case of refusal to besiege e the city, and in case he took it, to give it up to the plunder of his soldiers. The Parians however were not to be terrified, they refused so much as to deliberate on his proposition, but on the contrary, provided themselves the best they could for an obstinate defence. Miltiades caused the place to be invested, and carried on the siege with great vigour, till one Timo a Parian woman, who was a

* PLUTARCH. ubi supra. s CORN. NEPOS in vit. Miltiad.

(T) Torch-bearers, stiled in Greek Daduchi, were persons dedicated to the service of the gods, and admitted even into the most sacred mysteries. On this account, Pausanias speaks of it as a great happiness to a woman, that she had seen her brother, her husband, and her son, successively enjoy this office (63). We have observed in the text from Plutarch that Callias was mistaken for a king, because of his flowing hair bound with a fillet, which was not unlike the royal ornaments in use among the eastern nations; the reason of this was, that amongst the ancients it was an opinion almost universally received, that there was a very near affinity between the offices of king and priest; on this account the Romans preserved the title of Rex among their sacred officers when they expelled the Tarquins, and the Athenians, as we have heard, stiled their second archon who presided in the public sacrifices Rexileus; so that in affairs relating to the gods, both the Athenians and the Romans, though they hated monarchy, made use of kings. The same notion prevailed through the east, for we find Jeroboam standing by the altar at Beitbel, when the prophet came to denounce its ruin (64). And Uzziah king of Judah, when he had been victorious over the Philistines, Arabians and Ammonites, was lifted up in his heart, and desired to add to his royal dignity the honour of being priest of the most High God (65).

(63) In Artici. (64) 1 Kings xiii. (65) 2 Chron. xxvi. 16.

priestess,

a priests pretended to inform him how he should take the city. In consequence of what this woman told him, he went to the temple of Ceres the lawgiver, and not being able to open its gates, he got to the top of the wall, and from thence leaped down; but being seized with a sudden horror, and resolving to go back, he re-ascended the wall, and from thence leaped down, but his foot slipping he fell, and either broke his thigh, or dislocated his knee-pan; however it was, he was constrained to raise the siege, after having lain twenty-six days before the town, and to return, wounded as he was, without effecting any thing, to Athens. An unfortunate man was never welcome there! The whole city began to murmur, and Xanthippus the father of the famous Pericles accused him to the general assembly for deceiving b the Athenians, as Herodotus says; of treason, as Cornelius Nepos informs us; or rather of peculation, as Justin from Trogus Pompeius acquaints us, for that is much the most propable opinion, and for this he demanded that they should pass upon him sentence of death. The unhappy Miltiades was in no condition to defend himself; nature had already passed that judgment which his enemies sought; his wound perhaps through lowness of spirits had induced a mortification, so that he could not be moved out of his bed; his brother Tisagoras spoke for him; he represented to the Athenians that this Miltiades, who had failed in his last expedition, had saved Athens at Marathon, and had conquer'd for them the island of Lemnos; he therefore entreated them to remember his past services, as well as his present error, and to c pity him to whom they owed the power of deliberating, whether they would pity him or no. Having heard both parties, the people declared that he had not deserved capital punishment, but at the same time fined him fifty talents, which was the whole expence of the Parian expedition; and because he was unable to pay this great sum, they put him into goal, says Cornelius Nepos, where he died; but Herodotus says, that his son Cimon paid the fine, which is true, but not till after his father died in prison, himself being also sent thither on the same account, and remaining confined, till Callias furnished him with the money to pay his fine in lieu of his wife Elpinice, who was also his sister by the one side*. Such was the gratitude of the Athenians towards Miltiades and his family. If the nature of this work would have d allowed it, we should have digressed in favour of so great a man, who out of his passion for his country, quitted sovereignty to serve the Athenians; but considering that this manner of writing would protract the Athenian history exceedingly, we have contented ourselves with throwing into a note at the bottom of the page such circumstances relating to Miltiades as are necessary to be known (U).

Vol. II. N° 6.

6 C

THE

* HERODOT. ubi supra. * HERODOT. ubi supra. JUSTIN. ubi supra. CORNELIUS NEPOS in viz. Miltiad. & Cimon.

(U) The history of the family of Miltiades, and their becoming princes, is related by Herodotus; he says that the Thracian Doloncs inhabiting a part of Chersonesus, and having suffered much in a war against the Abynthians, sent to inquire of the oracle at Delphi whom they should elect king, to which they received for answer, that they should invite him to lead a colony into their country, who should first invite them into his house, after their leaving the temple in order to return home. Accordingly the Doloncs passing by the sacred way, through the territories of the Phocæans and the Bœotians, and receiving no offer of entertainment, turned into the road of Athens. In that time Pisistratus had indeed the supreme power, but Miltiades the son of Cypselus was not without authority in Athens, being of an illustrious family anciently descended from Æacus and Ægina, and afterwards established among the Athenians by Philaus the son of Ajax, the first of that blood that settled there. This Miltiades sitting before his gates, and seeing the Doloncs passing by clothed and armed in a different manner from the Athenians, called out to them, and upon their coming to him, desired they would be his guests, and accept the entertainment of his house. They accepted his invitation, and after they had been hospitably entertained acquainted him with the oracle, and requested him to act in conformity to the admonition of the god. Miltiades hearkened to their proposition, and complied with more readiness, because he grew impatient of the government of Pisistratus, and desired an opportunity to withdraw. In these sentiments he went to Delphi to consult the oracle, whether he should yield to the request of the Doloncs, and received an encouraging answer from the Pythian. Upon which Miltiades the son of Cypselus, who had formerly been victorious in the Olympian chariot-race, taking with him all such Athenians as were willing to join in his expedition, set sail with the Doloncs, and arriving in their country was invested with the sovereign power. The first thing he did was to build a wall upon the isthmus of Chersonesus, from the city of Cardia to that of Pentya in order to prevent the Abynthians from infecting the country for the future with their incursions; this isthmus is thirty-six stades in breadth; and the whole length of Chersonesus beginning in that place is four hundred and twenty stades. When Miltiades had built this wall on the neck of Chersonesus, and by that means excluded the Abynthians, he in the next place made war upon the Lampacians, and falling into an ambuscade, was taken alive by the enemy. Oteus king of Lydia being informed of this event, threatened the people of Lampacus with his displeasure, in case they did not release Miltiades, which they taking into considera-

The contests between Aristides and The-mistocles.

THE people of Athens being now released from all apprehensions of foreign war, a fell as usual into dissensions among themselves; they were divided on the old subject, whether all things should be in the power of the people, or whether the state should be governed only by the best. Aristides whom we have already often mention'd was at the head of one party, and Themistocles was chief of the other. It will be necessary to say something of the character of each of these great men, that the nature of their disputes, and the consequences of them with respect to the state may be the better known. Aristides was the son of Lyfimachus of the tribe of Antiochis, and ward of Alopece. Themistocles was the son of Neocles of the tribe of Leontes, by his mother's side a stranger, neither of them of any extraordinary family; Plutarch tells us that they were boys together, and that they were always at variance, not only in serious matters, but even in their sports and plays; nor could it well be otherwise, for Aristides is said by him to have been firm and steady in his behaviour, immovable in every thing that appeared just, and incapable of using the least falshood, flattery, or deceit, even in jest; whereas Themistocles was of an impetuous nature, full of spirit, subtle, daring, complaisant, and in fine one who could put on any appearance to carry his point; he spent even his times of recreation in study, and was wont to divert himself with composing orations, in which he either excused or accused some of his companions, whence his schoolmaster pronounced thus of him; Boy, thou wilt never prove an ordinary person, but will at some time or other become either a mighty blessing, or an outrageous curse to thy country. As they grew up, they differed still the more in their sentiments and conduct; Aristides studied the laws of Lycurgus, and by the reasoning of that great man, became a favourer of aristocracy. Themistocles, rather out of spleen to him than any other motive, favoured exceedingly the cause of the people; and thus childish quarrels ripening into a strong aversion in the breasts of two private men, created great disorders in a potent state, and shook the very constitution of Athens.

How much soever the dissensions, between Aristides and Themistocles might in fact injure the Athenian state, and how ready soever they might be to oppose each other, even in points where they were conscious that what they opposed was right,

² PLUT. & CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Aristid. & Them.

tion, and being afraid to disoblige so great a monarch, restored Miltiades to freedom. Thus having escaped by the means of Croesus, and afterwards dying without children, he left his dominion and riches to Stesagoras the son of Cimon, his brother by the same mother. The Chersonesians honour him with sacrifices, as the founder of their city, in the accustomed manner, having instituted gymnastic and equestrian exercises on that occasion, in which no Lampfacinian is permitted to contend for the prize. During the war which still continued against the people of Lampfacus, Stesagoras likewise died without children; being killed by the blow of an ax he received on the head from the hand of one who pretending to be a deserter, was indeed a most cruel enemy. After whose death the Pisistratide sent Miltiades the son of Cimon, and brother of Stesagoras to Chersonesus with one ship to take upon him the government, having been already favourable to him in Athens, as if they had not had any part in the murder of his father Cimon, who was assassinated by their order. Arriving in Chersonesus, he kept himself retired under colour of honouring the memory of his brother Stesagoras; which the Chersonesians hearing, the principal persons of every city assembled together, and coming to his house with intentions to condole with him, were all seized and imprisoned. By this means Miltiades made himself master of Chersonesus, entertained five hundred auxiliaries for his guard, and married Hegesypia daughter to Olerus king of Thrace. But he had not been long in possession, before he met with greater difficulties than he had yet experienced. For in the third year of his government he fled out of the country, nor daring to wait the coming of the Scythian Nomades, who having been irritated by the expedition of Darius, had assembled their forces, and advanced to the frontier of Chersonesus. Nevertheless upon the departure of the Scythians, he was again restored by the Dolones; and in the third year after this, hearing that the Phenicians were at Tenedus, he put all his riches on board five ships and sailed for Athens. The reader may possibly think this note very long, but there was a necessity for it since so eminent an author as Cornelius Nepos hath rendered the history of this great man unintelligible by confounding him with his grandfather, and attributing promiscuously the deeds of one to the other. As to his putting Lemnos into the hands of the Athenians, it happened thus: The inhabitants of that island having had long differences with the Athenians, and being admonished by the Delphian oracle to compromise them, they sent to Athens to know upon what terms it might be done; the Athenians offered them no other than the absolute surrender of their country, to which the Lemnian deputies answered, that they would obey when a ship from the Athenian dominions should come with a north wind in one day into a haven of Lemnos, which because Asia was situated to the south of Lemnos they conceived impossible; but Miltiades being possessed of the Chersonesus, and sailing from a port in the Hellaspont, arrived in one day at Lemnos, driven thither by a strong north wind, upon which he immediately demanded that the island should be given up to him, which partly through terror, partly by force, he obtained, and united it to the Athenian territories. As to the imprisonment of his son as well as himself, and the manner in which his fine was at last discharged, Cornelius Nepos expressly asserts it as delivered in our text, whereas the account given of it by Plutarch is neither clear nor consistent.

- a yet it must be owned that they sincerely loved their country, and were ashamed and sorry for the very things they did. Aristides was the honestest man of the two, and therefore the most frank. When Themistocles had one day proposed to the assembly of the people something much for their advantage, Aristides made a long oration against it, which so far misled the people, that they rejected what Themistocles had proposed. Aristides was however so much affected with what he had done, that when he went out of the assembly he could not help saying, The Athenians can never be perfectly safe till they have sent Themistocles and I to goal^a. We have before shewn how not only men in rank in Athens, but all Athenian citizens had seats in courts of judicature. As these rivals differed in every thing, so they were opposite
- b in their notions of what a man's duty was in such a station. Aristides conceived that he ought to be inflexibly upright, and to be void alike of affection and passion; whereas it was a common saying with Themistocles, God forbid that I should ever sit on a tribunal where my friends should not have more favour than strangers. Aristides's conduct was certainly the more laudable, and he piqued himself so much upon acting strictly up to the maxims he laid down, that he acquired the surname of just, and was looked upon as the most worthy and virtuous of the Athenians. Themistocles instead of repining rejoiced at this, for knowing well the nature of the people, he conceived it an easy thing to destroy a rival arrived at so high a reputation^b. The ostracism was already introduced into the Athenian state, though it is not certain by whom, some say by Pisistratus, or rather by his sons; others by Cleisthenes; but
- c this not being clear, we did not think fit to attribute it to him, or to mention the ostracism till we come to a particular instance of it. By this men eminent to such a degree, as to threaten the state with danger, were banished for ten years. Plutarch says this exile was not a punishment for any crime, but a kind of honourable retirement, used as the curb of too great power, and the remedy of the people, for those apprehensions with which they were so often taken. The method in which they proceeded to inflict the ostracism was this; every citizen took a piece of a broken pot or shell, on which having wrote the name of the person he would have banished, he carried it to a certain place of the market-place, which was inclosed with rails; then the magistrates began to count the number of the shells; for if they were less
- d than six thousand, the vote did not take place; but if they surpassed that number, they laid every name apart, and the man whose name was found on the greatest number of shells was of course exiled for ten years, with free leave however to make what use he thought fit of his estate (X)^c. It may seem strange that Themistocles could raise the popular resentment against a man amiable from peaceable virtues; yet he effected it by causing it to be whispered about, that Aristides having

^a PLUT. ubi supra.
Arist.

^b PLUT. in vit. Themist. CORN. NEPOS in vit. Arist.

^c PLUT. in vit.

(X) The ostracism makes so great a figure in all the Greek history, and occurs so often in that which we are now writing, that it is fit that we should give the reader a more particular account of it in a note, than we found it proper for us to do in the text. It derived its name from ostrakon, which signifies a tile, because at first the names of persons banished in this manner were wrote on pieces of tiles, or broken earthen vessels (66). Diodorus Siculus says, that such as were ejected from their country by the ostracism were not allowed to return in five years (67); but in this he is mistaken, for all writers agree that the time limited was ten years (68), and the time allowed him on whom this punishment fell to quit the Athenian territories was ten days (69). The fundamental rule of telling the gross number of the shells, and rendering the ostracism void, if they did not amount to six thousand, was a great point in favour of eminent persons, since in a city where there were not above 18 or 20,000 free citizens, it must have been a very difficult thing to engage a third part of them to enter upon such a design. It may seem strange that the author of so extraordinary a law as this, should not be known; and yet it is certain that about no historical point authors differ more. Ælian ascribes it to Cleisthenes beforementioned (70); Diodorus Siculus says it took place under the Pisistratida (71), and many are of that opinion besides him. For Plutarch reports that Hipparchus was banished under their administration (72). Heracidas fixes this general assertion to Hippias, whom he expressly declares the author of: this severe practice (73). Photius in his extracts from Prologus Hephæstius ascribes it to Achilles the son of Lyson (74); but Suidas, and Ensebius both set it far higher than the days of the commonwealth, viz. under the reign of Theseus. However uncertain its beginning is; there is no dispute, that it ended in the banishment of Hyperbolus. This practice Aristotle seems to ascribe to all the democracies of his time (75), and we are assured by various authors that the Argives, Milesians, Megarensians, and Syracusians had the same law, though under different titles, amongst them.

(66) Suidas Hesychius. (67) Biblioth. lib. xl. (68) Pollux, Plutarch. in vit. Arist. (69) Scholias. Aristophan. ad. Equis. (70) Var. Hist. lib. xiii c. 14. (71) Biblioth. lib. xi. (72) In vit. Nicias. (73) De Resp. (74) Biblioth. lib. vi. (75) Polit. lib. iii. c. 13.

assumed

assumed the name of just, and acting frequently as an umpire between contending parties, had insensibly erected a monarchy, though without pomp or guards; for what (said the agents of Themistocles) constitutes a tyrant but giving laws? On a sudden, and when it was least expected, citizens and countrymen flocked to the forum, and demanded the ostracism. One of the clowns from a borough in Attica, who could neither write nor read, brought his shell to Aristides, and said, Write me Aristides upon this. Aristides, surprized, asked him if he knew any ill of that Athenian, or if he had ever done him hurt. Me burt! (said the fellow) no, I don't so much as know him, but I am weary and sick at heart on hearing him every where called the just. Aristides therefore took the shell, and wrote his own name upon it. This was certainly a strong proof of his firmness of mind, but he gave yet a greater. When the magistrates signified to him that the ostracism fell upon him, he retired modestly out of the forum, and as he went out he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, I beseech the Gods, that the Athenians may never see that day which shall force them to remember Aristides ^f.

THE war against the inhabitants of Ægina revived after the battle of Marathon, and was carried on by both parties with great animosity; the nobles and their party had fallen upon the remains of Nicodromus's party, and put many of them to death with such circumstances, as not only irritated the exiles, but made many of their own citizens uneasy. The Athenians had revenged the death of their confederates in several expeditions, but the inhabitants of Ægina had in their turn done the subjects of Athens considerable damage, which was entirely owing to their great power at sea, their fleets being more numerous, and their ships better than their neighbours. Themistocles considering this, continually exhorted the Athenians to observe and weigh it in their minds. He also gave them to understand, that in his opinion the Persian war was so far from being ended that it was but begun, because it was unreasonable to suppose that Xerxes, who succeeded his father in his empire, would not also succeed him in his hatred to the Grecians, from whom the honour of his empire had suffered so much. Having often insisted on these topics, he had at last the boldness to move that the money produced by the silver mines, which hitherto the Athenians had divided amongst themselves, should be applied to building ships, with which, being thoroughly possessed of the nature of the thing, they complied, and a hundred galleys were immediately put upon the stocks; and this sudden increase of the Athenian fleet, with their addicting themselves continually afterwards to maritime affairs, proved the means of preserving, not only Athens, but all Greece in the enjoyment of its liberties, as Themistocles rightly foresaw it would ^e.

The Greeks prepare to resist
the Persians.

By this time, that is, about three years after the banishment of Aristides, the Athenians found that Themistocles had spoke the truth, where he affirmed that the Persian war, instead of being ended, was but just begun; for Xerxes after having made prodigious preparations for the total conquest of Greece, sent messengers with a Greek interpreter to its several republics to demand Earth and Water. Themistocles desiring to make the breach still wider between these two nations, engaged the Athenians to seize the interpreter, and put him to death, for presuming to publish the decrees of the king of Persia in the language of the Greeks. This act of levity was followed by another; one Artabimus of Zele a town in Troas had settled at Athens, and had an half freedom granted him; this man having received large sums of money from the king of Persia, endeavoured to corrupt some of the principal persons of the city therewith, for which Themistocles procured him to be banished Attica by sound of trumpet, and his family to be degraded. Lastly with the assistance of Chilon the Arcadian, he engaged the several states of Greece to lay aside their quarrels, and provide for their mutual defence ^h.

WHEN it came to be debated who should be appointed the general of the Athenians, in case the Persians should invade them, one Epicycles a great orator, but a man otherwise little capable of the charge, influenced the people so much by his speeches, that it was generally believed he would be elected to that important office. Themistocles seeing the danger of his country, and knowing the man to be covetous, strained his own circumstances and bought him off. By engaging him to desist, he made way for his own election, for there was no body then left capable of contending with him, so he was presently elected ⁱ.

^f PLUTARCH. & CORN. NEPOS in vit. Arist. & Themist. ^e HERODOT. lib. vii. PLUT. in Themist.
^h ÆSCHIN. cont. Ctesiph. PLUT. in vit. Themist. ⁱ PLUTARCH. in vit. Themist.

^a WHEN news came to Athens that the Persians were upon the point of invading Greece by the streights of Thermopylae, and that to this end they were transporting their forces by sea, Themistocles advised his countrymen to quit their city, embark on board their galleys, and go and meet their Enemies, yet at a distance; to this they would by no means yield. He then put himself at the head of their army, and having join'd the Lacedemonians marched towards Tempe. But when advice came that the streights of Thermopylae were forced, and not only Thessaly, but Boeotia had yielded to the Persians, the army returned without effecting any thing^k.

^b THE Athenians in this distress sent messengers to the Delphian Apollo, who on their arrival having performed the usual ceremonies, sat down in the sanctuary, and there received from Aristronica, who was that at time priestess, the following oracle.

Fly to the farthest regions of the earth,
Unhappy men, and shun th' impending ill.
Fly from your houses, and desert your walls;
For total ruin shall subvert that place.
An angry Mars in Asia born shall come,
And all your stately piles, and temples burn.
I see the sacred walls trembling for fear,
The lofty roofs cover'd with sweat and blood.
Depart, and be prepared to bear your fate^l.

^c THE Athenian deputies were extremely amazed at this answer, they therefore humbled themselves in a most extraordinary manner before the god, holding olive branches in their hands, beseeching a better answer, or vowing to remain in the temple till they died. The priestess feeling herself a second time inspired, delivered at length the following response:

Pallas in vain has used her utmost art,
To pacify the wrath of angry Jove.
So that my present answer must again
Of almost adamantin hardness be.
Yet for Minerva's sake the god will give
A safe protection under walls of wood
To all that lies contained within the bounds
Of Cecrops, or Citheron's sacred hills.
These, these alone impregnable shall prove,
But never stay to fight the dreadful troops
Of horse and foot, advancing thro' the plains:
If e'er you see them, save yourselves by flight,
The divine Salamis shall lose her sons;
Tho' Ceres be brought home, or left abroad^m.

^e THE Athenian deputies having wrote down this answer brought it away, and produced it to the general assembly at Athens, where the people were mightily divided about its true sense and meaning, many were of opinion that by walls of wood the citadel was to be understood, because, as we observed before, it was palisadoed, but others imagined that it could intend nothing but ships, and therefore advised their countrymen to place all their hopes in their fleet; but the maintainers of the former opinion urged against such as supported the latter, that the two last lines of the oracle were directly against them, and that they without question portended the destruction of the Athenian fleet near Salamis. Themistocles however declared for trusting in the fleet, and in answer to what was urged from the last lines of the oracle, alledged, that, if the oracle had intended to foretel the destruction of the Athenians, she would not have called it the divine Salamis, but the unhappy; and that whereas the unfortunate in that oracle were stiled the sons of women, it could mean no other than the Persians who were scandalously effeminate. All discreet people concurred in their sentiments that Themistocles had most judiciously interpreted the the oracle, and that the Athenians could only hope for freedom by following his advice. ^f The many however had much ado to be reconciled thereto; the leaving their country and estates bore hard upon them; their forsaking their houses and employments still harder; their leaving the tombs of their ancestors and the temple of their gods hardest of all. But Themistocles had a set of arguments in store for them, he made the very notions which would have kept them, contribute to drive them away; for having drawn over a the priests who attended in the temple of Minerva, he caused them to give out that the dragon refused to eat, that the offerings set before him were found untouch'd, that at last it disappear'd, so that without doubt the goddess had quitted the city, and taken her flight before them towards the sea. By degrees the populace were so intoxicated with these pious frauds, that they made no manner of question of the Persians being defeated, and that Salamis would be the place. They therefore decreed that the city should be recommended to the protection of Minerva, that all such as were of age to bear arms should embark on board the fleet, and that all possible care should be taken for the preservation of children, women, and slaves. One Cyrillus an orator vehemently opposed the decree, he urged all the common^b topics of love to the place of one's birth, and affection for wives and helpless infants; but the Athenians conceiving that the falling in with his proposition would betray a mean desire of preserving life, tho' at the expence of liberty, stoned him in the midst of his discourse, and the women, to shew how little they relished such arguments, and how far they were for desiring that the cause of Greece should suffer from them, stoned his wife. And thus Themistocles not only perswaded his countrymen to do what he conceived was expedient for their safety, but even infused into them the same spirit with which he himself acted^a.

^k Id. ib.

^l HERODOT. ubi supra.

^m HERODOT. ubi supra.

The Athenians
quit their city.

When they began to prepare for this extraordinary embarkation, they had recourse^c to the council of Areopagus, who, from funds to us unknown, distributed eight drachms to every man who went on board; but this sum not being sufficient, Themistocles with his usual quickness devised an expedient for furnishing the rest of the money. He gave out that in the present hurry somebody had stolen from the statue of Minerva her shield, whereon the head of Medusa was engraven, and having authority granted him to search for it, under colour of this he took away all the money he could lay his hands on, and applied it to the use of the public. The people in this their great distress, began to lament the loss of Aristides, and to express their apprehensions, lest he, to revenge himself of the ingratitude of his country, should^d go over to the Persians. Themistocles thereupon proposed a decree, that all who were banished might return again in order to assist the Greeks with their counsels^e and persons; thus he who, had been banished by the artifices of Themistocles, was recalled by his virtue. Aristides, on his return, behaved himself with more than ordinary civility to Themistocles, and did not suffer any aversion to that general's person to influence him in his conduct as to public affairs^f (Y).

NOTWITHSTANDING the Athenian fleet was superior to that sent by any of the confederates, nay to all the rest of the fleet taken together, yet such was the power of the Lacedemonians, that the command thereof was committed to Eurybiades a Spartan, a man either unskilful, or wanting fortitude enough for such an undertaking;

^a PLUTARCH. in vit. Aristid.

^c Id. ib.

^f (Y) At the same time that the Greeks thought of defending the pass of Thermopyla by land, they sent a fleet to hinder the passage of the Persian navy through the streights of Eubœa, which fleet rendezvoused at Artemisium. We have taken no notice of this in the text, because we shall be obliged to enter into a detail of this matter elsewhere; but inasmuch as the Athenians sent a squadron of ships, and on board them Themistocles, to this place, we are obliged to take some notice of his conduct here. The Eubœans, not being able to prevail with Eurybiades to remain on their coast till they could carry off their wives and children, addressed themselves to Themistocles, and made him a present of thirty talents. He took the money; with five talents he bribed Eurybiades. Then Adiamantus the Corinthian being the only commander who insisted on weighing anchor, Themistocles went on board him, and told him in few words; Adiamantus, you shall not abandon us, for I will give you a greater present for doing your duty than the king of the Medes would send you for deserting the allies. Which he performed by sending him three talents on board. Thus he did what the Eubœans requested, and put 22 talents into his pocket. In the succeeding engagement Themistocles and all the Athenians behaved with extraordinary bravery, for which they received the applause of all Greeks. At length, when it was thought necessary to retire from Artemisium, Themistocles caused certain stones to be set up in all the ports, with inscriptions, intreating the Ionians either to desert the Barbarians and join the Greeks, who were fighting for their liberty, or at least to act but faintly in the cause of their master, remembering that they were originally Greeks themselves, and that this very quarrel began on account of the assistance given by the Greeks to them. This he did with double intent, first to influence the Ionians to act as he desired; secondly to give the Persian monarch a jealousy of them, that he might be the less inclined to trust those in whose power it was to do him most service, since the Ionians were by far the best seamen in his fleet (76).

(76) Herodotus. lib. vii.

a for he, when danger approached, was for standing away for the gulph of Corinth in order to join the land army; which when Themistocles vehemently opposed, Eurybiades was pleased to say, Such as rise up before the rest at the olympic games are lashed. To which the Athenian wisely answered, But they that are left behind are never crown'd. Eurybiades at this lifting up his baton, as if he would have struck him, Themistocles cried out, Ay, strike if you will, but hear me; upon which Eurybiades laid down his staff, and patiently attended to his discourse. One of the Lacedemonians however, who had not so much sense as the admiral, replied to Themistocles's oration, that it did not become such as had neither house nor home of their own to endeavour to prejudice others by hindering them from returning to their habitations. Themistocles taking fire at this, said “ We have indeed, base fellow, b “ left our houses and our walls, not thinking it fit to become slaves, for the sake “ of those things that have neither life nor soul, and yet our city is the greatest of “ all Greece, as consisting of two hundred galleys, which are here to defend you, “ if you please; but if you run away and leave us, as you did once before, the “ Greeks will soon perceive that the Athenians can find for themselves as fair a coun“ try, and as large and free a city, as that they have left”. In a word, he took such pains to demonstrate to this assembly, and to the general in particular, that it would be madness to think of fighting any-where but where they were, that the wisest of the Grecian captains concurred with him. The chief of his argu-
c ments were these; he shewed them that, if once they retired from Salamis, the fleet would never fight at all, because being made up of quota's from different states, the several squadrons would immediately sail back to their own ports, and leave the common cause of Greece without defence; that fighting before the isthmus, which was the scheme of the opposite party, would be attended with two dreadful consequences; the one that Salamis and Ægina, with all the women and children in them, would be abandoned to the enemy; the other, that with a small fleet they would be obliged to engage a very great one, and that in an open sea; that on the contrary, if they fought in the channel of Salamis the Persians would not have near so great an advantage from the number of their ships, because the front of the line would d be on both sides nearly equal, that fighting here would effectually save Peloponnesus, whereas retiring to the coast thereof would withdraw the Persians thither, and induce all those consequences which those that proposed it sought to shun. As to the wall built cross the isthmus, upon which some depended, he shewed that it was a foolish and ridiculous defence, in case they yielded the superiority of the sea to the Barbarians, who would then make their descents on every side of it without being obliged to force the wall at all. These arguments, with the dread Eurybiades was in, that, in case he took other measures, the Athenians would desert him, and sail to Italy, as Themistocles had hinted, engaged that general to declare for fighting, and in this resolution they remained for some time.

THE courage of the Athenians on this occasion can never be enough commended, e since the chief cause of that fear which spread itself among the rest of the Greeks, was the miserable destruction of the city of Athens. We have already given so full an account of this matter of the Persian history, that there is no necessity of repeating it here. We shall content ourselves with noting two or three things, which will illustrate the history now before us. Such of the Athenians as had fled to the Acropolis or citadel, out of a fond opinion that it was the place pointed at by the oracle, were all put to the sword. The Persians, with whom the descendants of Pisistratus returned, shewed no mercy to such as obstinately refused to submit themselves again to their obedience. As to pillaging the temples, and setting fire to all the sacred things which gave such high offence to the Greeks, these were not so properly f to be ascribed to the barbarity of their enemies, as to their zeal; for we have shewn before that the Persians were deists in the strictest sense, and looked upon temples, images and altars, as they were the marks of polytheism to be so many indignities offered to the Supreme Being, which was the cause that they destroyed them without pity, as their resentment of the injuries done them by the states of Athens engaged them to shew no mercy to such of its people as fell into their hands.

WHEN Xerxes drew down all his land-forces to the sea-side, and at the same time caused his fleet to approach that of the Greeks, the Peloponnesians who were in that Debates amongst the generals of the Greeks.

navy, fell again into their old opinion of leaving all to preserve Peloponnesus from being ravaged. To this end a council of war was summoned, for their murmurs ran so high, that Eurybiades was afraid of their deserting; in this council their opinion prevailed, for they would neither listen to arguments, nor pay any respect to authority. Themistocles therefore, seeing his opinion set aside by the Peloponnesians resolved to take measures for forcing them to stay; for, as Herodotus informs us, withdrawing privately from the assembly, he sent away a man to the enemy's fleet in a small vessel, properly instructed; the name of this man was Sicinus, he was tutor to Themistocles's children, and every way capable of being made the instrument of great things. When he arrived in the Persian fleet, he was conducted to their council b of general officers, to whom he delivered the following message, as from Themistocles. "The general of the Athenians, who is in the interest of the king, and desires your affairs may prosper, rather than those of Greece, has sent me privately away with orders to let you know, that the Grecians in great consternation have determined to betake themselves to flight, and that you have now an opportunity of achieving the most glorious of all enterprizes, unless your negligence opens a way to their escape. For being divided in their opinions, they will not oppose your forces; but you will see those who are your friends fighting against those who are not of your party". This message had its desired effect, the Persians conceived, not without some show of reason, that the Athenians finding it to no purpose any longer to oppose the great king, were resolved by this piece of intelligence to make their peace with him at once, and thereby procure their city and country to be restored^a. They therefore made all the preparations necessary for shutting up the Grecian navy, and reckoned already that they were so many prizes, and that they now should regain their honour, and compensate themselves for the loss which they had sustained at Artemisium. Aristides was the first who perceived what the Persians aimed at; he immediately went to Themistocles, and when they were alone, he addressed him, if we may believe Plutarch, who in the mean time is supported by Herodotus in these terms: "If we are wise, Themistocles, we shall now for ever lay aside that vain and childish contention that has hitherto been between us, and begin a more safe and honourable emulation, by contending which of us two shall do most towards the safety of Greece; you by performing the part of a wise and great general, and I by obeying and assisting you with my person and advice. I understand that you alone have determined rightly, advising to engage in the streights without delay. Your allies are of a different opinion, but the enemies themselves seem to confirm and strengthen your advice; for the sea all round us is covered and shut up by their fleet, so that they who have opposed coming to an engagement must be forced to fight, and shew themselves men of courage, there being no room left for flight". To this Themistocles replied, "I am ashamed, Aristides, at your having got the start of me in this noble emulation; I shall use my utmost endeavours to outdo this beginning, which is so much to your honour, and to obscure, if possible, this glorious step of yours by the lustre of my future actions". At the same time Themistocles acquainted him with the stratagem made use of to compel the enemy to take the measures they did, and which in fact compelled also the Grecians to take those which were most advisable for their own interest, and to which he had so often pressed them, though to little purpose. Thus ended the interview between these two rivals for reputation, whose new cemented friendship proved of the utmost consequence to the cause of Athens and of Greece^c.

The battle of Salamis.
Year after the
flood 2519.
Before Christ
490.

THE detail of the battle of Salamis is unnecessary here, since the reader has met with it before in our account of the Persian affairs. We shall therefore content ourselves with observing that the Athenians reaped the highest honour from their behaviour on that remarkable occasion, though Herodotus is for bestowing the palm on the inhabitants of Ægina. We have more than once noted, that till Themistocles persuaded the Athenians to apply themselves to maritime affairs, the people of this little isle were lords of the sea. It is not therefore to be wondered that their long experience enabled them to perform great things in a sea fight, of which the Persian emperor was a spectator in person, and on the event of which their own liberty and that of all their confederates depended. The Athenians, after the Persian fleet was a once broke, drove their scattered ships towards the coast of Attica. The Squadron of Ægina stretching out to sea, got on the other side of the flying Persians, and sunk many of those vessels which out sailed the Athenians. Thus the skill and conduct of these two nations preserved all their confederates, and not only carried away victory from the prodigious fleet of their enemies, but likewise obliged the Persians to account it a great happiness, if after this extraordinary defeat they preserved any part of that navy, which had so lately darkened the coasts, and struck a panic through Greece.

^a HERODOT. lib. viii.

^c PLUTARCH. in vit. Aristid.

b THE morning after the battle of Salamis, the Greeks perceiving the enemies land-forces still encamped in the same place, conjectured that their fleet was retired into the Phalerum, one of the ports of Athens; but they were mistaken, for Xerxes had given orders that they should sail with the utmost diligence to the Hellepont, while himself with his land-forces pretended to throw up an artificial isthmus in order to unite the island of Salamis to the continent of Attica. The Greeks in the mean time were for pursuing the Persian fleet in hopes of taking straggling ships in order to increase their booty; but coming to Andros without discovering any of the enemy's ships, they there called a council of war, in which Themistocles gave it as his opinion, that they should shape their pursuit by the way of the islands, and make all the sail they could for the Hellepont, in order to destroy the bridge which Xerxes had thrown over it, and thereby cut off that monarch's communication with Asia. Plutarch says that he communicated his sentiments to Aristides, who opposed it; c but Herodotus, with greater probability, ascribes this opposition to Eurybiades. That Themistocles communicated his sentiments to Aristides might be, but that he informed Eurybiades of them is morally certain, because he commanded in chief. It is therefore more likely, that he and not Aristides opposed the carrying them into execution, because he thought that shutting Xerxes into Europe with such a mighty army, would be to compel him to repair his former omissions, and to exert himself with vigour against the Greeks. When Themistocles perceived that this reasoning prevailed, and that the Grecian chieftants were like to come into it unanimously, he formed another scheme, which Plutarch says he likewise communicated to Aristides, and that was this; he sent a trusty messenger to Xerxes to inform him that the d Greeks intended to break down his bridge over the Hellepont; wherefore he advised him to march back with the utmost speed, promising to delay as much as he was able the intended project of his countrymen. Herodotus says that he actually advised the Athenians to give over the pursuit, in order to return to their country and rebuild their houses, into which they readily gave, as it was natural for people to wish for a quiet retreat, after having so long endured so violent a tempest; but at the same time our author intimates, that Themistocles had in view the safety of the Persians, and not the interest of the Athenians, which he attributes to his foresight of following misfortunes, and his willingness to secure an asylum, when the envy of his countrymen should doom him to banishment. These sort of censures are the tribute paid by the great for the lustre of their actions. Whether Themistocles really intended his country ill or no is what none can tell; that he generally meant its good is universally allowed, and that this advice suited his scheme of making Xerxes of his own accord abandon the war in Greece, is plain from the nature of the thing. It is hard therefore to tarnish his glory by receiving such insinuations, and we had better suppose that he did not foresee his disgrace, than by a conjectural magnifying of his prudence diminish the reputation he acquired as a true patriot.

Herodotus relates another thing of Themistocles; he says that while the Grecian fleet and army were employed in besieging Andros, this general sent to Paros and other islands, and threatening the inhabitants of them that the Greeks would invade their country, extorted from them vast sums of money, which he insinuates he applied to his own private use. Plutarch relates another passage, which must have happened pretty near this time, viz. that when the Grecian fleet was arrived at Pegasa, a maritime town of Magnesia, where it wintered, Themistocles made an oration to his countrymen, in which he declared that he had it in his mind to do something which would prove of infinite consequence to Athens; but that it was of such a nature, that he could not communicate it to the assembly. Upon this the Athenians directed him to communicate it to Aristides only; and in case he approved it to put it in practice. When therefore these great men were alone, Themistocles discovered in few that his scheme was to burn the rest of the Grecian fleet, which would leave Athens mistress of the seas. Aristides made his report to the people that what Themistocles intended was indeed the most advantageous thing that could possibly happen to them, but at the same time it was the most unjust; upon which they readily directed him to think no more of it, esteeming it far better to sacrifice their interest to their fame, than for the sake of present advantage, how great soever it were, to hazard the censure of succeeding ages, and the stain of infamy never to be blotted out.

*HERODOT. ubi suprs. PLUTARCH, in vit. Themist.

WHEN the fleet was returned to Salamis, and the booty was divided amongst all who had served on board, the Greeks resolved to sail to the isthmus in order to confer there the customary honours on him, who by the free votes of their chiefs had deserved best, and these being assembled in the temple of Neptune, and directed to write down his own in the first place, and the name of Themistocles in the second, whereby, without designing it, they unanimously proclaimed him the most worthy of the Greeks. From thence he went to Lacedemon, where he was received with the greatest honour and respect, and the Spartans, partial as they were to their own countrymen, after decreeing the prize of valour to Eurybiades, assigned that of prudence to Themistocles, and crowned him with a wreath of olive; they presented him also with the most magnificent chariot in Sparta, and when he returned to Athens he was escorted by five-hundred horse, an honour never paid to any stranger but him.

The Persians
attempt to treat with the Athenians.

ON Themistocles's coming back to Athens, there were not wanting some who endeavoured to insinuate that his receiving such high honours from the Lacedemonians was injurious to his country; but he, confiding in his innocence, treated these clamours with contempt, and contented himself with exhorting the people, not to entertain any doubts of their confederates, but to be careful in maintaining the mighty reputation they had acquired, and the respect paid them by all the states of Greece. About this time some of the families of the Athenians returned from Salamis to Trezenne, where they had taken refuge while the Persians ravaged Attica; the former belonged to the Athenians, but the latter was free. They gave however a very kind reception to the women and children committed to their charge, they appointed them a maintenance out of their public funds, and paid also the best school-masters they could find for taking care of their youth; such a high regard had the generosity of the Athenians in abandoning all for the sake of liberty drawn from every state in Greece. The Persians themselves were no less ready in preferring them to all the Greeks. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had left to command the army, destined for carrying on the war, chose to treat with the Athenians rather than to fight with them; to this end he made use of Alexander king of Macedon, a person well known, and highly respected at Athens. Him, as a tributary and ally of the Persian king, he sent to make proposals of peace, not in his own name, but in that of his master. When he arrived, the Athenians entertained him like a friend, but delayed giving him audience from a foresight, that the Lacedemonians would not be long after hearing this news before they sent ambassadors, which accordingly came to pass. They then appointed a day for Alexander to have audience of the people, on which, as Herodotus informs us, he spoke to this purpose: " Athenians, I am sent by Mardonius to tell you, that he has received a message from the king in these words: " I forgive the Athenians all the injuries they have done me, and therefore, Mardonius, observe the following orders: Reinstatethem in the possession of their own territories; give them moreover whatever other country they shall chuse; let them govern by their own laws, and rebuild all their temples which I have burnt, if they will come to an agreement with me. Having received these orders, I am obliged to put them in execution, unless you prevent me; and now I myself would ask you what madness pushes you on to make war against a king you will never conquer, nor always be able to resist? You are not ignorant of the numerous forces and great actions of Xerxes; you have heard of the army I have, and if you should happen to be victorious, and to defeat us, which you can never hope so long as you have the use of reason; another much more powerful will come against you; suffer not yourselves then to be dispossessed of your country, and continually alarmed for your own lives, by measuring your strength with the king;

- a " king; but be reconciled to him, since you have now so favourable an opportunity in your hands from the present disposition of Xerxes. Enter therefore into an alliance with us sincerely, and without fraud, and continue to be a free people. These, O Athenians, are the words which Mardonius ordered me to say to you: For my own part, I shall not mention my constant affection to your state, because you have had sufficient proof of that in former time. I beseech you then, hearken to the counsel of Mardonius; for I see you will not always be able to make war against Xerxes. Had I not known this, I should never have undertaken to bring you such a message; but the king's power is incomparably greater than that of all other mortals, and his reach so extensive, that unless
- b " you immediately accept the favourable conditions he offers, I dread the consequences to you, who, lying in the way of danger more than any other of the confederates, and possessing a country placed as a prize between the contending parties, must be always most exposed to ruin. Let these reasons prevail with you, and consider the important advantages you will receive, if the great king forgives you alone among all the Grecians, and becomes your friend". The Lacedemonian ambassadors spoke in their turns, as soon as Alexander had made an end of his oration; they said that they were commissioned to exhort the Athenians not to listen to the proposals of the Barbarians, because it was a thing unreasonable on many accounts; First, because the original quarrel was between the Persians and
- c Athenians, into which the rest of the Greeks were drawn, merely through their respect to them: Secondly, that the Athenians were always wont to be the foremost in the cause of liberty, which it would not become them now to desert: Thirdly, that there were no grounds to believe the Persians would observe any terms with a people they so much hated, when occasion would serve; that the Spartans were exceedingly grieved for their misfortunes, and as a mark of their regard would in conjunction with their allies take care of their wives and children, till this war was at an end, and give them what other assistance was in their power. The Athenians having deliberated on this proposition, answered first that of Alexander. They said they were well acquainted with the great power of the king, but that they were also well assured
- d of the justice of their own cause; that as long as the sun and moon endured they would never desert the cause of Greece, nor forget the injuries done them by the Persians. To the Lacedemonians they answered they were sorry they should conceive so meanly of them, as to think they would ever compare interest with glory; that they would continue firm to their confederates without being a burden to them; but that it being probable Mardonius would be ready for action in the spring, they hoped the Lacedemonians would think it more reasonable to meet him with united forces in Beotia, than to suffer him to ravage Attica again¹.

WHAT the Athenians foresaw came exactly to pass; Mardonius, according to the orders of his master, marched directly into Attica, and began to waste and plunder the country, levelling even the ruins of ancient buildings, and throwing to the ground such as the Athenians had either erected or repaired. He proceeded to Athens, which its inhabitants were forced a second time to abandon, the Spartans sending help so slowly, that the enemy arrived long before their confederates, so that the Athenians were constrained to retire with their families to Salamis, and to send the army which they had raised under the command of Aristides, to join that of the Spartans and other states of Greece, which under the conduct of Pausanias, tutor of king Leonidas, was preparing to resist the Persians. This army soon after advanced into Beotia, where they fought the famous battle of Plataea, in which they made a far greater slaughter of the Persians than they had ever done before. It would be foreign to our present purpose to say any thing more of this battle here, because it was fought out of the territory of Athens, and the Lacedemonians had the supreme command. It will be necessary however to observe, that Aristides, with the body of troops under his command, behaved with such bravery and resolution, as procured him the praise of all the Greeks who were their cotemporaries, and hath transmitted their fame both for valour and prudence, even to this far distant age. The same day that the battle of Plataea was fought in Greece, the Persians were also defeated at Mycale in Ionia. The Grecian fleet consisted of two hundred and fifty galleys under the command of Leutychides the Lacedemonian, and Xanxbippus the Athenian.

Athens a second time destroyed.

Year after the flood 2521. Before Christ 478.

¹ HERODOT. ubi supra. PLUTARCH. in vit. Aristid. & Themist. JUSTIN. lib. ii.

It is universally allowed that the Athenians behaved better than any of the rest of a the Grecians in this engagement, of whom, Herodotus says, that Harmelycus the son of Euthoinus, a famous wrestler, deserved the first place. When they had defeated the Persian navy, the Greeks had the boldness to land and to attack the forces they found on shore, whom having also routed, they plundered all the country, and carried off an immense booty. Having done this they sailed to Samos, where it was debated in their council, whether or no it would be fit to transport the Ionians into Greece, and leave Ionis to the Barbarians, since it would be very difficult, if not impracticable for the Athenians, or indeed for the rest of the confederates, to assist them at all times, and in case they were not protected, their present revolt might prove fatal to them. It was likewise proposed in case they were transported to Greece, to give them the territories of such Greek states as had in this war sided with the Persians; but after all the Athenians changed their minds, and shewed a visible reluctance, when this design should have been put in execution. They were apprehensive that if the Ionians were transported into Greece, they would rival them in point of trade, or at least throw off that obedience and respect which hitherto they had paid Athens as their mother city and constant protectress. They were likewise uneasy at the Peloponnesians interfering in matters relating to their colonies, and as the Athenians were at this time the state of greatest consequence in Greece, their confederates thought it necessary to satisfy them by their particular condescension in this point, and therefore, after promising the Ionians such assistance c as they should have occasion for from time to time, the fleet left their coast. The Lacedemonians sailed back to Laconia, but the Athenians, under the command of Xanthippus, resolved to make some farther attempts before they quitted these seas *.

The strong fortress of Sestos taken.

THIS resolution being taken, the Athenians crossed over to the Chersonesus and besieged Sestos. It was a strong place, and had a great garrison under the command of Artayctes a Persian, whom Herodotus represents as a man of very dissolute morals. The siege was long and troublesome, and autumn drawing on, the Athenians were very desirous of returning home, but their general Xanthippus declared that he would not depart till he had either taken Sestos, or was recalled by a decree of the Athenian people, because Artayctes had been guilty of sacrilege in rifling the sepulchre of Protesilaus, and taking thence a vast sum of money. At last the garrison being pressed with hunger, and having no hopes of relief, resolved to shift for themselves, and accordingly made their escape in two parties, the one led by Oibazus, the other by Artayctes; Oibazus and his party were overtaken by the Thracians, who, after surrounding him and his guards, killed most of them, and took the rest of his family prisoners; after which they sacrificed him to Plistorus a Thracian god, and put the rest of their captives to the sword. The Athenians, as soon as they were masters of the place, sent out detachments to scour the country, and one of these coming up with Artayctes and his corps of troops near the river Ægos, engaged, routed them, and made him and his son prisoners. When they were brought back to Sestos and put under a guard, Herodotus relates a very extraordinary prodigy, which he attributes to the sacrilege beforementioned. He says that one of the Athenian soldiers, to whose custody this Persian general was committed, broiling some dried fish, saw them leap upon the coals, as if they had been just taken out of the water, upon which Artayctes addressed himself to him in these words; “Athenian friend, be not afraid, you are not at all concerned in this prodigy. Protesilaus, though dead and embalmed at Eleus, admonishes me, by this sign, that the gods have given him power to revenge the injury he has received: Resolving therefore to make him reparation I will consecrate a hundred talents to his divinity, instead of the riches I took out of his temples; and I will give two hundred talents to the Athenians, if they will spare my life, and the life of my son.” But their general Xanthippus would not be persuaded by these promises, partly because he himself was averse to the thing, and partly because the people of Eleus, to avenge the injuries done to Protesilaus earnestly solicited him that Artayctes might be put to death. Having therefore conducted him to that part of the shore, where the bridges of Xerxes terminated, or, as others say, to an eminence standing near the city of Madytrus, they caused him to be impaled on a stake fixed in the ground for that purpose, and at the same time stoned his son before ^a his eyes. When the Athenians had done these things, they returned with their fleet to Greece, carrying besides other riches all the materials of the bridges, in order to be consecrated in their temples, and nothing more was done that year¹ (Z).

THE victories of Plataea and Mycalæ sealed the freedom of Greece, and particularly eased the Athenians of their apprehensions; they therefore brought back all their families into Attica, and began to think of rebuilding their city, not only with the utmost expedition, but also with some degree of magnificence². The people were more elate than ever, they were conscious of the mighty share they had in driving the Barbarians back into Asia, and were therefore resolved to preserve that freedom uninvaded by citizens, for which they had so warmly contended against strangers. Themistocles, who was always for a popular government, encouraged them in these expectations, and Aristides having thoroughly considered the genius of his countrymen, thought it would be better to concede to them freely what they so much desired, than to hazard new disturbances by the rising up of different factions. He therefore proposed that every citizen should have an equal right to the government, and that the archons should be chosen out of the body of the people without preference or distinction; with this the commons were satisfied, and the men of figure were also contented³. Themistocles proposed also at this time that Athens should be instantly fortified in the best manner possible to prevent the misfortunes which they had lately sustained by the sudden invasions of the Persians. He had other views than this, ^c but they were not then ripe for discovery, so he contented himself with moving that first which was first to be put into execution. The Lacedemonians, as soon as they received this news, were exceedingly alarmed: they had been hitherto the principal people in Greece, and were of consequence, very jealous of a rival. They therefore sent ambassadors to Athens, who on their arrival declared to the assembly, that the Spartans having nothing in view but the general good of Greece, could not avoid remonstrating against the proceedings of the Athenians in fortifying their city, since it was clear to them, that this measure must prove very disadvantageous to their confederates, because if the Persians should again make an irruption into Attica with the same success as before, and possess themselves of a fortified city, they would ^d make use of it as a bridle on Greece, and fill it with such a garrison as would render it inexpugnable. These arguments seeming to have no great weight with those to whom they were urged, the Spartan ambassadors proceeded to exert an authority, which had been admitted in other Grecian cities, that is, they absolutely forbid the Athenians to carry their walls any higher. The people infinitely offended at this, and at the same time doubtful how it might be remedied, listened readily to Themistocles's advice, which was to the following effect: He said, that considering their own imbecillity, and the power of Sparta, they were in this case to make use rather of prudence than prowess. That to free themselves from the Lacedemonian ambassadors, who were but a kind of spies, they should promise not to proceed any farther in walling their city, till by an embassy of their own they should give satisfaction to ^e Lacedemon and the rest of their allies. He then offered to go himself at the head of that embassy, and undertook to bring all things to a happy conclusion⁴.

¹ HERODOT. ubi supra. DIOD. SICUL. lib. xi. ² DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xi. c. 5. ³ PLUTARCH. in vit. Aristid. ⁴ DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra.

(Z) The story of Arctylus's sacrilege we have from Herodotus, who relates it thus: "The government of the whole province was in the hands of Arctylus, a person of profligate and detestable manners who had been placed in that station by Xerxes, and by imposing a fraud upon him, when he marched to Athens, he rifled the treasures of Proteus, the son of Iphicles, which were at Eleus. For the city of Eleus in Chersonesus the sepulchre of Proteus was erected in the midst of this temple, and a great sum of money, with gold and silver plate, vessels of brass, and other offerings, were taken from thence by Arctylus, in virtue of a grant from the king, which he obtained by this artifice: Sir, said he,

"here is the habitation of a certain Grecian, who having entered your territories with an army, possessed as he well deserved. Give me the house of this man, that for the future none may dare to invade any part of your dominions. By this representation he doubted not to obtain the house from Xerxes, because he could have no suspicion of his project; and told him Proteus had invaded the royal dominions, because the Persians imagine that all Asia is the property of their kings. Thus after Arctylus had obtained his request, he brought away the treasure to Sestos, converted the sacred place into pasture and arable land; and when he was at Eleus, lay with divers women in the sanctuary (76).

(76) Herodotus. lib. ix. propo. fin.

The Lacedemonians deceived by Themistocles.

Themistocles, according to his own proposal, being named with some other Athenians ambassadors to Sparta, he set out before the rest, having intimated to the senate that it would be for the interest of the state, if they delayed as long as possible sending the rest of the ambassadors to Sparta. When he arrived at Lacedemon, he put from time receiving audience on account of his being alone, and expecting daily his colleagues. These in the mean time exhorted the Athenians to proceed in building their walls with all imaginable application; this they readily gave into, sparing neither houses nor sepulchres for materials, while women, children, strangers servants and citizens, all wrought night and day, so that in a short space the walls were almost finished. The Lacedemonians having received advice of this, and the colleagues of Themistocles being arrived, they summoned them before the Ephori, who began immediately to exclaim against the perfidiousness of the Athenians in thus violating their promise. Themistocles denied the charge; he said his colleagues assured him of the contrary, that it did not become a great state to depend on flying rumours, but that the Lacedemonians ought to send deputies back with the Athenian ambassadors to take cognizance of the affair, while himself remained as a hostage to to be answerable for the event. This being agreed to, Themistocles engaged his associates to advise the Athenians to commit the Spartan ambassadors to safe custody till he should be released. He then publicly avowed the whole transaction at Lacedemon, took the scheme upon himself, and said, That all things are lawful for our country. The Spartans seeing no remedy, concealed their resentment, and sent him home in safety^b.

THE next year, which was the last of the seventy-fifth olympiad, Adimantus being archon, Themistocles opened himself further to his citizens, as to the schemes he had formed for raising their power, and encreasing their wealth. He observed that the port Phalerum was very narrow and inconvenient, he therefore advised them to make the Pyreum the port of Athens, from whence he said that he was sensible that great advantages would accrue to the state, but that it was not proper for him to disclose them to the assembly, or to lay down publicly the methods by which his design might be carried into execution. He entreated them therefore to chuse two persons of rank and capacity, to whom he might communicate the whole of his project. The assembly thereupon made choice of Aristides and Xanthippus, to whom Themistocles freely imparted his contrivance, which was to render the Pyreum the most capacious haven in Greece, and to unite the city thereto by long walls, for he did not conceive it fit that the port should be made part of the city, because knowing that sailors are generally dissolute, he was afraid that their mixing with the citizens would work a corruption of manners. He observed that the Ionians were originally from the same stock with themselves, and that of consequence, if Athens were mistress of the sea, they would attach themselves to her rather than to Lacedemon, which he said would be the case of the islanders also, who having no idea of a land-force would sue for protection to that state who naval power was greatest; he concluded with shewing the easiness with which his scheme might be put in practice, if its ends were kept secret, and the danger there would be of its coming to nothing, if the Spartans had once an idea of what was intended. Aristides and Xanthippus went then out to the people, and told them that Themistocles's project was of the utmost advantage to the state, and yet might be performed with the greatest ease. This instead of satisfying the assembly, inspired them with new suspicions, they therefore directed Themistocles to apply himself to the senate, and if they approved his design, they empowered them to furnish him with what he wanted; accordingly Themistocles addressed himself to that venerable body, and they went unanimously into all his measures. In the first place ambassadors were dispatched to Sparta, to insinuate there how fit it would be for the Greeks to have some great port, where a fleet might always continue in safety in order to watch the designs of the Persians; having thus prepared the Lacedemonians not to take offence at their first preparations for enlarging and establishing the harbour of Pyreum, Themistocles took such care, that every thing was finished, and the place in a posture of defence, before it was well known at Sparta what the Athenians were about^c.

The sovereignty of sea transferred to Athens.

THE Greeks continuing the war all this time against the Persians, Aristides and Cimon the son of Miltiades were sent commanders of the Athenian forces, Pausanias the ^b PLUT. in vit. Themist. CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Themist. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. ^c PLUTARCH. in vit. Themist. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.

^a Lacedemonian having the command in chief. This Pausanias elate with the success he had had at Platea, and full also of new designs, having engaged in a treasonable correspondence with the Persian king, treated all the captains under his command with such haughtiness and state, that they were not able to bear it; for he never spoke to them but in very harsh terms, he would not allow them to provide forage, or draw water for themselves or their soldiers, till his Spartans were all served. As for the private men, under colour of preserving discipline, he treated them as if they had been all slaves, making them for the smallest offences stand with an anchor bound down on their shoulders, so that it almost sunk them into the earth. On the other hand the justice of Aristides, and the candour and generosity of Cimon attracted the hearts both of captain and soldiers, they saw that the Athenians were far more powerful at sea than the Lacedemonians, and that the authority of the latter was founded only on their pride; they therefore applied themselves first to Aristides, to desire that he would interpose with Pausanias in order to hinder him from behaving so roughly; but when Pausanias turned from him disdainfully, and said he was not at leisure to hear him, they unanimously besought the Athenian commanders to take them under their protection, promising for the future to acknowledge Athens as the first city of Greece. Aristides upon this proposition told them that he saw clearly, not only the fitness, but the necessity of what they proposed; but as he would never hazard either the safety or honour of his country, by attempting to do what might not succeed, so he would never comply with their request, till by some public act they put their sincerity out of question, and fix the concurrence of all the troops beyond a possibility of retracting. Upon this Uliades the Samian, and Antagoras of Chios, having agreed together, ran foul of Pausanias's galley as she rode at the head of the fleet before Byzantium, and upon his threatening to make them know they had not affronted him, but his country, they not only slighted his menaces, but also told him in answer, that the best thing he could do was to retire and thank fortune for her favours at Platea, for that nothing but the regard they had for that great action restrained the Greeks from resenting and revenging the ill treatment they had received at his hands. Thus the Lacedemonians lost that pre-eminence which they had hitherto maintained, and the supreme command was transferred to the Athenians ^d.

^d THE conduct of Aristides derived yet greater honour and advantage to his country; the states of Greece saw very clearly that it was necessary for them to be always on their guard against the Persians, and they had already learned that war was not to be made without money; they therefore inferred that a standing fund would be convenient for the maintenance of that force which it behoved them to keep on foot; but then the settling the proportions of this fund according to the abilities of the several states, seemed to be a difficult thing. Under this dilemma all Greece cast her eyes on Aristides, they demanded him of the Athenians as the only person as could be intrusted with such a plenitude of power. He executed his commission in such a manner, that his taxation was unanimously stiled The happy lot of Greece, all its states being perfectly well satisfied with the sums he allotted them to pay. The gross account of this tax was four hundred and sixty talents. When he had finished this business, he obliged all the people of Greece to swear to the observation of all the articles of their grand alliance, himself taking the oath in the name of the Athenians, throwing at the same time pieces of red-hot iron into the sea, when he pronounced curses against all such as should violate any article of the alliance they swore to. Afterwards indeed, when necessity compelled the Athenians to act a little against the letter of that treaty, Aristides advised them to transfer the curses on him, adding, that he would willingly bear the punishments of their perjury, rather than behold them fall upon the state. Themistocles saw with great concern the mighty honours heaped upon his rival, and in order to lessen his reputation, he was pleased to say in a public assembly, that the praises bestowed on Aristides were not praises worthy of a man, but of a money-chest, which safely keeps what is deposited therein. But this did not avenge him of an observation which Aristides had made on a former speech of his, wherein he declared that he thought it the greatest excellency in a general to penetrate the designs of his enemy; to which Aristides replied, that it was indeed a most necessary qualification but that there was another equally illustrious, which was to have clean hands, and not be a slave to a money. Thus when the Athenians were free from foreign wars, and from any contentions with their confederates, they were continually employed in domestic quarrels; the dissensions of eminent men were never failing to raise disturbances among their fellow citizens. An observation which we shall content ourselves with making here once for all, though the verification thereof will occur to our readers in almost every page of the Athenian history*.

Aristides taxes all Greece by common consent.

^d DIONOR. SICUL. lib. xi. c. 6. CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Aristid.

Themistocles
banished
Athens, and driven out of Greece.

THE Lacedemonians, though at first they made a semblance of submitting to the pleasure of the Greeks, who transferred the preheminance with respect to maritime affairs from from Sparta to Athens, yet in a short time they began to look on this as a mighty diminution of their authority; and they were the more concerned at it, because it was reported among them, that an oracle had bid them beware that they enjoyed not half an empire, yet their anger being moderated by the wisdom of some of their citizens, they laid aside all thoughts of war, and the Athenians who had provisionally built some stout gallies, reaped thereby some advantage from their threatenings. There seems just reason to believe that the Lacedemonians acted more politically in remaining at peace, than if they had taken arms; for a little after they accused Themistocles to his countrymen of having conspired with their king Pausanias to betray the cause of Greece. When this matter came to a hearing, it did indeed appear that Pausanias had discovered his intrigues to Themistocles; but it appeared likewise that Themistocles did all in his power to persuade him to let them fall, so that he was acquitted of this accusation with honour. But the minds of the people being once stirred against him, as well to gratify their own private resentment, as to make their court to the Spartans, there were now found to calumniate Themistocles. We have already shewn some of the reasons which induced the people of Lacedemon to hate this great man, there remains yet one more which deserves the readers notice, because of all others it exasperated them most. A little after the battle of Plataea, it was proposed in the council of the Amphictyones, or states-general of Greece, that all such cities as had not fought against the Persians, should lose their right of sending deputies to that assembly. This Themistocles opposed, for he foresaw that if the cities of Thebes, Argos, and many others should lose their right of sending representatives to this assembly, the Lacedemonians would rule all; wherefore he represented to the members there present, that there were but one and thirty cities, and most of them very small ones, which had concurred in the war against the Persians, and that if the deputies of those only had session in their council, it would undoubtedly come to pass that this august senate would be entirely under the influence of two or three great cities, which would be at once disadvantageous and dishonourable to Greece. These suggestions of his having destroyed the Lacedemonian scheme of empire, the chiefs of that city ever after befriended the rivals of Themistocles, and sought to bring him into odium with the Athenians. Timocreon the Rhodian, who was a famous poet in those times, wrote libels against Themistocles and Aristides, and Cimon promoted exceedingly that spirit of jealousy which began to spring up against him. Themistocles himself gave them a handle, by erecting near his own house a temple which he dedicated to Diana, the giver of the best council; intimating that himself had given the best council both for the safety of Athens and Greece. The end of these disputes was, that the Athenians by the ostracism banished Themistocles. The Lacedemonians, not satisfied with this, accused him afresh of having been concerned in Pausanias's conspiracy, which obliged that great man to fly from one place to another, and at last to take shelter in the court of Admetus, king of the Molossians; but the Spartans sending ambassadors thither to threaten that king with the Greeks making war upon him by a confederacy, he furnished Themistocles with money to make his escape into Asia, where learning not only the Persian manners, but the language also, he raised himself to greater favour with Artaxerxes than any of the native Persians, so that in time he bestowed on him a Persian wife, a large estate, and great privileges, which descended to his posterity, inasmuch that Plutarch affirms that he knew one of them whose name was also Themistocles, who lived at Magnesia in full possession of them above five-hundred years, after the ingratitude

* DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUTARCH. in vit. Aristid. CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Themist. DIODOR. SICUL. Biblioth. lib. xi. c. 12. PLUTARCH. in vit. Themist.

a of the Athenians sent this excellent person to receive his bread from strangers, and to make known to Persia those virtues of which Greece was no longer worthy (A).

† CORN. NEPOS in vit. Themist. DIONOR. SICUL. Biblioth. lib. xi. c. 12. PLUT. in vit. Themist.

(A) As far as the affairs of Themistocles were mingled with those of the state of Athens, we have followed his various fortunes in the text; but now when they are no longer connected, we think it necessary to throw together some memoirs of the latter part of this great man's life in a note. It does not appear that Themistocles when banished had any design either to revenge himself on Athens, or to take refuge in the court of the king of Persia. The Greeks themselves forced him upon this, or rather the Lacedæmonians; for as by their intrigues his countrymen were induced to banish him, so by their procurement after he was banished, he was never suffered to remain in quiet, let him take refuge where he would. His journey into Persia, if we may believe Plutarch, was very dangerous; the great king having promised by proclamation two-hundred talents for apprehending him. Nicogenes the Eolian found means to convey him to court in safety, for having put him into a close litter, he caused the servants who attended him to give out that they carried a young Grecian lady out of Ionia to a nobleman attending on the king's person; thus he arrived safely at the court of Artaxerxes, where he addressed himself to Artabanus, and informed him that he was a Grecian, who desired to be admitted to an audience of the king, which Artabanus having promised, demanded whom they should say he was; for you seem, said he, to be no ordinary person. Themistocles answered, no man must be informed of this before the king himself. When admitted to the royal presence, and commanded to declare who he was, he spoke thus: "I am Themistocles the Athenian, banished and persecuted by the Greeks; I fly to thee for refuge, mighty monarch: The evils I have done to the Persians are easily to be forgiven, in consideration of the many achievements performed for them, when I hindered the Grecians from pursuing the Medes after the fatal battle of Salamis and Platæa; when having freed my country, and placed the Greeks in safety, my ambition led me on to greater enterprizes; in which being successful, I gratified the far-extended Persian empire, and performed services acceptable to the greatest prince on earth: Since which all things having conspired to augment my present calamities, suitable to such a condition, I come hither hoping to receive mercy from a gracious reconciled emperor, who hath laid aside his anger, and is no longer mindful of former evils; humbly imploring you, that taking the Greeks for witnesses of the services I have done for Persia, you will make use of this occasion to shew the world the nobleness of your virtue, rather than the greatness of your resentment. Hereby you will preserve an humble suppliant; if otherwise, you destroy a servant of the Persians, and a public enemy of the Greeks (77)". Thucydides mentions a letter sent by Themistocles to Artaxerxes, differing very little from this speech, attributed to him by Plutarch. Cornelius Nepos hath copied this letter from Thucydides; and all agree that the Persian monarch received him with great kindness. Plutarch says, that he was so well pleased with him, that he cried out thrice, the night of his audience, in his sleep, I have Themistocles the Athenian (78). The next morning the king sent for him again, and as soon as the first compliments were over, said, I am in your debt two hundred talents, for so much I promised to him who brought Themistocles; he likewise promised him far greater favours, and desired he would speak his mind freely of the affairs of Greece. Themistocles answered by his interpreter, That dis- course, like a Persian carpet, had in it a variety of figures, which never appeared to advantage, but when it was thoroughly unfolded, and was scarce to be apprehended when wrapt together in the piece; he therefore desired that he might have time to learn the Persian language, which would enable him to disclose his own ideas without the help of another. This answer of Themistocles is a noble proof of his extensive genius, it was entirely in the oriental taste, the sentiment great, and the figure expressive; he delivered himself like a native Persian the very first day that he appeared in the court of Persia; the king readily granted him a year for the purpose he intended. At the end of that space he appeared frequently at court, Themistocles being in a short time so great a favourite, that it became afterwards a proverb, and the Persian kings were wont to promise any Greek whom they fought to bring over to their interest, that he should live with them as Themistocles did with Artaxerxes. He was also in high favour with the queen-mother, became a convert to the Persian religion, and was instructed therein by the magi. He had three cities bestowed upon him, which, alluding to their situation, the king of Persia said in pleasantry that they should serve to provide him bread, wine, and meat; these cities were Magnesia, Myons, and Lampsacus; the first brought him in a yearly revenue of fifty talents, and the last had in its neighbourhood the noblest vineyards in the east. Themistocles fixed his residence at Magnesia, where he lived with all the splendor of a Persian grandee, insomuch that he said one day at table to his children, We had been undone, my little ones, if we had not been undone. He was so far from expressing any hatred against his ungrateful country, that Plutarch assures us the tenderness he retained for it had like to have cost him his life; for seeing at Sardis a brazen statue of a virgin which he had set up in Athens, when he was surveyor of the aqueducts, he attempted to persuade the governor of Lydia to send it back to Athens; who, far from giving into his opinion, fell into a great passion, and threatened to inform the emperor, so that Themistocles, in order to extricate himself from danger, was forced to make large presents to his women. Authors differ exceedingly as to the manner in which this noble Athenian died. Plutarch says, that being pressed by the king of Persia to undertake an expedition against Greece, he made a solemn sacrifice, at which having kindly entertained his friends, he drank a porringer of bull's blood, and so put an end to his life. Thucydides, who was co-temporary with Themistocles, speaks very doubtfully of this business; He died, says he, of a distemper, but some report that he poisoned himself, seeing it impossible to accomplish what he had promised the king. He was sixty six years old at his death; he was honoured with a stately tomb at Magnesia, but his bones, by his own command, were privately carried back into Attica and buried there. Some say that the Athenians repenting afterwards of their ill-usage of this great man, honoured him with a tomb in the Pyreum. And Plutarch in support of this quotes the following verses from Plato the comedian:

Thy tomb is justly rais'd upon the strand,
Where from all parts admiring strangers land;
In that fair port by thy great genius made
The seat of empire, liberty, and trade:
So that thy ashes on this famous shore,
Both sea and land may honour and adore (79).

(77) de Bello Pelop. lib. i.
CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Themist.

(78) Plut. in vit. Themist.

(79) Plut. ubi supra. Thucyd. ubi supra.

THE popular party in Athens carried all things before them, after Themistocles was banished; and such a number of false witnesses arose, that those who were most concerned in that affair were in danger of repenting of it. Aristides alone, when things came to extremity, shewed himself more a friend to virtue, than an enemy to Themistocles; he refused to join with Alcmaeon and Cimon in prosecuting him capitally, and was so far from insulting him in his misfortunes, that he spoke of him with greater respect than ever. The war with Persia was not yet let fall, the Greeks found that great advantage accrued to them from carrying it on, especially the Athenians, who by means of their great force at sea, were continually enriching themselves at the expence of some or other of the Persian emperor's subjects. They therefore devised various reasons for sending fleets to sea, though the real intent was to aggrandize and enrich themselves by the skill and valour of their troops, and their commanders. With this view, in the latter end of the seventy-seventh olympiad, they equipped a navy for the relief of such of the Grecian cities in Asia, as were under subjection to the great king. This expedition was pleasing to the Athenians, and no less grateful to the Greeks in general, since it seemed to be for the advantage of others, though they had in truth no less regard to their own.

Cimon establishes the Athenian greatness.

Cimon the son of Miltiades, by the daughter of the king of Thrace, was unanimously chosen admiral and commander in chief on this occasion: He will make a great figure in the succeeding part of this history, and therefore it is necessary that we should give the reader his character here. Cimon's abilities were fair and solid, yet less so than his virtues; his father had distinguished himself by the firmness of his courage, Themistocles by the strength of his judgment, Aristides by his probity, Cimon was equal to them all; his distinguishing perfection was an openness of temper which made him above deceiving, the only stain on Themistocles's character; and an inflexible honesty, which raised his reputation above his father's. It was this Cimon whom the merciful Athenians put in chains for his father's fine, and for whose release his sister gave up her charms to Calchas, remarkable only for being at the same time worthless, and worth money. In his youth Cimon did not promise much, he was little inclined to learning, which in an Athenian was a strange thing; he was much addicted to magnificence, and the love of women, which were also thought blemishes in a young nobleman like him; but of a sudden he gave his citizens to understand that the greatest virtues are not the soonest seen; for, when on the first news of the Persian invasion, Themistocles advised the Athenians to quit their city, and go on board their galleys, and was thereupon universally decried, Cimon went immediately to the temple of Minerva, and offered up a bridle, to signify that horsemen were no longer of use, but that they ought to trust to their ships; after which he went cheerfully about taking down his goods, and carried them on board the fleet. Aristides, observing the integrity of this young man, took great care to train him up to business, that his candour might balance the craft of Themistocles, in which he succeeded very happily; for Cimon only, of all the Athenian generals was always beloved, and never suspected. In this expedition he took the city of Eion from the Persians, but with little advantage to the Athenians, because Butes, who commanded in that city for the Persian king, set fire to the place, and burnt himself, his garrison, and all the riches that were therein; however, Cimon settled colonies in that neighbourhood after revenging himself on the Thracians, who had assisted the Persians in Ionia with provisions. He afterwards reduced the island of Scyros, from whence he brought the bones of Theseus, which were honourably interred at Athens (B). After this he returned to Athens, and having increased his fleet to three hundred

§ DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.

¶ PLUT. in vit. Cimonis. CORN. NEPOS. in vit. ejusd.

(B) This note hath the same subject with the last; we are to speak of the honours paid by the Athenians to the ashes of a great man, whom they treated ill while living, and sent to beg his bread; this was no less a person than Theseus, to whom in a great measure they owed their being a people. The oracle in the latter end of the seventy-fifth, or beginning of the seventy-sixth olympiad, commanded the Athenians to bring home the ashes of this prince. When therefore Cimon made himself master of the isle of Scyros, he sought with great diligence for the tomb of Theseus; but being able to find no such thing, he inquired of the people of the island, who either could not or would not give him any intelligence; at last observing an eagle upon a rising ground pecking it with her talons, and tearing up the earth with her talons, it came into his head to dig there. This being done, there was found a coffin of a man of more than ordinary size, the brazen head of a lance, and a sword lying by him, all which he took on board his galley, and brought them with him to Athens. The Athenians transported with joy,

- a hundred sail, he steered for the coast of Caria, and having performed great things there, he sailed for Cyprus, where he was informed the Persian fleet lay at anchor. He found them at the mouth of the river Eurymedon, their land army, which was very numerous, being encamped not far off. Cimon, though the fleet was much stronger than his, attacked it, and after a very obstinate engagement, gained a complete victory, taking one hundred ships, their crews abandoning them to seek refuge on shore. Unsatisfied with this, he debarqued his forces, and attacked their land-army; the Persians fought better than ever they had done, and yet after a very long and bloody battle the Athenians prevailed, and not only routed the Persians, but possessed themselves of their camp with all their riches contained therein; thus in one day he gained two important victories, one at sea, the other at land, equal to those of Salamis and Platea.¹ Plutarch says, that he afterwards made himself master of eighty Pbanician vessels, which lay in a port of Cyprus, and were intended to strengthen that navy which Cimon had destroyed. However it was, he gained such an immense booty, that the Athenians were enabled thereby to build the south wall of the citadel, and to lay the foundation of those far extended walls which united the port to the city, and which being built in a moorish ground, they were first of all forced to sink great stones, that they might have whercon to erect a superstructure, besides various other things for the accommodation of the citizens, and besides what Cimon himself did out of his proportion of the spoils, which were very great; for he adorned the forum with palm-trees, and beautified the academy with delightful walks, and pleasant fountains. The wealth of Cimon, as it enabled him to do many things for the public, so it likewise put it in his power to live in his private capacity with that magnificence which he so much affected; he therefore demolished the inclosures about his grounds and gardens, and permitted every body to enter and take what fruits they pleased; he likewise kept an open table, where not only the rich found delicacies, but the poorest Athenians eat of them freely. When he went abroad he was constantly attended by a train of young gentlemen extremely well dressed, and whose pockets were well furnished with money. But if by chance he met any ancient citizen in a tattered suit, he made some of his domestics change cloaths with him; or if the quality of the person rendered that kindness unsuitable, he took a sum of money from one of his attendants, and conveyed it into the pocket of the distressed person privately. Thus, as one of the ancients said of him very justly, he gained riches that he might use them, and used them so as to get credit. Yet he was far from doing these things from a desire of becoming popular; on the contrary, he sided always with the nobility, and opposed openly such as sought to make their court to the people, by putting all things into their power. The riches which his victories poured into Athens, brought along with them their constant attendant, corruption; but though the tide was strong, yet Aristides in the midst of a voluntary poverty, and Cimon who lived with the greatest magnificence, escaped it, and were never taxed with partiality, or being under the influence of money.²
- THE affairs of Athens were now in such prosperous condition, that they would not suffer any thing to be transacted to their prejudice without revenging it. The Persians having invaded the Cberfonesus, and by the help of the Tbracians made themselves intirely masters of it, Cimon was sent thither in a great hurry; he had with him but four ships, so that the Barbarians and their allies looked upon this as a very rash attempt; however, Cimon falling upon them suddenly, took thirteen of their gallies, and afterwards reduced all Cberfonesus under the Athenian power, after which he went against the Tbasians, who revolting from the Athenians, had made themselves masters of the gold mines, which lie between the rivers Nyffus and Strymon, which tempted the Athenians to fall upon them. But before we enter into

Year after the deluge, 2531. Before Christ 468.

The Thasians revolt, and are reduced by Cimon.

¹ DIONOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUTARCH. ubi supra.

² PLUTARCH. ubi supra.

joy, went out to meet and receive the reliques of this great man with all the pomp imaginable. They interred them in the middle of the city, and made his tomb an asylum or sanctuary for slaves and people of mean condition, who fled from the persecution of men in power, because in his life-time he had been a protector of the distressed, and above all things delighted in doing the injured justice. They likewise sacrificed solemnly to him on the 8th of October, because he was reported to have returned from his Cretan expedition on that day. Thus the Athenians, who injured Themistocles living, revered him dead! (80)

the event of this war, it may not be amiss to observe, that Cimon put the Albenians into a method of becoming irresistible at sea, and of suving their neighbours, not at their own expence, but at the expence of those they awed. It was thus: Many of the Greek states, who by the treaty concluded with Aristides, were bound to furnish men and gallies, as well as to pay the tax for their support, when they saw themselves out of danger from the Barbarians, were very unwilling to furnish their quota of men and ships; this most of the Albenian generals disliking, would have compelled them by high fines to remedy; but Cimon took a contrary course, he premitted such as were desirous of staying at home to remain there, and took a certain sum in lieu of a galley compleatly manned. By this means he inured the Albenians, whom he took on board his gallies, both to hardship and discipline, b while the allies, who chose to excuse themselves in this manner, were enervated thro' idleness, and so from confederates dwindled by degrees into tributaries, and almost slaves. The people of Thasus, perceiving this, thought to have shaken off the Albenian yoke; but Cimon proved too many for them, though the Thasians behaved very bravely; for having first sustained a great loss at sea, they afterwards shut themselves up in their city, and made a very obstinate defence; while in the mean time they sent privately to the Lacedemonians, and endeavoured to stir them up to make war with the Albenians; but their affairs not permitting them to comply with their request, the Thasians were at last obliged to submit; and so the gold mines about which this war was commenced, fell into the power of the Albenians, c who sent a great colony to Amphipolis, a city of Thrace, which for a time made a great figure, but afterwards attempting to penetrate into the country of the Edones, a great part of them were destroyed. In the last year of the seventy-seventh olympiad, the Lacedemonians finding themselves extremely vexed by their Helotes, who were revolted from them, and who were supported by the Messinians, and some other of their neighbours, sent to demand aid from Athens, which produced very great disputes there; Ephialtes, a great orator, who was at the head of the popular party, opposed the motion for sending, as the Spartans desired, an army to their assistance. Cimon, who favoured the nobility, and who was a great friend to the Lacedemonians, by whose interest he had been supported against Themistocles, earnestly pressed the d Athenians to lay hold of this opportunity of shewing their virtue and magnanimity, by succouring their companion, who was the other eye of Greece. Ephialtes sought to bring the people into his opinion, by shewing that Sparta had always been, and from the nature of her constitution would always be an enemy to Athens, and therefore ought not to be succoured now the enemies her pride had excited were about to lay her low. The Athenians however listened rather to Cimon than to his adversary, and full of a generous concern for Greece, sent that fortunate general at the head of a great army to the assistance of Lacedemon, which service he very willingly performed, and returned from thence with great honour; some time after, the Lacedemonians being engaged in the siege of Ibome, sent again to the Athenians for succour, and were again relieved, Cimon marching with a numerous body of troops to their assistance; but the Spartans, finding that their other confederates had sent troops sufficient to enable them to make an end of the war successfully, dismissed the Athenian succours, as being either afraid of them, or caring least to be obliged by them. This grievously offended the people of Athens, who thenceforward not only hated the Lacedemonians, but all of their own citizens who were reputed to be friends to that state¹.

The Athenians
make war on Ægina, and send a fleet into Egyp^t.

THE Athenians engaged themselves in two new wars, one against the inhabitants of Ægina, who having been always free, bore very ill these acts of sovereignty which the Athenians exercised over them, as well as the rest of their allies; the f second was against the great king in Egypt, which now revolted from him, and set up one Inarus for king. The fleet which the Athenians sent hither performed wonders; for they enabled the Egyptians to beat the Persians in the field, and to subdue two districts of the great city of Memphis; but the third, which was called the white, they could not reduce, the Persians who retreated thither, having carried with them a vast quantity of provisions and ammunition, which enabled them to hold out a siege of three years; but this affair being already exactly related in our account a of the Persian monarchy, we need say no more of it here, than that it ended not much to the credit or advantage of the Athenians ^m.

¹ DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. CIMON. CORN. NEPOS vit. ejusd. THUCYD. lib. i.

THEIR great business abroad did not so much take up the time of the people of Athens, but that they continued as much divided as ever at home; the popular ^{State of the} party were continually making efforts against those small remains of power which ^{factions in} were yet in the hand of the nobility; they had at their head two very great and famous men, Pericles and Ephialtes; the former of these was the son of Xanthippus the famous Athenian captain, who won the battle of Mycale, by Agariste the niece of the celebrated Cleisthenes, who had so great a hand in expelling the Pisistratide. He studied under Damon and Anaxagoras; from the former he learned politics, though ^{Athens at this} b he pretended to teach him music, and from the latter natural philosophy, and the art of speaking. He had prodigious talents, and above all an eloquence superior to that of any of his co-temporaries; but he was obliged to conceal these shining qualifications, because the Athenians had taken it in their heads that he resembled Pisistratus very much in his face, and still more in his eloquence, which was so nervous and elevated, that it procured him afterwards the surname of Olympus. Notwithstanding therefore that he was of a great family, had a good estate, and many relations, who filled the first posts in the commonwealth, yet he not only declined standing for publick employments, but even speaking or appearing in public, that he might not draw upon himself the envy of the great, or become formidable c to the people. But when Aristides was dead, Themistocles in banishment, and Cimon, generally speaking, employed in foreign affairs, Pericles began to apply himself strictly to public business, but in a manner very different from that in which hitherto the great men of Athens had acted; for instead of courting the rich and the great, he applied himself wholly to the lower sort of people, notwithstanding that it was contrary to his natural disposition, which by no means inclined him to a plausible insinuating behaviour. The reason was that there appeared no other method than this, by which he could possibly attain to that eminence and superiority which he affected. Cimon, by the greatness of his birth, the lustre of his actions, and the largeness of his estate, had placed himself at the head of the nobility, and was by d them considered as their chief, being revered for his magnanimity, as he was beloved for his generosity and condescension. The multitude therefore were the sole resource of Pericles, who, as he was a great and deep politician, foresaw exactly the dangers he must be exposed to in consequence of his making court to them. To avoid these, he practised a behaviour equally singular and extraordinary; he left off all company, he neither received or paid visits, and but once in all his administration was present at a feast, and then he went away early. When he went abroad, it was either to the prytaneum or assembly; he preserved an unshaken gravity in his look, his gestures, and his speech, and always prayed before he delivered an oration, that nothing might slip from him displeasing to the people. With all e these abilities he perceived it impracticable to carry his point, unless he could be as liberal as Cimon, to whom, though his will was equal, yet his fortune fell short; but he overcame this difficulty by making bold with the public money, and doing what all artful politicians have done since, obliging the people at their own expence. He increased the salaries given to such of the Athenian citizens as sat in courts of justice, the money given the poorer citizens for attending at assemblies, and to enable them to pay for seats in the theatres ^a (C).

VOL. II. N° 7.

6 H

INASMUCH

^m Universal History, Vol. II. p. 131.

^a PLUTARCH. in vit. Periclis.

(C) The reader might be justly offended, if we had suffered Aristides's subsequent fortunes to have slipped without notice. We have already marked his public character, his notions of government, and the share he had, like the rest of the great men of Athens, in the favour and in the hate of his countrymen. In this note therefore we will draw together such scattered passages in relation to this great man, as the course of the history did not permit us to take notice of in the text. Plutarch tells us, that one Aristo, an historian of Cbios, or as M. Dacier will have it, of Ceos, said that the contention between Aristides and Themistocles took rise from their being both enamoured of Stesileus of the island of Ceos, the most beautiful youth of his time, in which if there be any truth, it is an incontestable argument, that the morality of the Greeks was far from being pure or perfect, since Aristides, who valued himself so much on his probity, could persist in so base and unnatural a vice. What a high esteem all his co-temporaries had of the rigid virtue of Aristides, is better known to us from an accident, that from all the laboured panegyrics of the writers of history. It happened that Aristides was present the first time that Eschylus's tragedy was played, which has this title, The siege of Thebes by the seven captains. A courier being therein introduced, relating to Eteocles the names and qualities of those that commanded, thus

INASMUCH as Pericles never pretended to any of the great offices of the commonwealth, he could not of consequence be chosen a member of the court of Areopagus, whence it came to pass that he distasted their authority, because he knew they could not be well pleased with his endeavouring to transfer all things to the general assembly, where by dint of his eloquence he governed all. But fearing to draw upon himself the displeasure of the most venerable council among the Athenians, he encouraged Ephialtes, his intimate friend to stir up the people against the Areopagites, and to make them believe that this tribunal was the greatest curb upon them, and the only bar to that extensive liberty which their friends wished to put into the hands of the commons of Athen; thus with great policy he laid the foundation of his own greatness in that of the people, but at the expence of the ancient constitution, and of the safety of the state, as the course of this history will shew.

WHEN things were in this situation, it was thought expedient by the popular party to attempt the destruction of Cimon. In order to this, a prosecution was commenced against him for treason against the state; this treason was pretended to consist in receiving presents or other gratifications from the Macedonians, whereby he was prevailed on to let slip the manifest opportunity he had to enlarge his conquests, after he had taken from the Persians the gold mines in Thrace. Cimon made a defence suitable to his character, he said that he had prosecuted to the utmost of his power the war against the Thracians, and other enemies to the state of Athen; but that it was true, he had not made any inroads into Macedonia, because he did not conceive that he was to act as a public enemy to mankind, and because he was struck with respect for a nation modest in their carriage, just in their dealings, and strictly honourable in their behaviour towards him and the Athenians; that if his countrymen looked upon this as a crime, he must abide their judgment, but could never be brought to think that his conduct was amiss. Elpinice his sister engaged herself warmly in his behalf, soliciting all such as she thought might either influence thus describes the genius and temper of Amphiarus.

• PLUTARCH. ubi supra. & in vit. Cimonis. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xi.

He aims at real worth without the show,
Reaping those fruits which in his rich mind grow;

Whence sage advice and noble actions flow.

As soon as these words were out of the actor's mouth, the whole audience turned their eyes upon Aristides, to shew that in their opinion this was his character also. He was appointed treasurer of Athen, and executed that office with great integrity; but inasmuch as he had exposed some of Themistocles's frauds, that artful politician accused him of misapplying public money, and though nothing was fairer than this charge, got him condemned. But the court of Areopagus interposing, his fine was remitted, and he chosen treasurer for the next year, when he suffered all the collectors and under-officers to act as they thought fit, who thereupon extolled him to the skies, and when the end of the year came, would have persuaded the people to chuse him a third time, when Aristides rising up, addressed himself to the Assembly in these words: "When I discharged my office with care, and managed your treasure faithfully, and like an honest man, I was reviled, and evil spoken of; but now, when I have taken no care at all, but left it to the discretion of these public robbers, I am, it seems, an admirable treasurer, and a most excellent patriot; I therefore declare to you, that I am more ashamed of the honour done to me this day, than of the sentence passed upon me last year; and with indignation and concern, I see it is more meritorious with you to oblige ill men, than to deserve well of the commonwealth". The day before the battle of Platæa, a conspiracy being discovered among the Athenians to introduce a democracy, Aristides, who commanded, would not suffer it to be looked minutely into, for fear it should occasion some sedition in the camp; but contented himself with telling such as were suspected, that the battle would be the tribunal in which they might justify themselves, and shew how much they were friends to their country. It is certain, that in this battle Aristides proved himself to be as great a general as he was a statesman, and gave as noble testimonies of his valour as he had ever done of prudence and justice; he lived but four years after Themistocles was banished, and notwithstanding he had exercised the greatest offices in the commonwealth, yet he was so poor that he was unable to make a figure himself, or to leave any thing to his children, except the honour of being descended from such a father, which procured them a maintenance from the public; we will instance but one thing more in relation to Aristides, which respects at once his poverty and virtue, and so conclude. His cousin Callias the torch-bearer being under a prosecution, the orator who spoke against him observed, that though he was immensely rich, he suffered his cousin Aristides to labour under the deepest necessity. Callias perceiving that this made more impression on his judges than the crime for which he was accused, he summoned Aristides, who owned that Callias had often pressed him to accept money, and that he had as often answered, It better becomes Aristides to make a shew of his poverty, than Callias of his wealth; for many people make a bad use of their riches, whereas there is scarce one to be found who bears poverty with an equal mind. He died in the second year of the LXXVIIth olympiad, 467 years before Christ (81.)

(81.) Plutarch. in vit. Aristid. Cern. Nepos in vit. ajustem. Polyæn. Strateg. lib. i. Just. lib. ii. c. 15. Senecc. de Benefic.

- a the people, or any other way either prejudice or benefit her brother; amongst the rest she addressed herself to Pericles, who was one of the persons appointed by the people to accuse Cimon at his trial. Pericles heard all she had to say patiently, and then answered with a smile, You are a little too old, madam, to be employed in such affairs as these. Pericles was noted for gallantry, and in all probability, he let fall this expression to take off all suspicion that Elpinice had made any impression upon him; for it was observed that when the trial came on, Pericles spoke but once, and then not only treated Cimon with great respect, but touched the business of which he was accused so lightly, that he seemed to have no opinion of his guilt; and when he had done speaking he withdrew; the consequence of this was, that Cimon escaped capital punishment, though he was banished by the ostracism, which cured his rivals of envy, and took away all apprehensions from the people¹.

THE disposition of the Athenians appearing now to be extremely favourable to those who inclined to the commons more than the nobility, Ephialtes took this opportunity to humble the court of Areopagus, which he did by a decree, whereby most of the causes which had been cognizable by them were transferred elsewhere; and this the wisest of the Athenians have looked upon as the first step to their ruin, for it gave the people such a dangerous notion of liberty, as rendered them ever afterwards ungovernable; however Ephialtes did not triumph long, for a little while afterwards he was assassinated in the streets by Aristodocus a Tanagrian, as Aristotle reports, induced thereto by the nobility, though Idomenes of Lampjacus, an author quoted by Plutarch, ascribes his murder to Pericles, who, when he had served his purposes, thought it best to have him out of the way².

- A WAR breaking out between the Corinthians and Epidaurians on the one side, and the Athenians on the other, the former were twice routed by the latter; after which the Athenians conceiving that the inhabitants of Ægina had some way or other been helpful to their enemies, sent Leocrates their admiral, at the head of a great fleet, to punish that island which had always been troublesome to the Athenians. The inhabitants of Ægina, vainly trusting to their skill in maritime affairs, ventured with a small fleet, made up for the most part of new-built ships, to hazard a battle with the Athenians, in which however they suffered dearly for their rashness, being totally defeated with the loss of seventy ships, so that they were constrained to submit themselves to the Athenians, and to purchase peace at the expence of honour and independence³.

- THE states of Peloponnesus, looking all with jealous eyes on the growing greatness of the Athenians, watched every opportunity of making war upon her, when she was engaged in troublesome affairs, and seemed to be less able to resist them. On this account the Corinthians attacked the Megarians, whom they knew to be the allies of Athens, while the Athenians upon some fresh provocation were laying siege to Ægina; but this warlike people, far from being frightened at the number of their enemies, sent Myronides their general, at the head of a considerable army, to the assistance of their allies, without desisting in the mean time from any of their former enterprizes. Myronides behaved so well, that after several engagements the Corinthians were glad to return, so that this attempt to check the Athenian power, served, as many others had done, only to increase it⁴.

- THE Lacedæmonians having sent a great army composed of their own troops, and those of their allies, to the assistance of the Dorians against the Phoceans, the Athenians resolved to attack them in their return, having long wished for an opportunity of revenging those insults which they had received, or which they apprehended they had received from the Spartans. The Athenians therefore drawing in the Argives and Thebælians to be confederates with them, manned out a fleet of fifty sail, and with them approached the isthmus, where they landed an army of fourteen thousand men, and took possession of the passages, so that it was impossible for the Lacedæmonians to return home without encountering them. The Spartan army commanded by Nicomedes consisted of eleven thousand five hundred men; he did not however hasten rashly to a battle, but turned aside to Tanagra a city of Beotia, where such of the Athenians as inclined to an aristocracy entered into some correspondence with him. But before their designs ripened, the Athenian army marched with great expedition expedition to Tanagra, so that a battle became inevitable. When the Athenians were disposing themselves in battalia, Cimon presented himself on a sudden completely armed, and went to take post among the troops of his own tribe. But those of the popular faction, forgetting all respect to their country, and minding nothing but their private resentments, raised a great clamour, alledging that he came with no other view than to put himself at the head of his own party in order to assist the Lacedæmonians; they therefore insisted that the general should not receive them, his time of banishment being not near expired; and Cimon being informed of this, rather than make his countrymen uneasy, voluntarily retired, but before he withdrew, he addressed himself to Eutibippus and the rest of his friends, who were charged with being in a conspiracy with him, earnestly beseeching them to behave in such a manner as might wipe off the aspersions, and convince the Athenians that they had not amongst them either braver or honest men than Cimon and his friends. Eutibippus and his companions made him no other answer than desiring him to leave them his armour, since their generals would not permit him to serve at their head, which accordingly he did; the battle proved long and doubtful, for the Theffalian horse, deserting the Athenians at the beginning of the action, added great weight to their enemies; however the troops of Athens and their confederates fought obstinately, particularly the little body commanded by Eutibippus, which drawing close together, and having Cimon's armour in the midst of them, charged amongst the thickest of the enemy, and there bravely fighting were all slain. In the end, however, the Athenians were routed with a very great loss. This unfortunate business was followed shortly after by another unlucky accident; a great convoy coming out of Attica, the Theffalians marched suddenly in the night to attack it. The Athenian escort, knowing nothing of what had happened at the battle of Tanagra, received the Theffalians as friends. But they suddenly falling upon them, the Athenian guard stood on their defence, and made a very gallant resistance, till at last their own army came into their aid, who quickly routed the Theffalians with great slaughter; yet these in the end being sustained by the Lacedæmonians, the engagement became again doubtful, till at length both armies being sufficiently tired, and the night coming on, they made a drawn battle, and concluded a short truce, that after such rude encounters both sides might have time to recruit their forces^c.

¹ PLUT. in vit. Cim. & Peric. CORN. NEPOS.
² DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xi. p. 283. ³ Id. ib.

⁴ DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Periclis.

THE Thebans, who on account of their having joined Xerxes in his war against Greece, had lost the government of Bæotia, applied themselves now to the Lacedæmonians, entreating them to assist their recovery of it, and promising to be for ever their faithful allies against the Athenians. The Spartans conceiving this to be a very seasonable proposal, readily complied with it, and entered into a strict league with the Thebans. By their assistance Thebes was restored to her ancient lustre, rendered the head of Bæotia, and one of the first cities in Greece. The Athenians however were so much displeased at the conduct of the Spartans in this matter, that they resolved to send an army into Bæotia to overturn all they had been doing. Myronides the son of Callias was chosen general in this expedition, and he appointed a day certain when he would march against the enemy; when that day came, many whose names were in the muster-roll did not attend; Myronides however began his march, and when many persuaded him to wait a little, that such as had been negligent might have time to come in, he answered roundly, that it did not become a general to wait for such people, since it was to be doubted they would behave as ill towards the enemy, as they did towards their friends; whereas the troops he had with him in their early appearance in the field, had given such a testimony of their courage as seemed to promise victory. The Thebans and their allies, making up a numerous and well-disciplined army, marched without scruple to meet Myronides and his handful of Athenians; but the event did not answer their expectation, for after a long and obstinate engagement, Myronides prevailed, gaining a glorious and complete victory. It is indeed surprising, as Diodorus Siculus long ago remarked, that ancient authors have passed over so slightly this victory of the Athenians, which in some sense was more glorious to them, than either that of Marathon or Platæa. In both these they fought against Barbarians, and were assisted by their allies; in this they were alone, and yet triumphed over a superior army, composed of the bravest of the Greeks. The first use which the Athenian general made of his victory

^c DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xi. p. 283. PLUTARCH. in vit. Cimonis.

■ was 'to march to Tanagra, where the Athenians had been so hardly dealt with a few months before; this city he took by storm, and that he might make even the defeats of his country terrible, razed it to the ground. He next plundered all Boeotia, beat an army which its inhabitants drew together, in order to force him to retreat, fell afterwards upon the Locrians, then penetrated into Thessaly, where having chastised the inhabitants for their treachery to the Athenians, he returned home laden with riches and glory *.

THE next year Tolmides the Athenian admiral, piqued at the great actions of Myronides, prompted the people to give him power to invade Laconia, a thing hitherto unattempted; that they might the more readily come into his project, Tolmides b asked but for a thousand men, which were readily granted him; but he well knowing that this was too small a number, found means to quadruple it without breaking the decree; for pretending that he would chuse the thousand men out of the strongest and bravest of the youths of Athens, he privately solicited all such to give in their names voluntarily, suggesting that it would be a stain on their honours to be compelled by his choice; and when he had thus drawn three-thousand to give in their names, he then chose another thousand by virtue of the decree, and with this body of four thousand men on board his fleet, which consisted of fifty sail of stout gallies, he went on the expedition he had propounded. Arriving at Melbon in Laconia, he took it, but the Spartans sending a speedy succour, he was forced to quit it. However, he had better fortune at Gythium, another sea-port belonging to the Lacedemonians, c which he took and burnt, with all the shipping and naval provisions that were therein; he likewise wasted all the country in its neighbourhood, after which he sailed for Zacynthus, which he reduced, together with all the cities in its neighbourhood. He then sailed over to Naupactus, which he took by composition, and having ejected the Lacedemonians, settled there a colony of Messenians, whom the Athenians had taken under their protection; thus ended this expedition, no less to the honour of the Athenians, than those undertaken in former years against the Spartans, and their allies *.

ON the very back of this, Pericles was sent with his ships, and a thousand soldiers, d to invade Peloponnesus, which he did with great good fortune, burning, spoiling, or taking whatever places he attempted; though he had with him, as was before said, but a thousand men, for the very fame of the Athenians half discomfited their enemies, and the reputation of so great a general took away almost the power of resistance. On his return to Athens, he found the people not a little out of humour, because Cimon remained still in banishment; the death of his friends in the battle of Tanagra, fully purged this great man of that crime, under pretence of which he had been banished, and therefore we need not wonder that all Athens looked upon it as an act of justice due from their state to recal him. Pericles, conceiving well what would be the consequence of their compassion, immediately took the thing e upon himself, and drew up an act for his restoration, which Cimon took so kindly, that he never thwarted him after he came home. The writers of scandal among the ancients, for some such there always were, as is to be feared there always will be, have handed it down to posterity, that this reconciliation between Pericles and Cimon was brought about by Elpinice, who, they say, stipulated for her brother, that he should be content with commanding abroad, and allows Pericles to be at the head of the administration at home. However it was, he brought now, as he had ever done before, good fortune to his country, for he concluded a peace between Athens and Sparta, and generously preserved the Greeks from falling upon each other *.

Cimon rightly judging that it would be impossible for the Athenians to lie still, f equipped two-hundred gallies, with an intent to make a fresh attempt upon Cyprus, conclude a that by gaining new booties from the Barbarians, his countrymen might be drawn rather to make war continually on the Persian king, than to be harrassing the Lacedemonians, or oppressing their allies. Plutarch suggests, that he had in view no less a conquest than that of the whole Persian empire; part of his fleet he detached to assist the Athenians in Egypt, with the rest he remained in the neighbourhood of Cyprus, or as Diodorus Siculus says, made himself master of Citium and Melus; after which he defeated the Phanecian fleet, beat the Persian army commanded by Megabizus, conclude a peace with Persia. Year after the flood 2550. Before Christ 449.

* DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xi. p. 285. THUCYD. lib. i. * DIODOR. SICUL. Biblioth. lib. xi. 7 DIODOR. SICUL. Biblioth. lib. xi. p. 287. PLOT. in vit. Cimonis.

which lay encamped in Cilicia, and after re-embarked his forces, and returned to Cyprus, where he besieged the capital city. But the Persian monarch, finding no ease from the Athenians, and no hopes of subduing them while commanded by this fortunate general, sent orders to Artabazus and Megabizus, his commanders, to enter into a treaty of peace, which accordingly they did, and the Athenians having named on their side Callias, the son of Hipponicus, their plenipotentiary, the treaty was quickly finished; the principal articles of which were, first, that all the Greek cities in Asia should be free, and governed by their own laws; secondly, that the Persians should send no army within three days journey of the sea; thirdly, that no Persian ship of war should sail between Thaselis and Cyene, the former a city of Pamphylia, the latter of Lycia. Articles most glorious for the Greeks, and not a little acceptable to the Persians, since the Athenians on their side undertook not to invade any of the provinces of that empire. During this treaty, and as it were in the arms of victory, Cimon died at Citium, whether of sickness, or of a wound he had received at the siege, authors were not agreed in the time of Plutarch. His death was as honourable as his life, and his last act the most glorious of it all; for when he found himself about to expire, he sent for the principal commanders, advised them to embark the men, to conceal his decease, and to sail home, being afraid that if his death were known at that juncture, it might be prejudicial to his country. Such was the end of the last great captain of Athens, the rest were soldiers, and heroes too, but not patriots like Cimon; for they flattering the humours of their countrymen, led them at every turn to fight against their brethren, and most cruelly employed the wisdom, power, and wealth of Greece, against herself. Whereas Cimon curbed the vanity of his countrymen, he told them it was lawful to make war, and to spoil the Persians who had destroyed their city, and carried away all they had; but he dissuaded them at all times from acting tyrannically towards the Greeks, and vehemently inveighed against that propensity they had to sacrifice virtue to profit, and honour to power. On such occasions he was wont to say, The Lacedæmonians would not do this; which at last provoked his countrymen to banish him to his immortal glory, and their shame. We could not avoid this eulogium, because we knew that we should nowhere else have occasion to speak of a man equally admirable for his abilities and his virtues, and for applying them constantly to the service of the public, and not to the aggrandizing himself, or his family * (D).

THE

* PLUT. in vit. Cimon. CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Cimon.

(D) The most memorable occurrences in the life of Cimon, regarding the Athenian state, have been already taken notice of in our text; and as to his character, his disposition, and abilities, we have been obliged to touch on them also more than once; this note therefore will contain only such passages in relation to the life of Cimon, as did not fall properly within our notice, either in speaking of the public or of him. First then, Plutarch, and Valerius Maximus from him, report Cimon in his nonage to have been suspected of folly, and to have been nicknamed from thence Coalemos, as his grandfather had been before him; but Valerius Maximus says rightly, that this folly of his greatly benefited the Athenian state, and that his subsequent behaviour constrained those who thought him a fool to condemn themselves of folly. The truth seems to be, that he did not affect learning, which seemed so strange to the Athenians, that they took it for granted he would prove a blockhead; Cornelius Nepos however commends him for his eloquence, which some have thought incompatible with his want of learning, in which, perhaps, they are mistaken; for as there is an artificial or rhetorical eloquence, so there is also a natural ability of speaking, which custom improves into an easy persuasive oratory, more pleasing to a mixed audience than the most artful and regular speeches; and this we may suppose was that kind of eloquence in which Cimon excelled. He went, while a very youth, into the army, and learned under the most experienced commanders the art of war, and the ambition of distinguishing himself as a great commander. His person was handsome, his stature just, his aspect manly, his hair thick and curled, his behaviour affable, his temper sweet, and his mind honest. But as all men have their faults, so this great Athenian wanted not his, which were a strong passion for women, and an inclination to feasting and good company; besides his sister Elpinice, whom for a while he kept as his wife, he had several other mistresses; yet he was passionately fond of his wife, whose name was Isodice, the daughter of Euripolemus, the son of Megacles; when the Athenians were in humour with him, they overlooked these faults; but when they took it into their heads to be angry with him, they suffered their poets to treat him with great rudeness: As for example, Eupolis, about the time of his banishment, wrote a piece in which were the following verses relating to Cimon:

In him ill-nature we cannot reproach,
But he is indolent, and will debauch;
He's gone to Sparta, and was so unkind,
To leave his poor Elpinice behind.

After reporting this, it is fit for us to observe, that Plutarch treats it as a downright calumny, and is of opinion, that Cimon never suffered his pleasures to interfere with the business of the state, of which it seems, his victories should be an incontestable proof. His attachment to the Lacedæmonians was the sole cause of his banishment; for as we observed in giving our readers his character, he was never suspected by the people of having any design to aggrandize himself at their expence; true it is that he

- a THE affairs of Athens began to be suddenly and sorely disturbed after the death of Cimon, for being alike hated by the enemies and their allies, the least unlucky accident furnished a handle for new revolts or invasions. The Megarians were the first in this business, their little state, which lay in an angle of Attica, had been long under the protection, which was but another word for being under the dominion of Athens, and had brought them into several quarrels with their neighbours. But now it seems, those of Megara, either forgetting the obligations conferred upon them by the Athenians, or else conceiving that no obligations could warrant the treatment they received, disclaimed all dependence on Athens, and entered into a strict league with her constant and avowed enemy Lacedæmon. The Athenians, as soon as they
- b were informed of this, ravaged their little country, and for a time blocked up the Megarians, in their city. The Lacedæmonians quickly resented this proceeding, and hearing that Pericles the Athenian general was employed another way, they made a great irruption into Attica, and did abundance of mischief; upon which Pericles, who was marched against Eubœa, was recalled in haste to assist his country. Upon his return, he did not, as many expected, immediately attack the Lacedæmonian army; but considering that it was led by a very young man, Phisonax, then king of Sparta, who had with him one Chandrides for a tutor, he sent the latter a considerable sum of money, and thereby procured the return of the Lacedæmonian army without blows. When Pericles came to make up his accounts, he thought fit to charge ten talents laid
- c out in a fit manner on a proper occasion; at another time the Athenians would not have bore with such an article in a public account, but Pericles had such an ascendancy over them, and they were so thoroughly sensible how this money had been applied, that they paid his accounts without a word, and ordered him to prosecute the expedition against Eubœa, in which he had been before employed.

WHILE Pericles was at home in the winter, Tolmides, who had done such great things for the Athenians, resolved to make an expedition into Boœtia with a small body of troops, and in a very advanced season of the year; a great number of the bravest Athenians, readily engaged to serve under this famous general as volunteers. Yet

d Pericles was constantly against it, pressing Tolmides to wait a little, and to join in his conduct prudence with valour. But he seeming to take this amiss, and not greatly to relish another's meddling in his affairs, Pericles told him calmly, If you will not listen to my advice, yet certainly it won't be amiss if you wait time's leisure a little, who, let me tell you, Sir, is the wisest of all counsellors. This saying being presently divulged, became afterwards exceedingly beneficial to Pericles; for Tolmides, after doing great things in Boœtia, was attacked by the confederate army composed of the quotas sent from all the little states of that country, killed, and his army routed at Cheronea. This ■ DIONOR. SICUL. lib. xii. p. 293. PLUT. in vit. Periclis.

he had a most extraordinary respect for that nation, arising not only from the kindness that they had shewn him, but from the honesty of his temper, which suited better with the severe virtue of Sparta, than with the sprightly levity of the Athenians. One thing is exceeding odd in Cimon's conduct, that he gave his children such names as did not seem to speak them Athenians; for he named his three sons, Lacedæmonius, Eleus, and Thessalus; most authors are of opinion that he had these by a woman of Clitorium, though Diodorus the geographer asserts, that they were the children of his wife Isodice. It is clear from all the writers who mention this great man, that even his banishment neither altered his conduct towards the Lacedæmonians, or towards his countrymen. He would have fought for the latter against the former at the battle of Tanagra; he had interest enough with the former to reconcile them to the latter after he was recalled, which shews how steady he was in his conduct, and what a high opinion all his contemporaries conceived of his virtues at home and abroad. Two remarkable incidents relating to his last expedition are preserved in history; the first, that when he was about to embark for Cyprus, he dreamed that an angry bitch barked at him, and in the midst of her barking uttered the following lines:

Go on, yet shortly shalt thou be
A friend unto my whelps and me.

Asthyphylus of Posidonium interpreted this dream thus; a dog, said he, is an enemy to him he barks at; a man can only be styled a friend to his enemies when he is dead; that mixture of a human voice with barking which appeared hideous in the bitch, this interpreter affirmed, signified the Mædes, whose armies were constantly made up of Barbarians and Greeks, yet in spite of this he set sail, and proceeded in his expedition. The second circumstance worthy of note, was, when he had arrived at Cyprus, having formed some great project in his head, he sent persons in whom he could confide to consult the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, as to his success; the oracle readily gave them this answer: You may return, for Cimon is already with me. The messengers on their return found that Cimon was at that time dead; he was somewhat younger than Themistocles, but what his age was at the time of his death, that we know not (82).

(82) Thucyd. lib. i. Diodor. Sicul. Biblioth. lib. xi. xii. Plut. in vit. Cimon. Corn. Nepos, in vit. ejusd. Cicero. de Offic. lib. ii.

Truce between Athens and Sparta.
Year after
the flood 2553.
Before Christ
446.

defeat terribly humbled the Athenians, for in order to redeem their prisoners, they ^a were constrained to renounce all pretence of dominion over the cities of Boeotia, and while this was doing, many other little states declared against the Athenians ^b.

Pericles, notwithstanding all these checks, marched with an army into Eubœa, from whence a new revolt of the Megarians caused him to be recalled, but within a short time he re-entered that island, and made himself master of the city of Hestia; the inhabitants of which, to terrify the rest of the country, he ejected, and placed a colony of Athenians in their stead. A short time after the rest of Eubœa submitted, and the Lacedæmonians finding it no longer for their interest to carry on the war, a negotiation was set on foot, whereby a peace was effected for thirty years, Callias and Chæres being plenipotentiaries for the Athenians ^c.

ABOUT this time Psammetycus, king of Lybia, or, as Plutarch calls him, of Egypt, sent by way of present to the Athenian people forty-thousand bushels of wheat, which proved a great misfortune to the city; for Pericles, out of spite to Cimon's family, who had children by an Arcadian woman, had preferred a law, whereby Athenians of the half blood were disfranchised; this law, on account of the division of the corn before-mentioned, was prosecuted with such severity and effect, that no less than five-thousand persons, who till then had been considered as freemen, were sold as slaves; a most exorbitant stroke of arbitrary power, punished afterwards by the hand of heaven, in taking away all Pericles's children of the whole blood, and obliging him to intreat the Athenians to cancel this law out of pity to him, its author, ^c who without the least compassion, had suffered five-thousand men to be made slaves at once under colour thereof. One thing this severity of his produced, which has been extremely useful to the critics, viz. the settling exactly the number of the Athenian citizens at this time, when in the midst of so many enemies, Athens durst think of sending out colonies, humbling her neighbours, subduing foreigners, and even of erecting an universal monarchy. This number, as it is set down by Plutarch, was found on the poll to be no more than fourteen-thousand and forty persons ^a.

THE year after this, that is, in the beginning of the eighty-fourth olympiad, the Sybarites, a people of Italy, being a second time driven from their city by the Crotonians, sent ambassadors into Greece, and humbly besought the Lacedæmonians ^d and Athenians to restore them, and to send a colony to share with them the new city they resolved to build. The Lacedæmonians rejected their request, but the Athenians, who delighted much in such applications, readily yielded to it; and not only dispatched ten ships, with a considerable body of men on board, under the command of Lampo and Xenocrates; but also caused a proclamation to be made throughout all Peloponnesus, that such as were willing to go and settle in Italy, might do so under the protection of their fleet, and abundance of people accepting the proposition, the Sybarites, by the assistance of these new-comers, re-established themselves in their country, and built a new city which they called Tburium, from whence themselves were afterwards stiled Tburians ^e (E).

AT

^b THUCID. lib. i. PLUT. ubi supra. DIOD. SICUL. Biblioth. lib. xii. p. 293. ^c THUCID. DIOD. PLUT. ubi supra. ^d PLUT. in vit. Periclis. ^e DIOD. SICUL. Biblioth. lib. xii. p. 295.

(E) In order to conceive rightly of this business, the reader must ascend a good deal higher in point of time, and trace the cause of the erection of Tburium back to the foundation of Sybaris, he will then see how the Greeks settled colonies, maintained and restored them. Sybaris was a colony of the Achæans and Træxenians, it stood on the gulph of Tarentum, between the rivers Crathis and Sybaris, from which last it took its name (83). The felicity of its situation was such, that in a very short space of time it excelled all the cities in its neighbourhood in wealth, power, and people. By degrees it spread its dominion over four small nations inhabiting this part of Italy, and reckoned no less than twenty-five smaller cities than itself within its territory, so thoroughly peopled, that they could on an emergency bring three-hundred-thousand men into the field. In consequence of its prosperity Sybaris became formidable and even hateful to its neighbours. Their immense wealth making its inhabitants at once luxurious and insolent, so that they neither knew how to behave towards others, or with what to content themselves (84). Telys being king of Sybaris, as Herodotus says (85), or as Diodorus with greater probability affirms, Demagogeus, i. e. a ruler in right of his eloquence, persuaded the people upon various accusations to banish five-hundred of their most considerable citizens, and to confiscate their estates. The exiles immediately fled for refuge to Crotone, and as suppliants fell down before the altars in the forum. In a very short space, Telys engaged the Sybarites to send deputies to Crotone, to demand, that those they had banished should be delivered up, threatening war in case of refusal. The Crotonians upon this were much at a loss what to do, at last they determined to protect at all events those who had fled to them, and to oppose force by force. The Sybarites took the field with 30,000 men, the Crotonians

(83) Steph. de Urb. (84) Aristot. de Rep. lib. v. sect. 3. Strab. lib. vi. p. 263. Marcian, p. 14.
Diod. Sicul. lib. xii. (85) lib. v. p. 346.

- a At the close of the eighty-fourth olympiad, according to the computation of Diodorus Siculus, and six years after the conclusion of the peace between Athens and Sparta, as Thucydides relates, a war broke out between the Samians and Milesians about the city of Priene, seated under mount Micale in Ionian; how this war came to affect the Athenians is not very clear; Diodorus says, that the Samians, who were victors, conceiving that the Athenians favoured their enemies, revolted from them; Thucydides says, that the vanquished complained to the people of Athens, who were likewise desired by some Samian malecontents to send a sufficient force thither, in order to change the government, and settle a democracy. Plutarch intimates that the Athenians having directed both parties to lay down their arms, and submit to their
- b decision, the Samians refused so to do, whereupon the war was commenced. There is yet another reason assigned, which seems at least as well founded as any of the rest; and it is this, that Pericles engaged the Athenians in this war to gratify his mistress Aspasia a Milesian, one of the handsomest women in her time, and who had such an ascendancy over Pericles, that for her sake he sacrificed his family and his peace (F). However it was, war was decreed against the Samians, and Pericles was Ionians were able to raise no more than 100000; however valour prevailed over numbers, and the Crotonians having beaten the Sybarites, killed all without quarter, and in the end sacked and destroyed the city. This happened in the third year of the lxxviii olympiad. In the fourth year of the lxxxi olympiad, the city of Sybaris was resealed by the Thesfalians, but in the first year of the lxxxiii olympiad, the Crotonians overthrew it again. After this last misfortune, the Sybarites made the application mentioned in the text to the Spartans and Athenians. Lampo and Xenocrates who commanded the Athenian squadron, found it no difficult task to collect volunteers in Peloponnesus, when the Pythian oracle had declared that the city should be exceedingly prospered if they founded it where the water was scarce, and bread without measure. When they arrived therefore in Italy, and began to search through the territory of Sybaris for such a place as suited the oracle, they found at last a small spring which was called Thuria, the water of which was conveyed through a brazen pipe that was called Medymnum. Concluding instantly that this was the situation pointed out by the oracle, they began to lay out the city which they came to build, and from the spring before-mentioned called it Thurium. They who had the direction of the buildings contrived to have four streets in length called, Heraclea, Apbrodisiade, Olympiad, and Dionysiad, and three in breadth, viz. Heræa, Thuria, and Thurina. When the business was executed according to this scheme, and the city completed, it appeared wonderfully neat and compact, every thing being so disposed as to be at once beautiful and commodious. Peace did not long inhabit these new raised dwellings, the Sybarites conceiving that in their own country they ought to rule all, shut out the new comers from all employments and honours, which so disgusted them who were by far the majority, that they suddenly took up arms, fell on the Sybarites, extirpated them, and sending for fresh supplies from Greece, formed themselves into a commonwealth, making Charondas, one of their fellow-citizens, their legislator. The subsequent history of Thurium will be found in its proper place. From what is said here, the circumstances attending establishing colonies will be sufficiently understood, as also the conveniences flowing to their mother cities from these kind of settlements, which was the principal intent of this long note (86).

(F) Aspasia, who is to be the subject of this note, was one of the most famous women in all antiquity on account both of her virtue and her vices. She was lovely in her person, admirable from her natural endowments, and no less distinguished by the accomplishments she had acquired. Her birth-place was Miletum a city in Ionian, famous for producing persons of extraordinary abilities. She was the tutress, mistress, and at last wife to Pericles, who by his eloquence ruled Athens, and as such claims a place here. The time of her birth can only be guessed at, she was in all probability about fifteen years younger than Pericles, and therefore might be born about the fourth year of the lxxviii olympiad. Her father's name was Axiochus, but of his quality we are ignorant. How she came to Athens is also a point unsettled; but as to the remaining part of her history we are not so much in the dark. She rendered herself conspicuous by her perfection in the art of speaking, which she possessed in a superlative degree, being also admirably versed in all the branches of useful literature, particularly natural philosophy and politics. One Thragelia an Ionian was her model, she had made herself conspicuous in Greece by her charms, addicted herself chiefly to the grandees, many of whom she brought over to the interest of the great king, and, as Plutarch says, sowed the first seeds of the Median faction in most of the cities of Greece. Aspasia resembled her, and even surpassed her. It is not to be imagined that this fair one excelled (like some of our age) in light and amorous discourses. Her discourses were on the contrary not more brilliant than solid. It was even believed by the most intelligent Athenians, and amongst them by Socrates himself, that Aspasia composed the celebrated harangue hereafter mentioned, which Pericles pronounced with so much applause. What then must we conceive of her abilities, who had Pericles for a lover, and Socrates for a disciple? Whose fine qualities atoned even for want of reputation, and engaged the most considerable persons in Athens, not only to visit her, but to bring their wives to hear her lectures, though they detested her conduct? As eloquence was of all others the most necessary talent to an Athenian statesman, so Pericles, on hearing Aspasia determined to become her scholar, observing that with an exact method she mingled the most warm and pathetic strokes of persuasive oratory, uniting the symmetry arising from art, with the vehemence flowing from nature. From admiring her wisdom, this great Athenian fell soon into a deep affection for her person, a thing not wonderful in itself, and less so, if what most writers report of Pericles be true, that he was of a very amorous disposition. Certain it is, that Aspasia gained an absolute dominion over him, and had as great an ascendancy over his genius as he had over the Athenians. Plutarch reports, that as often as Pericles went to, or returned from the forum, he went

(86) Diodor. Sicul. ubi. supra.

sent against them with a fleet of forty sail; he presently brought them into subjection, and began to change all things according to his will, directing first that the government should be democratical for the future, and that fifty hostages of principal persons should be delivered to him with as many children. Plutarch says, that all imaginable methods were tried to soften Pericles upon this occasion; the hostages offered him a talent a-head by way of ransom; those who disliked the democracy proffered him a large sum if he would leave the government as he found it, and Pissuthnes the governor of Sardis for the Persian king, thinking an aristocratic government in Samos more advantageous to his master, would have given ten thousand pieces of gold to have made up this breach with the Athenians; but Pericles b having no respect to money, he carried away the hostages to Lemnos, and established the democracy in Samos as he had been directed to do. But as governments founded in force seldom last long, the Samians fell into mighty dissensions as soon as Pericles was gone home. Some of them who had retired to Pissuthnes having procured from him an aid of seven-hundred men, returned into their own country, and their faction opening the gates to them, those of the opposite party were ejected, and the Athenian garison expelled; they procured also their hostages to be privately sent away from Lemnos, and having drawn the Byzantines to their party, they declared themselves open enemies to Athens. That city, unused to bear insults, immediately equipped sixty galleys, and sent them under Pericles to subdue the Samians a second time.

WHEN Pericles was at sea with this fleet, he found it necessary to detach sixteen ships, as well to gain intelligence of the Phœnician fleet, as to hasten the auxiliary squadrons he expected from Cbios and Lesbos; with the forty-four remaining vessels he engaged the Samians and their allies, though their fleet consisted of seventy sail, and beat them. Being afterwards strengthened by a reinforcement of forty ships from Athens, and twenty-five from Cbios and Lesbos, he besieged Samos by land and sea. Receiving intelligence that the Phœnician fleet was coming to its relief, he sailed with sixty ships to meet it. During his absence the besieged fell upon the

went to the apartment of Aspasia and saluted her. The tenderness this nobleman expressed for Aspasia, made his wife, who was a woman of family, very uneasy, which Pericles perceiving, readily consented that she should betake herself to a husband more agreeable to her (though she had borne him two sons, Xanthippus and Paralus) and then took Aspasia to wife, whom he had so long and ardently loved before. Heraclides of Pontus says, that Pericles having divorced his wife, abandoned himself to his pleasures, and living with Aspasia, spent on her the greatest part of his fortune; but this ought to be regarded as meer calumny, it being morally certain that Pericles in the first place was never profuse, and in the second that Aspasia piqued herself exceedingly on her skill in œconomy. As to the affair spoken of in the text, viz. the Samian war, we are undoubtedly warranted by the authority of Plutarch in what we have advanced. For though it be true that Thucydides makes no mention of Aspasia in his detail of this war, yet that might be owing to the gravity of the author, or to his generous disdain of blackening Pericles, by recording things incapable from their nature of direct proof. As to collateral circumstances tending to support this suggestion, there are many. Aspasia was a Milesian by birth, Pericles was wont to consult her; she is reported to have accompanied him in this expedition, and to have built a temple to perpetuate the memory of his victory; and lastly, she composed, as we remarked before, the funeral oration pronounced by Pericles, in honour of those who were slain in this war. The comic poets, as they lashed Pericles for affecting sovereignty, so they failed not treating Aspasia with the same severity, and as they called him Jupiter, they stiled her Juno; they likewise characterised her under the names of Omphale and Deianira, the one the wife, and the other the mistress of Hercules, and many other ways. Cratinus used her the worst; for he, without palliating the matter, painted her as an abandoned strumpet. It is evident enough that the spleen of Pericles's enemies prompted them to say any thing of him, or of those in his favour, men or women. The former they called the pimps and courtiers of the new Pisistratus, the latter not only his whores, but his bawds. Besides various remarkable events relating to Aspasia, which we shall be constrained to take notice of in the text, it may not be amiss to observe here, that it is generally conceived the son to whom Pericles bequeathed his name and his estate, was by her; certain it is, that son was but of the half blood, as any son of Aspasia's must have been, and that his father, to secure the inheritance to him, prevailed on the people to abrogate the law which himself had procured to exclude such from successions. Besides these circumstances there is another favouring this opinion, viz. that Eupolis the comic poet introducing Pericles asking news of his bastard son, makes the person he speaks to, answer, He is alive and well, and had been married long ago if the fear of meeting with a wife as dishonest as his mother did not deter him. Which is so correspondent with what Eupolis elsewhere says of Aspasia, that one can hardly conceive this son to have sprung from any but her. That she survived Pericles is certain, but for her adventures afterwards we are pretty much in the dark. Plutarch indeed informs us that she attached herself to one Lyficles, a man of mean birth, and as mean parts, whom by her interest however she raised to great employments in the state. What those employments were is not recorded, nor any thing farther of Aspasia which deserves notice (87).

(87) Plutarch. in vit. Periclis. Athén. lib. xiii. p. 560. Cicero in Bruto. Menoxen. Platonis. in tom. ii. A. D. 1578. p. 235, 249.

- a remainder of the Athenian ships under the command of Tesagoras, defeated them, and for fourteen days remained masters of the sea, during which space of time they furnished themselves with whatever they wanted. Plutarch censures Pericles's conduct on this occasion, and attributes the loss which the Athenians sustained to his leaving the siege; but there seems to be no foundation for this, because fighting the Phœnician fleet at sea, rather than in the neighbourhood of Samos, was certainly his interest. On his return to the siege, having received a farther reinforcement of fourscore ships, according to Thucydides; of ninety, as Diodorus tells us, he straitened the Samians more than ever, and having divided his men into eight bodies, kept seven every day on duty, and allowed the eighth to refresh themselves. At length after nine months siege the Samians surrendered, upon which Pericles demolished their walls, seized their ships, and mulcted them in the whole expence of the war, part of which he obliged them to pay down, and took hostages for the remainder^f.

- When Pericles returned from this war, he procured himself to be appointed to pronounce the public oration in commemoration of such as fell in this war, which he did with such eloquence, that when he came down from the pulpit or place where such public declamations were delivered, the ladies gathered about him, took him by the hand, and crowned him with garlands. Amongst the rest Elpinice drew near him, but not with the same intention with the rest, for she addressed him in these words:
- c "These are brave things, Pericles, that you have done, and such certainly as deserve these wreaths of glory, who have deprived us of so many worthy citizens, not in a war against Phœnicians or Medes, the natural enemies of our country, for such my brother Cimon waged; but in the overthrow of a city that was in alliance with us, whose people spoke the same language, and were of our kindred". Pericles gave a strong instance of his great composure and readiness of mind on this occasion, for he repeated carelessly the following verses from the poet Archilocus:

- d A dame like you in deep decline,
Should not attempt by art to shine;
You should not powder thus your hair,
Nor should your unguents taint the air;
Follies which suit the young and fair.

- In recording these passages we had the reader's profit as well as pleasure in view, for they shew that as absolute as Pericles was become in Athens, by dint of his eloquence and good fortune, yet even a woman could and durst distinguish between the services done the state by a patriot general, one who fought nothing but to exalt the interest and glory of his country, and him who had the preservation of his own power chiefly in view. They shew too the particular grandeur of mind inherent in Pericles, who was not to be ruffled even by the shrewdest speeches, but maintained always such an equality of temper as enabled him to make such an answer as was most proper on every occasion^g. It is on all hands confessed that Pericles valued himself very much on the reduction of Samos, and Thucydides gives us great reason to believe that the Athenians conceived highly of him for that exploit; the Samians at the time he destroyed them being one of the most flourishing nations in that part of the world, and who bid fair for wresting from the Athenians the dominion of the sea^h.

- The war between the Cercyrians and Corinthians commenced a little after this, and drew by degrees the Athenians into those engagements, which at last proved the ruin of their state. There is a necessity therefore that we should give here a succinct account of the causes of this war, and of the methods by which the Athenians were drawn to take part in it. An intestine war breaking out in the little territory of Epidamnium, a city in Macedonia, founded by the Cercyrians, one party called in the Illyrians to their assistance, and the other finding themselves straitened, applied themselves for aid to the people of Cercyra. They neglecting the business the people of Epidamnium sent to Corinth for succours, owing her for their founders, because the Cercyrians were a colony from Corinth. The Corinthians, partly out of pity to the Epidamnians, and partly out of spleen to the Cercyrians, sent a very great fleet to the assistance of the former, which thoroughly established that party which had applied to Corinth; this being resented by the Corcyrians, they sent a fleet to Epidamnus to support the exiles, who on its arrival at that port did not act offensively, the chief commanders having instructions to propose an amicable composition of all differences, into which the Corinthians would by no means come. The next year the Corcyrians beat the Corinthians and their allies at sea, and took Epidamnus by storm, after which they wasted the dominion of the confederates of the Corinthians, which greatly exasperated the latter. At Corinth therefore they began to make new preparations for carrying on the war, and pressed their confederates to do the same, that they might be in a condition to retrieve the honour they had lost, and humble this ungrateful colony, which had taken upon her to insult her mother city. When the Corcyrians received advice of these proceedings, they instantly dispatched b ambassadors to carry their complaints to Athens, and the Corinthians on the receipt of this news, dispatched theirs likewise; both on the same errand, and with equal hopes¹.

^f THUCYDID. lib. i. de Bello Pelopon. PLUTARCH. in vit. Periclis. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xii. p. 302.
^g PLUTARCH. in vit. Periclis. ^h de Bello Pelop. lib. i.

THERE could be nothing more glorious for the Athenians than such an application as this, which seemed to acknowledge the legality of that dominion which this state had always affected. Thucydides therefore, who begins his history with the story of this war, hath given us at large the harangues, as well of the Corinthian as of the Corcyrian ambassadors, to which we must refer our readers. At first the Athenian people approved the cause of the Corinthians, but they soon changed their minds, and took part with the Corcyrians, yet they did not make a league offensive and defensive with that state, because by such a step Athens would immediately have broken with Corinth, and all her allies; they contented themselves with making a defensive alliance only with the Corcyrians, whereby both parties reciprocally promised to assist each other in case either should be attacked. It does not appear that the Athenians entered much into the merits of this cause; they were become too great politicians for that; the reasons assigned by Thucydides, who was perfectly well acquainted with them, are these; first, Corcyra was a very great maritime power; secondly this island lay very convenient for assisting Athens in her designs on Italy and Sicily; when the Corinthian fleet therefore was ready to sail, the Athenians, according to their treaty, sent ten galleys to Corcyra under the command of Lacedæmonius the son of Cimon, with whom were joined Diotenes and Proteus, as colleagues. Plutarch says that Pericles, by sending this small squadron under Lacedæmonius, intended to affront him, or at least to put it out of his power to do any great matter, whereby to revive the ancient splendor of his family, against which that great politician had always a pique. But there seems to be very little colour for this. Thucydides says, that the Athenians, who were indeed under the direction of Pericles's counsels, did not intend the Corcyrians any real assistance, but sent this small squadron to look on while the Corinthians and Corcyrians weakened and wasted each other. The Corinthians, as soon as the Season of the year permitted, made for the coast of Corcyra with a fleet consisting of one hundred and fifty sail under the command of Xenoclides, assisted by four other Corinthian admirals, each squadron of their allies being commanded by a chief of their own. The Corcyrians prepared as well as they could for the reception of this great armada; they put to sea a fleet of one hundred and ten galleys, which by the Athenian ships was augmented to one hundred and twenty; as soon as the navies were in sight, they prepared for an engagement. The Corcyrians gave the right wing to their allies, the Athenians ranging their own fleet in three squadrons, each commanded by an admiral of reputation. The Corinthians gave their right wing to the Megarians, and other of their allies, disposed the rest of them in the centre, and placed their own galleys in the left, that they might engage the Athenians. The action was very brisk for a time, the Corcyrian right wing broke the left of the Corinthian fleet, and forcing some of the ships on shore, landed, pillaged their camp, and made a great number of prisoners; on the other hand the Corinthian ships in their left wing beat the right wing of the Corcyrians, whom the Athenians, according to their instructions, aided but faintly; at last the Corinthians charging them briskly, the Athenians were obliged to defend themselves, which they did so well, that the Corinthians were glad to retire, which accordingly they did after taking up part of the broken ships, and most of their own dead. The next day the Corinthians resolved to attack the Corcyrians again, who

¹ Thucid. ubi supra. Diodor. Sicul. Biblioth. lib. xii.

- a prepared on their side to receive them ; but when the action was ready to begin, the Corinthians of a sudden retired, which the Corcyrians knew not what to make of, till the arrival of a fleet of twenty sail from Athens put it out of doubt, that the Corinthians seeing them, and fearing there might be more behind them, had wisely chosen to withdraw. The next day the Athenian and Corcyrian fleets went and braved the Corinthians in their harbour, who would not be provoked to hazard an engagement, because all the ships from Athens were clean, and the Athenians, for ought they knew, might have another fleet waiting for them in their return to Peloponnesus. Both sides claimed the victory, and both erected trophies at Sybotis. The Corinthians because they remained masters of the field of battle, had carried away a part of the broken vessels, made a thousand prisoners, and sunk seventy of the Corcyrian ships ; the Corcyrians, because by the assistance of the Athenians they had sunk thirty of the Corinthian vessels, taken some spoils, and forced them to retire home. This was the greatest sea-fight, which to this time had happened among the Greeks, there being no less than two-hundred and seventy vessels engaged. The Corinthians complained loudly against the Athenians, as if they had broken the peace ; the Athenians, on the other hand, alledged, they had only assisted their allies ; and thus these states began to hate each other. As for the prisoners made by the Corinthians, they sold eight-hundred of them for slaves, the rest they used kindly, in hopes of making use of them for facilitating a peace ^e.
- c THE Corcyrian war was followed by the revolt of Potidea, a town in Macedonia, ^{The revolt of Potidea.} founded by the Corinthians, but joined in alliance to Athens. As soon as the Corcyrian war broke out, the Athenians sent orders to the citizens of Potidea, immediately to demolish a part of the wall of their city, to send back the magistrates whom they had received from Corinth, and to give hostages for their own behaviour. Perdiccas, king of Macedon, hating the Athenians, took this opportunity to persuade the Potideans to revolt, which accordingly they did, though they sent ambassadors to Athens, to entreat the revocation of the orders sent them ; but in the mean time they sent deputies to Sparta, to join with the Corinthians and Megarians, in their complaints of the Athenians. The Athenians, in the mean time, sent a considerable fleet against Macedonia, and some time after, another with a considerable body of land troops on board under the command of Calias, a man of great quality and courage. The Corinthians on their side dispatched Aristeus with a considerable force to the assistance of the Potideans. Not to detain the reader too long with a detail of all the little circumstances of this war, which may be found in the accurate history of Thucydides, we shall content ourselves with observing, that an engagement happened before Potidea, in which the Athenians were victors, but with the loss of their general Calias. Pbormio, who succeeded him in his command, invested the city in form, and shut up its port with his fleet ; but the Potideans, dreading to fall into the hands of the Athenians, made a most obstinate defence, while in the mean time they warmly solicited the Corinthians to perform their promises, and to engage the rest of the states of Peloponnesus in their quarrel ^d.
- e WHILE affairs abroad were in this condition, the Athenians were very far from ^{Diffensions at Athens.} being quiet at home ; Pericles had attained such a superiority as had never been seen in Athens since the days of Pisistratus ; the last competitor with him for the favour of the people was Thucydides, a man noble by birth, and of qualifications suiting therewith ; he endeavoured to the utmost to hinder those alterations in government which the popular party sought to bring about, and more especially opposed Pericles, who perceiving that one of them must give way, put the matter to the test by procuring an ostracism, wherein, upon counting the votes, it was found, that Thucydides was exiled by the people. From this time forward Pericles altered the whole tenor of his conduct, and behaved rather like a prince than a private man ; for he procured all things to be at his disposal, and took the whole management of the Athenian affairs at home and abroad upon himself. When the state of things began to have an ominous appearance, and the Athenians apprehended a war in which they should be obliged to contend, not for spoil, for glory, or authority, but for their lands and houses, and whatsoever was dear to them, they grew out of humour with Pericles, and received readily for truth whatever the envy of his enemies prompted them to say of him. For example, when Menon, one of Phidias's workmen preferred a petition to the people, wherein he charged that excellent statuary with purloining a part of the gold which had been delivered to him for the statue of Minerva, many reasons induced such as disliked Pericles to abet this prosecution, among the rest these two; first, they conceived that they should try the minds of the people by this step, and discover whether they were at present disposed to bear with the prosecution of Pericles or not; secondly, they thought to revenge themselves on the statuary, for having inserted a picture of Pericles fighting with an Amazon in the shield of the goddess. But in the end this business had an issue little expected, for Phidias having declared that by Pericles's direction the gold was so laid on, that the whole of it might be taken off without injury to the figure, the experiment was made accordingly, and the weight found to be just. However, Phidias either died in prison or was banished; Plutarch says that he was poisoned by the procurement of Pericles's enemies, who afterwards sought to charge it upon him^m. Hermippus next accused Aspasia of impiety or irreligion, as also for being a bawd to Pericles, and as such seducing the wives and daughters of Athenian citizens; Diopithes preferred a psephium or decree to the people, that it might be rendered criminal not to inform the proper court, i. e. the Areopagus, against such persons as disputed the religion of their country, or taught such things under colour of natural philosophy in relation to celestial bodies, as were inconsistent therewith. This was known to strike at Anaxagoras, the preceptor of Pericles, and even at Pericles himself. The people assented thereto, and in consequence thereof, Anaxagoras was judicially accused (G). To wind up Pericles's troubles, Dracontides moved, that Pericles might bring in his accounts, and that the final decision of his cause should be committed to judges, who should write their suffrages upon billets taken from the altarsⁿ. Our great orator found means to disengage himself from all these snares, he appeared in person, for Aspasia pleaded her cause as an advocate; but in the midst of his pleadings let fall a shower of tears like a child, which was the more remarkable, because

^e THUCID. ubi supra. DIOD. SICUL. lib. xii. PLUT. in vit. Periclis. ^d THUCYD. lib. i. DIOD. lib. xii.

^m DIOP. lib. xii. c. 7. PLUT. in vit. Periclis. ⁿ DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra. DIOGEN. LAERT. in vit. ANAX.

(G) It is not clearly expressed by Plutarch, on what account either Aspasia or Anaxagoras was accused of impiety; however, it is not hard to conjecture, that persons, eminent as they were, for the brilliancy of their parts, and for their great knowledge in natural philosophy, should be suspected on account of their notions of religion, in a country, where even in Hesiod's time they had no less than thirty thousand gods, for whose honour their votaries were wonderfully zealous. As to Anaxagoras, we shall have elsewhere occasion to mention him, and his opinions; at present we will stick to the point before us, and say nothing but what relates to this prosecution, its causes and consequences. Laertius reports from one Satius, who wrote a book of the succession of philosophy, that Anaxagoras was accused by Cleon of impiety, for asserting the sun to be a burning plate; but that being defended by Pericles, his scholar, he was fined five talents, and banished, whereas Satyrus reported that he was accused by Thucydides, not only of propagating of impious opinions, but of holding intelligence with the Persians, and in his absence sentenced to die. Hieronymus wrote, that Pericles brought him into court in poor garments, and much broken with sickness, which moved his judges to compassion, Suidas is positive, that he was cast into prison for introducing a new opinion, concerning the divine nature, and banished, notwithstanding Pericles undertook to plead his cause. Josephus tells us, that the Athenians believing the sun to be a god, and he affirming it to be without sense and knowledge, they adjudged him to suffer death as a blasphemer. None of these opinions quadrate with Plutarch's account, and, which is still worse, Plutarch does not agree with himself; for, though speaking of his retirement from Athens, he ascribes it to Pericles's precaution, yet he elsewhere admits, that Anaxagoras was accused. The truth seems to be, that the whole tenor of Anaxagoras's philosophy was according to the religious notions of the Athenians, impious. For he taught that matter was composed of infinite similar atoms, as gold is of grains, and that they were disposed in the frame we see them, by an infinite self-moving mind; whence he acquired from the novelty of his doctrine the surname of Nous, i. e. the mind. He lived after his banishment at Lampsacus, and was so little affected therewith, that when a person told him one day, You are deprived of the Athenians: He answered, You are mistaken, friend, they are deprived of me. As to his notion of the sun, he retained it to his death; what that notion was, we learn from various authors, who agree that he thought it to have been a burning mass, many times bigger than Peloponnesus, and that its revolution was occasioned by the repulse of the northern air; he held the moon to be a dark body enlightened by the sun, habitable, having plains, hills, and water, which he inferred from the inequality of her surface. He asserted likewise that the stars were earthy; which opinions we mention here, because they were all contrary to the Athenian religion. His scholars were the greatest men of Greece, but all suspected of irreligion. To mention only a few, Archelaus the philosopher, Euripides the tragic poet, Socrates the famous moralist, who heard both him and Aspasia; some say, that Democritus was also his hearer; but Isartius affirms that Anaxagoras could not endure him, which Phavorinus likewise asserts (88).

(88) Diogen. in vit. Anaxag. Plut. in vit. Periclis. Id. de superst.

a he had never been known to weep before; and thus either the force of his eloquence, or the sight of his grief, engaged the judges to acquit her. As for Anaxagoras, he was afraid to trust his eloquence with the defence of him whose wisdom was his only crime, and therefore wisely sent him out of Attica, with this mark of respect however, that he attended him in person. As for what was objected to his own conduct, he was in the least pain about it; for being a very exact oeconomist, he was able to shew two things from it, that he had always lived within the bounds of his fortune; and secondly, that he had no more than his father left him. This, as Thucydides observes, was the very basis of his greatness, that he was universally known to be strictly just to the public, above corruption, and through the innocence of his b actions, in respect to pecuniary affairs, superior to all the calumnies that could be raised against him.

THE Spartans having heard all that the little states of Greece had to say against the Athenians, and last of all the Corinthians; ambassadors were sent to Athens, to demand reparation for the injuries, or to denounce war in case of refusal. Thucydides, of all ancient authors the most to be relied on, tells us, that they demanded in the first place, the expulsion of those Athenians who were stiled execrable on account of the old business of Cylon, and his associates, because by his mother's side, Pericles was allied to the family of Megacles; they next insisted that the siege of Potidea should be raised; thirdly, that the inhabitants of Egina should be left free; and lastly, that the decree c made against the Megarians, whereby they were forbid the ports and markets of Athens on pain of death, should be rescinded, and the Grecian states set at liberty, who were under the dominion of Athens. It is certain, that Pericles persuaded the Athenians to reject these terms, but authors are not well agreed upon what motives he acted; some say, that he thought the din of war would dissipate that cloud of impeachments which his enemies were framing against him; others, that personal injuries done to him and to Aspasia, provoked him to fall into these measures; the most probable seems to be, that he advised the Athenians according to his apprehension of the affair, and directed such measures as he thought suited best with the dignity of the Athenian state. The harangue attributed to him by Thucydides, and which we d have no reason to doubt is to the same effect with that which he delivered, offers the following argument to the consideration of the Athenians. That whatever the Lacedemonians might pretend, as to the complaints of the allies, and injustice of them, the true ground of this resentment was the prosperity of the Athenian republic; which they always hated, and now sought an opportunity of humbling. That it must be the fault of the Athenians themselves, if they succeeded in this scheme, because for many reasons accurately and judiciously stated by him, they were better able to engage in a long and expensive war, than the Peloponnesians; that therefore it should be proposed as the most feasible, and at the same time the most equitable satisfaction that could be given, that they would reverse their decree against Megara, if the Lacedemonians would allow free egress and regress in their city; to the Athenians and their e allies; that they would leave all those states free, who were free at the making of the last peace with Sparta, provided the Spartans would also leave all states free who were under their dominion; and that future disputes should be submitted to arbitration. In case these offers should not prevail, he advised them to hazard a war, telling them that they ought not to think they ran such a hazard for a trifle, or retain a scruple in their minds, as if a small matter moved them to it, because on this small matter depended their safety, and the reputation of their constancy and resolution; whereas if they yielded in this, the next demand of the Lacedemonians would be of a higher nature; for having once discovered that the Athenians might be taught to fear, they would thence conclude that they durst deny them nothing, whereas a stiff denial in this instance would teach them to treat Athens for the future on terms of equality. He enforced these reasons, by shewing that their ancestors had always acted on the like principles, and had in all cases preferred their glory to their ease, and their liberty to their possessions. Diodorus informs us, that he laid before the people an exact account of their circumstances, putting them in mind that the treasure brought from Delos, amounted to ten thousand talents, and that though four thousand had been expended on the stately gate to their citadel, yet that six thousand were still in hand, that they were also entitled to the subsidies paid by the confederate states, that the statues of the gods, the Perſian ſpoil, and other marks of their magnificence were worth immense ſums, that private men were arrived at vaſt fortunes, and that conſidering their trade by ſea, they had a certain annual increaſe of wealth; that they had an army on foot of twelve thouſand men, and in their colonies and garriſons ſeventeen thouſand; that their fleet conſiſted of three hundred ſail, which might eaſily be increaſed, whereas the Peloponneſians had none of theſe advantages, which alſo Thucydides mentions, but places this oration lower. Theſe were the cauſes, and this the beginning of the famous Peloponneſian war, which though, while it laſted, it brought innumerable evils upon Greece, yet there reſults from it this circumſtance of glory, that perhaps of all the wars which ever happened, the events of this are beſt recorded, ſo that the minuteſt circumſtance thereof are known even in theſe far diſtant times; which ſhews how far learning is preferable to power, ſince now that all the ſtates of Greece have been for many ages ſubverted and deſtroyed, the reſpect due to the writings of Thucydides hath preſerved them, as the merit of Xenophon's hath alſo done his continuation of Thucydides's ſtory, and thereby kept alive the remembrance of actions which however great and glorious in themſelves, had otherwiſe been buried in oblivion (H).

b THUCID. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra.

that

Platæa ſur-
prized by the Thebans.

THINGS being in this ſituation, the Thebans conceiving with themſelves that Platæa, which had been always remarkable for her fidelity to the Athenians, would be a perpetual thorn in their ſides, reſolved to ſurprize it; with this view they ſent Eurymachus at the head of three hundred men, to aſſiſt ſuch of the Platæans c as they had drawn over to their party, in making themſelves maſters of the place. In this deſign they ſucceeded very happily, the Platæans, who had promiſed to open the gates, kept their word exactly, and the Thebans in an inſtant took poſſeſſion of the place. The Platæans, that is, the townſmen in general, perceiving at laſt how ſmall a number the Thebans were, unanimouſly roſe and fell upon them, killing great numbers, and in the end forcing the reſt, with Eurymachus their chief, to render themſelves priſoners of war. It happened that another party from Thebes came to aſſiſt their companions, but came too late, the Platæans foreſeeing that they would waſte their country, they offered to releaſe their priſoners, if they would forbear to ſpoil their lands; but threatened at the ſame time, that if they committed any waſte, d they would put their friends to death. The Thebans upon this withdrew, but the Platæans however put their priſoners to death, alledging that they never promiſed to releaſe them but in caſe of peace; their number was one hundred and eighty, and Eurymachus, as he led them, died with them. The Athenians, as ſoon as they had notice of this attempt of the Thebans, cauſed all the Boeotians in their territory to be arreſted, and when they underſtood how the Platæans had delivered themſelves, they ſent a great convoy of proviſions to that city, and a numerous body of troops to eſcort their wives and children to Athens. The league being now broken on both ſides, each party prepared for the war, both ſent ambaffadors to the Perſians, both ſought to rouse their allies, moſt of the ſtates of Greece were inclined to the Lacedæmonians, becauſe they profeſſed themſelves on this occaſion the deliverers of Greece; they likewiſe hated the Athenians, either becauſe they already oppreſſed

p THUCYD. ubi ſupra. DIODOR. ubi ſupra. PLUT. ubi ſupra. JUSTIN. lib. iii. c. 7. DEMOST. adv. NEXI.

(H) Beſides what is mentioned in the text of Pericles adviſing the Peloponneſian war, to get over an impeachment, there is a famous ſtory related both by Plutarch and Cornelius Nepos, that he was induced thereto by a ſprightly ſaying of young Alcibiades; who ſeeing him melancholy one day, asked him what was the matter, and upon his anſwering that he knew not how to account for the public money that had gone through his hands, Alcibiades ſharply replied, Then ſtudy to give no account at all. Others pretend, that he was the author of the decree againſt Megara to revenge Aspasia, two of whoſe harlots ſome young men of that city had ſtolen away. It is true, that the decree happened on this account, but Pericles does not ſeem to have been any ways guilty; for a herald being diſpatched to Megara, to complain of the injury, he was ſlain upon the road; and this violation of a ſacred character gave birth to the war. The enemies of Pericles indeed ſay, that he cauſed the herald to be ſlain, that he might pick a quarrel with the Megarians; but that the fact was notoriously otherwiſe, f may be gathered from this, that when the emperor Adrian granted many privileges and favours to the cities of Greece, he expreſſly excepted the Megarians, on account of this very murder. If Thucydides had conceived, that any of theſe charges on Pericles had been juſtly founded, he would certainly have reported them. As to the ſcenes of Ariſtophanes, and other comic poets, they ought not in juſtice to paſs for evidence, ſince they were enemies alike to all who were eminent (89).

(89) Plut. in vit. Periclis.

them,

- a them, or because they apprehended that in time they would. With the Spartans joined all the Peloponnesians, except the Argives and part of the Acheans; without Peloponnesus the Megarians, Phocians, Locrians, Boeotians, Ambracotes, Leucadians, and Anaxorians, declared themselves on their side. On the other hand, the Cibians, Lesbians, Plateans, Messenians, Acarnanians, Corcyrians, Zacynthians, Carians, Dorians, Ibracians, the islands for the most part, and all the Cyclades, excepting Melus and Tbera, with Eubaea and Samos. The Lacedemonians assembled their army at the isthmus, but Archidamus the Spartan king, and commander in chief, dispatched a herald to Aibens, before he would enter Attica; this herald was sent back without an answer, which put an end to all motions for peace, the Lacedemonians resolving to act immediately offensively, and the Aibeniens preparing to defend themselves as well as they could.

- Pericles*, as he had engaged his countrymen to undertake this war, so his wisdom seems to have been the only resource they had in it. He was aware that Archidamus being his friend, might forbid the plundering of his estates, of which he immediately gave advice to the people, and to cut off all ground of suspicion, declared that in such a case he made a present of his lands to the public. He then advised that without thinking how to defend their country seats, they should turn all their care to the city, busy themselves especially in equipping their ships, and settle a thorough resolution, not to be intimidated with the first evils of war. The Aibeniens came readily into all that he proposed, and appointed him with nine more generals of all their forces. To say the truth, the Lacedemonians themselves assisted his rise, for their ambassadors continually attacking of him, the Aibeniens apprehended from thence that he of all others must have the greatest regard for their interest. When however the Peloponnesian army advanced as far as Acharne, one of the largest boroughs in Attica, and at a very small distance from Aibens, the Aibeniens began to grow very discontented, and to clamour exceedingly against Pericles, for not so much as attempting to drive them away. In which however he shewed his judgment, for that army consisting of no less than sixty-thousand men, the Aibeniens were unable to set on foot any force capable of looking it in the face; wherefore when some hot men pressed for an engagement, Pericles very prudently said, Trees, when they are lopped and cut, grow up again in a short time; but men once lost, cannot easily be recovered. By degrees the madness of the people grew still more violent, so that he was persecuted with libels of all sorts, and even his own friends pressed him earnestly to alter his conduct, and to attempt something for his own and his country's honour; but he remained firm and calm in the midst of this storm, pursued the plan which he had laid down in spite of the clamour raised against him, and gave a happy turn to all things by the dint of his own magnanimity.

- He sent however a fleet of a hundred galleys with fourteen hundred land-forces on board, which fleet being joined by fifty vessels from Corcyra, coasting the Peloponnesian shore, did infinite mischief, so that its inhabitants had no reason to boast of their expedition into Attica, since they left their own country to feel those miseries which they pretended to inflict upon others. Another Aibenian fleet infested the Locrians, and because Egina had been a principal occasion of the present war, when the fleet returned from Peloponnesus it ejected all the inhabitants of that island, which was repopled from Aibens. They likewise reduced Cephalenia, and several towns in Acarnania and Leucas, while in the mean time Pericles refreshed those who were shut up in the city with distributions of public money, a law for the division of lands, and whatever else he could think of to amuse and divert them. In the autumn, when the Peloponnesians were retired, Pericles, at the head of a great army, entered the Megarian territory, and did all the mischief therein which could be expected from a provoked enemy. The reason of this was, because on their account the Lacedemonians pretended to have made war; thus in the end of this first year the Aibeniens made up accounts as it were with the Peloponnesians, and repaid them those mischiefs, insults, and ravages, which they had committed in Attica at the beginning of it.

In the winter of this year the Aibeniens solemnized in an extraordinary manner the funerals of such as first died in the war after this manner; first their bones were

1 THUCYD. lib. ii. prop. Init. DIODOR. lib. xii.

2 THUCYD. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra.

3 THUCYD. ubi supra. FLUT. ubi supra.

The Peloponnesian war.
Year after the
A.D. 2567.
Before Christ
432.

laid in a tent to be seen of all, and thither their friends were permitted to come in order to pay their last offices to their relations. Then they were carried out, each tribe providing a cypress coffin or coffins, and chariots for their dead, and one empty coffin was carried for such whose bodies had not been recovered, and consequently could not have those honours paid them, the women all the way making loud lamentations for them. They were then interred in a public sepulchre in the Ceramicus, and after burial, a person appointed by the senate of Areopagus, made a funeral oration to their honour; the person appointed on this occasion was Pericles. How he discharged this glorious employment, the reader may be informed from Thucydides, who, if he has not preserved the words of Pericles, has undoubtedly kept strictly to his sense, since he wrote and published his history within so short a time after this happened, that it would have undoubtedly have been decayed, if in all its circumstances it had not been exactly conformable to truth. Thus ended the first year of the Peloponnesian war†.

THE spring of the next year was doubly fatal to Athens; nature afflicted her at home, and the Peloponnesians, under the command of Archidamus, wasted all things abroad; but the plague was the more dreadful enemy of the two, as the reader will easily perceive from the description of Thucydides, who was sick thereof (I). Pericles

† Thucyd. ubi supra. Diodor. ubi supra. Plut. ubi supra.

(I) This plague in Athens makes so remarkable a figure in history, and the description of it by Thucydides has been so much commended, that we should deal unjustly with our readers, if we either omitted the description of this plague, or gave it in other words than those of that accurate historian. When the plague first began among the Athenians, the Peloponnesians had not been long in Attica; but so great a plague, and so fatal as this was, is not remembered to have happened in any place before. For at the first neither were the physicians able to cure it, through ignorance of what it was, but did fastest themselves, as being the men that most approached the sick, nor any other art of man availed whatsoever. All supplications of the gods, and enquiries of oracles, and whatsoever means they used of that kind, proved all unprofitable; inasmuch as, subdued with the greatness of the evil, they gave them all over. It began, by report, first in that part of Ethiopia that lieth upon Egypt, and thence fell down into Egypt and Africk, and into the greatest part of the territories of the king. It invaded Athens on a sudden, and touched first upon those that dwelt in Pyreus, inasmuch as they reported, that the Peloponnesians had cast poison into their wells; for springs there were not any in that place. But afterwards it came up into the high city, and then they died a great deal faster. Now let every man physician, or other speak, concerning the ground of this sickness, whence it sprung, and what causes he thinks able, to produce to great an alteration, speak according to his own knowledge; for my own part, I will deliver but the manner of it, and lay open only such things as one may take his mark by to discover the same, if it come again, having been both sick of it myself, and seen others sick of the same. This year by confession of all men, was of all other for other diseases most free and healthful. If any man was sick before, his disease turned to this; if not, yet suddenly without any apparent cause preceding, and being in perfect health, they were taken first with an extreme ach in their heads, redness and inflammation in their eyes; and then inwardly their throats and tongues grew presently bloody, and their breath noisom and unfavoury. Upon this followed a sneezing and hoarseness, and nor long after, the pain, together with a mighty cough, came down into the breast; and when once it was settled in the stomach, it caused vomit, and with great torment came up all manner of bilious purgation that physicians ever named. Most of them had also the hiccoughs, which brought with it a strong convulsion, and in some ceased quickly, but in others was long before it gave over. Their bodies outwardly to the touch, were neither very hot nor pale, but reddish, livid, and beset with little pimples and wheals; but so burned inwardly, as not to endure any the lightest cloaths or linen garments to be upon them, nor any thing but mere nakedness, but rather most willingly to have cast themselves into the cold water; and many of them that were not looked to, possessed with insatiate thirst, ran into the wells; and to drink much or little was indifferent, being still from ease, and power to sleep as far as ever. As long as the disease was at the height, their bodies wasted not, but resisted the torment beyond all expectation, inasmuch as the most of them either died of their inward burning in nine or seven days, whilst they had yet strength; or if they escaped that, then the disease falling down into their bellies, and causing there great ulcerations and immoderate looseness, they died many of them afterwards, through weakness. For the disease which took first the head, began above, and ran down, and passed through the whole body; and he that overcame the worst of it, was yet marked with the loss of his extreme parts; for breaking out both at their privy members, and at their fingers and toes, many with the loss of these escaped. There were also some that lost their eyes, and many that presently upon their recovery were taken with such an oblivion of all things whatsoever, as they neither knew themselves nor their acquaintance. For this was a kind of sickness which far surmounted all expression of words, and both exceeded human nature in the cruelty wherewith it handled each one, and appeared otherwise, to be none of those diseases that are bred amongst us, and that especially by this: For all, both birds and beasts, that use to feed on human flesh, though many men lay abroad unburied, either came not at them, or tasting, perished. An argument whereof, as touching the birds was the manifest defect of such fowl, which were not then seen, neither about their carcasses, or any where else; but by the dogs, because they are familiar with men, this effect was seen much clearer. So that this disease, to pass over many strange particulars of the accidents that some had differently from others, was in general such as I have shewn; and for other usual sicknesses at that time, no man was troubled with any. Now they died, some for want of attendance, and some again with all the care a in the midst of these distresses retained his courage, and endeavoured to infuse it into his countrymen, though he held them to the observance of the same rule which he had prescribed before, and would not suffer them to stir without the city, either to escape the plague, or infest the enemy. He caused however a great fleet to be equipped, and drew together fifty vessels of the allies of Athens, on board of which, and of a hundred Athenian galleys, he embarked three hundred horse, and four thousand foot, with which he sailed to Epidaurus. The Peloponnesians hearing how great a force he commanded, did as he conceived they would do, that is withdrew their troops out of Attica, after they had wasted it for forty days. Pericles however did no great matter, the plague raging amongst his soldiers and seamen. On his return home, the fleet under the command of Agnon and Cleopompus were sent against Chalcis and Potidea, but carrying the plague with them thither, they were able to do little or nothing, so that after a short stay they returned from thence, also bringing back to Athens about fifteen hundred men out of four thousand, the rest being lost through pestilence and war. These evils drove the Athenians to madness and despair. In vain Pericles made use of all his eloquence to appease them; they sent ambassadors to Lacedæmon to desire a peace, which the Spartans were much too proud to bestow; after this fruitless negotiation, Pericles harangued the assembly afresh, and with the utmost force of reason, sought to combat their apprehensions and fears; when he had done speaking, they confessed he was in the right in advising them to begin the war; yet, distracted with the evils it had brought, they dismissed and fined him; yet with an inconstancy natural to a people, they in a short time recalled him, and vested him with almost absolute authority. But the storms in his family did not blow over so easily; his son Xanthippus quitted his house, because his father would not allow him more money than his estate would bear; but to conceal the true cause, the profligate youth gave out his father conversed criminally with his wife. While this quarrel was open, Xanthippus died of the plague; shortly after him Pe- care and physic that could be used. Nor was there any to say certain medicine that applied must have helped them; for if it did good to one, it did harm to another; nor any difference of body, for strength or weakness, that was able to resist it; but it carried all away, what physic soever was administered. But the greatest misery of all was the dejection of mind in such as found themselves beginning to be sick, for they grew presently desperate, and gave themselves over without making any resistance; as also their dying thus like sheep, infected by mutual visitation: For if men forbore to visit them for fear, then they died forlorn, whereby many families became empty for want of such as should take care of them. If they forbore not, then they died themselves, and principally the honestest men: For out of shame they would not spare themselves, but went in unto their friends, especially after it was come to pass, that even their domestics weaned with the lamentations of them that died, and overcome with the greatness of their calamity, were no longer moved therewith. But those that were recovered, had much compassion both on them that died, and on them that lay sick, as having both known the misery themselves, and now no more subject to the like danger: For this disease never took a man the second time, so as to be mortal. And those men were both by others counted happy, and they also themselves through excess of present joy, conceived a kind of light hope never to die of any sickness hereafter. Besides the present affliction, the reception of the country people, and of their substance into the city, oppressed both them, and much more the people themselves that so came in. For having no houses, but dwelling at that time of the year in stifling booths, the mortality was now without all form, and dying men lay tumbling one upon another in the streets, and men half dead about every conduit through desire of water. The temples also where they dwelt in tents were all full of the dead that died within them; for oppressed with the violence of the calamity, and not knowing what to do, men grew careless both of holy and profane things alike. And the laws which they formerly used touching funerals were all now broken, every one burying where he could find room. And many for want of things necessary, after so many deaths before, were forced to become impudent in the funerals of their friends. For when one had made a funeral pile, another getting before him would throw on his dead, and give it fire. And when one was in burning, another would come, and having cast thereon him whom he carried, go his way again. And the great licentiousness which also in other kinds was used in the city, began at first from this disease. For that which a man before would dissemble, and not acknowledge to be done for voluptuousness, he durst now do freely, seeing before his eyes such quick revolution of the rich dying, and men worth nothing inheriting their estates; insomuch as they justified a speedy fruition of their goods even for their pleasure, as men that thought they held their lives but by the day. As for pains, no man was forward in any action of honour to take any, because they thought it uncertain whether they should die or not before they achieved it. But what any man knew to be delightful, and to be profitable to pleasure, that was made both profitable and honourable. Neither the fear of the gods, nor laws of men, awed any man. Not the former, because they conclude it was alike, to worship, or not worship; from seeing that alike they all perished: Nor the latter, because no man expected that his life would last till he received punishment of his crimes by judgment. But they thought there was now over their heads some far greater judgment decreed against them; before which fell they thought to enjoy some little part of their lives (90).

Pericles's sister died, after her almost all his relations and friends, last of all his second son Paralus. At his funeral, Pericles lost his heroism quite; for going to place a chaplet of flowers on the head of the corps, he burst out into a loud fit of crying, after which being conveyed home, he kept his house closely, and abandoned himself to melancholy. It was then that the Athenians invited him to accept of those honours of which they had stripped him. At the persuasion of Alcibiades, and others of his friends, he came abroad and shewed himself to the people, who received him with acclamations, and at his request cancelled that very unjust law which they had made at his motion for bastardizing all children of the half blood; and hereupon he enrolled a son of his by Aspasia, a freeman of Athens, by the name of Pericles. In the summer of this year, a Peloponnesian navy, of a hundred gallies, wasted the island of Zacynthus, whereby they did much hurt to the inhabitants, and little good to themselves. Towards the end of the summer they sent ambassadors to the king of Persia, to intreat his assistance against his ancient enemies, the Athenians; these ambassadors had it also in commission to make application to Sytaces, king of Thrace; but his son Sadocus being a citizen of Athens, seized them, and delivered them to the Athenians, who put them to death, to teach the Lacedemonians more mercy than they had shewn of late in killing such as they found in their territories, who were natives of places allied to Athens. In the winter the Athenians sent Melissander with a fleet of twenty ships, to Caria and Lycia, where he was slain. About this time Potidea, which had held out from the very beginning of the war, and wherein the people had been driven to the eating of human flesh, yielded to the Athenians, who permitted the men to depart with one garment, and the women with two. This city was repeopled afterwards by a colony from Athens. Such were the events which fell out in the second year of the war.^a

In the spring of the third year, Archidamus, king of Sparta, came with a great army and besieged Platea. The Plateans insisted that Pausanias, after the famous battle in the neighbourhood of their city, had declared them free, wherefore they hoped he would not overturn what his predecessors had solemnly established; but Archidamus insisted that they should forsake the side of the Athenians, give up their city and all that they had during the time of the war, on a promise of having all things restored to them when it should be over. The Plateans were so far from accepting these terms, that they resolved to abide all things rather than desert Athens. Archidamus then wasted their country, but not with impunity; for those of Platea made continual sallies, and cut off great part of his forces; he then caused the city to be set on fire, whereby a great part of it was reduced to ashes, yet this had no effect. In the end therefore, he was constrained to turn his siege into a blockade, and having thrown up an intrenchment, fortified with a deep ditch, he left a sufficient number of men to guard his lines, and then returned back to Peloponnesus. In Thrace and Acarnania the Athenians fought with variety of fortune, and under the command of Phormio gained two small victories at sea. But the great event of this year was the death of Pericles, which happened in the end of the summer. He fell by the plague, but in a manner different from any body else; for whereas it hurried off others suddenly, it destroyed him by degrees, praying at once on the constitution of his body, and the noble faculties of his mind. As an instance of this last observation, Plutarch says, that when he drew near his end, he shewed some of his friends an amulet or charm, which the women had hung round his neck, intimating, that he must be very sick indeed, when he suffered such a remedy to be applied. In his very last moments, some of his friends sitting by his bed-side, and conceiving him to have quite lost his senses, amused themselves with reckoning up the glorious events of his life: Of a sudden he raised himself on his bed, and turning to them, said, I wonder you should commend those things in me, which were as much owing to fortune as any thing else, and which have happened to others also, and omit that which has been peculiar to me, and more to my reputation than all the rest; that never any of my fellow citizens put on mourning on my account. Thus Pericles died as he lived, as much superior to the greatest men of Athens, as they to the vulgar; and after his death it appeared, that the same grandeur which in other men became fatal to the commonwealth, was in him its preservation; only it must be allowed that he gave way to the corruption of the people, that he might govern them, and that while he

^a exalted the Athenian state, and adorned its capital, he despoiled the people of their virtue, introducing an ambitious spirit of dominion, instead of that love of true glory which had been cultivated by Aristides and Cimon (K).

In the summer following, the Peloponnesians, under the command of Archidamus, invaded Attica, the third time, destroying the ripe corn, and waiving with implacable hatred whatever belonged to the Athenians, though without profit to themselves. In the mean time the whole isle of Lesbos, the city and district of Methymna only excepted, revolted from the Athenians, who thereupon sent a fleet of forty galleys under the command of Clippides, and two other generals; their orders were to come before the city of Mitylene, to demand that the citizens should pull down their walls, and deliver up their ships, which if they did not do, they were then to act offensively. The Mitylenians endeavoured to amuse the Athenians, and to that end procured a truce till they sent ambassadors to Athens; but in the mean time they dispatched other ambassadors to intreat aid of the Lacedemonians, who directed them to make their solemn application at the olympic games to the several states of Greece, which accordingly they did, and were thereupon admitted into the alliance formed against Athens. The Spartans meditated another inroad into Attica, and actually advanced as far as the Isthmus; but their allies not sending their quotas as they had promised, they thought fit to retire, having received advice that an Athenian fleet had appeared on the coast of Peloponnesus. Yet the Peloponnesians, in pursuance of their promise to the Mitylenians, sent a fleet to their assistance of forty galleys; but they were able to effect little, because the Athenians had sent a hundred galleys on that coast. Hitherto they pursued the maxims of Pericles, and cultivated a naval force; but as this cost immense sums of money, they were constrained to make new demands upon their allies, and to raise that tax which Aristides had imposed with the consent of the Greeks, by which they were enabled to keep up a fleet of 250 galleys. The Mitylenians and the rest of the Lesbians, greatly incensed at those of † THUCYD. lib. i. ii. PLUT. in vit. Periclis.

(K) This note, though it relates to one of the greatest men of Greece, will not be very long, because we have had occasion to say so much of him in his history, that very little remains unsaid. He was very learned, especially in useful science; and there is a story related of him, though the time in which it happened is not very well fixed; but it must have been within a year or two of his death at farthest, which shews what courage he had, and of what a different temper he was from most of his countrymen; just as he was going on board the fleet, and had entered the admiral's galley, an eclipse of the sun happened, which struck all the seamen with astonishment, and terrified his own pilot so much, that he knew not what to do. Pericles perceiving this, instantly pulled off his cloak, and muffling up the man's face in it, asked him if that was terrible, and whether he drew any ill omen from it? He answered, No. Why then, said Pericles, what difference can you make between one darkness and the other, except that, what shades the sun is bigger than my cloak. Which brought the pilot and his crew to their senses again. How much he owed to Anaxagoras appears from this, and indeed from almost every great circumstance of his life; how grateful he was, the reader will determine, when he hears that he suffered that wise man to be in such distress, that throwing himself on the ground, and muffling his face in his cloak, he took a resolution of starving to death. When Pericles was told of this, he ran to him in all haste; yet instead of lamenting his distress, he fell to bewailing his own loss, in case he should be deprived of so wise a counsellor; to which Anaxagoras opening his cloak, answered with a low voice: Those, Pericles, who have need of a lamp, supply it with oil. Whereupon the statesman took him home, and used him better for the future. It was at his motion that the Athe- nians seized the treasure of all Greece, Delos, and applied a great part of it to the adorning of their own city; which when complained of as a breach of trust, Pericles thus defended it; It was given, said he, to defend Greece from the Barbarians, which the Athenians having done, have a just title to the money; for money, said he, is not theirs who give, but theirs who receive, provided they fulfil the conditions; and as the Athenians were always ready to carry on war, it was but just that something should be done for their peace, and to give life and spirit to tradesmen, which was effected by these public buildings. This reasoning of his drew over to his party merchants, seamen, labourers, and artists of all kinds; as for such as were not obliged this way, he provided largesses for them, and pensions from the public stock; whence many writers of his own time complain, that whereas other Athenians had made themselves eminent, Pericles had made himself a prince. In times of peace, when he apprehended that the murmurs of the people might be most dangerous, he caused them to be draughted off in colonies, and thereby rendered those dependent abroad, who would have been factious at home: In a word, he made Athens the richest and most powerful of the Greek states; he exalted the power of the people, which all the other chiefs had sought to deprecate; and in the midst of all the Athenian greatness, when her commons were most vain, and most unruly, he directed all things at his will, was but once, and then but for a small time in disgrace, recalled afterwards with honour by the people, and remained in possession of his authority to his death. But in the midst of this great fortune his hands were clean, he did all things for Athens, and nothing for himself, leaving his paternal estate rather diminished than improved, an example admirable rather than imitable (91).

(91) Plut. in vit. Periclis. Thucyd. lib. i. § ii. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. xii. Justin. iii. c. 7. & mult. al.
VOL. II. No. 7. 8 N Methymna

Metymna for remaining steadfast in their duty to the Athenians, made excursions^a into their country, whereupon the Athenians invested the city of Mitylene, and thereby obliged them to think of defending themselves instead of offending their neighbours. Platea was all this time blocked up, its little garrison consisting of four hundred natives, and fourscore Athenians, having thus long withstood the whole power of Peloponnesus, but finding it a vain thing to hope assistance from Athen, and being very much streightened for provisions, they took a desperate way of forcing a passage through the enemies lines, which when they came to execute, many declined; three hundred however persisted in their intention, and fell with such fury on their enemies, that two hundred and twelve forced a passage, and marched to Athen, the rest were compelled to retire back into the city; thus ended the fourth^b year of the Peloponnesian war.

In the very beginning of the next year the Peloponnesians sent forty ships to the relief of Mitylene, and at the same time entered with a great army into Asia, for the fifth time, under the command of Cleomenes. The Athenians were exceedingly distressed by these cruel ravagers; but in the mean time their troops were victorious in Lesbos. Paches who commanded before Mitylene, obliged it to surrender before the Peloponnesian fleet, sent to succour it, could arrive; he likewise chased that fleet, and returning to Lesbos, sent the Lacedemonian minister, whom he found in Mitylene, together with a deputation, from the inhabitants of that place to Athen, where the Lacedemonian was immediately put to death; and in a general assembly^c of the people, it was resolved at the motion of Cleon, that orders should be sent to Paches, to put all the Mitylenians, who were at man's estate, to death, and to sell the women and children for slaves. The next day, however, they reconsidered this decree, which Cleon still supported with all his eloquence; but Diodorus, an orator of a milder disposition, having shewn how injurious it would be to the Athenian glory, to deal so severely with persons who had rendered at discretion, it was carried by a very small majority to reverse the decree. A clean ship was immediately dispatched to Lesbos, to countermand the orders that had been sent to Paches the day before, and instructions were given to the commander, to make all the sail he could, that he might arrive there before the other ship, which, though he strongly endeavoured, he^d could not perform. He arrived however time enough, to save the Mitylenians from utter destruction, for Paches being a man of great humanity, took a day to consider the orders he had received, and in that space the galley arrived, which brought him a countermand. The Athenians, however, did not wholly pardon the Mitylenians; on the contrary, they put a thousand of the briskest of the rebels to the sword, demolished the walls of the city, took away all their ships, divided their lands among themselves, and let them again to the Mitylenians at very high rents. The same summer they made themselves masters of the island of Minoas, lying over-against the territory of Megara; they seized likewise the port of Nisea, and fortified it, which acquisitions were of mighty importance to them. The Plateans,^e driven to the last extremity, surrendered, and by the judgment of the Lacedemonians were, to the number of two hundred, including twenty-five Athenians, put to death, and their women sold for slaves. Such was the end of one of the bravest and most generous people of Greece. Their city was some time afterwards razed by their implacable enemies the Thebans, who left only an inn to shew where it stood. The same however of its ancient inhabitants moved Alexander the Great, to rebuild it. In this year happened the famous sedition in Corcyra, from whence future seditions, when their effects rendered them terrible, were stiled Corcyrian. Thucydides hath inserted a very copious description thereof, its causes and consequences, in his admirable work; as far as it relates to the affairs of the Athenians, we are bound to^f insert a succinct relation of it here. We have already observed, that the war waged by this state against the Corinthians, induced the Peloponnesian war; and in speaking thereof, we have shewn that a great number of Corcyrians were carried away prisoners into Peloponnesus, where the chief of them were very well treated, though the rest were sold for slaves; the reason of this conduct of the Corinthians was a design they had formed, of engaging these Corcyrians to influence their countrymen to side with them and their allies; full of this intent, they treated them with all the lenity and tenderness imaginable, instilling into them by degrees an hatred of democratic goa vernment, and a desire of vesting the rule of their island in their own hands. When it was found that the Corcyrian Prisoners had thoroughly imbibed these principles, they were told, that on condition they would use their interest at home in favour of the allies, and to the prejudice of Athens, they might obtain their freedom. The Corcyrians promised largely, returned home, and which may seem extraordinary, endeavoured to perform all they promised. From these endeavours sprung the sedition beforementioned; at first, such as were for an aristocracy, prevailed, and in right of their power cut the throats of those as inclined to a democratic government; they were assisted by the Peloponnesians, but the Athenians sending a fleet, and afterwards another fleet to the assistance of the distressed party, the Peloponnesians b were forced to withdraw; and then the democratic party taking heart again in Corcyra, revenged themselves for the injuries they had received from the now depressed faction; nor would they suffer any notions of religion to restrain their hands, but dragged away suppliants from the altars to execution, on the standing maxims of all faction, that it was for the public good. The worst of all was, that this example once set, almost all the states in Greece felt in their turns the like commotions which were always incited and blown up by agents from Sparta and Athens, the former pretending to settle aristocracies every where, and the latter exerting her utmost power to prevent their remaining any where. In the midst of these momentous affairs, and while they had so many important businesses on the carpet, the c Athenians were engaged in a new one, which proved in the end more fatal to them than all the rest. It happened thus; the inhabitants of Sicily were split into two factions, the one stiled the Doric, which had the state of Syracuse at its head, the other the Ionic, which owned the Leontines for their chiefs; the latter conceiving themselves too weak without foreign aid, applied themselves to Athens, and sent a citizen of theirs, one Gorgias, and a great orator, to intreat it; never was any minister suited better to his negotiation than this man to treat with the Athenians; he was bold, vain, and eloquent, and so tickled the ears of the people by his fine speeches, that they ran headlong into a war, with which they had no business, and which they were unable to maintain, while they were engaged with the Peloponnesians. d Pericles had warned them of this at the very beginning of the war, he told them it would be as much as they could manage, but that they might manage it, if they medled with nothing else, and that their succeeding therein would fix their empire over Greece, and secure Athens in as high a state as she could expect, or ought to desire. But the people, giddy with success, and hoping at once to grasp the empire of Greece, and the dominion of Sicily, resolved to assist the Leontines, and to that end dispatched a fleet under the command of Laches and Chabrias; and, as if this new business had taken up all their thoughts, that fleet was hardly sailed before they began to equip another. The plague, however, made prodigious havock in the midst of all these great designs, cutting off this year four thousand citizens, three hundred knights, and an infinite number of meaner people. e Diodorus says, ten thousand; he likewise acquaints us with what he supposes to have been the cause of this distemper, he ascribes it chiefly to great rains falling in the winter, and a very hot summer following thereupon, during which the Etesian gales or evening breezes were wanting. The Athenians, however, ascribed it to the pollution of the isle of Delos, by the burying therein dead bodies, which they therefore caused to be removed, and sought to appease Apollo by various sacrifices; such were the events in the fifth year of the Peloponnesian war*.

^a THUCYD. DIODOR. ubi supra.

At the opening of the next summer, the Peloponnesians, under the command of Agis, the son of Archidamus, king of Sparta, invaded Attica, or rather assembled in f order to invade it; for the many earthquakes which happened at this time throughout Greece, alarmed them so much, that they returned home without doing any great matter. The war was carried on in Sicily with various success; Carcades, one of their generals being slain, the sole command devolved upon Paches, who discharged his trust with great reputation. At Athens the people ordered new ships to be daily fitted out, and created new admirals to command them; among these Demosthenes gained great reputation, and made himself very agreeable to their allies. The Athenians, however, received some check from the Ætolians, but in the winter they thrice overthrew the Ambraciots, and constrained them to conclude a peace with the Acarnanians, the allies of Athens; Eurymedon and Sophaocles, who commanded ^a in Sicily, gained, as the winter drew on, some advantages over the Syracusians, and in this year it is remarked that mount Etna made a greater irruption than it had done for fifty years; this was the sixth year ^b.

* THUCYD. lib. iii. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xii.

IN the succeeding spring, Agis, the son of Archidamus, invaded Attica with a great army; the Athenians, however, fitted out a great fleet, sending forty ships to Sicily, and to their commanders gave instructions, to keep a strict eye on Corcyra, the inhabitants of which were under great apprehensions, lest their exiles should make any attempt, or the Peloponnesians make a descent with their fleet of sixty gallies which was in their neighbourhood. Demosthenes was sent with another fleet to infest the coasts of Peloponnesus, he was one of the greatest generals of his time, ^b of which he gave evident proof in this expedition; for as the fleet sailed by Laconia, he took notice of the promontory of Pylus, which was united to the land by a narrow isthmus, having before it a barren island, about two miles in circumference, in which however there was a very good safe port, all winds being kept off either by the headland, or by the isle; these advantages gave him to apprehend that a garrison left here would give so much trouble to the Peloponnesians, that they would find it more advisable to protect their own country, than to invade their neighbours. He proposed therefore to his colleagues, that they should immediately seize it, and fortify it with the utmost expedition; but they desirg rather to fulfil their instructions, than to do extraordinary service, for which they might not be thanked, ^c refused to follow his advice, and insisted upon sailing to Corcyra, according as their orders bore. A storm arising obliged the fleet to put into the haven in the island, where Demosthenes revived his persuasions to seize and fortify so convenient a post, but in vain; his colleagues were all of another opinion, so that he was forced to give way; but the matter taking air, the soldiers declared unanimously that they would not quit the place, which they immediately fell to fortifying, and in six days finished a strong wall; and then the rest of the admirals sailing for Corcyra, Demosthenes was left with five ships to guard his new-raised fortifications. As soon as the news of this event was carried to the Peloponnesian army, it was immediately resolved to return back and besiege Pylus. ^d When they arrived before the place, they took possession of the harbour, and caused a chosen body of Spartans to take possession at the same time of the island Spbacteria, and these precautions taken, they attacked the Athenian retrenchments with great vigour; Demosthenes and his garrison made a prodigious defence, and a fleet of forty Athenian ships arriving in the nick of time, offered battle to the Peloponnesian fleet; but this being refused, because the Lacedemonians were at present set on taking Pylus, the Athenians boldly sailed into the harbour, broke and sunk most of the vessels therein, and took the rest, after which they besieged the Spartans in the isle, which threw the affairs of the Peloponnesians into the greatest disorder. The Lacedemonians sent for their magistrates into camp, which was their custom in all great dangers, and they perceiving that ^e no safety could be wrought for the Spartans in Spbacteria, but by a treaty with the enemy, concluded a truce with the Athenian army, while a negociation was carried on at Athens; the articles of this truce were, that the Peloponnesians should deliver up all their ships, on condition to have them punctually restored to them in case the treaty did not take effect; that neither the Athenians nor they should undertake any thing till this negociation ended some way or other; that a certain quantity of victuals should be carried daily to the island, but that no ship should attempt to pass thither by stealth; that the truce should end at the return of the embassadors, and that, if in the mean time it were broke in any of its articles, it should be held utterly void in all. ^f The Lacedemonian embassadors spoke to the Athenians with great gravity and wisdom, they shewed them how much for their honour it would be to make a peace at their request; and in proof of this they urged an argument worthy of the Spartans. You have now, said they, an advantage, which whether it be owing to your wisdom, or fortune, may be disputed hereafter; but if you lay hold of this occasion, to make a just and honourable peace, you will shew that your nation do not acquire advantages by chance, but by prudence; whereas, if you do not make peace, you will risque that reputation, and even those advantages, from the pride of which you reject the accommodation we offer. The Athenians in ge-

^b THUCYD. lib. iii. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xii.

- a neral were inclined to put an end to this troublesome war, but Cleon, one of their demagogues, a warm and obstinate man, so wrought upon them, that they insisted on very unreasonable conditions, and treated the ambassadors in such a manner, that finding nothing could be done with honour, they withdrew, and by their return to the camp put an end to the truce. The Peloponnesians then demanded their ships, but the Athenians pretending that the truce had been infringed, refused to deliver them, and thereby kept the possession of sixty good vessels, to which they had but a very indifferent title. Hostilities being recommenced on both sides, the Lacedemonians attacked the Athenian retrenchments at Pylus, while the Athenians renewed their assaults on the Lacedemonians at Spalacteria; the latter, though under all the discouragements imaginable, behaved with great bravery, inasmuch that the business went on very slowly, which gave the people of Athens much uneasiness. They began then to wish they had embraced the peace, and to rail vehemently at Cleon, who to excuse himself said, that it would be easy for the general of the forces they were now sending to attack the Spartans in the isle, and put an end to this dispute at once. Nicias, who had been appointed to this command, said immediately, that if Cleon believed he could do such great things, he would do well to go thither in person; the latter conceiving this to be meant only to try him, said he was ready to go with all his heart, whereby Nicias caught him, and declared that he had relinquished his charge. Cleon thereupon said, modestly enough, that he was no general;
- b but Nicias answered, he might then become one; and the people pleased with this controversy, held the orator to his word; Cleon then advancing, said, I am so little afraid of the enemy, that I will desire but a very small body of troops; and yet in conjunction with those at Pylus, I will undertake in twenty days either to bring you the Spartans you are in such pain about, or perish in the attempt; at which the people, little expecting such things from an orator, fell a laughing. They decreed him however the troops he desired, and he set sail on this expedition, in which he conducted himself with great prudence and fortitude; for he first sent a herald to the enemies camp, signifying, that if the Lacedemonians in the isle surrendered at discretion, a new negotiation might be commenced; but this demand
- d being looked upon as dishonourable to the Lacedemonian state, was rejected. He afterwards in conjunction with Demosthenes made a descent upon the island, and partly by their conduct, and partly by their valour, reduced the Spartans to the last extremity. Cleon perceiving it to be in their power to cut these brave men to pieces, restrained his Athenians, and sent a herald to inform them, that they might yet yield at discretion; whereupon the Lacedemonian commander, who had been the third officer in the army, his two superiors being killed, demanded a conference with the Athenian generals, in which he desired leave to send for orders to the Peloponnesian camp, but that was refused; at length the terms offered were accepted, and the prisoners were put on board the ships in order to be conveyed to Athens. They had sustained a siege of seventy-two days, and a terrible engagement, wherein they lost one hundred and twenty-eight persons out of four hundred and twenty, so that two hundred and ninety-two yielded. Cleon, who had been laughed at when he made it, performed exactly his promise, producing the prisoners within the time prefixed, which wonderfully elated the people, who in their next assembly decreed, that these prisoners should be safely kept till a peace should be made, unless the Peloponnesians should in the mean time invade Attica, in which case they resolved that they should be put to death. They sent a colony of Messenians, who had been cruelly expelled out of their own country by the Spartans, to repossess Pylus, and their neighbourhood was so troublesome to the Lacedemonians, that they quickly resolved to send ambassadors afresh to Athens, in order if it was possible to put an end to the war. The
- f people of Athens were too much exalted with their success, to treat the Lacedemonians either with justice or candour, and the ambassadors of that steady nation, disdainng to be amused with frivolous pretences, returned without doing any thing. This summer the Athenians fought the Corinthians near the isthmus; they sent likewise a fleet to Sicily, which fleet had instructions to put in at Corcyra, and to assist the government there against the faction which was in the interest of the Lacedemonians; this they effectually performed, for they gave the Corcyrians such assistance, that the exiles fell into their power; they imprisoned them, and afterwards drew them out by twenty at a time, and put them to death with all the circumstances of rage and cruelty that civil fury could invent; when there were only sixty remaining, maining, they besought the Athenians to put them to death, and not deliver them a up to their countrymen. The Corcyrians thereupon surrounding the place where they were confined, endeavoured to bury them under their darts, which throwing these unhappy men into despair, they strangled and otherwise destroyed themselves with their own hands. Such was the dreadful end of that miserable sedition, which for so many years rent this little island, and made the Corcyrians endure greater evil from themselves, than they had ever felt from any enemy. The Athenians were this year successful in some other expeditions, which, to avoid prolixity, we shall omit, and refer our readers to an account of them in Thucydides. In the winter, a Persian ambassador whose name was Ariaphernes, being sent to Lacedæmon, was intercepted in Thrace, and brought prisoner to Athens. His letters and instructions were read, b but when it was discovered, that they no way concerned the Athenians, he was dismissed, and other ambassadors from Athens were sent with him to Ephesus, where, when they came, they were informed that Artaxerxes the Persian monarch was dead, by which their commission being determined, they returned home. Towards the end of the year the Athenians apprehended that the inhabitants of Cbios had an intention to desert them, they therefore sent a fleet thither with orders that they should demolish their new walls, a method they commonly practised on such occasions. These were the principal events of the seventh year of the war.

In the beginning of the eighth year of the war there happened an eclipse of the sun, as Thucydides tell us, which was followed by an earthquake. The first matter c of consequence the Athenians resolved on, was the taking of the isle of Cythera, seated on the coast of Laconia, which lay extremely convenient for them. Nicias was chosen to command this expedition. This nobleman, even in the time of Pericles, had been eminent in the state, and enjoyed a great measure of favour with the people. His qualifications were not extraordinary, for though he had much knowledge in military affairs, and knew perfectly well how to perform his duty as a general, yet he was exceeding cautious, fearful of trespassing in the least on his instructions, and timorous to the last degree of offending the people. Pericles, especially in his latter days, governed all things with a high hand; he so much exceeded all others in eloquence, that to speak and to persuade were the same things d with him, and the people being confident that he was a friend to their power and authority, came readily into whatever he desired. Nicias was of another disposition, and therefore he sought to acquire their good will, or rather to purchase it, another way; he had an immense estate, and he laid out a great part of it in bestowing largesses, exhibiting plays, shews, and whatever else might please the people, who likewise pitied the timidity of his temper, and always encouraged him when he had any thing to offer or to propose to them. We have already mentioned his dispute with Cleon as to the business of Pylus; the same man was his constant opponent in every thing, which is the less wonderful, since it is evident there was a direct contrariety both in their tempers and interests. Cleon was continually the author of warm e and violent counsels, a lover of blood, and a vehement enemy of the Lacedæmonians; whereas Nicias was gentle in his manners, advised moderate measures, was for treating enemies with clemency; and though in all other respects he was fearful, yet he never dissembled that he wished well to the Lacedæmonians, that is, wished his countrymen would rather conclude a peace with them, than break the power of that state and their own, by obstinately continuing the war. The people having a great opinion of his probity and conduct, appointed him general in this expedition into Cythera, and furnished him with a strong fleet and a good army. Nicias executed his commission punctually and successfully, whereby he gained them a very commodious post, and brought the Lacedæmonians very ill neighbours; afterwards the Athenians took Thyrea on the confines of Laconia, this place the Lacedæmonians had given to the inhabitants of the isle of Egina, when they were expelled by the Athenians, these with the Cythereans were sent to Athens to abide the judgment of the people; the former they condemned to death, as being the ancient and inveterate enemies of their state and nation, the latter they dispersed for the most part through the islands under their obedience, and on such as they left in their own country, they imposed a very heavy tribute. In Sicily, one Hermocrates of Syracuse, persuaded all the inhabitants of that island to adjust their differences among themselves, whereby the Athenian generals were constrained to re-embark their forces, and to return home. There were three of them, Pythodemus, Sophocles, and Eurymidon, they

- a they gave the people a distinct account of the reasons which induced them to quit the island, and insisted particularly on this, that the Sicilians being reconciled to each other, they were in no condition to force them upon other measures; but the Athenians, who seldom considered any thing where success was wanting, banished two of their generals, and subjected the third to a very heavy fine. The inhabitants of Megara, finding themselves exceedingly distressed from the continual incursions of the Athenians, and the mischief done by their own exiles, began to have some thoughts of recalling those they had banished, of which when the Athenians had notice, they found means to engage the magistrates to assist them in quelling the townsmen.
- b Hippocrates and Demosthenes, two famous generals, were employed in this expedition, wherein the Megarians concerned exactly kept their agreement; the gates were opened, and the Athenians had taken possession of the town, if on a sudden some of the conspirators had not altered their minds, and gone over to those who sought to defend it, whereupon the Athenians and their friends seized the long walls, and threw up a cross work against the city, bending all their force to make themselves masters of Nisæa, or the port, doubting not that if they had this, Megara would soon fall. The garrison having no magazines of provision, were constrained to surrender at discretion, after which the Athenians invested the city, and closely besieged it. Brasidas the Lacedæmonian came quickly from Corinth to relieve the Megarians,
- c but the citizens being still divided in their opinions, some siding with the Athenians, some with the Lacedæmonians, would not open their gates to any body. In the mean time the Boeotians came with a considerable army and joined Brasidas, who thereupon engaged the Athenians; but it ended in a drawn battle; at last, however the Lacedæmonian party prevailing in Megara, those who sided with the Athenians were many of them obliged to withdraw; after this the exiles returned, and were admitted into the city, on their taking an oath to forget all that was past, and their attempting nothing which might disturb their country. But as soon as they were settled, they forgot their oath, and with it all tenderness for their country, caused a hundred of those whom they most suspected to be apprehended, forced the people to condemn them, and in consequence of that judgment, put them all to death. They then changed the whole frame of the government, introduced an oligarchy, and possessed themselves of the supreme power. The exiles of Mitylene, some other Lesbians, and crew of mercenary troops, seized Rhetium in Asia, and possessed themselves afterwards of Antandrus; that they might not incumber themselves with too many things, they sold the former city to its ancient inhabitants, and were quickly after dispossessed of the latter by the Athenian generals, Demodorus and Aristides; their colleague, whose name was Lamachus, sailed to Heraclea in Pontus, where he pretended to levy tribute; but the Heracians insisted, that as they were subjects to the Persian king, the Athenians had no right to any subsidies from them. While these points were litigating, a land-flood drove most of the Athenian ships on shore, and broke them in pieces, so that Lamachus found himself unable to act either by land or sea. The Heracians, instead of taking any advantage of this accident, assisted the Athenians to the utmost of their power, so that with much ado Lamachus put his army into a condition to march through Thracia to Chalcedon. The Boeotians growing weary of that form of government, which since their league with the Lacedæmonians had been introduced among them, began to cabal with the Athenians, and to invite them to assist in settling democracies throughout Boeotia; but this business was not very prosperous, for the Thebans and other Boeotians of their party, drew together a great army under the command of Pantoedus. The Athenians were commanded by Demosthenes and Hippocrates; at Delium the armies met,
- f and a very bloody engagement ensued, wherein the Athenians were at last beaten, and all hopes of their prevailing in Boeotia taken away, most of the Boeotians, who leaned to their party, being obliged to forsake their country, and to take shelter in the Athenian territories. Thucydides the historian, commanded at this time the Athenian forces on the coast of Macedonia, whither the Lacedæmonians had sent Brasidas one of their best generals with a considerable army. He, partly by force, partly by persuasion, reduced Amphipolis and several other places; but Thucydides, by a quick march, saved Ione; and the Athenians, being extremely alarmed at the news of Brasidas's conquest, sent new supplies of men, money, and ships, in the winter to the Macedonian coast; but all their care could not prevent a mighty defection from their their interest in those parts, where the valour and conduct of the Lacedæmonian chief ^a carried all before him. These were the events of the eighth year of the war ^c.

IN the beginning of the spring the Spartans made new propositions of peace at Athens, supposing that the misfortunes which their enemies had met with in Thrace and Macedonia, would render them more tractable than they had been before, in which they were not much mistaken; for the Athenians, finding that fortune was no more constant to them than to their enemies, and finding their affairs much unsettled by the loss of Amphipolis, agreed to a truce for a year, that they might have time to re-establish them. This truce was founded upon the following articles, that both parties should remain in quiet possession of what they held at present, that embassadors, heralds, and all other persons with public characters, should have free ^b leave to enter any of the states in order to the negotiation of a general peace, that neither party should receive or protect deserters, that all controversies should be amicably decided, and not by force; proceedings at sea were likewise settled, and confederates on both sides were comprised in this truce. Immediately on the conclusion thereof, negotiations were set on foot for a general peace; but these were interrupted, and the Athenians thrown into new disorders by an accident in Thrace, where the city of Scione, and the city of Menda revolted to Brasidas, who knowing nothing of the truce, sought to draw over Potidea also; the Athenians pretending that Scione revolted two days after the truce was concluded, clamoured loudly thereat, asserting that it was a breach thereof, and that both it and Menda should ^c be restored them, which negotiations not having the power to effect, an army was sent to reduce them; by this army Menda was recovered, but Scione made an obstinate resistance, whereupon the Athenians encompassed it with a wall, and turned their siege into a blockade. The spring drawing on, the Lacedæmonian army, under the command of Brasidas, made an attempt upon Potidea; but it miscarried, and the Athenians began to recover some courage in this part of the world.

THE truce expiring on the day of the Pythian games, Cleon persuaded the Athenians to send a great army into Thrace under his own command; it consisted of twelve hundred foot, and three hundred horse, all Athenian citizens, embarked on a fleet of thirty galleys. Cleon, soon after his arrival took the city of Torone; but he mis- ^d carried in his attempt on Stagirus, which however did not discourage him from falling upon Galopsus, a colony of the Thasians, which he took; after which he retired to Ione, waiting there for succours. Brasidas, who had an army much inferior to his, observing that Cleon was become careless, and that his troops did not observe discipline, attacked the Athenians by surprize, and routed them with very great slaughter; Cleon himself flying at last, but not far, a Lacedæmonian soldier overtaking and killing him on the spot; Brasidas was mortally wounded in the beginning of the engagement, wherein the Athenians lost six hundred men, and the Lacedæmonians no more than seven. This decisive engagement had mighty effects on both parties, the Athenians were greatly humbled by the loss of their army, and the Spartans little less concerned at the loss of their general; besides, the Athenians, in losing Cleon, lost the most popular speaker amongst them, and the great promoter of the war; they therefore grew much more quiet and tractable than formerly, and were very ready to hear what the wise and prudent statesmen amongst them thought fit to offer in their public assemblies. Amongst the Lacedæmonians there was likewise a considerable party, at the head of whom was Plistonax their king, who declared for peace, and who laboured as hard to effect it, as Nicias and his party did at Athens. These proceedings induced various negotiations, which in the end brought on a peace for fifty years between the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, on the following conditions: That a restitution of places and prisoners should be made on both sides, ^e excepting that Nicea should remain to the Athenians, who had taken it from the Megarians, and that Platea should remain in the hands of the Thebans, because they absolutely would not give it up. The Bæotians, Corinthians, and Megarians, refused to be included in this peace, but the rest of the allies yielded to it, and it was accordingly sworn to at Athens in the archonship of Alceon ten years after the commencement of the war; and as Nicias of all the Athenians most vigorously promoted it, so from him it was called the Nician peace ^f.

^c THUCID. lib. iv. DIODOR. lib. xiv. PLUT. in vit. Niciæ. ^d THUCID. lib. v. DIODOR ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Niciæ.

a THE quiet of Greece was far from being restored on the cessation of the war, such of the states in Peloponnesus as were not satisfied with the terms of peace, began to intrigue and negotiate amongst themselves, and to endeavour to set on foot a new confederacy, the head of which was to be the state of Argos. The pretence was, that the liberty of Greece was in danger from the alliance between Sparta and Athens, and as a proof of this they alledged an article in that alliance, whereby it was provided, that by mutual consent new conditions might be added thereto, or any of the old ones altered at their pleasure. In the mean time the Spartans found it not in their power to perform exactly the terms of their treaty with Athens; for whereas it was stipulated, that all places taken should be restored, Amphipolis absolutely refused to return under the Athenian government, so that all the Lacedemonians could do was to withdraw their garison, and under the colour of this, the Athenians on their side refused to evacuate Pylus. The Lacedemonians pressing earnestly to have this fortress put into their hands, or that at least the Helotes and Messenians might be removed from thence, the Athenians were at last prevailed on to grant the latter, and to send those who were thus removed from Pylus to the island of Cephalenia. In the winter new negotiations were entered into on all sides, the Lacedemonians sought to induce the Boeotians to give up Panastus and the Athenian prisoners, in hopes thereby to recover Pylus; with much ado they brought the Boeotians into this, but not till they had thoroughly destroyed the fortifications of the city in question; after which it was delivered up. The Athenians on their side had done every thing that could be expected from them, excepting only the rendering of Pylus which they kept as a pledge for the Spartans complying with what they had undertaken in that alliance. The demolition of Panastus therefore gave them very great uneasiness, and induced them to apprehend the Lacedemonians had circumvented them, and would in the end reconcile themselves to their old confederates at their expence. These discontents were heightened by the artifices of Alcibiades, who began now to rival Nicias, and who will make so considerable a figure in the subsequent part of this history, that there is a necessity of our informing the reader who and what he was. In point of birth he yielded to none, he was the son of Clinias, the nephew of Pericles, and descended lineally from Ajax; in his person he was so beautiful, that while a youth he was beloved, and when he grew up to be a man, he was revered for his extraordinary comeliness; his fortune was large, and beyond most of the nobility in Athens; as to his parts, Cornelius Nepos seems to have drawn his just character in saying, that nature in him had exerted her utmost force, since whether we consider his virtues or his vices, he was distinguished from all his fellow-citizens. He was learned, eloquent, indefatigable, liberal, magnificent, affable, and knew exactly how to comply with the times, that is he knew how to put on all these virtues when he thought fit; for when he gave a loose to his passions, he was indolent, luxurious, dissolute, extremely addicted to women, intemperate and inclined to prophaneness. It was a great advantage to him, that Socrates had a great friendship for him, or, as the Greeks stiled it, a love; for this not only corrected his manners, and brought him to the knowledge of many things of which otherwise he would have been ignorant; but also gave the Athenians hopes of him, and kept them from resenting those wanton acts of pride and vanity which he committed whilst a lad; by his mother's side he was descended from the Alcmeonida, and his ancestors by the father's side had been always upon good terms with the Lacedemonians. Clinias had indeed disclaimed his friendship with that people, but Alcibiades renewed his title to it, and affected to shew a mighty respect to Lacedemonian strangers. But when he observed the ambassadors of that state applied themselves wholly to Nicias and his dependants; he resented it so much, that he began instantly to work upon the people's mind to their prejudice, giving out that the Lacedemonians were not hearty in their last treaty, and that Nicias was more a friend to them than was consistent with his duty to his country. In proof of the first, he alledged, that the Spartans were now taking measures for humbling Argos and her allies, that they might afterwards bring down Athens. As to the latter, he put his countrymen in mind of the coldness Nicias had shewn when they would have sent him with a fleet to make a descent on Sphaeria; the issue of all this was, that the people began to entertain a distrust both of their old general, and of their new allies. Shortly after this came ambassadors from Lacedemon to court the Athenians, and to rectify their opinions as to the sincerity of that state; these ministers at first applied themselves to Nicias, who introduced them to the senate, where they declared they were vested with full power to adjust all differences, and to add such new clauses to the treaty already subsisting as might give ample satisfaction to the Athenians. When they retired from thence, Alcibiades, as the old friend of their nation, invited them to his house, where he expostulated with them on their attaching themselves to Nicias, assured them of his friendship, and as a proof thereof, advised them to deny in the general assembly of the people that they were vested with full powers, under pretence that the acknowledging thereof would induce the Athenians to extort unreasonable compliances. When therefore the ambassadors came into the forum, Alcibiades first stood up, and asked them whether they had full powers, to which, according to agreement, they answered, No. Alcibiades turning to the people, said, You see, my countrymen, what credit ought to be given to these Lacedæmonians, who deny to you to day what they solemnly affirmed yesterday to the senate! The people upon this absolutely refused to hear the Lacedæmonians speak. Alcibiades immediately afterwards recommended the cause of the Argives, Mantineans, and Eleans, who at that time sought the friendship of Athens; but before they could come to a conclusion, an earthquake happened, which of course dissolved the assembly. At the next meeting, Nicias proposed that he might be sent ambassador to Sparta before any harsh resolutions were taken, which the assembly complied with; but when Nicias came to Lacedæmon, he found there a party as unreasonable as that which he had left at Athens; for they would not give him any sort of satisfaction with respect to his demands, and only swore anew to the old alliance, merely that they might seem to do something for the sake of their old friend. Upon his return, the Athenians concluded a league with the Argives and the other states beforementioned for a hundred years, which Alcibiades who promoted it looked upon as a master-piece in politics, because thereby he had provided a means to keep that war at a distance in case the feuds between Sparta and Athens were revived, a thing which was much easier foreseen than remedied. Such were the events of the eleventh and twelfth years after the commencement of this Peloponnesian war* (L).

THE

* THUCID. lib. v. DIODOR. lib. xii. PLUT. in vit. Niciæ & Alcibiad.

(L) We thought it necessary to insert here the league itself as it stands in Thucydides, for many reasons; first, because it enlightens the history; secondly, for that it shews the policy of those times, and that the treaties of the ancient Greeks were no less perfect and explicit than ours; thirdly, that it might serve as an authority to demonstrate the truth and solidity of this history; thus it runs:

"The Athenians and Argives, and Mantineans, and Eleans, for themselves and for the confederates commanded by every of them, have made an accord for a hundred years, without fraud or damage, both by sea and land. It shall not be lawful for the Argives, nor Eleans, nor Mantineans, nor their confederates, to bear arms against the Athenians, or the confederates under the command of the Athenians or their confederates, by any fraud or machination whatsoever, and the Athenians, Argives, and Mantineans, have made league with each other for a hundred years on these terms. If any enemy shall invade the territory of the Athenians, then the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans shall go unto Athens to assist them, according as the Athenians shall send them word to do in the best manner they possibly can. But if the enemy, after he have spoiled the territory shall be gone back, then their city shall be held as an enemy to the Argives, Eleans, Mantineans, and Athenians, and war shall be made against it by all those cities, and it shall not be lawful for any of those cities to give over the war without the consent of all the rest. And if any enemy shall invade the territory either of the Argives or of the Eleans, or of the Mantineans, then the Athenians shall come into Argos, Elis, and Mantinea, to assist them in such sort as those cities

"shall send them word to do in the best manner they possibly can. But if the enemy, after he hath wasted their territory, shall be gone back, then their city shall be held as an enemy both to the Athenians, and also to the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans, and war shall be made against it by all those cities, and it shall not be lawful for any of them to give over the war against that city without the consent of all the rest. There shall no armed men be suffered to pass through the dominions either of themselves, or of any the confederates under their several commands, to make war in any place whatsoever, unless by the suffrage of all the cities, Athens, Argos, Elis, and Mantinea, their passage be allowed. To such as come to assist any of the other cities, that city which sendeth them shall give maintenance for thirty days after they shall arrive in the city that sent for them, and the like at their going away. But if they will use the army for a longer time, then the city that sent for them shall find them maintenance at the rate of three oboles of Ægina a-day for a man of arms, and of a drachmæ of Ægina for a horseman. The city which sendeth for the aids shall have the leading and command of them whilst the war is in their own territory: But if it shall seem good unto these cities to make a war in common, then all the cities shall equally participate of the command. The Athenians shall swear unto the articles both for themselves and for their confederates; and the Argives, Eleans, Mantineans, and the confederates of these, shall every one swear unto them, city by city, and their oath shall be the greatest that by custom of the several cities is used, and with most perfect hosts, i. e. beasts offered in sacrifice, and in these words:

"I will

a THE next summer Alcibiades, at the head of a considerable army, passed over into the territory of Argos, and from thence to Patra; he laboured at both places to persuade them to build walls to the sea, that so they might the more easily receive assistance from the Athenians. The Prætons thinking to shew their wisdom and foresight, expostulated with Alcibiades, telling him, that if they took his advice, the Athenians might in time swallow them up. I do not know, answered he, but they may yet, they must begin at the feet, and eat you by degrees, whereas if the Lacedæmonians are your enemies, they will begin at the head, and devour you all at once. The Argives thought this year to have made themselves masters of Epidaurus, but were hindered by the Lacedæmonians putting a garrison into it of three hundred men, whereupon the Athenians brought back the Helotes and Messenians, and resettled them in Pilus; thus all the preparatives for war were made this year, which was the thirteenth after the beginning of that stiled the Peloponnesian, yet no action was undertaken therein ^f.

THE next summer the Spartans drew together a very great army, which under the command of Agis their king, entered the territory of Argos, where the confederate army lay; but as the engagement was about to begin, a truce was suddenly clapped up by two of the Argive generals, and the king of Lacedæmon, for which none of them received thanks, but, on the contrary, were extremely ill treated by their respective citizens. Some short time after, an Athenian army consisting of a thousand foot, and three hundred horse, arrived at Argos, whereupon the Argives renounced the truce with Lacedæmon, and began the war again. The Athenian troops were commanded by Laches, and Nicostratus, but Alcibiades was in it as a volunteer without command; he it was who persuaded the Argives to besiege Orchomanus, and soon after Tegea; but the career of their victories was soon stopped, for Agis king of Sparta, at the head of a great army, came to give them battle; it was fought in the neighbourhood of Mantineæ, and is very accurately described by Thucydides; in it the Argives and their confederates were at first victorious in one wing, but the Lacedæmonians prevailing in the center, and in the other wing afterwards, hemmed in the Argives, and defeated them also, gaining thereby a glorious victory, in right of which they erected a trophy. The Eleans and Athenians however, after this battle invested Epidaurus, and threw up intrenchments around it; in the winter a strong party in Argos joining with the Lacedæmonians, that city broke off her league with Athens, and renewed it with Sparta for fifty years; in consequence of which the Argives abolished democracy, which hitherto had subsisted in their city, and to compliment their new allies, not only set up an aristocracy among themselves, but assisted the Lacedæmonians with a considerable body of troops, to force the Sicyonians upon the same measure; thus ended the fourteenth year after the Peloponnesian war, which was now opened again with circumstances more dangerous than before.

c IN the very next summer Argos changed her party again, for falling into an early dislike of aristocracy, which to those who were free before seemed little better than a tyranny, they fell upon the Lacedæmonians in their city, and upon such of their

^f THUCID. DIODOR. PLUT. ubi supra.

" I will stand to this league according to the articles thereof, justly, innocently, and sincerely, and not transgress the same by any art or machination whatsoever.

" This oath shall be taken at Athens by the senate and the officers of the commons, and administered by the Prytanies. At Argos it shall be taken by the senate, and the council of eighty, and by the Arctynæ, and administered by the council of eighty. At Mantineæ it shall be taken by the procurators of the people, and by the senate, and by the rest of the magistrates, and administered by the Thetori, and by the tribunes of the soldiers. At Elis it shall be taken by the procurators of the people, and by the officers of the treasury, and by the council of six hundred, and administered by the procurators of the people, and by the keepers of the laws. This oath shall be renewed by the Athe- nians, who shall go to Elis, and to Mantineæ, and to Argos, thirty days before the olympian games, and by the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans, who shall come to Athens ten days before the Panathæan holy days. The articles of this league and peace, and the oath shall be inscribed in a pillar of stone by the Athenians in the citadel; by the Argives in their market-place within the precinct of the temple of Apollo; and by the Mantineans, in their market-place within the precinct of the temple of Jupiter; and at the olympian games now at hand, there shall be erected jointly by them all a brazen pillar in olympis (with the same inscription). If it shall seem good to these cities to add any thing to these articles, whatsoever shall be determined by them all in common council, the same shall stand good (92)".

(92) Thucyd. de Bell. Pelop. lib. v.

own citizens as they thought were of their party, and having killed some, and banished others, they renounced their new made league with Sparta, and renewed their old one with Athens. They likewise began to follow the advice which Alcibiades had given them, and with indefatigable industry wrought on the long walls which were necessary to join their city with the sea. The Athenians in the mean time being convinced that Perdiccas king of Macedonia had betrayed them, and been the chief occasion that their expeditions against the Chalcideans and the city of Amphipolis had miscarried, they renounced their league with him, and declared war against him. These were the events of the fifteenth year ^a.

Alcibiades at the beginning of the next year came with a fleet of twenty ships into the territories of Argos, to assist his friends, and to put an end to the disputes which ^b reigned in that city; in order thereto, he caused three hundred of the inhabitants, who were suspected of favouring the Lacedemonians, to be seized and carried away; after which they sailed to the island of Melos, which though but small, and of inconsiderable force, had always acted with inflexible obstinacy against the Athenians; the general contented himself with besieging the capital, and when he found that the reduction thereof would be a work of time, he turned his siege into a blockade, and leaving a considerable body of forces in his lines here, turned to Athens. Pbilocrates the son of Endemus, being afterwards sent with supplies to the camp before Melos, he reduced the place to such distress, that the inhabitants yielded at discretion; whereupon the Athenians put every man who was able to bear arms to the sword, and carried the women and children captives to Athens. Thucydides and Plutarch both mention this extraordinary act of severity, but they differ pretty much with respect to the circumstances attending it; Thucydides speaks of this as the act of the general and his army, provoked by the obstinate defence of the inhabitants of Melos; Plutarch says, it was done by virtue of a decree of the people of Athens, which, if it was not proposed, was at least promoted by Alcibiades; Diodorus Siculus relates this fact also, but generally, and without any circumstances at all. The Athenians from Pylus made various incursions into Laconia, which the Lacedemonians did not resent as a breach of the peace, but gave leave only to their subjects to make reprisals on the Athenians. As to affairs in Macedonia they received no very material alteration, except that the Athenians made some incursions into the territories of king Perdiccas; these were the events of the sixteenth year of the war ^c.

THE Athenians determined in the beginning of this year to send a fleet and a great army into Sicily, the occasion this; the Egestines conceiving themselves exceedingly ill-treated by their countrymen, sent to desire aid from the Athenians; their ambassadors arrived the year before, but as no resolution was taken, or at least put in execution, till now, we thought it proper to give the whole story at once. Alcibiades and his faction were of opinion that this was a very happy conjuncture, and that the Athenians ought readily to embrace an opportunity of conquering Sicily; for with them, to invade and to conquer were synonymous terms, that from thence they might pass over to Africa and reduce Carthage and Lybia under their dominion; after which they intended to conquer Italy. People of sense saw the madness of these schemes, but durst not oppose them; Nicias alone, though he was held the most timorous man in Athens, had the courage to oppose both the nobility and the people, and to set all things forth in their true light. He said that Athens had already as much work upon her hands as she could do, that a breach with Sparta was inevitable, that the war must of consequence be carried on in all parts of Greece, and that fleets and armies sufficient for this purpose would try the utmost strength of Athens. That Sicily was not so easy a conquest as many apprehended, since it was a very populous island, and its inhabitants remarkable both for prudence and valour. That the Carthaginians, who were by far more powerful than the Athenians, had in vain attempted to reduce this island, and that in case the Athenians could prevail, it would be found no easy task to preserve their conquest, against the united power of the Sicilians and all their other enemies in Greece. His discourse however had no manner of weight, the Athenians, deluded by their own ambassadors, who reported strange things of the wealth of the Egestines, decreed that a fleet should be sent to their assistance with a land army on board, naming Nicias for the general, and giving him Alcibiades and Lamachus for his colleagues. ^d

^a THUCID. DIODOR. & PLUT. ubi supra.

^b THUCYD. DIODOR. PLUT. ubi supra.

Nothing

- a Nothing could give greater uneasiness to any man, than this nomination did to Nicias, he represented the expence of the war, in hopes that it might deter his countrymen from engaging in it, but in vain; they cut off all objections of that sort, by giving the generals absolute authority to do whatever seemed to them most proper for the service of the state. While these preparations were making, an accident happened, which put the whole city in confusion; the Hermæ, i. e. the statues of Mercury, of which there were a multitude in and about the city, were all of them defaced in one night; nor could the authors of this fact be discovered, notwithstanding a proclamation, offering impunity and reward to the informer; yet in consequence of a clause therein, inviting any person, of what condition soever, to discover former
- b sacrileges, some servants and slaves deposed, that a long time before certain young men, heated with wine, had ridiculed some religious mysteries, and that Alcibiades was amongst them; his enemies, catching at this, commenced a prosecution against him, to which Alcibiades readily offered to answer, asserting his innocence, and protesting against accusations brought in his absence; but his enemies being determined to destroy him, procured others to move that for the present he should have licence to depart on his command, and that after his return a day of trial should be assigned him; to which proposition he very unwillingly was forced to accede. The fleet equipped upon this occasion consisted of a hundred galleys, but they were better and better provided than any the Athenians had ever sent to sea before, and
- c when joined by their allies at Corcyra, made up a hundred and thirty-four galleys; of heavy-armed troops there were five thousand one hundred, of which fifteen hundred were Athenian volunteers. This great fleet staid some time at Corcyra in order to send some light frigates to the coast of Sicily, and to take proper measures for the debarkment of the forces with their allies. At Corcyra the generals differed, Nicias, who never had any opinion of the war, finding that their confederates were far less powerful than they had been represented, inclined to send only a squadron of sixty ships to their relief. Alcibiades alledged that it would be highly dishonourable for the Athenians, after fitting out a fleet at such an immense expence, to content themselves with sending only a part of it to perform what the whole
- d was designed for; Lamachus differed in opinion from them both, he said that their allies being no longer to be depended on, they ought now to consider what could be done against their enemies; and as an army was always most terrible at first, before the minds of the soldiers were discouraged by hardships and fatigues, he gave his vote for sailing directly for Syracuse, landing their troops as near it as possible, and giving the enemy battle under their own walls; at last however he came over to the opinion of Alcibiades, after which the fleet sailed for Sicily, where the army was landed, and with much ado took possession of Catana; from thence they made some excursions, but with little success. But long they had not been in this island before
- e orders from Athens arrived, directing Alcibiades to return, and abide his trial, the city being all in an uproar on the old affair of defacing the Mercuries. It was a state trick plaid off by the enemies of Alcibiades to ruin the mighty interest he had in Athens; to the same end they gave out, that he had entered into a conspiracy to betray the city to the Lacedæmonians, and that he had persuaded the Argives to undertake something to their prejudice. It was therefore determined to put him to death upon his return, but it being apprehended that the causing him to be arrested in sight of his army, might produce great commotions therein, those who were sent to bring him home were ordered to treat him with great decency, and not to discover by any means the severe resolution taken against him. They executed their com-
- f mission very exactly, so that Alcibiades and those of his army, who were accused as well as he, had not any suspicion; but in the course of their voyage, gathering from the seamen somewhat of what was intended, and being informed that a person out of fear of death had acknowledged himself guilty, and impeached them, they wisely determined not to trust an enraged and superstitious multitude, but to provide for their own safety, by withdrawing as soon as they had an opportunity; which offering itself quickly after, they gave their convoy the slip, and retired to such parts of Greece, as out of hatred to the Athenians, were most like to give them shelter; as for Alcibiades, he afterwards went to Sparta, and was well received there. The army in Sicily took this proceeding very heavily, however the command devolving on Nicias, he managed it the best he could, as well for the sake of his own honour, as from the apprehensions he was under of being accused, in case any accident happened; for having a just idea of the temper of his countrymen, he dreaded above all things a prosecution before the people, who heard accusations willingly, and believed the most just defences but slowly. By a stratagem he and his colleague Lamachus brought their army near Syracuse, and afterwards engaged the inhabitants of that city to make a sally, wherein they suffered some loss, and grew in great fear of an enemy, whom hitherto they had in a manner despised; the Athenians however retired, and took their winter quarters at Catana. In the interim the Syracusians by the advice of Hermocrates, sent deputations to Sparta and Corinth to desire aid against the Athenians, while in the mean time themselves wrought hard in repairing the fortifications of their city, and in laying waste the country in the neighbourhood of the Athenian camp. The moderation of Nicias, and the complacency of Lamachus, a well-disposed man, and an excellent officer, but little esteemed by the Athenian people, because he was poor, drew many of the cities of Sicily to side with them, so that at last the island was divided into two factions, the one friends, the other enemies to the state of Athens; as for the Syracusians, who were at the head of the latter, they depended chiefly on the succours they had demanded from Greece; the Corinthians readily promised and sent them assistance, and also sent ambassadors to Sparta to co-operate with those whom the Syracusians had sent thither; but the Spartans, not caring to offend the Athenians further, hesitated much at their propositions, till Alcibiades informed them of the Athenian designs; then they dispatched Gylippus with a small body of troops to assist the Syracusians, and at the same time determined to renew the war with Athens, and to invade Attica itself; this was the first step to the ruin of Athens, for by the persuasion of the same person they determined to fortify Decelea a castle in Attica, which hindered the inhabitants of Athens from returning to their farms when the enemy was withdrawn, cut off their supplies from their silver mines at Laurium, and served as a receptacle for all the malecontents, and indeed for all the banditti in the neighbourhood. It is strange that this was never thought of before, and that it should be resolved on now at the recommendation of Alcibiades, who in a short time had gained as great or greater credit at Sparta than he had ever at Athens. He procured this confidence by addicting himself to their customs, by conforming to them in his dress, and manner of living, and in short by throwing off every thing which seemed to speak him an Athenian, and going more heartily than any of the Lacedaemonians themselves did into such measures as had a direct tendency to their destruction. Towards the end of the year, the army in Sicily being much weakened, the generals sent to demand a supply of money and horsemen, which the Athenians readily decreed; this was the seventeenth year after the commencement of the Peloponnesian war¹.

Nicias, having received the succours he demanded, sailed to Syracuse, where he had several rencounters with the townsmen, but had the better of them in all; the Athenian fleet sailing into the haven of Syracuse, a very brisk action happened, in which Lamachus was killed; after which Nicias causing new works to be thrown up before the place, streightened the Syracusians so much, that they thought of capitulating, but in the interim Gylippus with his Spartan succours arrived. In Greece, the Athenians in support of their allies the Argives, invaded the territory of Epidaurus, and thereby openly broke the truce which had hitherto, though in a doubtful manner, subsisted between them and the Lacedaemonians. Gylippus by dint of conduct, defeated the designs of Nicias against Syracuse, who notwithstanding began to form new projects, and to exert his utmost skill, though in a very bad state of health, for furthering the Athenian affairs in that island. New supplies were in the mean time decreed to him at Athens, Demosthenes, and Eurymedon, being joined in commission with him, the latter sailed in the midst of winter with ten galleys, and a great sum of money, into Sicily; Demosthenes remained behind, being employed in providing all things necessary for a great fleet, which was to be sent thither in the spring. A small one in the mean time, consisting of twenty galleys, was sent to cruize on the coast of Peloponnesus, and these were all the remarkable things which happened in the eighteenth year of the war².

EARLY in the spring, Agis king of Sparta, at the head of a very numerous army of Lacedaemonians, Corinthians, and other nations of Peloponnesus, invaded Attica, and according to the advice which Alcibiades had given, seized and fortified

¹ THUCYD. lib. vi. DIODOR lib. xiii. PLUT. vit. Alcibiad. & Nicias. ² THUCYD. DIODOR. ubi supra.
Decelea,

- a Decelia, which stood at an equal distance from Athens and the frontiers of Boetia. In the mean time, the Athenians seemed less concerned for their own safety, than for their conquests in Sicily; for they ordered a fleet of thirty ships to be equipped for spoiling the coasts of Peloponnesus, at the same time that they sent Demosthenes with sixty of their own galleys, and five belonging to the island of Cbios, to support Nicias, and to carry on effectually the war against the Syracusians, who about this time received a powerful succour from the Peloponnesians. When Demosthenes arrived, he found things in a very declining way, Nicias having sometime before sustained some loss at sea, wherewith himself and his army were much dispirited, though it had been occasioned chiefly by the warmth of other commanders, who paid too little
- b regard to the general's orders. Demosthenes, who commanded the supply, affected to censure Nicias's conduct, as if he had wanted activity, and was not at all desirous of carrying on the war; to shew therefore of how different a disposition himself was, he would cause Epipole to be attacked, and that too in the night, which was accordingly done, but with very bad success; for all speaking the same language, they were unable to distinguish foe from friend, so that a mighty slaughter happened which exceedingly weakened the Athenian fleet. Demosthenes was then for sailing away as fast as possible, conceiving that since himself could do nothing, there was nothing to be done in Sicily; Nicias on the contrary insisted positively on continuing of the siege, Eurymedon joined with Demosthenes, but Nicias could not be prevailed on to depart
- c from his sentiment; which was, that the Athenians having once sat down before a town, ought not to rise without taking it. The true motive however to his obdurate behaviour, was his old apprehensions of the people of Athens; he remembered how they banished two generals for coming from Sicily before, though they had all the reason in the world for what they did; he chose therefore to trust fortune, sickness, and the enemy, rather than the people of Athens. Yet when they received certain intelligence that Gylippus, with a body of Spartans, and other Peloponnesian troops, was arrived, Nicias agreed that it was fit to depart, and immediately thereupon orders were issued to the army; but just as they were ready to retire, an eclipse of the moon happened, which terrified Nicias, who was a very superstitious man,
- d so much, that he would needs keep the army there seven and twenty days longer. The Syracusians, as soon as they were informed of this, attacked the Athenian camp, and provoked them to fight both by land and sea. At last a naval engagement happened, in which Eurymedon was slain; and though Gylippus and his squadron were beaten, in consequence of which the Athenians erected a trophy, yet they had apparently the worst of it, since the Syracusians and their allies immediately bent all their endeavours to shut them up in the port. Nicias and Demosthenes, seeing the miserable condition in which they were, concluded at last to draw their forces into a smaller camp nearer their ships, that they might be at hand to assist each other; and when this was done, they resolved to venture another engagement at sea, in hopes of breaking through; but in case they were so unfortunate as to fail therein, they determined with themselves to burn their vessels, and to march over land to Catana; according to this resolution they attacked the Syracusians in the mouth of the haven with wonderful bravery and resolution, the land armies being spectators on both sides. This was the most bloody battle, and by far the most obstinate which the Athenians had ever fought; in it they sunk and burnt many of the enemies fleet, but were themselves so much weakened, that tho' the generals resolved to hazard another engagement, yet the men absolutely refused to go on board, alledging, that it was impossible for them to undergo two services at once. It was thereupon determined to retire the next night by land, which
- e if they had done, it is very probable they might have escaped; but being deceived by the industry of Hermocrates, they put it off till the third day after. Nicias with his troops led the van, Demosthenes brought up the rear, but the Syracusians pressed so hard upon them, that Demosthenes was forced to halt, whereupon he drew up his forces in order of battle; but the Syracusians surrounding him, and many of his men beginning to desert, he thought fit to capitulate, and having stipulated that none of his men should be put to death on any pretence whatsoever, he and his troops to the number of six thousand yielded up their arms, and became prisoners. The next day the Syracusians overtook Nicias, who thereupon encamped on an eminence, and disposed all things for making the best defence he could; Gylippus immediately sent to inform him that Demosthenes had surrendered, and advised him him to do the like, which he refused; but he offered to give hostages for the re-^a payment of the expence of the war to the Syracusians, if they would suffer him and his army to retire; but this was refused him, whereupon he continued his march fighting as he went, till he arrived at the river Afinarus, where the soldiers, throwing themselves in without any order, miserably destroyed each other, and were at the same time killed without mercy by the enemy, so that they perished by hundreds, without making any effort for their lives. Nicias himself surrendered to Gylippus; when the Syracusians returned to the city, the Sicilians pressed violently to have the generals put to death, which the Lacedæmonians, and especially Gylippus, opposed as much as they were able, out of generosity with regard to Demosthenes, who was the most bitter enemy of the Spartans, and who, as we have^b before shewn, projected the seizing of Pylus; out of gratitude with respect to Nicias, who had ever been a friend to Lacedæmon, and who had been the chief author of the peace. At last, if we may believe Thucydides, the Syracusians prevailed, and Nicias and Demosthenes were put to death. Plutarch says they killed themselves in prison (M). Of the soldiers who were made prisoners, numbers were put to death, many sent to work in the quarries, and a very few returned by stealth to the sea-ports, and from thence made their escapes to Athens. This was the end of the Sicilian war, wherein the Athenians lost not the conquest they aimed at, or that reputation which they had so long maintained, but their fleet, their army, and their generals. When advices of these losses came to Athens, they were for a long^c time not believed; but when the thing could be no longer doubted of, they grew very angry with those who had advised the war, and with such as had pretended to publish prophecies and oracles in favour of it; they resolved however to take all necessary measures for supporting the dignity of the state, to leave the administration of affairs to grave and wise persons, to live with greater frugality at home, and to treat their confederates better abroad; the expediency of these resolutions appeared suddenly, for as soon as the news of the defeat in Sicily was spread throughout Greece, all such as had been confederates with Athens began to shew their dislike of her,

(M) The character and services of Nicias are sufficiently settled in the text: here therefore we shall speak only of his misfortunes, which were derived from the fear of the people, and his superstition; he carried with him into Sicily one Stilbides a philosopher, who had weaned him from many of his follies, and had possibly saved him at last, if he had lived; but happening to die sometime before the last defeat at Syracuse, Nicias had no body about him who could account for an eclipse of the moon; for as to eclipses of the sun, Pericles had put their being ominous out of every body's head by an action mentioned in note K. In their last retreat, Nicias in the midst of his misfortunes behaved with the greatest dignity and composure; after he was taken prisoner, perceiving that the Syracusians continued still to massacre his soldiers, though they were absolutely in their power, he threw himself at the feet of Gylippus, whom he addressed in these words: In the midst of victory, O Gylippus, suffer yourself to be touched with pity, not of me, whom an excess of misery has made famous, but of those unhappy Athenians. Consider that fortune is never so changeable as in war, and do not forget how the Athenians, whenever they got the better of the Lacedæmonians, always used their victories with moderation and generosity. The Lacedæmonian, moved at this, raised up Nicias, and gave orders that the slaughter should cease; but those orders were very indifferently obeyed, many hundreds being killed afterwards. Authors differ exceedingly about the melancholy catastrophe of this great man. Thucydides says, that the Syracusians, against Gylippus's will, put Nicias and Demosthenes to death, or, as the word literally signifies, cut their throats. Plutarch tells us, that one Timæus wrote that Hermocrates sent the generals word that the Syracusians would put them to death, and that thereupon they slew themselves. Diodorus Siculus is still wider from Thucydides than any of the rest, for he makes Gylippus the author of their death against the will of the wisest of the Syracusians, and has inserted an oration of his to that purpose. Justin from Trogus Pompeius says, that Demosthenes slew himself, but that Nicias submitted, and was made prisoner; undoubtedly Thucydides deserves most credit; with his account of the matter therefore we will close this note: "Nicias and Demosthenes " they killed against Gylippus's will. For Gylippus " thought the victory would be very honourable, " if over and above all his other success, he could " carry home both the generals of the enemy to " Lacedæmon. And it fell out, that one of them, " Demosthenes, was their greatest enemy, for the " things he had done in the island and at Pylus; " and the other upon the same occasion their greatest " friend. For Nicias had greatly laboured to have " those prisoners which were taken in the island to " be set at liberty, by persuading the Athenians to " the peace: For which cause the Lacedæmonians " were inclined to love him. And it was princi- " pally in confidence of that, that he rendered " himself to Gylippus. But certain Syracusians (as " it is reported) some of them for fear (because " they had been tampering with him) lest being " put to the torture he might bring them into " trouble, whereas they were now well enough; " and others (especially the Corinthians) fearing he " might get away by corruption of one or other " (being wealthy) and work them some mischief " afresh, having persuaded their confederates to the " same, killed him. For these, or for causes near " unto these, was he put to death, being the man, " that of all the Greeks of my time had least de- " served to be brought to so great a degree of " misery (93)".

(93) Thucyd. lib. vii. prop. fin. Diodor. lib. xiii. Plut. in vit. Nic. Justin. lib. iv. c. 5.

a while the Lacedemonians were preparing by all means whatsoever to carry on the war with greater vigour than before. The Athenians caused the promontory of Sunium to be fortified with all diligence, cut down vast quantities of timber, and wrought hard to equip a new fleet, with which preparations ended the nineteenth year of the Peloponnesian war. In the beginning of the next year, the Cbians sought to revolt from Athens, and to put themselves under the protection of the Lacedemonians, with a view to which they sent privately ambassadors to the latter, who, in concert with their allies, promised to send such a fleet as might protect them; but this promise was easier made than kept, and besides the Athenians got notice of it in the mean time, and sent b a fleet to Cbios. The general of this fleet reproached the inhabitants of that island with their perfidy, which they stiffly denied, and indeed the greater part of the people of Cbios knew nothing of what had been transacted with the Lacedemonians. But the Athenian general, to put the business out of dispute, insisted that they should send their quota to join the fleet of Athens, whereupon they were constrained to fit out immediately seven galleys, and to send them as he directed. After this the Athenians had several small successes at sea, which not a little discouraged the Peloponnesians, who would shortly have lost all their resolution, if Alcibiades had not exerted his eloquence to persuade them to carry on the war. He advised them to send him with a small fleet to Ionia, where he promised to engage the cities to revolt from the Athenians, and to negotiate a league between Sparta and the great king, from c whence he assured them, that such advantages would be derived as must effectually sink their rival. The Lacedemonians coming at last into his measures, he passed over, as he had proposed, into Ionia, and there actually effected a great part of what he had promised, which struck the Athenians with such a panic, that they instantly ordered a thousand talents, which had hitherto been reserved untouched, to be laid out in the service of the war, for which also they made other great preparations. As soon as they were able they sent several squadrons of ships to sea with directions to reduce, first of all, such places as had revolted, and then to act generally against the Peloponnesians; most of these squadrons were successful, so that Lesbos, Clasomene, and other places, which upon the prospect of the downfall of Athens, had revolted from d her, were constrained to fall under her dominion again: Alcibiades in the mean time acquitted himself well to the Lacedemonians, by drawing Tissaphernes the king of Persia's lieutenant into a league with them. The Spartans however were displeased with the terms thereof, and sought to have them altered, which gave the Persians much distaste. The hatred which Agis had conceived against Alcibiades for debauching his wife, began now to produce terrible effects; for he persuaded the Lacedemonians to send orders to their general in Ionia to put the Athenian to death, notwithstanding all the service he had done their state. Alcibiades, gaining some intelligence of this, retired to Tissaphernes, and laying aside the Lacedemonian, as he had formerly done the Athenian, he became now a perfect Persian; and by the e politeness of his address, gained so much on Tissaphernes, who was a professed enemy to the Greeks, that he stiled his gardens of pleasure, after he had been at vast expence in adorning them, Alcibiades, by which name they went ever afterwards. When the Athenian perceived that Tissaphernes placed a mighty confidence in him, he gave him a just light into the affairs of Greece; he told him, it was not for the interest of the Persian king that Athens should be destroyed, but on the contrary, that she and Sparta might be maintained as rivals to each other, that the Greeks might never have an opportunity of turning their arms upon his master; but if it should at any time be found convenient to rely upon one of them, he advised them to trust Athens, because she would be content with the dominion of the sea; whereas the pride of f the Spartans would always instigate them to new conquests, and especially excite a desire of setting all the Greek cities at liberty. For the present he put them upon detaining a part of the pay which had been promised to the Peloponnesian seamen, that they might thereby be kept in dependence, as also to countermand the order given to the Phœnician fleet, to join that of Peloponnesus. When Tissaphernes had given into these councils, Alcibiades privately wrote to some of the officers of the Athenian army which lay at Samos, intimating that he was now treating with the Persian on their behalf, adding that he cared not to return to his country till the democracy was abolished. The reason offered by him to engage the Athenians to this proceeding, was, that the Persian king liked not a democracy, but should immediately trust and assist Athens, if the government was put into the hands of a a few. Phrynicius the Athenian general, having a great antipathy to Alcibiades,^a and dreading his return, resolved to let nothing slip which might prevent it; he therefore not only gave his opinion against the proposition which Alcibiades had made, but also discovered it to Astyocheus, who commanded the Lacedemonian troops; this man, being brought over to the interest of Tissaphernes, revealed Phrynicius's treachery; Alcibiades upon this wrote again to his correspondents at Samos, charging their general with treachery, and betraying his country. Phrynicius, when he had information of this, wrote a second time to Astyocheus, reproaching him with betraying him, and discovering what he had formerly acquainted him with in confidence, and offered him notwithstanding to betray the Army he commanded at Samos, which lay in an open town, to the Lacedemonians; which piece of intelligence Astyocheus^b instantly revealed to Alcibiades. Phrynicius being aware of this, told his soldiers that the Lacedemonians were about to attack them by land and sea, and that therefore they should throw up with all diligence a strong intrenchment round the town to defend themselves, which immediately they did, so that, when Alcibiades wrote again concerning Phrynicius's second treachery, his letters were disbelieved, because the general had taken such care for their safety. Such were the chieftains of Greece in these times, how unlike those who broke the power of Persia, and abandoned their country, rather than live in it in a state of dependence? The Athenians, always prone to novelty, on the arrival of Pisander, and the other deputies from the army, who brought with them the propositions of Alcibiades, dissolved the democracy in defence^c of which they had so often and bravely fought, or rather resolved to dissolve it, for it stood yet a small time. The issue of their present debates was, that Pisander with ten deputies should return and treat with Alcibiades and Tissaphernes, that it might be known on what terms the king of Persia's friendship might be depended on; and in case they were reasonable, to declare, that the Athenians would vest the sovereignty in the hands of a few. But before their arrival, Alcibiades discovered that Tissaphernes did not incline to help the Athenians at present on any terms, because they had been lately successful, and Alcibiades himself had taught him to help always the weaker party; when Alcibiades perceived this, he set up such high demands in the name of the Persians, that the Athenians themselves broke off the treaty, whereby^d he preserved both their friendship and that of Tissaphernes. When Pisander and his colleagues came to the army at Samos, they engaged them to favour the scheme for the alteration of government, and procured a commission to themselves to overturn all the democratic governments that were under the dominion of Athens. When they came back to the city, they found their confederates had almost done their work without them, partly by cajoling the people, and partly by privately taking off, or in plain terms assassinating such as were staunch friends to the people. It was at first proposed, that only the dregs of the people should lose their authority, which was to be vested in five thousand of the most wealthy, who were for the future to be reputed the people; but when Pisander and his associates found the strength^e of their party, they determined to carry matters further, and to erect an oligarchy. In the mean time Oropus, a strong city on the borders of Beotia, revolted from the Athenians, whereby all Eubœa was in danger, the inhabitants thereof being desirous to revolt, and the disturbances at Athens giving them hopes to do it with impunity. In the mean time the twentieth year ended of the Peloponnesian war.

When Pisander and his associates first came from the army, they accused Phrynicius to the Athenians, and procured him to be recalled; he was a man of consummate parts and prudence, and, according to Thucydides, as honest as the iniquities of the times would permit. On his return, finding the temper of the people, he became an enemy to democracy, in hopes that, if he had a hand in settling an oligarchy, Alcibiades would be afraid to trust it; there was likewise at Athens one Anisiphan, a man of such mighty parts and eloquence, that the people were afraid of him to such a degree, that he was constrained to avoid speaking in public, and to manage his concerns by other hands; this man devised a new frame of government, and having communicated it to Pisander, they contrived together a method whereby to establish it. With this view the latter, who was become very popular, proposed that ten men should be elected with full power to frame, model, and alter laws; this being done, these ten appointed an assembly of the people at Colonus, a place without

^a Thucyd. lib. vii. viii. Diodor. lib. xiii. Plut. vii. Nic. & Alcibiad. Coar. Narr. vii. Alcibiad.

- a without the city. When they came together there, instead of proposing to them a body of laws, they offered them only this one, That every Athenian might speak his mind freely, i. e. without danger from any of the laws; which being assented to, Pisander produced his scheme, which was, that the old form of government should be dissolved, and that five prytanes might be elected; that these five should chuse a hundred; that each of the hundred should chuse three; that the four hundred thus elected should become a senate with supreme power, and should consult the five thousand only, when and on such matters as they thought fit. Here was an end of the old government of Athens, which was grown into dislike with the people, who were notwithstanding not over-fond of the new; but those who were for it being
- b such as were men of great parts, found means to establish it by force; for when the people were gone out of the city to their ordinary employments, the four hundred, having each a dagger concealed under his vest, attended by a guard of a hundred and twenty men, entered suddenly into the senate house, dissolved the old senate, paid them their salary, and turned them out, which once effected, the commons were constrained to submit, not knowing what to do, or to whom to apply. The new senate chose prytanes, or presidents out of their own body, and began to establish themselves after the mode of most new governments, by blood, bonds, and banishment; yet these severities, though they were illegal, were not excessive, and as soon as their enemies were removed, the four hundred ruled gently enough. They
- c sent ambassadors to Agis, who lay with the Lacedemonian army at Decelea, to acquaint him that they were ready to treat of a peace, and that the Spartans might better rely on them than on the democracy; but Agis was of another opinion, he could not imagine that the Athenians, who had stickled so much for democracy, would submit patiently to an oligarchy, established rather through the Arts of a few, than according to the general inclination of the citizens; he therefore gave no answer to the ambassadors sent by the four hundred, but having signified his thoughts of the matter to the Lacedemonians, procured a great recruit to be sent him into Assica. On the arrival of these succours, he marched boldly to Athens, not at all questioning but that the enemies of the oligarchy would raise a sedition on his approach, and
- d either subvert the government, or so weaken and distract the city, that the Lacedemonians might easily take it; but he was quickly convinced of his mistake, for the people of Athens, when he approached their walls, and sent some advance-parties to skirmish with them, attacked and routed those parties, and appeared afterwards before their city with such order and intrepidity, that Agis, after receiving some loss, was constrained to retire again to his old post, from whence he sent back the last forces he received to Lacedemon. After this the four hundred sent ambassadors to him again, concerning whose negotiations we can say nothing, except that they were treated with greater civility than before. The four hundred, knowing well that the army at Samos were generally inclined to a democracy, sent ten deputies thither
- e to appease them, by persuading them that the government now subsisting at Athens, was only the best sort of democracy, the dernier resort not being in the four hundred but in the five thousand, a larger number than had ever assembled while the power was in the people; but these deputies were hardly gone from Athens before deputies of the army arrived there, signifying that they had restored the democracy at Samos, and that they were resolved to adhere to that form of government, for which the four hundred sent some of these deputies to prison; but one Carlas who came from the army made his escape, and got thither again, making a frightful report of the state of things at Athens; upon which a sedition ensued, that might have been very fatal to the state; but moderate men interposing, the generals
- f Thrasylus and Thrasyllus contented themselves with taking an oath of all the soldiers to do their utmost to restore the power to the people, to fight against the Peloponnesians and other enemies of Athens, and never to yield obedience to, or have any correspondence with the four hundred. They greatly encouraged their forces to be steady in the measures they had taken, by representing to them that they had not deserted their city, but their city them; that their strength was superior to any that could be sent against them by the four hundred, and that questionless on the public faith Aristides would come to them, and procure them aid from Tissaphernes, and the king. These discourses had their effect, the soldiers came unanimously into all that was required of them, chose new officers that might be depended on, and when their generals required it, went and offered battle to the Peloponnesians. At the request of of Thrasylus they recalled Alcibiades, who, on his arrival, made a most eloquent a speech to the army, shewing them the true source of his misfortunes, the injustice of their countrymen, and the great danger of the state. Above all things he magnified the power and good will of Tissaphernes, though he knew he had little authority for it, yet he could not be said to deceive his countrymen, because by this very method he compelled Tissaphernes to become their friend, instilling such a spirit of jealousy into the Peloponnesians, as made them no longer able to treat that lord either with confidence or civility. The soldiers, bewitched by his fine words, created him general with full power; and conceiving that with him they carried victory along with them, talked of nothing but sailing directly to Athens, and restoring the ancient form of government there. Alcibiades opposed this extravagant measure, he told the soldiers, b that since they had chosen him their general, he must return to Tissaphernes in order to dispose things for the making a speedy end of the war. The army came readily into this, as they did into every thing he desired of them, and he departed accordingly; when he came to Tissaphernes, he gave him to understand that matters were now quite changed, and that it was in the power of the Athenians to be either great friends, or very troublesome enemies to the subjects of the king, and that, whether they should be either one or the other, depended entirely on his management. Thus he made himself formidable to the Persians by boasting of the Athenian power, and necessary to the Athenians by the display of his interest with the Persians. As to the Peloponnesians, their affairs went wrong every where, and all through the pro- c curement of Alcibiades; their army mutinied and forced their general to fly to a sanctuary; Tissaphernes withheld their pay, and deluded them with promises of a fleet; they on the other hand distrusted Tissaphernes, and neither knew what measures to take, nor whom to trust. When Alcibiades came back to the Athenian army, he disposed them to hear reason, and not only to hear it, but to act according to it. The deputies from Athens had stayed all this while at Delos, being afraid of going to the army, as indeed they well might, the soldiers having passed a vote to put them to death. On the motion of Alcibiades however, they were allowed to come and deliver their message; but no sooner had they done this, than the army cried out as vehemently as ever, that they would have no intercourse with the tyrants, but sail to d Athens, and restore the government; but Alcibiades still interposed, he shewed that if such a course was taken, all Ionia and the Hellepont would be immediately lost, so that if they pretended to be true patriots, they must remain where they were, and defend the dominions of the state. To the deputies he gave this answer, that they should immediately return to Athens, and to acquaint the four hundred, that they were commanded to resign their power, and to restore the senate they had ejected; that as to the five thousand, they might retain their authority, provided they used it with moderation, and that they should remember to look well to the concerns of their country at home, since, if they betrayed Attica, or the army deserted Athens, a reconciliation would not restore the mischiefs such wrong steps might create. On e the return of these deputies to Athens, all things were in confusion, few regarding the public, almost all anxious for their particular interest. Pbrynicius knowing upon what terms he stood with Alcibiades, laboured to maintain the government in being; while others endeavoured all they could to gratify the army. The former were the stronger party, and that they might make a proper use of their strength, they dispatched away ambassadors to Sparta, desiring peace upon any terms; they likewise ordered the Pyraeum to be fortified towards the sea, upon which Theramenes, who was at the head of the other party, cried out, that they were about to betray the city to the enemy, which was rendered the more probable, by the coming of a fleet of forty Peloponnesian ships upon the coast; nor was he much in the wrong, for the four hun- f dred fought first to maintain themselves in the sovereignty they had acquired; but if that could not be done, to preserve at least the city under their dominion; and in case that likewise failed, to make a composition for themselves by giving it up to the Peloponnesians; for at all events they were resolved to prevent a popular government from being restored, not doubting, that if once that was done, they should fall victims. Pbrynicius, who was sent at the head of the embassy to Sparta, being able to effect nothing, returned, and on his return was stabbed in the forum; after which Theramenes and his party growing bolder, seized the chiefs of the four hundred, upon which a tumult ensued, which had like to have proved fatal to the city, had not Thucydides the Pharsalian interposed, and engaged the people to be quiet.

a quiet. The soldiers, however, insisted on demolishing the new works in the port, which for the sake of safety was permitted. The next day the four hundred, tho' in great fear, assembled in the senate house, and sent some of the members to appease the people, promising to set all things right, and to make every thing easy; in order to which, they proposed that they should be allowed to chuse five thousand men, who should elect four hundred by turns to govern the state, beseeching their country-men not to destroy themselves by giving up the city to the enemy. With much ado an agreement was made, that at a day certain a general assembly should be convoked for settling the state, but when that day came, and the assembly was convened, news was brought that the Lacedemonian fleet steered directly for Salamis, which put all things in confusion again; for instead of deliberating upon the matter they came about, they ran in crowds down to the port, where they perceived that the fleet bore away for Eubœa, whither immediately a fleet from Athens was sent, under the command of Thymocbares; but this fleet had little success, for being attacked by the Peloponnesians without, and betrayed by the Eretrians on shore, they were miserably defeated, twenty-two ships out of thirty-six being taken, most of the others killed, and all Eubœa, except Orcus, revolting. When this news came to Athens, the wise and the unwise gave up all things for lost, the defeat at Sicily seeming a small thing to this, because they had now neither fleet nor army, and had lost Eubœa, from whence the city received greater supplies than from Attica itself; certain it is, that if the Spartans had known their own strength, they would have sailed directly to Athens, and put an end to the war; but being always slow, and especially so in naval affairs, they gave the Athenians time, which of all things they wanted most: when they had gained this, they wrought so hard at their galleys, that in a short space they equipped a fleet of twenty sail; the power of the four hundred they abolished by law, conferred the sovereignty on the five thousand, and acted in all other respects, especially in recalling Alcibiades, with such prudence, moderation, and firmness, that Thucydides thinks the commonwealth never enjoyed so happy a temperature as at this time. Pisander and the rest of the vehement sticklers for Oligarchy, withdrew unheeded to the enemy. But it is now time to return to the army and fleet at Samos, and to the view of those things which were performed in Ionian. Tissaphernes going to Aspendus, where the Phœnician fleet lay, gave out, that he would comply exactly with all the promises he had made to the Peloponnesians. Alcibiades, however, persuaded the Athenians, that he meant nothing less, and either with a view to make this probable to them, or that he might indeed bring it to pass, sailed with thirteen galleys to Aspendus, where he held frequent conferences with the Persian Lieutenant, embroiling him thereby so effectually with the Peloponnesians, and they with him, that he destroyed all their affairs. In his absence an engagement happened between the Peloponnesian fleet, under the command of Mindarus, which consisted of seventy-three sail, and that of Athens, under the command of Thrasybulus, consisting only of fifty-five; at first the Peloponnesians had the advantage, sinking some of the Athenian ships, and running others on shoar; but pursuing the advantage too eagerly, and breaking their line, the Athenians supplied by their great skill in maritime affairs, their defect in force, and intirely defeated the Peloponnesians, taking twenty-one of their ships; it is true, they lost fifteen of their own, but a victory at this time, tho' dear bought, was a prodigious advantage, it raised the hopes of the Athenians, gave new life to their affairs, and saved all Ionian, and the Hellepont: A few days afterwards the Athenians took eight galleys coming from Byzantium, which had revolted presently after they reduced that city, and grievously fined its inhabitants for their disobedience. Alcibiades returning with his thirteen galleys, took nine more from the fleet, with which squadron he constrained the Halicarnasseans to pay a large sum of money, and fortified Cos. The news of these advantages coming to Athens, mightily enlivened the People, and inspired them with hopes of recovering Eubœa, and putting an honourable end to the war. These events fell out in the summer of the twenty-first year of the war, and here we take leave of our old and sure guide Thucydides, who concludes his history at this point of time. The history of the Peloponnesian war was continued by Theopompus and Xenophon, the work of the former comprehended the events falling out in the next seventeen years, that of the latter the next twenty-eight. Theopompus's writings are swallowed up by time, but it may be a great part of their contents are preserved by Diodorus Siculus. The Grecian history of Xenophon remains still in our hands; from these materials therefore, by the assistance of Plutarch's writings, we shall continue our memoirs of the Athenian affairs 1.

After the flood 2588.
Before Christ
411.

Doricus, admiral of the Italian galleys, passing to the assistance of the Lacedæmonians in the Hellefpont, found the Athenians in his way at Sestos, whereupon he fled to Dardanium, and landing his men, endeavoured from the shoar to defend his ships, which he caused to be hauled on the beach. The Athenian fleet, however, attacked him, and were upon the very point of making themselves masters of all his galleys, when Mindarus, the Peloponnesian admiral, came to his assistance, with a navy of eighty-four sail. The Athenians thereupon relinquished their first enterprise, and prepared for a general engagement, Thrasybulus commanding the right wing, and Thrasyllus the left. Mindarus, with his Lacedæmonian ships, had the right in the Peloponnesian fleet, and Doncus, with the Syracusan galleys, were in the left. Pharnabazus with a Persian army lay hard-by on the shore, on whose assistance the Peloponnesians knew they might depend. The Athenians, notwithstanding these disadvantages, fought with great resolution, and the battle was yet very dubious, when a fleet of twenty sail appeared in view, neither party knew to whom they belonged, and therefore both quickened their endeavours to end the fight before their arrival; when they drew near, the admiral's gally hoisted a purple flag, which was known by all to belong to Alcibiades. The Peloponnesian fleet immediately broke and fled, the Athenians took ten ships, and if a mighty tempest had not arisen, would have taken many more. Mindarus was constrained to run his ships into any port, and marched with his men to join Pharnabazus, who effectually protected them from the Athenians. The Eubæans having almost generally deserted the Athenians, the Beotians proposed to them the joining their country, by an artificial isthmus, to the continent, to which they assented, and herein they succeeded in spite of the opposition given them by the Athenians, and the rapidity of the Euripus, i. e. the arm of the sea they were to fill up. Theramenes the Athenian admiral finding it impossible to hinder this design from taking effect, he sailed away to other places, particularly to Paros, reduced them again under the Athenian government, and levied exorbitant fines upon such as he conceived had willingly deserted him; after which he sailed to join the grand fleet, under the command of Thrasybulus. Some short time after this conjunction, advice came that Mindarus, by the assistance of Pharnabazus, had taken Cyzicum by storm, upon which it was resolved to sail directly thither and fight them. When, therefore, the Athenian fleet had coasted the Chersonesus, and were arrived at Picænesus, they anchored there all night, and having landed their men under the command of Chares, directed him to march strait to Cyzicum; as to the fleet they divided it into three squadrons, the first led by Alcibiades, the second by Theramenes, and the third by Thrasybulus. Alcibiades with his squadron sailed in sight of the Peloponnesian fleet, upon which Mindarus having with him eighty sail, put to sea, to give him battle. Alcibiades, when the enemy drew near, broke and fled, whereupon the Peloponnesians pursued him with great joy, when on a sudden Alcibiades made a signal for a new line. The Peloponnesians looking about them, saw the squadrons of Theramenes and Thrasybulus, of whom they had no intelligence, between them and the shore; upon this, altering their course, they endeavoured to get into Cleros, a port near Pharnabazus's camp; Alcibiades pursued them thither, sinking and taking their ships all the way; when they came to the shore, however, Pharnabazus sent them such aid, that the Athenians suffered in their turns. Thrasybulus then landed his men to their assistance, giving Theramenes orders to land also, to join Chares, and to come with all speed to their aid. Alcibiades dealt with Mindarus and his Lacedæmonians, Thrasybulus fought bravely against the rest of the Peloponnesians, and their Persian succours, notwithstanding they were much out-numbered, and were at last surrounded. In that instant, Theramenes and Chares came in with their foot; the battle was long and obstinately fought, till Mindarus being killed, the Persians, Peloponnesians, and Lacedæmonians all fled; and thus to his immortal glory Alcibiades gained a victory at sea, and another at land, on the same day took the enemy's whole fleet, and more spoil than his and the remains could carry away. When the news of this success reached Athens, the people were ready to run distracted;

1 THUCYD. lib. viii. prop. fin. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiii. PLUT. in vit Alcibiad. JUSTIN. lib. 5.

- a they immediately levied an army of a thousand foot, and three-hundred horse, and sent thirty galleys to join Alcibiades, from whom, as he was now master of the sea, they expected all things. The Lacedæmonians conceiving rightly of this war, that it would end in the destruction either of the one state or the other, sent Endius their ambassador to Athens to propose a peace. This minister delivered himself to the assembly of the people, after the Laconic manner, in a short, plain, and excellent speech, wherein he shewed, that Athens had suffered more, and was like to suffer more than Sparta from this war, but inasmuch as the evils occasioned by war, were hateful to all good men; he said the Spartans desired both to free themselves, and their neighbours, from labouring any longer under them, and that on this account only they had sent him to treat of peace. The people at first were inclined to relish what he said, but one Cleophon, an orator, a man of mean birth, and formerly a slave, but who had surreptitiously got his name inserted in the roll of citizens, by a petulant harangue, put all thoughts of peace out of their heads, and engaged them to send back Endius without an answer. This was the last step they had to take for perfecting their ruin, for never afterwards were they in any condition to refuse peace again, and indeed they did it now merely from the hopes they had, that Alcibiades would for ever conquer, and fortune, who had been hitherto so unsteady, fix herself now to their side ^m.

- In the beginning of the next year, Thrasybulus having repulsed Agis, king of Sparta, who led an army to the gates of Athens, sailed with a great fleet, and a strong body of land forces on board, to Ephesus, which he attacked, but was forced to retreat; he went afterwards to Lesbos, and other places, where he had better success. The Spartans, in the mean time, perceiving that the war was transferred far from Greece, attacked Pylus by sea and land, whereupon the Athenians sent a squadron under the command of Anytus, but he finding the wind directly against him, after he had been some days at sea, returned directly to Athens; upon which the people, according to their usual custom, condemned him to die, which sentence however, he commuted by paying a vast sum of money, being the first who reversed a judgment in that manner. In the mean time the garrison of Pylus, after having made an obstinate defence, rendered upon terms; and thus the Lacedæmonians pulled this thorn out of their side, after it had vexed them fifteen years. On the heels of this followed another misfortune, the Megareans surprised Nisæa, which so enraged the Athenians, that they immediately sent an army into that country, though it could be of no use; the Megareans, by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians, and some troops from Sicily, ventured a battle, wherein they were most shamefully beaten, the Athenians killing great numbers of them, and committing horrid devastations in their country. In the mean time Alcibiades, Thrasybulus, and Theramenes, did great things in the Hellepont and Thrace; at last they besieged Byzantium, then well fortified, and having in it a Lacedæmonian garrison, under the command of Clearchus; some of its inhabitants, however, betray'd it, and let in Alcibiades and his army; the garrison, however, and such of the Byzantines, as adhered to them, made so gallant a resistance, that the Athenians were on the point of being driven out; which when Alcibiades saw, he caused proclamation to be made, that the Byzantines should be safe in their persons and effects, whereupon they turned out the garrison, which were all put to the sword, except five hundred, who were sent prisoners to Athens. This done, Alcibiades received Byzantium into favour ⁿ.

- In the beginning of the next year Alcibiades and Theramenes, returned in triumph to Athens, they brought with them a fleet of two-hundred ships, and such a load of spoils, as had never been seen in Athens since the Persian war. The people left their city destitute, that they might crowd to the port to behold Alcibiades, as he landed; old and young blessed him as he went by, and the next day when he made an harangue in the assembly, they directed the record of his banishment to be thrown into the sea, ordered the Eumolpides to absolve him from the curses he lay under, created him general with absolute power, and in fine endeavoured to cover him with as many favours as he had conferred benefits on them. The sweetness of his temper, his complacence towards all degrees of people, and the care he took of applying the immense riches he brought, to the discharge of taxes, made the best of the Athenians ready to own that he deserved the honours that were paid to a him; neither did he long indulge to himself the enjoyment of his glory, but soon put to sea with a fleet of an hundred ships, in order to do further service to his country. He was scarce departed when Agis, king of Sparta, made a bold attempt upon Athens; he came with an army of twenty-eight thousand men, in the night, to the very walls, slew the watch, and gained a part of the walls. The Athenians, greatly amaz'd, ran to arms, and in the morning sent out a body of horse, equal to the cavalry of the Peloponnesian army; they fought under the walls, and in the sight both of the Lacedemonians, and the Athenians; at last the Athenians prevailed, and drove the Peloponnesian cavalry back on their foot, whereupon Agis retired, finding it impossible to prevail against the city. Alcibiades, in the mean time, leaving part of his fleet under the command of Antiochus his pilot, with strict orders to do nothing till his return, sailed into the Hellepont, to assist some of the cities, which yet stood firm to the Athenians. When he was gone, Antiochus, little regarded his orders, went and provoked Lysander, the Lacedemonian admiral, to fight, which he, finding Alcibiades was absent, very readily did. In this engagement the Athenians were beat, losing fifteen ships, with Antiochus their commander. On the news of this defeat Alcibiades returned, and would have provoked Lysander to a second battle, but that prudent general would not hazard the glory he had acquired. In the mean time, the Athenians being persuaded, that this disgrace was owing to the indolence and luxury of Alcibiades, and listening also to certain stories they were told, that he corresponded with Pharnabazus, and the Lacedemonians, they instantly stripped him of his command, naming ten new generals, among whom were Conon, Thrasylulus, and Pericles, the son of the famous Pericles. Conon having demanded the fleet from Alcibiades, he readily yielded up his command, but refused to return to Athens. He then with his own ship passed over into Thrace, built a castle for his own security, and erected a little principality in the sight of his many and potent enemies.

^m XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. 1. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiii. PLUT. in vit. Alcibiad. JUSTIN. lib. v. CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Alcibiad. ⁿ XENOPHON. DIODOR. PLUT. CORN. NEPOS. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

THE next year Conon, the Athenian general, engaged Callicratidas, the successor of Lysander, in a sea-fight, wherein he is said to have shewn greater conduct than any admiral before him had done, in the disposition of his fleet; however, he was worsted, lost thirty of his ships, and was closely besieged in Mytelene. News of this coming to Athens, the people were in great confusion; they admitted all sorts of persons to the freedom of their city, who would assist them in this war, and with much ado equipped a great number of ships, which were sent away to Samos, where their fleet rendezvoused, with strict orders to relieve Conon at any rate. In obedience to these commands, the whole fleet, consisting of an hundred and fifty sail, bore away from Samos: Callicratidas receiving advice thereof, leaving a force sufficient to block up the city, sailed with an hundred and fifty ships to Malea, a promontory of Lesbos. The same night that he arrived there, the Athenian fleet came to Arginæse, a place over-against Lesbos. In the morning a general engagement ensued, which was fought with great obstinacy, till at last the Lacedemonian admiral being sunk, the Athenians gained a great victory, with the loss, however, of nineteen of their ships, with most of the men in them; but the Peloponnesians lost seventy-nine. It might have been expected, that the people of Athens would have been extremely grateful to those generals, who had gained them this victory, but the very contrary happened, for Theramenes having accused his colleagues of having taken no care to save the dying, or to pay the last rites to the dead, they were immediately recalled, two of them not caring to trust the people, fled, but six of them returned home and stood their trial, alledging that they were hindered by a tempest from doing what they were now accused of neglecting; but Theramenes making a most laboured and pathetic oration against them, in which he now and then stopped, that the cries of those who lamented the dead might be heard, and producing in the end a man who pretended to have escaped in a meal-tub, and who deposed, that the people, when drowning, desired that the Athenians would revenge them on their generals, the people, against law and reason, condemned them all to death. Socrates, the philosopher, was at that time one of the prytanes, and resolutely refused to do his office. Diomedon, one of those who were condemned, rising up, desired to be heard, whereupon silence being made, he spoke thus, We all of us wish, ye men a of Athens, and wish it from our hearts, that the sentence pronounced against us, may issue in the prosperity and happiness of this city; but since we are prevented from paying our vows for the victory, it is but just and fit, that you return thanks to providence for it. They were then all haled to execution, and suffered like brave men, with great resolution, calmness, and fortitude; their names are Diomedon, Thrasyllus, Calliades, Lyfias, Aristocrates, and Pericles, the only son of the famous Pericles. A little while after the madness of the people turned the other way, Cleophon, the demagogue, who had been very busy in this matter, was killed in a sedition, upon which the rest who had stirred in that affair, fled, but Calixenus who pronounced the sentence returned afterwards, and being hated by all men, was famished to b death.

• THUCYD. DIODOR. ubi supra PLUT. in vit. Alcibiad. CORN. NEP. in vit. Eujul. JUSTIN. lib. 5.

THE next year the Athenian fleet assembled at Samos, under the command of Conon, while Lyfander took the command of what fleet the Peloponnesians had left; he being unable to fight with so small a force, and having too great a one to lye idle, sailed first to Thesus, which he took, afterwards he sailed to the coast of Attica, where being able to do nothing of great moment, he returned to his old station, and some time afterwards besieged and took Lampsacus. The Athenians hearing of this, sailed under the command of Conon and Philocles, with a fleet of a hundred and eighty ships; first to Sestos, and then to the river Ægos, where Lyfander lay daring him to fight, which he, being much inferior in strength, refused.
 c While they remained here, the Athenians grew idle and careless, and having a camp on shoar, spent their time in revelling and drunkenness. Alcibiades residing in this neighbourhood, could not remain an unconcerned spectator; he came therefore to the officers, and earnestly besought them to be more vigilant. He told them that Lyfander was both a wise and a fortunate general, and that it became them to take care of him. They answered that they wondered at his assurance, who was an exile and a vagabond, to come and give laws to them, threatening if he came any more, to seize him and send him to Athens; they afterwards concluded, among themselves, what they should do with the Peloponnesians, when they were taken prisoners, and resolved, at the motion of Philocles, their general, to cut off d their right hands, or, as Plutarch says, their right thumbs, that they might never be able to hold a spear, but tug at an oar. Adiamantus, one of their officers, could not help saying, that such idle discourse was unworthy of Athenians; for which they hated him. Some days after Lyfander taking his opportunity, fell upon them, while they lay in disorder, both by sea and land, and gained one of the most compleat victories recorded in history. Conon with eight gallies only escaping to Cyprus. Afterwards returning to Lampsacus, Lyfander put Philocles and three thousand captives, with all their officers, except Adiamantus, to death, by the unanimous judgment of all the confederates. This execution over, he reduced all the cities, which had been under the Athenian power, dismissing all their garrie sons with great civility; that going home to Athens, the city might be full of people, and empty of bread, whenever he came to besiege it, which soon after he did by sea; while Agis king of Sparta came with a great land-army before it. For a long time the Athenians defended themselves, without so much as demanding a peace, at last, being sore pressed by famine, they endeavoured to treat with Agis, but he referred them to Sparta; thither then they sent deputies, who offered to give up all things but their city and port. The Lacedemonians, however, would listen to nothing, unless their walls were demolished. On the return of the ambassadors, Archistratus proposed complying with those terms to the assembly, for which he was imprisoned, many preferring death to slavery; at length Theramenes undertook f to treat with Lyfander, who after a long attendance referred him to Sparta, whither with some other deputies he was presently sent. On their arrival they found the council of the confederates assembled, wherein all gave their votes for the utter destruction of Athens, excepting only the Spartans, who declared they would not consent to the ruin of that city, which had so well deserved of Greece. On the return of Theramenes, peace was concluded upon these terms, that the long walls, and the fortifications of the port, should be demolished. That they should deliver up all their ships, except twelve, receive all they had banished, and follow the fortune of the Lacedemonians. Lyfander caused the walls to be pulled down, all the music in his army playing, on that very day of the year on which they had beat the Per-

p XENOPHON. DIODOR PLUT. CORN. NEP. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

fians at Salamine. He likewise established an oligarchy, expressly against the will of the people; and thus the ruin of Athens ended the twenty-seventh year of the Peloponnesian war¹.

As soon as Lyfander had demolished the long walls, and the fortifications of the Piræum, he constituted a council of thirty, with power, as was pretended, to make laws, but in truth to subjugate the state. These are the persons so famous in history, under the title of the thirty tyrants; they were all the creatures of Lyfander, mere implements of power, who as they derived their rise from conquest, and the law of the sword, exercised their offices in a suitable manner; that is with the highest testimonies of pride, insolence, and cruelty. Instead of making laws, they governed without them, appointed a senate, and magistrates at their will, and, that they might do all things without danger and controul, they sent for a garrison from Lacedæmon, which was accordingly granted them, under the command of Callidius, upon their promise to pay the soldiers regularly. One of the first steps they took was to punish all informers, who by false accusation had taken off honest men, and disturbed the state; this, though severe, was popular, but when through flattery and bribes, they had wholly drawn over Callidius to their party, they suffered bad men to live in quiet, and turned their rage against the good. Critias and Theramenes were at the head of the thirty, men of the greatest power and abilities in Athens; the former was ambitious and cruel without measure, the latter retained some bowels for his country; the former pushed on all the bloody schemes framed by his confederates, and carried into execution many of his own; the latter always opposed them at first with moderation, at last with vehemence. He said that power was given them to rule, and not to spoil the commonwealth, and that it became them to act like shepherds, not like wolves, and that they ought to beware of rendering themselves at once odious and ridiculous, by attempting to domineer over all, being such a handful of men as they were. The rest disliking much the former part of his discourse, caught hold of the latter, and immediately chose out three thousand, whom they made the representatives of the people, and to whom they granted this notable privilege, that none of them should be put to death, but by the judgment of the senate, thereby openly assuming a power of putting any other Athenian citizens to death by their own authority. A glorious use they made of this new-assumed privilege, for as many as they conjectured to be no friends to the government in general, or to any of themselves in particular, they put to death, without cause and without mercy. Theramenes openly opposing this, and absolutely refusing to concur in such measures, Critias accused him to the senate as a man of unsteady principles, sometimes for the people, sometimes against them, always for new things and state revolutions. Theramenes owned that he had sometimes changed his measures, but alledged that he had always done it to serve the people; he said that it was solely with this view, that he made the peace with Sparta, and accepted the office of one of the thirty; that he had never opposed their measures, while they cut off the wicked, but when they began to destroy men of fortune and family, then he owned he had differed with them, which he conceived to be no crime against the state. While Theramenes was speaking, Critias withdrew, perceiving that the senate were thoroughly convinced of the truth of what Theramenes had said; but he quickly returned with a guard, crying out, that he had struck Theramenes's name out of the list of the three thousand, that the senate had therefore no longer cognizance of the cause, which the thirty had already judged, and condemned him to death. Theramenes perceiving, that they intended to seize him, fled to the altar, which was in the midst of the senate-house, and laying his hands thereon, said: I do not seek refuge here, because I expect to escape death, or desire it, but that tearing me from the altar, the impious authors of my murder, may interest the gods in bringing them to speedy judgment, and thereby restore freedom to my country: The guards then haled him from the altar, and carried him to the place of execution, where he drank the poison with undaunted courage, putting the people in mind with his last breath, that as they struck his name out of the three thousand, they might strike any of theirs. His death was followed by a train of murders, so that in a short time sixty of the worthiest and most eminent citizens of Athens fell by the cruelty of the thirty. Amongst these the most pitied was a Niceratus, the son of Nicias, a man universally beloved for his goodness, and universally admired for his virtues. As for the Spartans, they, losing their former generosity, were extremely pleased with these things, and by a public decree commanded that such as fled from the thirty tyrants should be carried back bound to Athens; which extraordinary proceeding frightened all Greece; but the Argives and Thebans only had the courage to oppose it; the former received the Athenian exiles with humanity and kindness, the latter punished with a mulct; such of their citizens as did not rise and rescue the Athenian prisoners, who in pursuance of the Lacedæmonian decree were carried bound through their territories.

¹ XENOPHON Hellen. lib. ii. DIODOR. lib. xiv. PLUT. in vit. Lyfander. CORN. NEPOS in vit. ejusd. JUSTIN. lib. xv.

Thrasybulus and such as with him had taken shelter in the Theban territory, resolved to hazard something, rather than remain perpetual exiles from their country; and though he had but thirty men on whom he could depend, yet considering the victories he had heretofore obtained in the cause of his country, made an irruption into Attica, where he seized Phyla, a castle at a very small distance from Athens, where in a very short space his forces were augmented to seven hundred men; and though the tyrants made use of the Spartan garrison in their endeavours to reduce him and his party, yet Thrasybulus prevailed in several skirmishes, and at last constrained them to break up the blockade of Phyla, which they had formed. The thirty and their party conceiving it very advantageous for them to have the possession of Eleusina, marched thither, and having persuaded the people to go unarmed out of their city, that they might number them, took this opportunity most inhumanly to murder them. The forces of Thrasybulus increasing daily, he at length possessed himself of the Piræum, which he fortified in the best manner he could, but the tyrants being determined to drive him from thence, came down against him with the utmost force they could raise. Thrasybulus defended himself with great obstinacy, and in the end they were forced to retreat, having lost before the place not only a great number of men, but Critias the president of the thirty, another of the same body, and one who had been captain of the Piræum; when they came to demand the dead from Thrasybulus, in order for their interment, he caused a cryer he had with him, to make a short speech in a very loud voice to the people, intreating them to consider, that as they were citizens of Athens without, so those against whom they fought, and who fought to preserve themselves within the fort, were Athenian citizens also, wherefore instead of thinking how to ruin and destroy their brethren, they ought rather to consult how all differences ought to be composed, and especially ought to rid themselves of those bloody tyrants, who in the short time they had had the administration in their hands, had destroyed more than fell in the Peloponnesian war. The people, though moved by these discourses, differed among themselves, the consequence of which was, that they expelled the thirty, and chose ten men out of each tribe to govern in their stead, whereupon the tyrants retired to Eleusina. The citizens, however, though they changed the government, made no agreement with those in the Piræum, but sent away deputies to Sparta, as did also the tyrants from Eleusina, complaining, that the Athenians had revolted, and desiring their assistance to reduce them. The Spartans sent thereupon a large sum of money to encourage their confederates, and appointed Lysander commander in chief, and his brother to be admiral, resolving to send sea and land forces to reduce Athens, a second time, intending, as most of the Greek states suspected, to add it now to their own dominions. It is very probable that this design of theirs would have taken effect, if Pausanias, king of Sparta, envying Lysander, had not resolved to obstruct it. With this view he procured another army to be raised against the Athenians, of which himself had the command, and with which he marched immediately to besiege the Piræum. While he lay before the place, and pretended to attack it, he entered into a private correspondence with Thrasybulus, informing him what propositions he should make in order to force the Lacedæmonians, who were suspected by all their allies, to grant them peace.

THE intrigues of Pausanias had all the success he could wish; the Ephori who were with him in the camp concurred in his measures, so that in a short space a treaty was concluded on the following terms; that all the citizens of Athens should be restored to their houses and privileges, excepting the thirty, the ten which had succeeded

XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. ii. DIODOR. lib. xiv. PLUT. in vit. Lysand. Alcibiad. CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Lysand. JUSTIN. lib. v. XENOPH. DIODOR. PLUT. CORN. NEPOS. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

succeeded them, and who had acted no less tyrannically than they, and the eleven, ^a who during the time of the oligarchy had been constituted governors or keepers of the Piræum; that all should remain quiet for the future in the city, and that if any were afraid to trust to this agreement, they should have free leave to retire to Eleusina. Pausanias then marched away with the Spartan army, and Thrasybulus at the head of his forces marched into Athens, where having laid down their arms, they sacrificed with the rest of the citizens in the temple of Minerva, after which the popular government was restored. Yet quiet was not thoroughly established, the exiles at Eleusina, having endeavoured by the help of money to raise an army of foreigners, by whose aid they might recover the authority they had lost; but first depending on their friends in the city, they sent some of the principal persons ^b amongst them as deputies, to treat with the citizens, but strictly instructed them to sow jealousies, and excite discords among them. Which the latter quickly perceiving, put these persons to death, and then remonstrating to those at Eleusina, that these contentions would undoubtedly end either in their own, or the destruction of their country, they offered immediately to pass an act of oblivion, which they would confirm with an oath. This being accepted, those who had withdrawn returned to the city, where all differences were adjusted, and both parties most religiously observed the agreement they had made, and thereby thoroughly resettled the state. In this whole transaction, the virtue of Thrasybulus deserves chiefly to be admired. When he first seized the castle of Phyla, the tyrants privately offered him ^c to receive him into their number instead of Theramenes, and to pardon at his request, any twelve persons he should name; but he generously answered, that his exile was far more honourable than any authority could be, purchased on such terms; and by persisting in his design, accomplished, as we have seen, the deliverance of his country. A glorious deliverance it was, since, as Isocrates informs us, they put fourteen hundred citizens to death, contrary to, and without any form of law, and drove five thousand more into banishment, procuring also the death of Alcibiades, as many think, though at a great distance from them (N). Much about

(N) We are here to speak of the misfortunes of Alcibiades, a man who deserved much of his country, and would have deserved more, if her impatience had not prevented his services, and her ingratitude deprived him of the power of serving her. Plutarch tells us, that he was removed from his employment, not because he had done any fault, but because he had not performed all which the Athenians hoped from him; his success in his first expedition had so elated them, that they would not afterwards believe he could fail of achieving any thing, which he desired to achieve, tho' his ships were ill provided, and tho' he had no pay for his soldiers; when therefore he was sent to Chios and Ionis, they concluded the first news they heard would be that he had reduced both, being disappointed in this their fond opinion, they grew angry, and persecuted him anew, for not doing what in the nature of things it was, not possible he should have done. With the public madness of the people conspired the private envy of the chief men amongst them. Thrasybulus began to dislike him, and most of the ten commanders, who afterwards perished by popular rage, now busied themselves in turning it on him, of which when Alcibiades had notice, he retired, according to his old maxim, that it was foolish to study a defence against an accusation, when it was possible to fly from it. In his expedition into Thrace, he made use of such as offered their service, and he did it with honourable intent; first to settle a secure retreat for himself, and secondly to preserve the Greek cities in his neighbourhood, from the insults of these Thracians, who as they yielded no obedience to the king, so they consulted nothing but their own interest, preying, as occasion served, on any who were least able to resist. After the entire destruction of the Athenian fleet, and the flight of Conon to Cyprus, Alcibiades thought himself no longer safe in his castle; for the Lacedæmonians, his inveterate enemies, being now every-where powerful, he was afraid they should take this opportunity of avenging the many defeats they had received from him; he therefore retired first into Bythinia, but finding himself not safe, there, he went to Pharnabazus, who received him with great civility, and as he believed, with great friendship. In Athens the people sighing under the thirty tyrants, placed all their hopes in Alcibiades; they knew his love for his country, and they doubted not but he would make some effort to relieve her. The tyrants themselves expected the same thing, and especially Critias, their chief, who had been his most intimate friend, and at whose motion the decree had been made for recalling Alcibiades from banishment; but the lust of power destroys all ties, whether of blood or affection. He who was before his friend, became now his bitter enemy, and sending to Lysander, assured him that Athens would never be quiet, or Sparta safe, till Alcibiades was destroyed. The Lacedæmonian general scorning to defile himself with an assassination, treated these notices with the contempt they deserved; but Critias applying to the magistracy of Sparta, procured an order to be sent from thence to Lysander, which he durst not disobey. Upon receipt of this order, Lysander sent away a messenger to Pharnabazus, desiring him to put it in execution. Pharnabazus committed the affair to Magæus, his brother, and to his uncle Sisamithres. Alcibiades resided at that time in a small village in Phrygia, together with Timandra, a mistress of his. As he slept he had this dream: He thought himself attired in his mistress's habit, and that she holding him in her arms, dressed his head, and painted his face as if he had been a woman. Others say, he dreamed that Magæus cut off his head,

- a about this time, that is, a little after the popular government was settled again in Athens, Socrates was condemned, and put to death. He was not only a philosopher, or one who in words professed the love of wisdom, but one who in deeds, as well as by his excellent sayings, demonstrated that he was truly wise. As a soldier, he had been present in several engagements; in one he preserved the life of Alcibiades, in another he carried off a friend of his, who was wounded upon his back, in a third shewed as much courage and conduct as the most experienced generals. In all the campaigns wherein he served, he distinguished himself by enduring hardships with patience, executing punctually whatever he was commanded, and complying readily with any thing that was desired of him; for tho'
- b he was exceedingly temperate, and strictly sober, yet if his company was desired he refused not to go to entertainments, and to drink there as other people did. He refused to meddle at all with matters of state, till he grew far in years, and was then elected to the senate by his tribe. He opposed, as we have already related, the judgment given against the generals for not burying the dead; though Theramenes, his friend had promoted it, and when he was called upon to put that judgment into writing, as his office required, he said he was unacquainted with the law terms, and at last absolutely refused it. Afterwards he sought to rescue Theramenes, when he was accused by his colleagues; after his death, he continuing to speak his mind freely, which gave some umbrage to the thirty, who notwithstanding suffered him to live, because Critias was his intimate friend. But the danger he was in
- c hindred him not from disclosing his mind to his associates, particularly he said one day to Antisthenes on account of the eminent men, who were daily taken up, Doth it repent thee, that we have done nothing memorable, or at all comparable to what those monarchs have performed, who are celebrated in tragedies, such as Atreus, Thyestes, Agamemnon, and Egisthus? They are in those plays beheaded, feasted with their childrens flesh, and some way or other destroyed at last; but no poet had ever the hardiness to introduce the death of a hog upon the stage. One of his friends complaining, that of late, he was grown a no-body, and could pretend to no post or office, Socrates demanded tartly, Are you sorry for it? At another time he delivered himself in a public conversation thus: A herdsman would
- d be very disingenuous, who, in case the cattle grew worse, and the herd thinner, by his management, would not confess himself an ill herdsman; but the governor of a city would be yet more disingenuous, if, seeing his citizens grew worse and thinner, he should not own himself an ill governor. Which being reported to the tyrants, Critias and Clearchus sent for him, and forbid him to converse with any man under thirty, on pain of having his head placed somewhere else than upon his shoulders; but not being yet satisfied of his fidelity to their government, they summoned him to the senate-house, and ordered him to go with some other persons, whom they named, to seize one Leon, a man of rank and fortune, whom they determined to put out of the way, that they might enjoy his estate; this
- e commission Socrates flatly refused, and not satisfied therewith, added also his reason head, and burnt his body; and it is said that it was but a little while before his death, that he had these visions. They who were sent to assassinate him, had not courage enough to enter the house; but surrounding it first, they set it on fire. Alcibiades, as soon as he perceived it, getting together great quantities of cloaths and furniture, threw them upon the fire, with a design to choke it; and having wrapped his robe about his left arm, and holding his naked sword in his right, he cast himself into the middle of the fire, and escaped securely through it, before it had time to take thoroughly the furniture and other materials he had thrown into it. The Barbarians, as soon as they saw him, retreated, and none of them durst stay to expect him, or to engage with him; but standing at a distance, they slew him with their darts and arrows. When he was dead, the Barbarians departed, and Timandra took up his dead body, and covering and wrapping it up in her own robes, the very best she had, she buried it as decently and as honourably as her present circumstances would allow. She buried him in a town called Melissa; and we learn from Athenaeus, that the monument remained to his time, for he himself saw it. The emperor Adrian, in memory of so great a man, caused his statue of Parian marble to be set up thereon, and ordered a bull should be sacrificed to him annually. Ephorus the historian, as he is cited by Diodorus Siculus, gives quite another account of his death, than that before recited from Plutarch. He says, that Alcibiades having discovered the design of Cyrus the younger to take up arms, informed Pharnabazus thereof, and desired that he might carry this news to the king; but Pharnabazus envying him that honour, sent a confidant of his own, and took all the merit to himself, which Alcibiades suspecting, went to Paplagonia, and sought to procure from the governor thereof letters of credence to the king, which Pharnabazus understanding, hired people to murder him. He was destroyed in the fortieth year of his age (1).

(1) Plutarch in vit. Alcibiad. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiv. Corn. Nep. in vit. Alcib. Athen. in Deipnos.

for such refusal. I will never willingly, said he, assist an unjust act. Chericles replied ^a sharply, dest thou think, Socrates, to talk always in this high style, and not to suffer. Far from it, added he, I expect to suffer a thousand ills, but none so great as to do unjustly. Upon which he went directly home, where he would not have been long safe, if the tyrants had not shortly after been obliged to turn their thoughts to the contriving means, for their own safety, rather than to project how to injure and destroy others. The cause of this great man's death was the pique one Anytus had taken against him, who drew in Melitus a bold young man, and Aristophanes the comic poet. The last of these broke the ice first, brought Socrates upon the stage, in a comedy of his, called the clouds, wherein he represents him as a man given to a subtle fallacious manner of arguing, whereby he could make a bad ^b cause seem good, an introducer of new gods, whilst himself worshipped none, and as a petulant railer at those things which others held sacred. Socrates himself went to the Theatre, where he sat in the most conspicuous place; and when one of his friends asked him if it did not vex him to be thus treated, he answered, No! at all; I fancy I am at a feast, where every one enjoys me. A long time after this Anytus conceiving the season now proper for the execution of that vengeance, which he had so long meditated, engaged Melitus to prefer a complaint against him to the senate, which he did in these words: Melitus, son of Melitus, a Pythian, accuseth Socrates son of Sophronicus an Alopeitian. Socrates violates the law, not believing the deities whom this city believeth, but introducing other new gods. He ^c violates the law likewise, in corrupting youth, the punishment death. When the day of trial came on, Melitus opened the prosecution with a very poor harangue, in which he was often prompted, and had much ado to get through it. The crimes he therein alledged, were, that Socrates persuaded his scholars to contemn the laws of the republic; that he was the intimate friend of Critias and Alcibiades, that he taught young people to be disrespectful to their parents, by telling them that he would make them more knowing than their fathers, with many other things of a like nature. When he had done, Anytus began a long and malicious harangue, wherein he was favourably heard; and after him Lyco in a set rhetorical speech supported ^d the accusation. When these had done speaking, Socrates went up into the orators desk, and from thence spoke after this manner to the people; "I am surprized, "O Athenians! how Melitus came by this extraordinary piece of knowledge, that "I do not worship the gods the city worships. Others have seen me, and so, if " Melitus had pleased, he might have done too, sacrifice at common festivals in " the public altars; how do I introduce new deities, when I profess in all my " actions to be directed by the voice of God; they who observe the notes of " birds, or the answers of men are guided by the voice. None doubts of thunder, " that it proceeds from the supreme power, and is oraculous, that the priestess on " the tripod conveys to us by her voice, what she receives from the god, who ^e " doubts? and that he foreknows future events, and communicates them to whom " he pleases, all men believe and confess as well as I. Many call such as foretel " future things, sooth-sayers and diviners. I ascribe these things to the dæmon, " and, I conceive, speak more religiously therein than they who fancy I know not " what divine power in birds; that I am no impostor herein many can attest, " who have asked any advice, and never found it fail; let such as are incredulous " hear this also to confirm their opinions; as to my being favoured of the gods, " when Cerephon in the presence of many witnesses, inquired of the oracle at " Delphos concerning me, Apollo answered, that no man was more free, more " just, more wise; yet the same god said more of Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian law- ^f " giver, that he knew not whether to call him a god or a man. Me he compared " not with the gods, though he gave me the priority amongst other men, but trust " not the gods herein, consider me exactly your selves, whom have you less a slave " to sensual pleasures? whom more free? I accept neither stipends nor gifts. " Whom more just than him who conforms himself so to the present time, as that " he stands not in need of the defence of any other? who will say that he deserves " not the title of wise, who, since he was able, never lost any opportunity of learning, " by inquiry, all the good possible? And that I took not the pains in vain, is evi- " dent from hence, that citizens and strangers, studious of virtue, have preferred " my conversation to that of other men. Why do you think so many desire to " oblige me by gifts, whom they know to have no capacity of requiting them? " or

- a " or how can you account for my engaging so many, without requiring any return " from them? that when the city was besieged, and every one lamented the " wretchedness of his condition, I shewed no alteration of temper, but remained
 " the same as before, that while others lay out their money on exterior things to " please themselves, I furnish myself from within, with such things as please " me better. If none can controvert what I say, how comes it to pass that I " deserve not commendation both of gods and men, instead of being charged as I " am now by you, Melitus, that with these instructions I corrupt youth. Every one " knows what it is to corrupt youth; can you name one whom I of religious have " made impious, whom from a modest deportment, I have rendered impudent, of b " a frugal disposition, prodigal, of a sober habit, debauched, of a hardy way of " life, effeminate? know ye any of these? " I know those, answered Melitus, " whom you have persuaded to be more obedient to you than to their own parents".
 " With respect to instruction, I confess I have, answered Socrates, for that was my " sphere, not theirs. In regard to their health, men consult physicians, before their " parents, in law suits they apply to counsel, not to cousins; and in war you
 " inquire as to your general's skill in arms, not who are his allies". " With " good reason, cried Melitus, and fit we should". " Is it so, said Socrates: If others " are preferred for such things, as they excel in, and with reason too, can you " think it fit, because in the opinion of some I have an advantage beyond others c " in educating of youth, which is a matter of the greatest consequence to society, " that therefore I ought to suffer death? Anytus and Melitus, O my judges, may " procure that judgment, but hurt me they cannot: to fear death, is to seem " wise, and not to be so, for it is to pretend to understand what we really under" stand not. No man knows what death is, or whether it be not the greatest " happiness which can arrive to us, yet all fear and shun it, as if they were sure " it would be the greatest misfortune". Plato would also have spoken in his defence, and going up into the desk, opened his speech thus: Though I, Athenians, am the youngest of those that come up into this place. The people immediately cried out, of those which go down, which they constrained him to do without speaking of d another word; then proceeding to vote, it was carried against Socrates by two hundred eighty-one voices. He might, however, have escaped with a fine, which his friends offered to pay for him, but he contented himself with saying, that to pay a fine was to acknowledge an offence, and that what had provoked a prosecution against him, deserved rather the highest rewards, and a maintenance out of the public stock, than a pecuniary mulct. At this the judges were so much incensed, that they judged him to a capital punishment, by a majority of eighty.
 He might easily have avoided this, if his friends could have prevailed on him to have made his escape; but he refused, drank the poison in their presence, praying to God to make his passage from this life happy, and shewed the same calmness e and resolution in death, for which throughout his life he had been famous (O).

IT

(O) Socrates happened to be condemned the very day after the sacred ship set sail for Delos. The reader must observe, that this ship went annually in commemoration of the mighty deliverance of Theseus in Crete, and in consequence of his vow. It was a rule of their religion never to be broken through, that from the time of the departure of this ship from the port of Athens, to the time of its coming back, no malefactors were ever put to death; this sometimes, by means of contrary wind, occasioned the intervention of a considerable space, as happened in the case of Socrates, who was in prison thirty days before his death; in this time he was visited by his friends, some of whom offered to carry him away by force, at which he laughed, Why, said he, do you know any place out of Attica where death never comes? Plato hath wrote a long discourse concerning the manner of his death; we will from thence transcribe only so much as relates immediately thereto, though indeed the whole is an admirable piece, and extremely well worth the reading. " It was " now sun-set, for he had staid long within, when
 " the officer entered, and after a little pause, said,

" I have not, Socrates, observed that carriage in you
 " which I have found in others; but as I thought " you the most generous, the mildest, and best of " all men, that ever came into this place, so I
 " now see you hate me not, for that whereof " others are the cause: you know the message I " bring, farewell; bear what you cannot remedy.
 " With that he departed weeping; and fare thee
 " well, said Socrates, I am well: how civil is this man?
 " I found him the same all the time of my impris" onment, he would often visit and discourse with " me, used me always courteously, and now see " how kindly he weeps for me; but come, Crito,
 " let us do as he bids us, if the poison be ready, let " it be brought. The sun is yet scarce set, answer
 " Crito, others take it late after a plentiful supper, " and full cups; make not so much haste, there is " time enough. He replied, they who do so think " they gain time, but what shall I gain by drink" ing it late, only deceive myself, as covetous of " life, and sparing of that which is no longer
 " mine? Pray let it be as I say; then Crito sent one " of the attendants, who immediately returned,
 " and

IT is easy to judge that from the usage they gave the worthiest men amongst them, the Athenians least deserved to meet with patriots; yet so it was, that notwithstanding her ill usage, never any city was more beloved by her citizens. Conon, who after the misfortune which befel him, at the battle of the Hellepont, which was followed by the destruction of Athens, had kept himself close in Cyprus, and never ventured home, now conceived in his mind a mighty project, no less than the restoring the Athenian affairs to their antient state, and bestowing once more upon that city the empire of the sea; with this view he caused a project to be transmitted to the Persian king, wherein he endeavoured to demonstrate that the pride of the Lacedemonians would be extremely detrimental to his affairs, that their dominion once thoroughly settled in Greece, they would presume to give laws to Asia also, especially with respect to the Greek cities therein, and that therefore it would be expedient for the Persians to consider of some means for putting it once more in the power of Athens to check the insolence of that aspiring state, and thereby preserve the great king's dominions in peace and safety. Conon's memorial was quickly supported by facts; two Lacedemonian armies within the compass of a few years passed over into Asia, the last under Lysander and Agésilas, which performed great things, and would have performed greater, if the Persian king had not, by sending some of his agents with vast sums of money into Greece, raised so many, and so powerful enemies against Sparta, that she was constrained to recal Agésilas to her assistance. The expediency of Conon's advice being so fully made known, he, as a person perfectly well skilled in maritime affairs, was preferred to be admiral of the Persian fleet; the Athenians in the mean time had the courage to join with the Argives, and other states, in a war against the Lacedemonians, which they pursued with variety of fortune. Conon attacked the Lacedemonian fleet, which was nearly equal to that of the Persians, which consisted of ninety sail, and after an obstinate engagement, wherein the Spartan admiral was killed, totally defeated it, taking fifty ships, and five hundred prisoners. Afterwards he and Pharnabazus obliged most of the states, dependent on Lacedemon, to change sides, particularly those of Coos, Nisæa, Tios, and Cbios, Mitylene, Ephesus, Erytbrea, and other places followed their example, and thus the Lacedemonians at once lost the empire of the sea. Conon determined after this unexpected success to return to Attica, and in his way

"and with him the man that was to administer
"the poison, bringing a cup in his hand. To whom "Socrates, Prithee honest friend, for thou art well
"versed in these businesses, what must I do? no"thing, said, he, but as soon as you have drank,
"walk till you find your legs begin to fail; then
"lie down, and in so saying he gave him the cup.
"Socrates took it cheerfully, not changing either "countenance or colour; and looking pleasantly
"upon him, demanded whether he might spill any "of it as a libation, who answered, he had made no "more than would just serve. Yet, said Socrates, I "may pray to God, and will, that my passage hence
"may be happy, which I beseech him to grant,
"and in that same instant drank it off easily, with"out any disturbance. Many of us, who till now, "had refrained from tears, when we saw him put
"the cup to his mouth, and drink off the poison,
"were not able to contain any longer; which So"crates observing, Friends, said he, what mean ye?
"for this reason I sent away the women, lest they "should be so unquiet: I have heard we should die "with gratulation and applause, be quiet then, and "take it patiently. These words made us, with "shame, suppress our tears; when he had walked
"a while, perceiving his legs to fail, he lay down
"on his back, as the executioner directed him;
"who looking on his feet, pinched them hard,
"asking him if he felt it, he answered no; he did
"the like to his legs, and shewing us how every "part successively grew cold and stiff, told us when
"that chillness came at his heart, he would die;
"not long after he spake these his last words, O

"Crito, I owe Æsculapius a cock, pay it, neglect it "not. It shall be done, said Crito, will you have "any thing else? He made no answer, lay still a "while, then stretched himself forth; with that
"the executioner uncovered him, his eyes were "set, Crito closed them. This was the end of the "best, the wisest, and most just of men". Tho' Leo Allatius, and some others, have endeavoured "to represent the time of the death of Socrates, as a "point not easily settled, yet they are certainly in the "wrong, since there is scarce a great event in the "whole Greek history, the time of which is more "unquestionably settled, the Arundelian marbles, and "many other authorities, shew that it happened when "Laches was archon, in the first year of the ninety-"fifth olympiad, that is 2599 years after the flood,
"and four hundred before the birth of Christ. The "reader may possibly be desirous to know what be"came of his enemies; and because we shall have no "opportunity of inserting it in the history, we will "add it in this note. The Athenians grew very "quickly sensible of the mischief they had done, and
"because it was irreparable, they so hated its authors "that they would not suffer them to light fire at "their houses. They would not answer them a ques"tion. They would not bathe with them; and if "they were seen to touch ever so large a vessel of "water, they threw it away, as impure, until these "men, unable to bear this usage longer, hanged
"themselves; and for the same reason, the Atheni"ans, that they might blot from their minds the "memory of so black an action, forbade the name of "Socrates to be mentioned in the Theatre (2).

(2) Plato in Phæd. Plat. de Invidia & odio.

- a thither brought over the Cyclades, reduced Cythera, put a garrison therein, and after having confirmed the Corinthians in their league with the Athenians, he sailed from thence to Athens, where he promised the citizens to rebuild the long walls, and to re-fortify the city, which he accordingly performed as far as in him lay, hiring a multitude of workmen, and landing a great body of men from the fleet; the Thebans also sent five hundred carpenters and masons, and other cities did the like; but Teribazus, who commanded the Persian Armies in Asia, envying Conon's great success, gave out that he made use of the Persian power merely to get towns and countries for his own citizens. To answer which charge, he sent for him to Sardis, where upon his first appearance he threw him into prison.
- b THE disturbances in Greece gave the Athenians an opportunity of re-establishing their affairs, and making themselves once more considerable; the Corinthian war, particularly as it lasted a considerable time, and with various success, served as a kind of school to the Athenian youth, who addicted themselves to arms; and it served the better, because the Athenian general, who then commanded, was Iphicrates, not only the best officer of Greece in his days, but who, in his knowledge of the art of war, exceeded all who went before him; others had studied it from the glory resulting therefrom, Iphicrates looked upon it as a science, for which he laid down rules and brought things nearer a certainty than it was ever conceived they would have been. Plutarch tells us that he was the son of a shoe-maker, but Cornelius Nepos
- c does not mention any thing of his family; the first exploit by which he distinguished himself was in a sea-fight, where finding himself wounded, and unable to remain on board the enemy's ship, he caught up one of the soldiers in his arms, and carried him on board his own, which shews that he had great strength of body, as well as mighty presence of mind. We are told further with respect to his person, that it was wonderfully venerable, and that he struck with awe all such as conversed with him. He shewed his good sense in altering the habit and arms of the Athenian soldiers, which had been used to his time; instead of large heavy shields, he gave them light ones; instead of short spears, long ones; and instead of little stabbing swords, weapons of a more useful size. In this war of Corinth he gained by
- d his skill great advantages over armies more numerous, and composed of better soldiers than his own. He carefully fortified his camp, though it was in the country of his allies; and when some of his officers, who thought he gave the soldiers needless trouble, asked him, who he was afraid of; I am afraid, answered he, of being forced to use that expression, which of all others least becomes a general, I did not think of it. Agefilas king of Sparta, whose troops had been elsewhere always victorious, were notwithstanding beaten with great loss by this Athenian, which exceedingly grieved Agefilas, and made him abate somewhat of that haughtiness he had hitherto shown upon all the offers which had been made to him for peace. Abroad the affairs of the Athenians went but ill, the exiles from Rhodes, which was now
- e under a democratic government, went to Sparta, and boasting there of their great interest, and of the facility with which their country might be brought to change sides, and join with the Lacedemonians, two fleets were sent to that island. The Athenians greatly alarmed at this, dispatched the famous Thrasylbulus, to whom they owed their deliverance, to prevent the designs of the Lacedemonians from taking effect. When this great captain came into these seas, he received such intelligence from Rhodes, as thoroughly convinced him that any attempt he made thereupon would be fruitless; he therefore sailed to the Hellispoint, where he reconciled two Thracian princes, and made them confederates with the Athenian states; after this he bent his endeavours to the reducing such cities as, taking advantage of the bad state
- f of the Athenian affairs, had revolted from them. In pursuance of this scheme, he reduced Byzantium and Chalcis, and afterwards sailing over to Lesbos, where all the cities had revolted except Mitylene, he brought them again under the obedience of Athens, and levied considerable sums of money by way of fine for the revolt; after these victories he set sail for Rhodes, hoping that the fame of them would awe the people of that island, and contribute to the end for which he had been sent thither. First of all he exacted a sum of money from Aspendus, but after it was paid him, his soldiers having plundered some of the inhabitants without his knowledge, it so much provoked them, that in the night, when Thrasylbulus thought himself safe, and expected no harm, they suddenly entered his camp, where they committed a great slaughter, and in the beginning thereof slew him, which so terrified his soldiers, that making what haste they could to their ships, they withdrew without attempting to prosecute further the expedition on which their general had been sent. This end had Thrasylbulus, a man who in point of virtue was inferior to none, in fortune superior to most, and in the glory of freeing his country from servitude without any view to his own interest scarce equalled by any. The Athenians to supply his place were constrained to send Iphicrates, for they had not now as formerly, choice of generals; their insolence and their misfortunes having either driven away or extinguished all their great men. Iphicrates had only with him eight galleys, and twelve hundred men, when he joined the remains of Thrasylbulus's fleet hitherto commanded by one Argyrius; he having intelligence that Anaxibius, the Lacedæmonian admiral, proud of some small successes he had obtained, lay very carelessly at Abydos immediately sailed thither, and intercepting him one day abroad with twelve more governors of towns, fell upon and slew them, after which Iphicrates sailed to Cbesonesus. Shortly after this Egina, at the motion of Eteonecus revolted, whereupon the Athenians sent one of their Admirals with a fleet to reduce it, which could not be effected; on the contrary, the inhabitants of the island, as soon as the Athenian fleet was withdrawn, began to infest the coast of Attica, which vexed the Athenians exceedingly, and constrained them to keep a squadron continually at sea, to protect as well the villages on the shore, as their ships employed in trade, an evil they had experienced since the close of the Peloponnesian war. The affairs of the Lacedæmonians obliging them to remove the fleet they had in the neighbourhood of Egina, the Athenians sent Eumenes with a strong squadron to keep in Gorgopas, who was left to command there. Gorgopas finding his much outnumbered by the Athenian galleys, retired into port, and landed his troops, which when the Athenian Admiral perceived, he put to sea in the night, carrying a light in his poop, that the rest of his ships might steer after him. Gorgopas instantly re embarked his men, and stood away after the Athenian fleet, keeping aloof, till Eumenes, entering a port of Attica, began to land his men; which when he had half finished, Gorgopas fell upon them with great vigour, and after an obstinate fight, carried off four galleys to Egina; this loss was a little after repaired by Chabrias the Athenian general, for he sailing to Cyprus with a fleet which had a body of land forces on board, landed in Egina in the night-time, and having posted the major part of his forces in a valley near the temple of Hercules, ordered the rest to advance towards a place called the Three Towers at break of day; Gorgopas, as soon as he had intelligence of the Athenians landing in the island, marched with what forces he could to oppose them, and sent orders to all who were on board the fleet to hasten to him with the utmost speed, which accordingly they did; and these rushing all by the ambuscade where Chabrias lay, he suddenly charged them in flank and rear, while the other Athenians fell upon them in front; Gorgopas with eight Spartans being quickly slain, the rest betook themselves to flight, of whom Chabrias cut off near four hundred men, which, with the want of the subsidies they expected from Sparta, so broke the spirits of the inhabitants of Egina, that they undertook nothing for a considerable time after. At length Talentias being sent from Sparta to command the galleys in that island, he so wrought upon the people by his fair speeches, that they went on board the ships, and offered to follow him where he pleased. He having sacrificed and taken a day's provision on board, put out to sea, and having in the night rode very near the port of Athens, as soon as it was day, he sailed straight into the Pyræum, where he took several galleys, and a great number of prisoners. These he sent presently away to Egina, and afterwards cruising along the coast, carried off several trading vessels, and an immense booty, out of which having given his men a month's pay beforehand, he so raised their spirits, that they were ready to undertake any thing. In the height of their ardor he fell upon an Athenian squadron of eight galleys, and took them; after which, drawing together a fleet of eighty sail with twenty galleys of Syracuse, he reigned about without rival, and maintained the dominion of the sea for the Lacedæmonians ¹.

* XENOPHON. lib. iv. DIODOR. lib. xiv. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Cononis.

Peace of Antalcidas.
After the flood
2612.
Before Christ
387.

THE Spartans, willing to secure the great advantages they had obtained, ordered Antalcidas their admiral to settle with the ministers of the king of Persia the terms of

¹ XENOPHON. lib. iv. v. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiv. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Iphic. Thrasylb. & Chabr.

- a a general peace in Greece; for on account of the Corinthian war, and the vast expence of keeping so many fleets at sea, Sparta was grown weary of fighting though she had the better of her rival. The Athenians on the other hand, wearied out with continual misfortunes, were far from being averse to the putting an end to the war; for which the rest of the cities of Greece were anxious, provided the peace was not prejudicial to their interests; they therefore sent all of them agents to Teribazus to know what terms the king his master would propose. The Persian having first shewn them the great king's seal, opened his dispatch; the contents of which were, that the king thought it just the cities in Asia should belong to him, and remain under his jurisdiction, and that all the rest little and great should remain free; of the islands however he claimed Cleazomene and Cyprus, Lemnos, Imbros, and Sciros, he left to the Athenians, because they had belonged to them time out of mind, declaring moreover, that if any of the Greek states rejected these terms, he and the rest of the confederates would compel them to accept them by continuing the war by sea and land. The Lacedæmonians and Athenians accepted of them, and became once more friends and allies; this from its author was stiled the peace of Antalcidas, which in the main was very scandalous to Sparta, who, after so long pretending to vindicate the liberties of the Grecian cities in Asia, now delivered them up to the king.

- THE design of this peace was evidently the raising Sparta to an uncontrollable dominion over the Grecian states, which she began to exercise immediately after it took effect, falling first on the Mantineans, and afterwards on other little states, at last on Thebes itself, where, without the least provocation, the Lacedæmonians seized the citadel, and enabled the Thebans of their faction to tyrannize over their country, of whom four hundred fled to Athens, which city was far from making the same figure now as formerly; the Grecians remembering with aversion her cruelty when in power, and seeing with disdain her insolence under the affronts of Sparta. The Theban exiles however found here not only a safe place of refuge, but all the kindness and assistance they could reasonably expect for the principal men in Athens, who laboured hard to persuade the people that it was both safe and honourable for them to succour these unhappy men. The exiles, unsatisfied with being safe abroad, longed to live with freedom at home; they therefore found means to set on foot a conspiracy in Thebes, and by the private assistance of the Athenians brought matters so to bear, that they got possession of the city; but fearing lest the Lacedæmonians should send mighty succours to their garrison in the citadel, they sent deputies to Athens, beseeching the people to call to mind with what kindness they had received the Athenians who were banished by the thirty tyrants, and how far it was owing to their aid that the Athenians recovered that liberty which they now enjoyed, conjuring them not to desert them now, when the Thebans were ready to fight against Sparta for the liberty of Greece, but to afford them such succours as might enable them to fight with hope. The people having heard the Theban deputies, came presently to a resolution of sending away such a body of auxiliaries as might at once demonstrate their gratitude to the Thebans, and their care of the liberty of Greece; with this view they sent Damophoon at the head of five thousand foot, and five hundred horse, who marched with prodigious diligence to Thebes, where they enabled those of their party to take the citadel, which they effected before the Lacedæmonians could relieve it; after which the Athenians returned home. From this time forward they fought by all means to raise a party against the Spartans, by putting themselves at the head, by which they hoped to recover their ancient lustre. The forces however of the Lacedæmonians being as yet much greater than their own, made them sometimes obliged to dissemble their hatred to that state, and also to discountenance those orators who were notoriously enemies to Sparta. An accident happened at last which intirely changed the face of things, and constrained the Athenians to declare openly against Lacedæmon. One Sphodrias a Spartan, who commanded at Theffis, undertook a bold expedition, in which if he had succeeded, his countrymen must have been absolute lords of Greece; for he marched suddenly with a great body of troops towards Athens, and hoped to seize the fort of Pyraum in the night; but when he had marched as far as Elenfsina, the sun began to appear, upon which his soldiers refused to march any farther. That he missed his blow was far from being the worst consequence of his rashness; the Athenians were so much alarmed, that they seized certain Spartan em-

* XENOPHON. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. AGESIL. & ARTAX. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Iphicr. bassadors ambassadors who were in their city, and made them prisoners, conceiving that they ^a were privy to this attempt; but they asserting their innocence, assured the people of Athens that Spodrias should be called to a severe account, and pay with his life for this infamous attempt; whereupon they were released, but Spodrias being brought to a trial, and acquitted, the Athenians instantly declared war, accounting it better to hazard all things in the field, than to be in danger of having their throats cut in their houses by such sudden expeditions. They named on this occasion three generals, Timotheus, Cbabrias, and Callistratus, directing them to levy an army of twenty-thousand foot, and five-hundred horse; they likewise ordered a fleet to be fitted out of two-hundred sail. To shew that they did not intend to fight for themselves only, but that they would do justly by all their confederates, they restored all the ^b lands which had been divided among their citizens out of Attica, to their ancient proprietors, and offered such reasonable terms to their allies, particularly the fixing a senate, which was to consist of one deputy from each city of Athens, that they presently drew over a great number to their side, and exceedingly alarmed the Lacedæmonians.

 The same also of the Athenian generals was of no small service to their country, for Timotheus was exceedingly esteemed on account of his father Conon's merit, and for his own magnanimity and prudence; Cbabrias was reputed one of the first generals of his age, and Callistratus was a man of great worth, and high accomplishments; as for Ipbicrates, the king of Persia had begged him of the Athenians, and they held the friendship of that prince, in consideration of the great ser- ^c vices he received from that experienced general. In the mean time the Lacedæmoni-ans invaded Boetia under the command of their king Agessilaus, who with a mighty army braved the Thebans and their allies in the neighbourhood of their own city.
Cbabrias, who commanded them, took post along the descent of a hill; and when Agessilaus led the Spartan army in battalia towards them, Cbabrias ordered his soldiers to lean one knee on the ground, to let their shields hang carelessly on their arms, but to keep their spears extended as if they intended to continue in their posts, and to expect the Spartans without putting themselves into any hurry. Agessilaus having weighed within himself the advantage they had in ground, the intrepidity of the men, and the experience of their general, retired without attempting to force them. After- ^d wards the Athenians obtained some advantages, and in consequence of them obliged Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, to retire without entering Boetia. Cbabrias in the interim was recalled to take upon him the command of the Athenian fleet, which was to go against Naxos; he besieged the capital of that island, but in vain; Pollis, the Lacedæmonian, coming with a great fleet to its relief, Cbabrias, desirous to regain the honour of his country, re embarked his forces, and offered the Lacedæmonians battle; the engagement was long and obstinate, at last however he gained an absolute victory, though with the loss of eighteen galleys, the Lacedæmonians losing twenty-four, besides eight that were taken with all their men. But Cbabrias did not pursue this victory as he might have done, being deterred by the fate of the six generals who had suffered ^e for not succouring the wounded, and burying the dead; as it was, he recovered the Athenian reputation at sea, for this was the first naval victory, which with their own proper forces the Athenians had acquired since the Peloponnesian war. Afterwards he sailed against the Thracians, and delivered the Abderites whom they had treated with great cruelty; but while he was here taking care of the affairs of the city, and providing against the return of the barbarians, he was, as some say, assassinated, none knew by whom, or for what reason. The Athenians sent Timotheus to supply his place, which he effectually did, proving more formidable to the Lacedæmonians in his single person, than all their enemies beside; for by his eloquence, affability, and justice, he drew many of their allies to forsake them, and by his great skill in maritime affairs, he ^f vanquished them in a sea fight at Leucades, so that all things went prosperously for the Athenians on this side. Artaxerxes, king of Persia, endeavoured all this time to reconcile the Grecians among themselves, because he wanted mercenaries to be employed in a war he intended against Egypt. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians themselves were weary of war, and therefore suffered themselves to be the more easily intreated; besides they were both apprehensive that the Thebans would at length run away with that authority for which they had so long contended; they therefore clapped up a sudden peace, which was ill kept, upon these terms, that all cities should be free; to which the Thebans would by no means yield, for they would never consent that all the little cities of Boetia should be freed from their dominion. Ipbicrates much about this

a this time quitted the Persian service, where he had been entrusted with the command of twenty thousand Greeks, escaping with a single ship to Athens. The reason of this was, that Pharnabazus and he had differed, whereupon the Athenian fearing that this Persian general would serve him as he had done Conon, that is clap him into a prison, and put it out of his power to defend himself, chose rather to quit his command than hazard his liberty, and therefore retired in the manner beforementioned; he was quickly followed to Athens by Persian ambassadors, who charged him with mighty crimes, and earnestly desired that he should be punished; to which the Athenians answered, that they would punish him when he was proved guilty, but in the mean time having occasion for his service they made him admiral of their fleet. The late peace having given the Grecian cities a just title to freedom, disputes arose in many of them, whether aristocracy or democracy should prevail, and these disputes not being accommodated by words, sedition and civil war ensued in several places, especially in Zacynthus and Coryra; the Lacedæmonians notwithstanding the peace assisted to the utmost of their power such as were for oligarchy, and the Athenians, according to their old practice, befriended every where the democratic government. Menesippus the Lacedæmonian general blocked up Coryra, the inhabitants of which were on the very point of being ruined; Timotheus, who had been sent to their assistance, having found it necessary to sail to Thrace, preferring the service
c of his own country, to the necessities of its allies, for which the Athenians rewarded him and Ipbicrates after the old manner, that is to say, they condemned them both; but when the former brought along with him many ambassadors who desired to renew the ancient leagues between their constituents and Athens, and also proved that he had encreased the fleet with thirty gallies, and brought mighty sums into the public treasury; the Athenians, in regard to his own and his father's merit, who by rebuilding their walls, had made Athens once more a city, rescinded their former decree, and restored Timotheus to his command. In the mean time Ctesicles was sent with five hundred men to Coryra, where he was so fortunate as to kill the Lacedæmonian general, and to leave very little to be done by Timotheus and Ipbicrates, who came at length d with the fleet. Artaxerxes still labouring to reconcile the Grecian states, and the Athenians having conceived a violent antipathy against the Thebans for destroying Plataea and Thebes, sent deputies to Sparta with Calistratus at their head, and there concluded a peace on the old terms, that all the city should be set at liberty, to which as before the Thebans refused to consent; this happened in the beginning of the hundred and second olympiad, Alcibiades being archon at Athens a.

THE Athenians now perceiving that they were become very inconsiderable, endeavoured to strengthen themselves, by proposing an oath to the cities of Greece, that they would observe the truce established by the king, and in case any injury was offered to one city, that she should be assisted by all; this was readily yielded to e by all except the Eleans and Thebans: between the latter and the Spartans a new war broke out, in which the latter were so distressed, that they demanded aid of the Athenians, who thereupon sent Ipbicrates, who in this expedition lost some part of his reputation. Some negotiations for a general peace being set afoot at the court of the Persian king, the Athenians amongst the rest sent deputies, and amongst them one Timagoras; the Thebans, who now aimed at the dominion of Greece, sent Pelopidas, a man of superior abilities, who drew to himself the confidence of the Persian king, and having found a way to bring over Timagoras to his party, he clapped up a peace, whereby it was agreed that Messene should be exempted from the Lacedæmonian government; that the Athenians should no more pretend to the sovereignty of the f sea; that the cities should be governed by their own laws, and the Thebans be esteemed the king's chief friends and allies. Timagoras on his return was accused to the Athenian people of having betrayed his trust, upon which he was condemned, and put to death. The Argives falling upon the Phliacians on account of their remarkable fidelity to the Lacedæmonians, and bringing them to great streights, the latter desired aid of the Athenians, who thereupon sent Cbares to their assistance, who behaved himself with great prudence and valour, and gained two victories against the Argives. After this the Athenians entered into a strict league with the Arcadians, for they were now forced to temporize, and to take such opportunities as the times offered for maintaining themselves in any shew of power. Timotheus their last great a XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. vi. DIODOR. lib. xv. PLUT. in vit. Agesil. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Timotheus.

commander gave, however, some degree of credit to their arms, by reducing Torone and Polidæa, in Macedonia, under their obedience, and raising the siege of Cyzicum. The war still continuing between the Thebans and Lacedæmonians, Epaminondas desiring to put an end to it at once, fought the famous battle at Mantineæ, against the Lacedæmonians, Arcadians, Achéans, Eleans and Athenians; of the latter there were six thousand, who behaved very well in the left wing, where they were posted, but were at last put to flight by the Thebans; however, they rallied again, and remained in the field of battle till the engagement was over, wherein, indeed, the Thebans had the victory, but it cost them very dear; for they lost here Epaminondas their glorious general, who first inspired them with the thoughts of attaining the sovereignty of Greece, both by land and sea. Some b flirs in Arcadia engaged the Athenians to send thither a great army, under the command of Pammenes, who performed what he was sent for, and returned home with honour. Alexander, prince or tyrant of Phærea, having undertaken an expedition against the Cyclades, met with some opposition therein from Leosthenes the Athenian, whereupon he attacked some galleys belonging to that state, and took them; upon which the Athenians being angry with Leosthenes's bad success, condemned him, and sent Chares with a fleet into those parts, who was so far from repairing the disasters which had already fallen out, that by his ill management he greatly increased them, plundering the confederates of the Athenians, delaying any attempts upon the enemy, creating seditions where-ever he came, and seeming to c have nothing else in view but to enrich himself *.

The first Macedonian war.
Year after the Flood, 2639.
Year before Christ, 360.

WE are now come to those times in which the Athenians came to contend with Philip of Macedon, unluckily for them, when all their great captains were exhausted, and when this prince appeared with a genius superior to all the politicians and chieftains of his time. The Athenians were very early apprehensive of his abilities, and therefore they espoused the cause of Argius his competitor, to whose assistance they sent Mantias at the head of three thousand men, with a great fleet. This Mantias put things into a good posture at his first arrival; for besides the Macedonians who adhered to Argius, the Paonians and the Thracians were of his party. King Philip advanced, however, with an inferior army, as if he came to an assured victory, rather than d to a doubtful engagement. First, he took off the Paonians and Thracians, by giving them a prodigious sum of money, and as soon as they were retired, he fell upon Argius and Mantias, who still lay with their army at Metbone, and thoroughly routed them. The Macedonians of Argius's party he pursued, but suffered the Athenians to make an orderly retreat, which mightily affected the spirits of that people, and readily disposed them to an accommodation, wherein they chiefly sought to make themselves masters of Amphipolis, to which Philip quitted his claim, the situation of his affairs requiring it, and in consequence thereof a peace was concluded; however, he took it shortly afterwards, pulled down its walls, and expelled such of its citizens as had given him offence; the Athenians not being able to relieve e it, on account of the many troublesome affairs in which they were now engaged, and of which we are next to give an account *.

The Social War.
Year after the Flood, 2643.
Year before Christ, 356.

THE Chians, Rhodians, Coans, and Byzantines, growing weary of the Athenian yoke, resolved to throw it off, and set themselves free. The Athenians on the first notice thereof sent Chares with a land army to besiege Chios, while Chabrias, (who, as we observed before, Diodorus affirms to have been slain long before,) was to block up the place by sea. Cornelius Nepos, who expressly wrote the life of that general, says, that he was no more than a private man in this expedition, but that the soldiers and seamen, having a better opinion of his skill, than of their generals, in a manner forced him on the command, which respect of theirs proved his destruction; for endeavouring first to enter the haven, where he had broke in, nobody followed him, so that being encompassed by the enemy, his galley was sunk, out of which casting himself he might easily have escaped, as others did, but preferring a glorious death to a life without honour, he continued fighting till he was slain. If we may credit the author beforementioned, the Athenians doubting whether Chares with his fleet of sixty sail would be able to reduce the confederates again under their dominion, dispatched away sixty other ships, under the

* XENOPH. Hellen. lib. vii. viii. DIODOR. lib. xv. PLUT. & CORN. NEP. ubi supra. JUSTIN. lib. vi.
† DIODORUS lib. xvi. PLUT. CORN. NEP. JUST. ubi supra.

- a command of Timotheus and Ipbicrates,, making them all equal in commission. In the mean time the confederates fitted out a fleet of a hundred gallies, and with it infested Imbros and Lesbos, taking all ships that fell into their hands, and raising contributions where-ever they landed their troops, so that by these methods they acquired mighty sums of money, wherewith they paid their armies and fleets; they afterwards besieged Samos both by land and sea. The Athenian generals, to constrain them to abandon this design, went and besieged Byzantium, which had the effect they proposed, for immediately the confederates raised the siege of Samos, and with their utmost force bore away for Byzantium. When they came before the port, they offered the Athenians battle; but a great storm arising, Timotheus and Ipbicrates thought it improper to fight, though Chares vehemently pressed it; and because he could not carry his point, he sent home to Athens, and accused his colleagues, at which the people were so incensed, that they cashiered and fined them; Timotheus being unable to pay his mulct, did not return to his country, but retiring to Chelos, broke his heart. Such was the end of the great Canon's son, a man no way inferior to his father, either in military skill, or in love to his country; the Athenians, when they heard of his demise, remitted the greatest part of his fine to his son, but they obliged him to pay a tenth of it, which they most unaccountably appropriated to the reparations of those walls which had been built by his grandfather. Philip of Macedon in the mean while took Pidna, which he afterwards delivered up to the Olynthians, after which he besieged and took Potidea, which had so long been under the power of the Athenians, and which was of vast advantage to them in all their Thracian war. Chares the Athenian admiral having now no-body to check him, rashly engaged in an arduous affair, whereby he hoped greatly to serve his country. Pharnazus having revolted from the king of Persia, a mighty army was sent against him by the king; Chares, hoping that the Persian would well repay the favour, joined him with his forces, and together they proved an over-match for the king's generals, whom they totally routed. The Athenians, as their custom was, struck with the first news of the victory, cried up Chares as one of the greatest patriots that could be; but afterwards, when the Persian king by his ambassadors complained of the act, as contrary to the amity which subsisted between them, and when it was reported abroad that the Persians intended to lend the confederates a great fleet, the Athenians treated Chares as a traitor, and cried out vehemently against that action, which they had as vehemently commended, and in the first transports of fear, resolved to make a peace with the states which had revolted from them, almost upon their own terms; accordingly peace was concluded, tho' little to the honour of the Athenians, after the war had lasted four years *.

- THE Phocian war broke out the same year, in which the Athenians made peace with the states which had revolted from them; this war concerned all Greece, and particularly the Athenians, and therefore, though they had nothing to do with the beginning of it, yet it is requisite we should give an account thereof here. The Phocians had plowed some of the lands dedicated to the Delphian Apollo, for which they were fined by the Amphiſſiones, or states general of Greece, but instead of submitting to the judgment of that court, the Phocians at the motion of Philomelus, a bold and daring speaker, carried their insult on Apollo yet farther, and seized on the temple, and all its riches; this put all Greece into a flame, the Locrians and Boeotians made war on the Phocians, and to countenance their cause styled it sacred; the Phocians on the other hand pretended that they were far from being sacrilegious persons, for that they meddled not at all with the riches of the temple, but only resumed the honour of protecting it, which had belonged to their ancestors; but knowing that an army could better support their pretensions than fine speeches, they applied themselves to the Lacedemonians and Athenians, and prevailed on them to become their allies. The war lasted a long time, and with various success, sometimes the Phocians, and at other times the Thebans prevailing; however, it was conceived that the Athenians acted unworthily in sending such great supplies as they did to the Phocian commanders; at one time no less than five thousand foot, and three hundred horse, because it was certain that the chief reason which induced them thereto, was the high pay given to their troops; and as the money expended on this occasion, was raised either by the coinage or sale of the dedicated things in the Phocian War.

Year after
the flood 2644.
Year before Christ 355.

* DIODOR. PLUT. CORN. NEP. JUST. ubi supra.

temple of Delphos, it was considered as a sacrilege to receive any part of this theft, especially for defending the robbers. But, indeed, the Athenians were much degenerated in their manners, of which their inclinations to these sort of proceedings may pass for a manifest proof; for though it is certainly beneath a wise and free people, to run, as the Athenians had formerly done, into gross and cruel superstitions, yet it has been in all times accounted a certain sign of corruption and degeneracy, when people lose all sense of religion, and openly affront those powers they pretend to worship. It is true, the Athenians pretended to colour the assistance afforded by them to the Phocians, by pretending they were their old allies, and that they endeavoured to raise up their power, to ballance that of the king of Macedon; but even at this distance of time we may conclude, that these were merely pretences, since it is certain, that when Iphicrates intercepted some statues of gold and ivory, sent by Diomsus the Sicilian, they sent him orders to sell them publicly, notwithstanding they were dedicated to the Olympian Jupiter, and to the Delphian Apollo. But it must be owned, that not Athens only, but all Greece, was at this time governed by money; the Persian king, who had always made use of gold to preserve himself from the unwelcome visits of the Greeks, and to purchase their assistance, when he found it necessary, employed it now more than ever, and laid out greater sums in Greece than any of his predecessors, because bribery, like other vices, rises higher by degrees; and when men have been accustomed to take money, they require larger wages than those which contented them at first. Philip of Macedon having found a way to render the gold mines in Thrace infinitely more beneficial to him than they had been to the Athenians, openly practised the same art, maintaining pensioners in all the states of Greece, and in Athens among the rest. The Phocian chiefs had nothing else to support their cause but money, and that they parted with it very freely, we may guess from what Diodorus and Plutarch tells us; that in a few years they squandered ten thousand talents, which falls little short of two millions of our money. The orators, or as the Athenians stiled them, the Demagogues, that is, such as led the people by their speeches, were most of them retained by some or other of these parties. Demosthenes himself, who was, by far, the most worthy of that number, was not unimpeached of accepting Persian gold. He became about this time eminent, and therefore, according to our custom of giving the characters of Athenian statesmen, it is necessary that we should here draw his, since he was the Pericles of his time, and in right of his eloquence held a kind of dominion over his fellow-citizens. He was the son of an eminent Athenian, who had raised a great fortune from the manufacture of sword blades, but was far from being a blacksmith, as Juvenal would have us believe. Demosthenes himself seemed least of all designed by nature for an orator; his person was far from being handsome, his tongue was too large, his voice weak and broken, and his gesture very uncouth. His father dying when he was young, and his own constitution being weak, his mother indulged him, to the prejudice of his education, and his guardians taking advantage of his tender years, imposed on him, to the prejudice of his fortune; these unforeseen accidents led him to commence orator, for being engaged by that time he was seventeen years old in several law suits, he pleaded his own cause, which no law forbid, and having from thence attained an ability of speaking, he attempted, when of a proper age, to harangue the people, in which he succeeded so ill, that it had like to have discouraged him from speaking more; but his passion for becoming an orator, enabled him to get the better of nature, and the people; to render his tongue flexible, he accustomed himself to speak with stones in his mouth; to raise his voice to a proper pitch, he declaimed on the sea shoar; to repress a habit he had got of shrugging his shoulders, he hung a sword drawn in his chamber, at such a height, that when he practised his orations, it pricked his shoulders whenever he pulled them up: long practice supplied him with all things, and knowing he had nothing to trust to but his merit, he by study and patience acquired a manly solid eloquence, not only superior to that of his co-temporaries, but also excelling all that went before, and all who have come after him, which his orations, yet in our hands, demonstrate beyond a question. He declared himself, in loud terms, against the prevailing follies of his countrymen, he reproached them with their fickleness, faithlessness, and want of true regard for the public interest. He exclaimed against their vanity, in attributing to themselves the merit of their ancestors,

a ancestors, and fancying that the reputation of the ancient Athenians would support the vices of their posterity. He expatiated on the necessity of pursuing the old method of making war, by maintaining an army of free citizens, not of mercenaries, and taking care of their naval affairs; he advised them to be kind to their allies, and ready on all occasions to assist them, whereby they might keep war at a distance, enure their subjects to martial toils, and revive the glory of the Athenian name. He exhorted them to live always upon good terms with the Persian, because it was no longer in his power, or indeed in his will, to think of conquering them; but on the contrary, it was his interest to preserve them from being conquered, as it was theirs to preserve the independency of all the states of Greece. Above all, he cautioned

b them against the growing power of the Macedonian, he observed that the dominion of republics seldom lasted long, whereas monarchies lasted the longer for being powerful; whence he inferred, that they ought to fear Philip more than the Thebans, and not suffer themselves to be amused either by his specious pretences of loving peace, or of his affection to the Athenian state; but in these discourses, as he shewed himself a true patriot, so there wanted not many pretended ones, who strenuously pleaded the cause of Philip. But the Macedonian in the mean time did not altogether depend either on his money, or the friends purchased by his money, but endeavoured by force to establish himself in that absolute power of Greece, which he affected. He made use of the war then raging between the Phocians and Boeotians to march

c into Greece, and though he had ill success in two engagements, yet he overcame at last, and partly by force, partly by fraud, gained possession of the streights of Thermopylae; then it was that Demosthenes endeavoured to rouse the Athenians to a proper sense of their danger, and to that end composed the first of those orations which bear the title of Philippic, and which to this day are held inimitable in their kind; he shewed the Athenians with great perspicuity and candour, that it was to no purpose to make use of palliations in their dangerous condition, or to fancy that to apply a remedy to this evil, and that would preserve them from ruin. He proved to them, that Philip's plain and settled design was to advance himself to the sovereignty of Greece, in consequence of which they must become his subjects, tho' he might perhaps call them his allies. He therefore advised them to think of forming a plaister as d broad as the sore, and instead of opposing Philip here and there, in sending succours as they had two or three times already done to places before they could arrive, to begin a war in earnest, to excite all their confederates to rise in arms, and concur with them in destroying the power of an ambitious prince, who would neither be contented with his own, nor suffer other people to enjoy their possessions in quiet. He concluded with assuring them, if they trusted any longer to expedients they would be ruined, because Philip would every day grow stronger, and they weaker; whereas by following vigorous and uniform counsels, they might possibly retrieve all things, and reduce Philip and his Macedonians to their primitive obscurity. The Athenians listened,

e as they were wont to do, attentively to his discourse, and came to some resolutions which were suitable thereto; but contented themselves with this, and took no care to put their votes in execution. To say the truth, they were at this time very unfit for great undertakings; the general they chiefly relied on was Chares, a man of great vices, and small abilities; it is true, Phocion was then in their service, but they employed him in a trifling war in Cyprus, where it was not in his power to do them much good; besides he was so modest, that he never sought command, nor intigated wars, that he might raise his authority by them, though, taken as a soldier, and an orator, as a statesman and a general, he was by far the greatest Athenian of his time. As he was a most disinterested patriot, he could have no great affection for f Philip, but as he perfectly well knew the disposition of his countrymen, and how unlikely they were to support long such measures as were necessary to pull down the Macedonian power, he did not express himself vehemently, but chose rather to cultivate the esteem which on all occasions Philip shewed for the state of Athens, as a means of preserving her, when things should be in that state which he conceived they wanted virtue to prevent. From this character the reader will easily discern that Demosthenes and he could not well agree, the former was always warm, his language copious, and his designs vast and surprizing; Phocion on the other hand was of a mild temper, delivered himself in very few words, and proposed things at once fit and easy to be done; yet he seldom or never concurred with the people, but spoke as poignantly against their vices as Demosthenes himself; insomuch that this orator once told him, The Athenians, Phocion, in some of their mad fits will murder thee. The same, answered he, may fall to thee, Demosthenes, if ever they come to be sober. At this season, such of the Athenians as had a competent share of eloquence and knowledge in state affairs, applied themselves to the management of the assemblies, to the practice of pleading, and other civil matters; such again as had spent their time in the army, addicted themselves wholly to military employments, endeavoured to obtain such commands as were at once honourable and lucrative, and meddled little with the civil polity, seldom aspiring to the supreme magistracy, but confining themselves wholly to what they conceived their sphere. Phocion was too wise not to discern how dangerous such a conduct must in the end prove to the state; he saw that their speakers would dwindle into declaimers, and their officers become soldiers of fortune, valuing nothing but their rank, and their pay. He applied himself therefore alike to both, he spoke frequently in the assemblies, but in few, plain, and significant words; he refused no commands that were assigned him, never canvassed for any, and lived and died poor. The Chalcidian cities fell most of them into the hands of Philip, in the last year of the hundred and seventh olympiad, and the year following he made war on the Olynthians, a people who had hitherto been a match for him, and had frequently been an over-match for his predecessors. When the news of this expedition was spread through Greece, Demosthenes exerted his utmost eloquence to engage the Athenians to aid the people of Olynthus to the utmost of their power, and there are still remaining three excellent orations on this subject. The reasons offered by him appeared so clear, and the necessity of sending succours to Olynthus, was made so evident, that relief was decreed. The supplies sent were small, but they came so opportunely, that the Olynthians received great advantages from them, which being reported at Athens, the people became intolent with their good fortune, and affected to give out, that the Athenians had nothing more to do than to appear in a war, in order to carry victory to the side they favoured; but Demosthenes shewed them the vanity of these light conceits in his third oration on the Olynthian war, wherein he told them that there was indeed some merit in beginning well, but that they were in danger of losing even this, if they did not proceed with the same spirit, and enable their confederates not only to repulse the invasion of Philip, but also to invade him in their turns, and to carry that terror into Macedon, which of late years Philip had struck through all his neighbours. But the Athenians were not able to relish such high-seasoned discourses, they were content to send a squadron now and then to the coasts of Thrace, with a small body of land troops on board; but to think seriously of a war like that which their fore-fathers had sustained against the Peloponnesians, and for it to forego all their public diversions, and relinquish all the donatives which they at present received from the revenue of the state, was what the Athenians of those times could not be brought to endure; what therefore Demosthenes had predicted, came exactly to pass, Olynthus could not long resist the power of Philip's armies, and his bribes; on the contrary two of its citizens betrayed the place into his hands, where having exercised all that his cruelty and his avarice could dictate, he marched away big with new projects for aggrandizing his own empire, and ruining his neighbours.

THE Phocian, or, as the friends of Philip affected to call it, the sacred war, was open yet, and the Boeotians and their allies, who were unable to carry it on with their proper forces, intreated the king of Macedon, to come down into the heart of Greece, and put an end thereto. But Philip being at that time intent on his conquests in Thrace, did not listen so readily to this proposal as was expected; the true reason was that he grew apprehensive of the Athenians, and was in some doubt, whether, considering their great interest in Thrace, they might not be able to stir up much mischief in his absence. He therefore proposed to make peace with them, and his party in Athens having drawn over many to an opinion that this would be a mighty advantage to their republic, Æschines with some other deputies were sent to treat with him. He made these ambassadors wait his leisure until he had finished his affairs in Thrace; then he came suddenly down into Thessaly, proposing to pass immediately into Phocis, which grievously alarmed the Athenians, notwithstanding their ministers had concluded a peace for seven years. Demosthenes advised them to send and demand a ratification of the treaty before he passed the Pyle, as also to

* DIODOR. l. xvi. PLUT. in vit. DEMOST. & PHOCION. JUSTIN. lib. ix. DEMOST. Olynth. & Philip. persuade

- a persuade him not to undertake a war against the Phocians. On the other hand the Bœotians sent to intreat him to continue his march, and come speedily to their assistance. Philip heard all the ambassadors, and though their demands were diametrically opposite, he promised them all to do as they desired, and thereby kept them in a state of dependence, till he seized the post of Thermopylae; then coming down with a mighty army into Locris in the third year of the hundred and eighth olympiad, he put an end to the sacred war by his presence only, for the Phocians finding themselves too weak to give him battle, made a treaty, whereby their general obtained leave to march away with such as would follow him; the rest were left to the mercy of Philip, who referred them to the Amphyctions, which great council, in return for
- b this eminent service, took from the Phocians their double voice, and gave it to Philip and his subjects, who till then had no voice at all. Returning crowned with glory into his own country, he bent his arms first against the Illyrians, and soon after, when he conceived the Athenians unable to help them, he attempted to bring the Perynthians under his dominion. Perynthus was seated on the shore of Propontis, and as it always favoured the Athenians, had incurred the Macedonian's high displeasure. The inhabitants however were not easily subdued, they had learned from the Athenians to set a high value on their liberty, and prepared to defend themselves valiantly, when they heard that Philip was marching against them. The Persian king beginning to doubt the designs of the Macedonian, whose ancestors had been his tributaries, gave
- c instructions to his lieutenants, who were nearest Perynthus, to favour the inhabitants as much as possible; the Byzantians also doubting much the intentions of Philip, sent Perynthus a very great supply, insomuch that they not a little weakened their own forces, of which Philip having intelligence, he left part of his army to block up Perynthus, and marched at the head of the rest to surprize or besiege Byzantium; at the news of this the Athenians were indeed affrighted; they therefore decreed that succours should be immediately sent, and with more than ordinary care put it in the power of Chares, who was elected general, to sail with a good fleet, and a numerous army, to the assistance of the Byzantines; yet this effected nothing, for when the fleet appeared off of Byzantium, the inhabitants of that city refused to let it enter
- d their fort, having before experienced the worth of the Athenian admiral, and knowing him to be no better than a pyrate with a commission. Chares having dressed this refusal in the worst colours possible, dispatched advice of it at home, where it put the Athenians into a mighty chafe, and caused many of them to say in the assembly, that it was a pity they had assisted the Byzantines at all; upon which Phocion rising up, addressed them in the following concise terms: My masters, you ought not so much to blame the jealousy of your allies, as the base behaviour of your generals, who have rendered you suspected even to those who are unable to support themselves without your assistance. Upon this the people with their usual inconstancy dropped their former opinion, and unanimously chose Phocion general, who immediately sailing to the Hellepont, received
- e the command of the fleet from Chares, and again appeared before Byzantium, landed his forces, and would have encamped without the city; but the Byzantines would by no means permit it, setting open their gates, and joyfully receiving the Athenians, when they had Phocion for their general, who quickly obliged Philip to return to his own dominions, took many of his ships, recovered several places into which he had put garrisons, and exceedingly harassed the frontiers of his kingdom, to that it appeared that the Macedonian was not invincible when opposed by a man of probity as well as of abilities*.

SOME time after this the Megareans privately sought the friendship of the Athenians. Phocion being apprehensive that the Bœotians would exert themselves to prevent f this union, caused an assembly to be called very early in the morning; where having presented the petition from Megara, and backed it with great warmth, the Athenians came into it very readily; whereupon he made proclamation, that all such as would go on this expedition should immediately assemble in arms, and a great number presenting themselves very readily, he without more ado put himself at their head, and marched directly away to Megara, where he was very joyfully received. He re-edified the long walls, joining that city to its port Nicea, and thereby effectually secured it to the Athenians; after this he was sent again among the islands to regulate all things for the interest of his country. Philip in the mean time neglected nothing which might either tend to the raising of his own power, or depressing that of the a Greek states; but above all, desiring to humble the Athenians, he came suddenly down to Phocis, and having seized Elatea, he there assembled a mighty army with a resolution to invade Attica, for which purpose there was an absolute necessity of passing through Boeotia; the Athenians upon this were in the utmost confusion, so that Demosthenes had need of all his eloquence to keep up their spirits; at last however he prevailed upon them to declare war against Philip, and to send to the Boeotians to intreat them to stand fast for the liberty of Greece; he also engaged them to raise a very considerable army in an instant, and to chuse Chares and Lyficles generals, who without more ado marched into Boeotia, where they were kindly received, and promised all things. Philip however resolving to have as few enemies as he could to deal with, b sent Pythos into Boeotia to persuade the people of that country to be quiet; to him the Athenians opposed Demosthenes, whose eloquence prevailing, the Boeotians joined their utmost force with the Athenians, and resolved to hazard all in a general engagement. Demosthenes magnified this at Athens as a mighty stroke of policy, because he put the war at a distance from Attica, to which Phocion shrewdly replied; Let us not be so careful about the place where we are to engage, as how to get the victory; that is the only way to keep the war at a distance; whereas, if we are overcome, the very worst of calamities will soon be at our doors. Phocion had the resolution also to express at the same time a dislike of the war, and a doubtfulness of its event, nay even to propose an accommodation, and the renewing the peace with Philip, when an Athenian of very bad character cried out, Darest thou, Phocion, think of dissuading the Athenians from the war, now the sword is drawn? Yes, I dare, returned he, though I know that in time of war I shall always be thy master, whereas in peace thou perhaps may be mine. The event shewed how just a notion Phocion had of things, for Philip coming down at last with an army of thirty thousand foot, and two thousand horse, the Athenians and Boeotians met him at Cheronea. In this battle, which began at the rising of the sun, Alexander commanded one wing, and his father the other; the confederate army was divided according to the nation of which it consisted, the Athenians having the right, and the Boeotians the left; at the beginning the confederates had the better, whereupon Stratocles an Athenian commander cried out, Come on, brother soldiers, let us drive them back to Macedon; which king Philip hearing, said very coolly to one of his officers, These Athenians do not know how to conquer. Whereupon he directed the files of his phalanx to be streightened, and drawing his men up very close, retired to an eminence hard by, from whence, when the Athenians were eager in their pursuit, he came down like thunder, broke and routed them with prodigious slaughter. Demosthenes acted very unbecomingly in this engagement, for he deserted his post, and was one of the first that fled. Philip did not preserve that wisdom after his victory which he had shewn in the fight; for he danced about like one distracted with joy, and coming up to the band of Athenian prisoners, treated them with scoffs, and ill language; upon which Demades, who was one of them, c could not help reproving him: Since fortune, O Philip, said he, seems to have assigned thee the part of Agamemnon, why wilt thou play Thersites? At which Philip blushing, ordered him to be immediately released, and discharged likewise the rest of the Athenian captives, who sending afterwards to demand their baggage, Philip said laughing, I believe these people don't think we beat them in earnest. He ordered them however to be given them; he likewise sent ambassadors to Athens to renew the peace, which was done. After this Philip convoked a general assembly of the Greeks, into which Demades persuaded the Athenians to insist on being received. Phocion opposed it, alluding that they ought first to be informed what Philip would demand in that assembly; however it was carried against him; but when it afterwards appeared that d the Athenians were by this rash step obliged to furnish the king with a body of horse, and a squadron of ships, they repented their meddling at all, and reproached in the assembly Demades and the other orators, who were so forward in the business, expressing at the same time a doubt whether they ought to comply with articles so unworthy of the Athenian state. Phocion upon this stood up again, I foresaw, gentlemen, said he, what would happen, and therefore I was against this step, when it was first proposed; but since it is once taken, I am for it, and advise you to bear it as well as you can, always remembering the conduct of your ancestors, who suited their behaviour to their fortune; sometimes giving laws, sometimes receiving them, but doing both with a good grace, whereby they not only preserved their own city, but also all Greece. The kindness e expressed

* DIODOR. PLUT. JUST. ubi supra.

- a expressed by the king towards the Athenians, was not over sincere, since he doubted so far of them, as to enquire on the marriage of his daughter Cleopatra, that a deputy should be sent from them with a gold crown, as from the rest of the cities, which was accordingly done, and presented to him in the midst of the marriage solemnities, with this remarkable compliment; that if any conspirator against Philip fled to Athens, he should be delivered up. At this marriage, however, Philip was murdered, which gave a new turn to affairs at Athens; Demosthenes and his party making great rejoicings, wearing chaplets of flowers, and behaving as if they had gained a great victory, which Phocion reprehended, bidding them remember that the army which had beat them at Cheronæa, was lessened but by one. This
- b reproof, however grave, however poignant, had little effect; the very people who put Lisicles their general to death, merely because he was so unlucky as to command them in that battle, who directed Demosthenes to exalt the memory of those who fell therein, in a funeral oration, who in contradiction to these measures had just now flattered the king, by sending him a crown of gold, ran again into the same extravagancies, and heard with pleasure all the harsh things the orators could say of the young Alexander, whom they represented as a giddy wrong-headed boy, ready to grasp all things in his imagination, and able to perform nothing; but he soon gave them occasion to understand that they were mightily mistaken by his quick dissolution of that confederacy, which they formed not only for depriving him of the command of Greece, but even of his hereditary dominions; for Demosthenes taking pains to inspire all the states with high notions of liberty, the Etolians first of all made a decree to recal the exiles whom Philip had driven out of their country. The Ambrociots drove out the Macedonian garison, the Thebans cast out that which had been established in the citidel, the Arcadians, as they had refused to give their votes for Philip's becoming general of Greece, so they now rejected Alexander; the Argives, Elians, Lacedæmonians, and others in Peloponnesus, all spoke the same language, and all determined to throw off that yoke, which the Macedonians had imposed; they likewise treated with Attalus, Alexander's uncle, who aspired to the kingdom, to favour his pretensions; so that if the son of Philip had really been as
- d weak as the Athenian orators would have represented him, he must have been crushed by such a load of opposition; but he, far from being dismayed, came first into the council of the Ambitions, where he procured himself to be recognized general of Greece. He then marched immediately towards Thebes, with a numerous army, sacked and plundered it, and thereby struck such a terror into the rest of the confederates, that no-body durst oppose him. As to the Athenians, he refused to admit them into his favour, unless they delivered up to him Demosthenes, and as some say, nine more of their orators; other historians say, but seven. This struck the Assembly with the utmost terror, none knowing what to say, or what to propose; at last they called upon Phocion, and desired his opinion, upon
- e which, arising up and pointing to his friend Nicocles, These persons, said he, whom Alexander demands of you, are they who have brought you into these miserable circumstances; circumstances so miserable, that if he demanded that friend of mine, I should advise you to deliver him innocent as he is. As for my own life, if that would purchase you safety, I would resign it cheerfully; but truly it pierces my heart, that those who have fled for succour from the desolation of Thebes, should have so little hopes of safety here; surely it would be more for our interest to pacify the conqueror in time, and to intercede for both cities, than to hazard another battle: Demosthenes contented himself with saying, that once on a time, the wolves offered to make peace with the sheep; but first, said he, they would have them give up their dogs. The stream, however,
- f was too strong, and therefore he and his party were forced to give way; the first decree which the Athenians passed for making peace, and which they sent to Alexander, he would not deign to take notice of, but turned his back upon the ambassadors, as if they had not been worthy of his notice; but when Phocion presented the second decree, he received him very graciously, and not only granted him his requests, but listened to his advice, nay he had the complaisance to tell him at parting; Your Athenians ought to have their eyes about them, for if I should miscarry, they only are worthy to command. The friendship which Alexander contracted with this general, was not broke off, or interrupted by his expedition into Asia; on the contrary, he wrote to him frequently, offered him mighty presents, and even his choice of four cities; nay, what was still a greater mark of his regard,

when he no longer used in his letters the phrase of, Alexander wishes health, he preserved a it to him and Antipater, as if they had been his equals. When that conqueror had occasion for galleys to complete his fleet, he sent to demand those which had been promised him by the Athenians; the orators, as they were wont, opposed this as derogatory to their freedom; at last, Phocion being required to speak, delivered his sentiments freely, which were, that the galleys should be immediately sent; For, said he, till you can put yourselves at the head of Greece, I would have you be the friends of those who are at the head of it. Harpalus, one of Alexander's commanders, having in several respects failed of his duty, and dreading the resentment of his prince, fled with an immense quantity of treasure, which he had amassed together out of the spoils of Asia. Athens was the city of Greece, he thought the most b proper place for his retreat, and therefore thither he came, and brought his plunder along with him, not doubting, that since he came laden with wealth, he should meet with friends enough to be purchased. Accordingly, most of the orators came flocking about him, to know how they might be serviceable, and upon what terms; as for Demosthenes, his good sense engaged him to make a warm oration against receiving a person who was little better than a thief, and thereby involving the common-wealth in a war at once dangerous and unjust; but a few days after, when the treasure was publickly brought on shore, and laid up, Demosthenes being present, took notice of the king's golden cup, whereupon Harpalus desired him to poize it in his hand, and consider its weight; which he c did, and then asked the price of it, To you, Sir, (said Harpalus) it shall come with twenty talents; at night accordingly it was sent, and Demosthenes, when he was called upon the next day in the assembly, to deliver his opinion, shewed his neck, which was swathed round with several rollers, and made signs, that he was unable to speak, upon which some of the wits said, The orator had got a silver quinsy. As for Phocion, Harpalus knew well that he was of another disposition, and therefore he sent him no less than seven-hundred talents, and offered to commit himself and all his affairs to his disposal; but Phocion, treated those who came to him very roughly, and threatened not to be content with words, if he went on thus to corrupt the people; when the matter came to be debated the last time in the assembly, d those who had received his money, railed most at Harpalus, to conceal their own guilt, whereas Phocion expressed a great regard for his misfortune, and treated him in such gentle terms, that Harpalus again offered him money; but he was impregnable, and in the end the Athenians expelled the Macedonian the city, and ordered the court of Areopagus to take cognizance of such as were impeached of bribery; which court dealt very severely with them, and particularly fined Demosthenes fifty talents, and ordered him to be imprisoned, till it was paid, but he shortly after made his escape from thence, and fled to Egina, where he remained till after the death of Alexander, which was no very long time.

THIS great event altered all the affairs of Greece; the Athenians had been much e dissatisfied with him, for designing to take from them Samos, in order to restore it to its ancient inhabitants; and therefore, when Asclepiades, the son of Hipparchus, brought the first news of it to Athens, the people ran immediately into the market-place, where many contradicted it, but the majority cried out, that what Asclepiades had related was true. Phocion fearing they would do some mad action or other, cried out; Well, suppose it is, if it be true to day, it will be true to-morrow, ay, and the next day, so that we shall have time enough to deliberate coolly. The orators unanimously concurring in prompting the people to make war, and indeed all Greece was in commotion, so that, at length, it was carried by a great majority, that the Athenians should take upon them the defence of the common liberty, should free all the f citizens from their garisons, should fit out a fleet of two-hundred and forty sail, and that all men under forty years old, should take up arms. Leosthenes was the commander, who drew together a very fine army, with which he marched against the Macedonians. Antipater, as soon as he had intelligence of this, sent to Craterus in Cilicia, to come to his assistance, but in the interim he marched into Thessaly himself with 13000 foot, and 600 horse. The Thessalians joined him with a great body of cavalry; but when Leosthenes approached, and it appeared that the Athenians and their confederates were by far more numerous, the Thessalians deserted

• DIODOR. lib. xvii. PLUT. in vit. Demosth. & Phocion. JUSTIN. lib. xi. & xii.

- a to them ; yet Antipater had the courage to venture a battle, in which his troops were thoroughly beaten, and himself constrained to fly ; but he shewed himself a great general in his flight ; for arriving with some foot at Lamia, a city in Thessaly, he caused the place to be fortified, and received into it all his troops, as fast as they came up, so that he drew together again 8 or 9000 men, and prepared to make an obstinate resistance. Leosthenes coming up with the confederate army, invested and attacked this city, but finding that it could not be taken by storm, he was constrained to make a regular siege: Antipater watching his opportunity, though he was every day attacked by fresh troops, made a sally upon the workmen, and put them in great disorder. Leosthenes coming to encourage them, was
- b unfortunately killed with a stone, which greatly dispirited the Greeks ; however, they chose Antipbalus their general, and continued the war, notwithstanding Antipater had escaped out of Lamia ; not long after they routed the Macedonians, under the command of Leonatus, which victory was their ruin ; for slighting the Macedonians, many returned home to their respective cities. Antipater having joined the remains of Leonatus's army, and being joined afterwards by Craterus, who yielded to him the command, he soon after fought and routed the Greeks, under the command of Antipbalus and Memnon ; though there were but five-hundred men slain in this battle, yet the confederates were so dispirited, that they sent to Antipater to treat of peace ; but Antipater refused to treat at all of a general peace, professing at the
- c same time, that he was willing to hear and receive ambassadors from each of the cities, and to consider their respective demands. At first the Grecians rejected this with scorn, but when several of the Thessalonian cities were taken by storm, they were glad to treat upon the terms prescribed, upon which Antipater received the ambassadors very kindly, and granted almost every thing they desired ; thus the Athenians were deprived of all their confederates, and in a short time reduced to the utmost extremity. In this distress, Phocion, with some of the orators, were deputed to go to Cadmea, where Antipater was encamped, to procure from him, if possible, an honourable peace ; when they came thither, Phocion intreated, that the terms might be adjusted there, whereas Craterus was for marching into Attica, and treating with
- d the Athenians, as it were, at their own doors ; saying, it was unreasonable to burden their friends with an army, while they were treating with enemies. Antipater replied, that what he said was just ; but yet, continued he, let us grant this favour to Phocion. In fine, a treaty was concluded, or rather Antipater imposed upon the Athenians these conditions ; that Demosthenes and Hyperides should be delivered up, that the ancient way of raising taxes in the city should be restored, that they should receive a garrison into Munichia, defray the charges of the war, and submit to some other taxes. Phocion was very desirous that they might be spared the garrison ; but Antipater answered, I will deny thee, Phocion, nothing but what will inevitably tend to thy ruin, and my own. In consequence of this treaty, Menyllus, a man of great sweetness
- e of temper, and one of Phocion's friends, was sent to command the garrison, which entered Munichia ; Demosthenes in the mean time fled, fearing to be delivered up to Antipater ; and being pursued by some persons in that nobleman's service, poisoned himself (P). The Macedonian garrison being settled in Athens, a great number of the lower citizens were disfranchised, and sent into Thrace, where Antipater assigned them

(P) As to the character and eloquence of Demosthenes, we have spoken at large in the text ; as to his works, the greatest part of which have escaped the injuries of time, the reader is to expect an account of them elsewhere ; in this note we have nothing in view, but his misfortunes and death, which to have related at length, would have broke in on the thread of our history, and to have passed over in few words, must have offended the peruser. When he was banished, that is voluntarily, by flying from prison, some of his enemies followed him out of town ; from these he endeavoured to hide himself, but they having him in view, kept close to him, and at last coming near, called him by his name ; and when he came out, exhorted him to bear his misfortunes patiently, and presented him with a sum of money for his support ; whereupon Demosthenes broke out into a louder lamentation than ever, crying out, Alas, how shall I support my self under so heavy an affliction, since I am forced to leave a city, where one's very enemies are more kind and generous than any friends I can hope to find elsewhere ? To say the truth, his love for his country made him bear his exile but very indifferently, the greatest part of which he spent either in Ægina or Trezen, from whence he could see the coast of Attica, towards which he would frequently look with tears in his eyes ; he had a just sense, however, of the danger to which wise men are exposed in democratic governments ; for looking once at the citadel, he could not help breaking out into this exclamation ; O goddess, Minerva, whence comes it, that thou delightest in threes such fierce and untractable creatures, the owl, the dragon, and the people. When Leosthenes led the Greeks against Antipater, and endeavoured to prevent slavery from being introduced them a place to build a city, and lands to cultivate. In the mean time political affairs were managed by men of the better sort, and especially by Phocion, who was in very high credit with Antipater, and the Macedonians. He was for proceeding still on his old maxim of complying with the times, and making no attempts beyond the reach of their power. Happy had it been for the Athenians, if they had gone into this way of thinking; but they were continually rejoicing at the loss of that power, which they knew not how to manage, abhorred the sight of the Macedonian garison, which they knew not how to remove, and earnestly longed for an alteration of circumstances, though there was no reason to hope that such an alteration would be for their benefit. They were continually pressing Phocion to apply to Antipater for removing the garison, and at last finding all their solicitations in vain, they turned their eyes on Demades, the orator who was also in the Macedonian interest, and had been greatly favoured by Antipater. This man, willing to do the people a pleasure, and at the same time to make a display of his interest, readily undertook the proposed embassy. This Athenian was a man of parts and eloquence, but probity and disinterestedness were not among the number of his good qualities, as we may guess from this saying of Antipater's, That he had two friends at Athens, Phocion and Demades, the former a man who would receive no satisfaction for the services he did him, and the latter who would never be satisfied, how much soever he received. Whether Antipater had lately left off his liberality towards this orator, or whether Demades had reason to hope greater appointments from Perdiccas, who was Antipater's mortal enemy, is a point we cannot determine; but so it was, that Demades had entered into a correspondence with Perdiccas, and had put him upon invading Macedonia and Greece, and assuming the government of them himself, making use in one of his letters of this expression, That at present they leaned on an old rotten staff, meaning Antipater. It so fell out that all these transactions, and particularly this very letter, were found out, while Demades and his son Demias were soliciting the recal of the garison; upon which Antipater ordered the son to be put to death, not only in the presence of the father, but in such a manner, that his blood flew all over him. After this Demades introduced by all the commanders of Alexander the great, Demosthenes exerted his eloquence again, and was indefatigable in stirring up all the little states to remain firm in their confederacy for supporting the Grecian liberty. Amongst the rest, he travelled to the Arcadians, among whom one Pytheas an agent of the Macedonians was very busy; this man seeing the Athenian ambassadors, and Demosthenes with them at a public assembly, could not help crying out, That as it is a certain sign there is some disease in the family, where asses milk is brought, so the coming of an Athenian embassy was a never-failing indication, that the city to which they came was indisposed. Demosthenes immediately retorted this comparison. As asses milk, said he, is never carried into a house, but with intent to restore the health of those who dwell therein; so the Athenians never send their ambassadors to any city, but with a view to cure it of those distempers, with which it is afflicted. On the report of this, the Athenians instantly recalled him, found a means to satisfy his fine, and paid him the highest honours they could invent, but his prosperity was of a very short continuance; for in September the Greeks lost the battle of Cranon, in October the Macedonian garison entered Athens, in November Demosthenes fled to avoid death, which followed and overtook him the same month; for one Archias a player having undertaken to Antipater to find him out, receiving intelligence, that he had taken sanctuary in the temple of Neptune in the little island of Calauria, he passed over thither with a small detachment of Thracian guards. When he found Demosthenes, he would fain have persuaded him to go with him to Antipater, assuring him that he would receive no harsh treatment, which was very improbable, because most of his friends were already murdered. To these fine speeches therefore the orator answered, O Archias, I was never much pleased with you as a player, and now I am as little moved with you as a negotiator. Archias beginning at this to grow angry, and to threaten him; Now, said Demosthenes, thou speakest like the oracle of Macedon; before thou dost but act a part. Therefore forbear only a little, while I write a word or two home to my family. Having thus spoken, he withdrew himself farther into the temple, and taking some paper, as if he meant to write, he put the quill into his mouth, and biting it, as he was wont to do, when he was thoughtful or writing, he held it there for some time. Then he bowed down his head, and covered it. The soldiers who stood at the door, supposing all this to proceed from pusillanimity, in derision, called him effeminate faint-hearted coward. And Archias drawing near, desired him to rise up, and repeating the same kind things he had said before, he, once more promised to make his peace with Antipater. But Demosthenes perceiving, that now the poison had pierced and seized his vitals, uncovered his head; and fixing his eyes upon Archias, Now, said he, as soon as you please, you may act the part of Creon in the tragedy, and cast out this body of mine unburied: but, continued he, turning towards the altar, O gracious Neptune, I, for my own part, while I am yet alive, arise and depart out of this sacred place, without profaning it; but Antipater and the Macedonians have not left so much as thy temple unpoluted, but have defiled it by my death. After he had thus spoken, he desired to be held up, because already he began to tremble and stagger, as he was going forward, and passing by the altar, he fell down, and with a groan gave up the ghost (3).

(3) Plutarch. in vit. Demosthen. prope fin.

- a himself was put to death, and the Athenians left without hopes of ever seeing this bit taken out of their mouths ^b.

ON the death of Antipater, two factions sprung up in Macedonia, the one headed by Polyperchon, who had the custody of the persons of the kings, and the other by Cassander, the son of Antipater, the latter sent Nicanor to command the garison in Athens, a man of great art, and a good foldier; with him Phocion ^{seems Athens. Year after the flood, 2631 Year before Christ 318} often conversed, labouring all he could, to persuade him to use the citizens kindly, and to leave the government in the same condition in which he found it; Polyperchon, on the other hand, desiring to recover the Greek cities from his rival Cassander, published a decree in the king's name, restoring them all the freedom, particularly Athens, directing the garison immediately to withdraw from them thence, and the democracy to be restored; this had its effect, for it put the Athenians all into confusion; Nicanor refused to obey the decree, and because Phocion corresponded with him afterwards, the people accused him of being an enemy to his country, whereas he desired nothing more than to see their liberty restored, which it was not likely to be on a bare decree unsupported by arms, Nicanor paying no respect to Polyperchon's orders. Not long after, Polyperchon came with the kings, and a great army into Attica, or at least to the borders of Attica, whither Phocion was sent, and deputies from the Athenians to accuse him; Polyperchon, willing to keep up to the terms of that decree, which he had published, sent back Phocion and his friends chained in carts, with this message, That though he was convinced they were traitors, yet he left them to be judged by the Athenians, as a free people. As soon as there was silence made, that he could be heard, Phocion demanded whether they intended to proceed against him by form of law; and some crying out that they would, Phocion demanded how that could be, if they were not allowed a fair hearing; but perceiving by the clamour of the people, that no such thing was to be expected, he cried out, As for myself, I confess the crime objected to me, and submit myself to the judgment of the law; but consider, O ye Athenians, what have these poor innocent men done, that they should be involved in the same calamity with me? The people at this cried aloud, They are your accomplices, and that is enough. Then the decree was read, adjudging them all to death, viz. Phocion, Nicocles, Abeudippus, Agamon, and Pythocles; these were present; Demetrius, Phalereus, Callimedes, Cbaricles, and others, were condemned in their absence; some moved that Phocion might be tortured before he was put to death; nay, they were for bringing the rack into the assembly, and torturing him there. The majority, however, thought it enough if he was put to death, for which the decree was carried unanimously; some putting on garlands of flowers, when they gave their votes; as he was going to die, a person who was his intimate friend, asked him, if he had any message for his son? Yes, replied Phocion, tell him it is my last command, that he forget how ill the Athenians treated his father. The spleen of his enemies was not extinguished with his death, they passed a decree, whereby his corpse was banished the Athenian territories, they likewise forbid any Athenian to furnish fire for the funeral pile. One Conopian, an undertaker, took up the corpse and carried it beyond Eleusina, where he borrowed some fire of a Megarian woman, and burned it. A Megarian matron who attended with her maids, raised on the place an honorary monument, and having gathered up the bones carried them home, and buried them under her own hearth, praying at the same time thus to the Penates: To you, O ye gods, guardians of this place, I commit the precious remains of the most excellent Phocion; protect them, I beseech you from all insults, and deliver them one day to be reposed in the sepulchre of his ancestors, when the Athenians shall become wiser. It was not long before this came to pass, when the Athenians began to cool a little, and remember the many kindnesses they had received from Phocion; they decreed him a statue of brass, ordered his bones to be brought back at the publick expence, and decreed that his accusers should be put to death; Agnonides, who was principally concerned, suffered; but Epicurus and Demophilus, who were also concerned in it, fled; however Phocion's son met with them, and executed his revenge upon them, which was almost the only good action he ever did, he having a very small share of his father's abilities, and none at all of his virtues. It was not long, however, before Cassander came with a great fleet into the port of Athens, and by the help of Nicanor, who commanded in the fort

^b DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xvii. PLUT. in vit. Demosth. & Phocion. JUSTIN. lib. xxvi.

Munichia, reduced this city into such streights, that the Athenians were content to submit to him upon these terms: That he should leave a garison in the fort, and appoint some Athenian to preside over the city. He accordingly placed Demetrius Phalereus in the office of governor, a man of great quality, being descended from Conon, and of great fortune, yet neither his birth nor fortune were equal to his virtue. He had studied under the philosopher Theophrastus, and from him learned how to behave as an active as well as contemplative philosopher; he treated the Athenians with the utmost kindness, and made use of that power which he might easily have improved into tyranny, to do those things for them which their factions had hitherto hindered them from doing for themselves. He encreased their public revenues, beautified their city with many magnificent structures, restored such as were in danger of falling through the injuries of time, and in every other respect gave such signal testimonies of his tender affection for them, that the Athenians set up no less than three-hundred statues to his honour, most of them equestrian; but because he derived his power from Cassander, and they were not able to depose him at their pleasure, they secretly hated him, of which we shall see many instances hereafter.

Demetrius
Poliorcetes freed Athens.
Year after the
flood 2602.
Before Christ
307.

Antigonus, the most magnanimous of Alexander's captains, and his son Demetrius Poliorcetes, i. e. the city-taker, having resolved to free Greece from the yoke of Cassander, determined to begin with Athens. The young prince Demetrius, who was the handsomest, and at the same time one of the bravest men of his time, took upon him the command in this expedition, which he executed with great facility; for hoisting false colours, he sailed without the least opposition into the port of Athens, where a multitude of people were assembled on the shore, who, when they discovered their mistake, armed themselves in haste; but Demetrius quickly disarmed them, not by force, but by fair words; for he caused a cryer to make proclamation, that he was come thither, by the command of his father, with no other design than to deliver them from the oppression of Cassander, to expel the garison, which he had placed in the fort, and to restore to them their ancient laws and government. The people immediately welcomed him with loud shouts, bestowing on him the title of deliverer and benefactor. As for Demetrius Phalereus, he was in a moment deserted, and the very next moment loaded with reproaches, and in danger of suffering death. He thereupon sent one Aristodemus to Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, to intreat a guard to protect him, and to beg leave of him to retire to Thebes: Demetrius received this messenger very respectfully, said he came not to injure persons of worth, and granted Demetrius both his requests; after this he blocked up the fortress of Munichia, and then departed for Megara, where Cassander had also a garison; having set this place at liberty, he returned to Athens, and attacked Munichia so briskly, that he took it by assault; after which at the earnest intreaty of the Athenians he entered the city in great pomp, and having summoned an assembly, he therein publicly declared that he did not only freely restore them to their former popular government, but that he would prevail on his father to bestow on them fifteen-thousand measures of wheat, and such a quantity of timber as would enable them to build a hundred galleys for the defence of their city. These mighty favours the Athenians repaid with most unmanly flattery, for they bestowed on Antigonus and Demetrius not only the title of kings, which hitherto they had not taken, but also stiled them tutelar deities and deliverers; they appointed a priest to them; and whereas they had till this time marked the year by the name of the first archon. They decreed, that for the future, it should be designed by the name of this priest. They caused the portraits of Antigonus and Demetrius to be placed among the number of their gods, they erected an altar where Demetrius first alighted from his chariot, and stiled it the altar of the descent of Demetrius; they added two new tribes to the ten which already subsisted, and called them Antigonides and Demetriades. To sum up all, Stratocles proposed, and had it decreed, that as often as they sent ambassadors to Antigonus and Demetrius, they should be stiled ambassadors of the gods; they changed the name of the month Munichian into Demetrian. It would be tedious to dwell on the rest of the follies of this degenerate people, who, at the same time that they paid all this court to Antigonus and his son, passed a decree, whereby they adjudged Demetrius Phalereus to death,

- a ordered all his statues to be thrown down, and even sent persons to execute, as far as in them lay, their decree, by endeavouring to way-lay and murder him, a practice which could not but give those whom they now flattered to understand that they would be sure to desert them, when they were deserted by fortune. The democratic government was no sooner restored in this city, than the effects of it were abundantly felt, accusations were frequent, condemnations common, to be eminent induced danger, and to be low contempt. At the motion of Sophocles the people decreed, that no philosophers should teach unless licensed by the senate and people, which occasioned Theophrastus the successor of Aristotle's breaking up his school. It is likely that they were displeased with this great man, because he was so much in favour with
- b Cassander king of Macedon, and because their late governor Demetrius Phalereus had been his scholar; however their resentment did not last long, for they afterwards rescinded this decree, and recalled the philosophers; but their protector Demetrius being engaged with all his force in the siege of Rhodes, Cassander took this opportunity of vindicating his title to Greece, and coming with a powerful army to support it, many of the cities revolted to him, so that in a short space he penetrated as far as Attica, and laid siege to Athens. The Athenians, thus distressed, sent for aid to Demetrius, who came speedily to their relief, and after obliging Cassander to raise the siege, stript him in a very short time of all his conquests. After this success he put various cities under the power of the Athenians, and multiplied his good turns,
- c as if he intended to overwhelm them with benefits. The Athenians in return racked their wits to devise new compliments, and acts of flattery, still superior to those which they performed before. They assigned Demetrius lodgings behind the temple of Minerva, in the apartments belonging to the virgins devoted to her service; this was a scandalous insult on religion, because Demetrius was remarkably intemperate with respect to women. But the Athenians were so corrupt, that they gave way even to his unnatural lusts, which afforded an instance of private virtue worthy of being recorded to latest times. There lived now in Athens a young gentleman so remarkably handsome, that he was styled the beautiful Damocles; him Demetrius pursued where-ever he appeared, so that the poor young man was constrained to avoid the
- d public bathing-places, and to go to a private bagnio; yet even thither Demetrius came, and surprized him alone in the bathing-room; the unhappy youth, with a courage never to be enough commended, threw off the cover of the chaldron, where the water was boiling for the bath, and leaping into it, was stifled in a moment. It would have been unpardonable to have dwelt on such particulars as these in any other period of the Athenian history; but the Athenians having now forgot to act, we are constrained to entertain the reader with what they said, and having no more victories, to speak of, we are forced to record their flatteries. After all his mighty victories, Demetrius had a mind to be inrolled in the fraternity of the priests of Ceres, and admitted to all the mysteries. Now the constant practice in this case was, that he who desired such admission, was introduced as a novice in the lesser mysteries in the month of November, and afterwards admitted to the greater in the month of August following; but when Demetrius signified his desire, it was the month of March. Stratocles furnished them with an invention which set all things to rights, and which ought everlastingly to be remembered to the dishonour of this servile flattering people. He proposed a decree, and procured it to be passed, that the month of March should become November; in consequence of which, Demetrius was admitted to the lesser mysteries: when this was over, Stratocles had it decreed, that the month before called November should now be called August; and by virtue of this decree, Demetrius assisted at the greater mysteries. Philippides the comedian could not help stigmatizing these
- f mean compliances in the following distich:

What miracles by flattery wrought are here,

Which in one month have crowded all the year!

THE pride with which the Athenians inspired Demetrius and his father, drew upon them first the envy, and then a general confederacy of all the rest of the successors of Alexander against them; this obliged Demetrius to quit Greece, and go into Asia, where in one battle his father Antigonus lost his empire and his life, and Demetrius was constrained to sail with a small squadron of ships from Ephesus towards Athens, where he had left his queen Deidamia, and great part of his navy; but in the islands called Cyclades, he met with ambassadors from that city, who informed him, that the Athenians had made a decree that no crowned head should enter their city; a most grateful grateful decree indeed towards a man whom a little before they acknowledged for a their favour, and their god! Demetrius did not however resent this usage with that warmth which might have been expected; he only desired that his ships and his queen might be delivered to him, which was done; however the Athenians were shortly after severely punished, for their seditions among themselves encouraged one Lacharis to seize the sovereignty, and to reduce the people to submit to him, who was but an obscure person, rather than live under the protection of so great princes; but when the affairs of Demetrius were a little restored, he began to think of humbling this insolent and inconstant people, who, to shew their ingratitude and contempt, passed a decree in full assembly, whereby they made it death for any person to propose a treaty or intercourse with Demetrius on any pretence whatsoever. This rather irritated the king, than at all inclined him to lay aside his first design. He therefore first began to interrupt the trade of Aibens, and to ruin its territories, at last he closely besieged the city; Lacharis in the mean time applied to Ptolemy, beseeching some relief, for the Athenians were almost starved, Demetrius punishing capitally such as attempted to bring them provisions; by degrees their distress grew so great, that a bushel of salt was sold for forty drachms, and a bushel of wheat for three hundred. At last a hundred and fifty ships laden with corn came from Egypt, and anchored at Ægina in sight of Aibens; but Demetrius being at the same time reinforced with three hundred sail from Cyprus, and other places, the Egyptians cut their cables in the night, and steered away. Lacharis, as soon as he was acquainted with this misfortune, privately quitted the city; and the Athenians, who had no choice but starving or yielding, surrendered at discretion to Demetrius, who immediately entered the place with all his forces. He first of all commanded that the Athenians should all instantly assemble in the public theatre, which when they had done, he surrounded it without with his guards, and so brought in a body of armed men, who were posted round the stage. The people, trembling with fear, expected every moment when the signal should be given for putting them to the sword, when through the door made for the actors, Demetrius came upon the stage, where in a short oration he gently reprehended their former ingratitude, and told them at the same time that he would receive them again into his wonted grace and favour, as an instance of which he presented them with an hundred thousand bushels of wheat, and named such magistrates as were agreeable to the people. The Athenians immediately relapsed into their old strain of flattery, their orators were all at work in contriving fine speeches to celebrate the generosity, and extol the clemency of this great prince, whose valour had acquired, whose abilities deserved, and whose gentleness adorned the diadem he wore. Dromoclides, one of the speakers on this occasion, did him a much more acceptable service than the rest; for he besides his compliments preferred a decree, whereby the haven of Pyraeum, and the castle of Munichia, were given to the king, who was far from slighting so acceptable a present: he knew too well the fickleness of that people, to trust them again without taking some security for their behaviour; in Pyraeum and Munichia therefore he placed garrisons by virtue of the decree, and in the Museum, because it was convenient and fit for his purpose; thenceforward the Athenians were exceedingly faithful, especially when Demetrius had possessed himself of the kingdom of Macedon; but when he was expelled from thence, and brought into such circumstances that he did not presume to wear the habit of a king, the Athenians exerted their old ingratitude, degraded the priest of the two deities, and put all things into their old form. Sometime after their old master getting together an army, came and besieged them, and reduced them to great streights; they had then recourse to Cratærus the philosopher, who went out to Demetrius, interceded with him, and so fully persuaded him, that it would be more for his interest to pass over into Asia, that he left them in that liberty to which Olympiodorus had restored them^a.

WHILE Lyfimachus, Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Softbenes held by turns the Macedonian kingdom, the Athenians remained free indeed, but without making any great figure; when the Gauls under the command of Brennus threatened the destruction of the Greeks in general, the Athenians for a time exerted somewhat of their ancient magnanimity, and under their general Calippus did great things; for then the common danger united all the Greeks, and even the king of Macedon himself, they had ^a PLUT. in vit. Demet. DIOGEN. LAER. in vit. Theoph. Epicur. & Crat. ATHEN. in Deipnosoph.

- a nothing to fear but the common enemy; but these dangers over, and the affairs of Antigonus Gonatus the son of Demetrius once in a prosperous way, the Athenians felt the weight of his power: for he remembering how they had dealt with his father, resolved to punish them for their former behaviour; and to make sure of them for the future, he first wasted their territories, and afterwards closely besieged Athens; at last, unable to hold out, and unwilling to yield, they made the best treaty with him they could, and in consequence thereof admitted a garison, whereby, though they flattered themselves with the face of liberty, they became effectually his subjects, and after his death were left as such to his son Demetrius. About this time a spirit of liberty revived in Greece, and the Achaëans, who were far from being a considerable
- b people, not only defended their own freedom, but made it their business to free others, in which they were exceedingly assisted by the mighty genius of Aratus the Sicyonian, one of the ablest, and in all respects one of the honestest men that Greece or any other country produced; for he bent all his great qualities, and expended the vast riches which the fame of his virtue procured him in doing good to others, without having a view to any other reward than the satisfaction of doing good; this disposition of his co-operating with the inclination of the Achaëans, put him on two or three sudden expeditions in order to surprize Athens, not with any intent to seize and keep it, but to set the people free; all which expeditions proved unfortunate, and it so happened that in the last of them his forces being dispersed, he wandered about in the night, and with much ado got back to Corinth, while a report prevailed he was
- c dead, upon which the Athenians in a giddy ingratitude put on garlands, as if it became citizens to rejoice for the death of their best friends; sometime after, when Aratus was sick in his bed, the Athenians suddenly resolved they would be free, and as the greatest men, and even nature herself must submit to their desires, sent for Aratus to come to their assistance; he thinking only of the merit of such an action, and forgetting their former ingratitude, caused himself to be carried thither in a litter; and having prevailed on Diogenes the Macedonian governor to give up the three fortresses, Pyrcum, Munichia, and Musæum, for a hundred and fifty talents, he advanced twenty of them out of his own pocket, and then left the Athenians absolutely free, having also the
- d protection of the Achaëans to guard their freedom. This happened in the beginning of the hundred and thirty-second olympiad, two thousand seven hundred and forty-seven years after the flood, and two hundred fifty-two years before Christ. Thus we have traced the history of the Athenians in a continued series from their becoming a free people to their junction with the Achaëans, which hitherto hath not been done in our language, nor, that we know of, in any other*.

* FLUT. in vit. ARAT. ATHEN. in Deipnosoph. JUSTIN. lib. xxvi. c. 3.

C H A P. XIX.

The history of Sparta from Lycurgus to its being joined by Philopoemen to the Achæans.

WE are in this chapter to give the history of the Lacedæmonians from the time of Lycurgus, till they ceased to be an independant state; that is, for a long series of years, while they were the most considerable people in Greece, not from extent of territory, not from their numbers or wealth, not from the convenience of their situation, or in short from any other accidental or external cause, but from their wisdom and virtue, their valour, their moderation, their strict regard to honour, their love of liberty, and contempt of luxury under all its various disguises: The stability as well as glory of the Lacedæmonian government was derived from the wise institutions of Lycurgus the celebrated law-giver of Sparta, with whose administration we are to begin this chapter; but previous thereto, it will be necessary to continue the list of the kings of Sparta begun in our former section relating to the Lacedæmonian affairs, that we may preserve the same order which has hitherto obtained throughout this work.

A TABLE of the Lacedæmonian Kings.

The Agide , or family of Agis .			The Proclide , or family of Procles .
xviii	Archelaus	60	xviii	Charilaus	64
xix	Teleclus	40	xix	Nicander xx	Alcamenes	37	xx	Theopompus
xxi	Polydorus		xxi	Zeuxidamus	b
xxii	Eurycrates		xxii	Anaxidamus xxiii	Anaxander		xxiii	Archidamus xxiv	Eurycrates		xxiv	Agasicles xxv	Leon		xxv	Aristo
xxvi	Anaxandrides		xxvi	Demaratus
xxvii	Cleomenes		xxvii	Leotychides	22
xxviii	Leonidas		xxviii	Archidamus	42
xxix	Plistarchus	1
xxx	Plistonax	68	xxix	Agis	42
xxxi	Pausanias	14	xxx	Agésilas	41 c
xxxii	Agessipolis	14
xxxiii	Cleombrotus	9	xxxi	Archidamus	23
xxxiv	Agessipolis	1	xxxii	Agis	9
xxxv	Cleomenes	61	xxxiii	Eudamidas xxxvi	Arcus	44	xxxiv	Archidamus xxxvii	Acrotatus		xxxv	Eudamidas xxxviii	Arcus	8	xxxvi	Agis xxxix	Leonidas
xl	Cleombrotus	40	xxxvii	Eurydamidas	d
xli	Cleomenes		xxxviii	Epichidas

The wise conduct of Lycurgus protector of Sparta.

Lycurgus at first held the crown in his own right, till it was known that his sister-in-law the relict of Polydectes was with child; Lycurgus then declared that he acted only as his guardian or protector who should be born of the queen, (in case she should be delivered of a son,) which was a thing already common among the Spartans. The queen, who was an ambitious and profligate woman, privately intimated to Lycurgus, that she would make use of means to make herself miscarry, if he would promise to marry her. Lycurgus returned her many thanks, accepted a part of her proposal, but intreated her not to hazard her own health by adventuring on any such violent method, assuring her that for her sake he would take the trouble of making away the child upon himself. The queen, amused by his fair speeches, reckoned on her project as already accomplished, when she fell in Labour, of which she immediately gave notice to Lycurgus, who sent some of his confidants to be present with instructions, if it was a son, to bring it to him, where-ever he was, or whatever he was about; but if it was a daughter, to deliver it to the women; accordingly the queen being delivered of a boy, his agents brought it to him, where he was at supper with some of the principal persons of the city. Lycurgus taking the child in his arms, immediately produced him at the table, My Lords of Sparta, said he, here is a king born unto us; then laying the child down on the chair of state, when he observed that all who were present were extremely overjoyed at the sight of so worthy and disinterested an action; he called the young Prince Charilaus, i. e. the joy of the people. He then laid down all pretences to the royal Authority, which he had exercised for about eight Months, and took the title of protector only. This conduct of his, as it rendered him wonderfully beloved and admired by the people, so it exceedingly irritated the queen with all her family and faction; inasmuch that they immediately began to calumniate Lycurgus, and to alledge, that notwithstanding all this fair shew, he intended nothing less than to resign the crown to his nephew; nay Leonidas, the brother of the queen, had the Assurance to tell him in a dispute, which happened between them, that he was confident it would not be long before he should see him king. The queen pretended too much concern on the same account, and bewailed

- a bewailed to her attendants the fate of her unhappy child. Lycurgus, greatly alarmed at these practices, and desiring to avoid not only evil, but the very suspicion of evil, resolved to stifle the voice of malice itself by going into a voluntary exile, which resolution he carried into execution soon afterwards, notwithstanding all the intreaties of the people.

THE injuries which he had received and the base constructions which had been put on his best actions, did not hinder Lycurgus from applying himself with the same diligence abroad to the study of that Science which might render him useful to his country, that he was wont to practice while at home; to this end he devoted all his travels, and like a true patriot, was careful that neither time nor place should alter his attachment to his fellow citizens. Full of these noble conceptions he first visited Crete, an island famous in the most ancient times for the laws whereby it was governed, and for that artful polity which had been established there in the most early ages. As far as can be gathered from Plutarch, it was at this time governed by several princes, or was at least cantoned into various independant states, through all which Lycurgus travelled, procuring to himself the acquaintance of persons of the first rank, and by their means a perfect knowledge of their laws; some of which he greatly approved, others he slighted. Amongst all the friendships which he contracted in Crete, that which stood him in most stead was his intimacy with Tbales the Lyric poet, whom he persuaded to be the companion of his voyages, and afterwards to return with him to Sparta; this poet was not a writer of amorous or drunken songs, but one who made use of the sweetness of poetic numbers to recommend temperance, modesty, obedience, and civil harmony, and whose songs paved the way to the admission of Lycurgus's laws, by removing that ferocity and querulous disposition to which the Lacedæmonians had till then been addicted. From Crete Lycurgus passed over to the continent of Asia, that he might philosophize on the Ionian mode of life, which differed greatly from the Cretan. Here, as Plutarch conjectures, this noble enquirer after truth and virtue found the works of Homer, which he eagerly transcribed, and brought over with him into Greece, whereas yet they had only scattered episodes of that famous author's poems, which were however highly esteemed. From Ionia Lycurgus went into Egypt, a place never forgot by such as went in quest of wisdom, and there he met with that method of distinguishing military men from mechanics, which he afterwards introduced at Sparta. As to his voyages to Spain, Afric, and the Indies, Plutarch says, the credit of them rests solely upon one author; at this distance of time therefore we can affirm nothing about them. Instead of entering into a field of conjectures, from whence it might be difficult to get out, we will pass to the affairs of Sparta during his absence*.

THE inhabitants of Lacedæmon being in their nature bold and turbulent, were continually quarrelling amongst themselves, or trespassing on the prerogative of their princes; the kings on the other hand sometimes joining with the prevailing faction, practiced a kind of tyranny, and at other times had much ado to support a legal authority; these confusions were greater or less, according as the princes were men of parts or otherwise. At this time neither of the kings had any shining genius, Archelaus had the most wit, but Charilaus was the better man, more affable, and more beloved; the people however regarded neither of them so much as they did Lycurgus; wherefore taking it in their heads that many things went wrong, and that in short the whole frame of the government was out of order since this great man's departure, they sent ambassadors to solicit him to return, which ambassadors told him, that though they had indeed kings, whom their birth, their title, and their robes, shewed to be such, yet as to royal qualities, and that disposition of the mind which deserves to rule, they had observed nothing among them since his departure of that kind. We use the words of Plutarch, who observes farther, that though this language seemed to bear a little hard upon the princes, yet they were far from being averse to his return, hoping that his presence would serve as a bulwark to screen them from the growing insolence of the people. To gratify the unanimous voice of his fellow-citizens, Lycurgus shaped his course homewards, in order to put in practice that wisdom, which with so much industry and pains he had acquired. On his arrival at Sparta, he found all things in a very bad way, the people mutinous, the kings timorous, and no middle rank of people, who durst interpose between them.

* Plut. in vit. Lycurg.

He acted in this case like a great physician; for knowing that palliatives would ^a do little or nothing, he resolved to alter the whole political constitution in order to introduce health by thoroughly purging out all precat humours. A glorious undertaking, but attended with mighty difficulties, and no less danger! To surmount these, and to avoid those, he endeavoured first to gain the confidence of the most eminent men of Sparta, by communicating to them his scheme, and shewing them the reasons upon which it was founded; and secondly, he sought to secure the obedience of the people, by pretending to the sanction of divinity, and ascribing all he did to the counsels of Delphian Apollo. Having made a journey to Delphi, and there offered sacrifice, he returned with an oracle, which stiled him, Beloved of God, and rather God than man; declared the laws he had framed perfectly good, and promised to ^b make the commonwealth, wherein they were observed the most famous in the world. This divine manifesto having wonderfully awed the people, the next thing he had to do was to publish these laws, which that he might perform with security, he appointed thirty of his friends to appear by break of day, armed in the market-place; but of these twenty-eight only appeared. At the news of these preparations, Charilaus, who though honest, was very timid, fled to the temple of Minerva the protectress, fearing that it was some conspiracy against his person; but when Lycurgus sent to inform him of his real design, the king not only quitted the sanctuary, but repaired to the market-place, and entered into the confederacy. The first step taken was the establishing a senate consisting of twenty-eight persons, or of thirty, including ^c the two kings; this alone was of very great consequence, since it fixed the form of the government which had hitherto fluctuated between tyranny and democracy; the senate positing the authority both of the kings and the people, siding with the former, if the latter were seditious, and with the latter, if the former were too enterprising. That the people might not apprehend their condition to be worse than it was before, Lycurgus allowed them to meet in a general assembly, which was to be held sub dio, and wherein they were not allowed to deliberate, but had barely a power of assenting or dissenting to or from what the kings and senate proposed.

WHEN Lycurgus by constituting a senate had secured to himself an accession of power, he proceeded intirely to new-model the commonwealth, and to adjust all ^d things to the scheme he had formed, without any respect whatsoever to their former state and condition; a mighty project, which if we consider, and take at the same time a strict view of those laws which he introduced, we shall have a just idea of his mighty genius, of the form of the Spartan government, and of the means whereby a state which was not considerable either for the number or wealth of its people, maintained itself so long in the sovereignty of Greece. We have the rather taken upon us to enter into a distinct detail of the laws of Lycurgus, because hitherto only general and imperfect accounts of the Spartan republic have been inserted in our histories of Greece, and even in books relating more strictly to politics; whereas we shall make it evident, that these superficial draughts of a constitution are by no means ^e sufficient to give us a just idea of its force and effects. The laws of Lycurgus may be properly divided into twelve tables, according to the subjects of which they treated, and by a proper attendance to the contents of these tables, we shall come at that perfect notion of Lycurgus's scheme, which is absolutely necessary for the thorough understanding of the Lacedæmonian history.

In the first table we shall comprehend such of the Spartan laws as regarded religion. The statues of all the gods and goddesses worshipped by this people were represented armed, even to Venus herself; the reason of which was, that the people might conceive a military life the most noble and honourable, and not attribute, as other nations did, sloth and luxury to the gods. As to sacrifices, they consisted ^f of things of very small value; for which Lycurgus himself gave this reason, that want might never hinder them from worshipping the gods. They were forbidden to make long or rash prayers to the heavenly powers, and were enjoined to ask no more than that they might live honestly, and discharge their duty. Graves were permitted to be made within the bounds of the city, contrary to the custom of most of the Greek nations; nay they buried close by their temples, that all degrees of people might be made familiar with death, and not conceive it such a dreadful thing, as it was generally esteemed elsewhere; on the same account the touching of dead bodies, or assisting at funerals, made none unclean, but were held to be as innocent and honourable duties as any other. As to the mode of burying, it was also rendered

- a dered simple and unexpensive by law, there was nothing thrown into the grave with the dead body, magnificent sepulchres were forbidden, neither was there so much as an inscription, however plain or modest, permitted. Tears, sighs, outcries, were not permitted in public, because they were thought dishonourable in Spartans, whom their law-giver would have to bear all things with equanimity. Mournings were stinted to eleven days, on the twelfth the mourner sacrificed to Ceres, and threw aside his or her weeds. In favour of such as were slain in the wars however, and of women who devoted themselves to a religious life, there was an exception allowed as to the rules beforementioned, for such had a short and decent inscription on their tombs. When a number of Spartans fell in battle at a distance from their country, many of them
b were buried together under one common tomb; but if they fell on the frontiers of their own state, then their bodies were carefully carried back to Sparta, and interred in their family sepulchres.

UNDER the second table let us place the statutes relating to the lands, and to the city; Lycurgus divided all the country of Laconia into thirty thousand equal shares; the city of Sparta he divided into nine thousand, as some say; into six thousand, as say others; and, as a third party will have it, into four thousand five hundred. The intent of the legislator was, that property should be equally divided amongst his citizens, so that none might be powerful enough to oppress his fellows, or any be in such necessity as to be therefrom in danger of corruption; with the same view he c forbade the buying or selling these possessions; if a stranger acquired a right to any of these shares, he might quietly enjoy it, provided he submitted to the laws of the republic. The city of Sparta was unwall'd, Lycurgus trusting it rather to the virtue of its citizens, than to the art of masons. As to the houses they were very plain, for their cielings could only be wrought by the ax, and their gates and doors only by the saw, and their utensils were to be of a like stamp, that luxury might have no instruments among them.

As to the third table, it shall consist of the laws regarding citizens. In the first place they were to be neither more nor less than the number of city lots; and if at any time there happened to be more, they were to be led out in colonies: as to d children, their laws were equally harsh and unreasonable; for a father was directed to carry his new-born son to a certain place, where the gravest men of his tribe looked upon the infant, and if they perceived its limbs strait, and thought it had a wholesome look, then they returned it to its parent to be educated, otherwise it was thrown into a deep cavern at the foot of the mountain Taygetus. This law seems to have had one very good effect, viz. making women very careful when they were with child, of either eating, drinking, or exercising to excess; it made them also excellent nurses, for which they were in mighty request throughout Greece. Strangers were not allowed to reside long in the city, that they might not corrupt the Spartans by teaching them new-fangled customs. Citizens were also forbid to travel for the same reason, unless the good of the state required it. Such as were not bred up in e their youth according to the law, were not allowed the liberty of the city, because they held it unreasonable, that one who had not submitted to the laws in his youth, should receive the benefit of them when a man. They never preferred any stranger to a public office, but if at any time they had occasion for a person not born a Spartan, they first made him a citizen, and then preferred him.

THEIR laws relating to marriage shall be comprehended under the fourth table, Celibacy in men was infamous, and punished in a most extraordinary manner; for, in the first place, the old batchelor was constrained to walk naked in the depth of winter through the market-place: Secondly, while he did this, he was obliged to sing f a song in disparagement of himself; and, thirdly, he had none of the honours paid him which otherwise belonged to old age, it being held unreasonable that the youth should venerate him who was resolved to leave none of his progeny behind him, to revere them when they grew old in their turns. The time of marriage was also fixed, and if a man did not marry when he was of full age, he was liable to an action; as were such also as married above or below themselves; such as had three children had great immunities; such as had four were free from all taxes whatsoever. Virgins were married without portions, because neither want should hinder a man, nor riches induce him to marry contrary to his inclinations. When a marriage was agreed on, the husband committed a kind of rape upon his bride, who was not a tender raw girl, but one in the flower of her age, and fit to bring healthy children.

dren. Husbands went for a long time secretly, and by stealth, to the beds of their wives, that their love might not be quickly and easily extinguished. Husbands were allowed to lend their wives, but the kings however were forbid to take this liberty; some other laws of the like nature there were, which it is not necessary for us to dwell on, because, as they were evidently against modesty, so they were far from producing the ends for which Lycurgus designed them, since though the men of Sparta were generally remarkable for their virtue, the Spartan women were as generally decried for their boldness, and contempt of decency.

UNDER the fifth table shall stand the laws relating to eating. It was the care of Lycurgus, that from their very nonage and infancy the Lacedæmonians should be inured to conquer their appetites; for this reason he directed that nurses should accustom their children to spare meals, and now and then to fasting; that they should carry them when twelve or thirteen years old to those who should examine their education, and who should carefully observe whether they were able to be in the dark alone, and whether they had got over all other follies and weaknesses incident to children. He directed that children of all ranks should be brought up in the same way, and that none should be more favoured in food than another, that they might not even in their infancy perceive any difference between poverty and riches, but consider each other as equals, and even as brethren, to whom the same portions were assigned, and who through the course of their lives were to fare alike. Only youths were allowed to eat flesh, older men eat their black broth and pulse, the lads slept together in chambers, and after a manner somewhat resembling that still in use in Turkey for the Janizaries; their beds in the summer were very hard, being composed of the reeds plucked by the hand from the banks of the Eurotas; in winter their beds were softer, but by no means downy, or fit to indulge immoderate sleep. They eat altogether in public, and in case any abstained from coming to the tables, they were fined. Xenophon seems to have penetrated farther into the reason of this institution than any other author, as indeed he had better opportunity to do; for, whereas the rest say that this was only intended to repress luxury, he very wisely remarks, that it was also intended to serve for a kind of school or academy, where the young were instructed by the old, the former relating the great things that had been performed in their memory, and exciting the growing generation therefrom to perform great things also. It was also strictly forbidden for any to eat or drink at home, before they came to the common meal; even then each had his proper portion, that every thing might be done there with gravity and decency; the black broth was the great rarity of the Spartans, which was composed of salt, vinegar, blood, &c. so that in our times it would be esteemed a very unsavoury soup. If they were modest in their eating, they were so also in their drinking; thirst was the sole measure thereof, and never any Lacedæmonian thought of drinking for pleasure; as for drunkenness it was both infamous and severely punished; and that young men might perceive with how great reason, slaves were compelled to drink to excess, that the beastliness of the vice might appear. When they retired from the public meal, they were not allowed any torches or lights, because it was expected that men, who were perfectly sober, should be able to find their way in the dark; and besides it gave them a facility of marching without light, a thing wonderfully useful to them in time of war.

THE laws relating to their habit fall under the sixth table. As the poor eat as well as the rich, so the rich could wear nothing better than the poor; they neither changed their fashion, nor the materials of their garments; they were made for warmth and strength, not for gallantry and shew; and to this custom even their kings conformed, who wore nothing gaudy in right of their dignity, but were contented that their virtue should distinguish them rather than robes. The young lads wore a tunic till they were twelve years old; afterwards they had a cloke given them, which was to serve them a year, and their cloathing was in general so thin, that a Lacedæmonian vest became proverbial. Boys were always used to go without shoes, but when they grew up they were indulged to them, if the manner of life they led required it; but they were always inured to run without them, as also to climb up and slip down steep places with bare feet; nay the very shoe they used was of a particular form, plain and strong, and from the place of its invention Laconic. Boys were not permitted to wear their hair, but when they grew up they did not cut it. Baths and anointing were not much in use among the Lacedæmonians; the river Eurotas supplied the former, and exercise the latter. In the field however their

- a their sumptuary Laws did not take place so strictly as in the city ; for when they went to war they wore purple habits ; they put on crowns when they were about to engage the enemy ; they had also rings, but they were of iron, which metal was most esteemed by this nation. Young women wore their vests or jerkins only to their knees, or, as some think, not quite so low, which beyond question was indecent, and as such it is censured both by Greek and Roman authors. Gold, precious stones, and other costly ornaments, were permitted only to common women ; which permission was the strongest prohibition to women of virtue, or who affected to be thought virtuous. Virgins went abroad without veils, with which married women on the contrary were always covered, it being conceived fit for the one to be looked
- b on, but not the other ; in certain exercises and shews both the young women and men were naked, a thing for which Plutarch endeavours to apologize, as if there could be no nakedness, where the mind was in the habit of virtue ; this is evidently playing with words, for without question there never was a more immoral, impudent practice than this ; the truth is, Lycurgus had nothing in view but the rendering the commonwealth of Sparta powerful and lasting ; and that he might do this, he sought by all means to eradicate the seeds of civil dissensions ; hence the equal division of estates ; hence the banishment of wealth ; and hence the accustoming men to bear with the wantonness of women ; that birth, riches, jealousy, which in other countries, and in other states, produced such stirrings and tumults, might be able to effect little or
- c nothing in Lacedæmon.

DISCIPLINE and manners, that is the rules regarding these, shall fall under the seventh table. Though the Spartans were always free, yet it was with this restriction, that they were subservient to their own laws, which bound them as strictly in the city, as soldiers in other states were bound by the rules of war in the camp. In the first place, strict obedience to their superiors was the great thing required in Sparta ; this they looked upon as the very basis of government, without which neither laws nor magistrates availed much. Old age was an indubitable title to honour in Sparta ; to the old men the youth rose up, whenever they came into any public place ; they gave way to them when they met them in the streets, and were silent whenever their elders

d spoke. As all children were looked upon as the children of the state, so all the old men had the authority of parents, they reprehended whatever they saw amiss, not only in their own, but in other people's children ; and by this method Lycurgus provided, that as youth are every-where apt to offend, so they might be no-where without a monitor. The laws went still further ; if an old man was present where a young one committed a fault, and did not reprove him, he was punished equally with the delinquent. Amongst the youths there was one of their own body, or at most two years older than the rest, who was stiled Iren ; he had authority to question all their actions, to look strictly to their behaviour, and to punish them if they did amiss ; neither were their punishments light, but on the contrary very severe, whereby the boys were e made hardy, and accustomed to bear stripes, and hard usage. Silence was a thing highly commended, and greatly valued at Sparta, where modesty was held to be a most becoming virtue in young people ; nor was it restrained only to their words and actions, but to their very looks and gestures, Lycurgus having particularly directed that they should look forward, or on the ground, and that they should always keep their hands within their robes. A stupid, inconsiderate person, one who would not listen to instruction, but was careless of whatever the world might say of him, the Lacedæmonians treated as a scandal to human nature ; with such an one they would not converse, but threw him off as a rotten branch, and worthless member of society.

- f THE studies and learning of this people fall naturally into the eighth table. The plainness of their manners, and their being so very much addicted to war, made the Lacedæmonians less fond of the sciences than the rest of the Greeks ; they measured the worth of all things by their usefulness, and therefore, if they wrote to be read, and spoke to be understood, it was all they sought. For this the Athenians, who were excessively vain of their learning, mightily contemned them, insomuch that Thucydides himself, in drawing the character of Brasidas says, he spoke well enough for a Lacedæmonian. These, on the other hand, valued themselves no less on their roughness, and their steady adherence to the maxims of their ancestors, as, amongst other instances, appears from this answer of a Spartan to one of the learned Athenians, who upbraided him with the ignorance of his country : All you say may be true, and yet it amounts to no more, than that we only amongst the Greeks have learned no evil customs from you.

you. Arts were in no greater credit with them than sciences, a soldier was the only a reputable profession in Sparta, a mechanic or husbandman was thought a low fellow ;
 the reason of this was, that they imagined professions which required much labour, some constant posture, being continually in the house, or always about a fire, weakened the body, and depressed the mind ; whereas a man free from these incumbrances was at liberty to attend the service of the republic in time of peace, and to fight its battles when engaged in war. Such professions as were necessary the Helotes exercised, but for curious arts, and such as served only to luxury, they would not so much as suffer them to be practised in their city, in consequence of which rhetoricians, fortune-tellers, bankers, and dealers in money were shut out ; neither tragedy nor comedy could b obtrude itself on the Spartans, they would not bear the representation of evil even to produce good ; but other kinds of poetry were admitted, provided the magistrates had the perusal of pieces before they were handed to the public. Above all things they affected brevity of speech, and accustomed their children from their very infancy never to express themselves in more words than were strictly necessary, whence a concise and sententious oratory is to this day stiled Laconic. In writing they used the same method, of which we have a signal instance in a letter of Archidamus to the Eleans, when he understood that they had some thoughts of assisting the Arcadians ; it ran thus : Archidamus to the Eleans. It is good to be quiet. And therefore Epami- nondas had reason to glory in having forced the Spartans to abandon their mono- c syllables, and to lengthen their discourses. We need not wonder that people so much removed from their neighbours in their customs and manners, should not be desirous of having the customs and Laws of strangers published or discoursed of in their city ; this therefore was a Law given by Lycurgus, and strictly adhered to ; but some who have inferred from thence that the Lacedæmonians were equally cautious to prevent strangers from gaining acquaintance with their Laws and customs, are somewhat mistaken ; for in this point they were not so strict. The greatest part of their education consisted in giving their youth right ideas of men and things ; the iren or master proposed questions, and either commended the answers that were made him, or reproved such as answered childishly ; these questions did not relate either to trivial d or to abstruse matters, but to points of the highest importance in civil Life ; such as,
 Who was the best man in the city, wherein lay the merit of such an action, and whether this or that hero's fame was well founded ? Harmless raillery was greatly encouraged, and this, joined to their short manner of speaking, rendered Laconic replies universally admired. Music was much encouraged, but in this, as in other things, they adhered to that which had been in favour with their ancestors ; nay, they were so strict therein, that they would not permit their slaves to learn either the tune or the words of their most admired odes, or, which is all one, they would not permit them to sing them if they had learned them. The love of boys was much encouraged at Sparta, but it was a virtuous and modest affection untinged with that sensuality which was so scandalous at Athens ; female friendships were no less frequent, e and no less warm ; it is likely that Lycurgus introduced these things in order the better to unite his citizens, which is the more probable, if we consider that neither in one case, nor in the other, rivals were angry, or bore ill-will towards each other ; but on the contrary, their love to the same person begat a secondary friendship among themselves, and united them in all things which might be for the benefit of the person beloved. There is but one thing more, in respect to their education, which deserves mention, and it is this ; That theft, if it was handsomely concealed, was not held scandalous amongst them ; a most absurd institution, for which many apologies have been offered, which have done as little honour to their authors, as this very law did to Lycurgus. When theft was discovered however, it was severely punished, and f what between this practice and the former, the Spartan youth were so hardened, that they would endure any thing, after they had committed a theft, rather than suffer it to be known. It would be easy to alledge instances, but to what end ? to prove that in defence of vice, men will dare to suffer pain ? We see it every day, and therefore they are needless ; it was an error in the Lacedæmonian policy, which we are not bound either to palliate or excuse. The exercises instituted by law fall under the ninth table ; in these all the Greeks were extremely careful, but the Lacedæmonians in a degree beyond the rest ; for if a youth by his corpulence, or any other means, became unfit for these exercises, he fell into public contempt at least, if not banishment.
 Hunting was the usual diversion of their children, nay, it was made a part of their educa-

- a education, because it had a tendency to strengthen the limbs, and to render those who practised it supple and fleet; they likewise bred up dogs for hunting with great care. They had a kind of public dances, in which they exceedingly delighted, and which were common alike to virgins, and young men; indeed in all their sports girls were allowed to divert themselves with the youths, insomuch that at darting, throwing the choit, pitching the bar, and such-like robust diversions, the women were as dextrous as the men; for the manifest oddity of this proceeding, Lycurgus assigned no other reason, than that he sought to render women as well as men strong and healthy, that the children they brought forth might be so too; violent exercises, and a laborious kind of life, were only enjoined to the youth; for when they were
- b grown up to men's estate, that is, were upwards of thirty years old, they were exempted from all kinds of labour, and employed themselves wholly either in affairs of state or in war. They had a method of whipping at a certain time young lads in the temple of Diana, and about her altar, which however palliated, was certainly unnatural and cruel. It was esteemed a great honour for lads to sustain these flagellations without weeping, groaning, or shewing any sense of pain; and the thirst of glory was so strong in these young minds, that they very frequently suffered death without shodding a tear, or breathing a sigh. A desire of overcoming all the weaknesses of human nature, and thereby rendering his Spartans not only superior to their neighbours, but to their species, runs through many of the institutions of Lycurgus;
- c which principle, if well attended to, thoroughly explains them, and without attending to which it is impossible to give any account of them at all.

THE tenth table shall comprehend their laws, respecting contracts and money-matters. Gold and silver were by the constitutions of Lycurgus made of no value in Sparta; he was so well apprised of the danger of riches, that he made the very possession of them penal; but as there was no living without some sort of money, that is, some common measure or standard of the worth of things, he directed an iron coinage, whereby the Spartans were supplied with the useful money, and had at the same time no temptation to covetousness afforded them; for a very small sum was sufficient to load a couple of horses, and a great one must have been kept d in a barn or warehouse; the coming in of all foreign money was also prohibited, that corruption might not enter under the name of commerce. The most ancient method of dealing, viz. by barter or exchange of one commodity for another, was preserved by law in Sparta long after it had been out of date every-where else. Interest was a thing forbid in the Spartan commonwealth, where they had also a law against the alienation of lands, accepting presents from foreigners even without the limits of their own country, and when their authority and character might well seem to excuse them; thus by all possible methods Lycurgus sought to shut out corruption, to oblige his citizens to live simply and innocently without admitting amongst them those seeds of luxury and dissension, which he saw had produced e such fatal effects in the regions through which he travelled.

SUCH of the laws of Sparta as related to courts of justice may be brought under the eleventh table. Thirty years must have passed over the head of him who had a right to concern himself in juridical proceedings; young men were thought unfit for them, and it was even held indecent, and of ill report, for a man to have any fondness for law-suits, or to be busying himself at the tribunals, when he had no affairs there of his own; by these rules Lycurgus thought to shut out litigiousness, and to prevent that multiplicity of suits which is always scandalous in a state. As young people were not permitted to inquire about the laws of other countries, and as they were hindered from hearing judicial proceedings in their courts, so they were

f likewise forbidden to ask any questions about, or to endeavour to discover the reasons of the laws by which themselves were governed. Obedience was their duty, and to that alone they would have them kept. Men of abandoned characters, or who were notoriously of ill fame, lost all right of giving their votes in respect of public affairs, or of speaking in public assemblies; for they would not believe that an ill man in private life could mean his country better than he did his neighbour.

THE military laws of Sparta shall compose the twelfth table. Till a man was thirty years old, he was not capable of serving in the army, as the best authors agree, though some think that the military age is not well ascertained by ancient authors; they were forbidden to march at any time before the full moon, the reason of which law is very hard to be discovered, if indeed it had any reason at all, or was not a rather founded in some superstitious opinion, that this was a more lucky conjuncture than any other. They were likewise forbidden to fight often against the same enemy, which was one of the wisest maxims in the political system of Lycurgus; and we shall see that Agesilaus, by offending against it, destroyed the power of his country, and lost her that authority which for so many ages she maintained over the rest of Greece; for by continually warring against the Thebans, to whom he had an inveterate hatred, he at last beat them into the knowledge of the art of war, and enabled them under the command of Epaminondas to maintain for a time the principality of Greece. Maritime affairs they were forbid to meddle with, though the necessity of things compelled them in process of time to transgress this institution, and by degrees they transferred to themselves as well the dominion at sea as land, as the reader has already seen in the Athenian history; but after the Peloponnesian war they again neglected naval affairs, from a persuasion that sailors and strangers corrupted those with whom they conversed. As they never fortified Sparta, so they were not ready to undertake sieges; fighting in the field was their proper province, and while they could overcome their enemies there, they rightly conceived that nothing could hurt them at home. In time of war they relaxed somewhat of their strict manner of living, in which they were singular; the true reason for this was, in all probability, that war might be less burdensome to them; for, as we have more than once observed, a strong desire to render them bold and warlike, was the reigning passion of their legislator. For they were forbid to remain long encamped in the same place, as well to hinder their being surprized, as that they might be more troublesome to their enemies, by wasting every corner of their country. They slept all night in their armour, but their out-guards were not allowed their shields, that being unprovided of defence, they might not dare to sleep. In all their expeditions, they were careful in the performance of religious rites, and after their evening meal was over, the soldiers sung together hymns to their gods. When they were about to engage, the king sacrificed to the muses, that by their assistance they might be enabled to perform deeds worthy of being recorded to latest times; then the army advanced in order to the sound of flutes, which played the hymn of Castor; the king himself sung the pæan, which was the signal to charge; this was done with all the decorum imaginable, and the soldiers were sure either to die or conquer; indeed they had nothing else to do, for if they fled they were infamous, and in danger of being slain, even by their own mothers, for disgracing their families. History informs us, that a Spartan lady, on the news of her son's having fled from a battle, wrote him this short letter, Fame speaks ill of you, efface it, or be no more. In this consisted all the excellency of the Spartan women, who, if it were possible, excelled in bravery their men, never lamenting over husbands or sons, if they died honourably in the field, but deploring the shame brought on their house, if either the one or the other escaped by flight. The throwing away a shield also induced infamy, and with respect to this, mothers, when they embraced their departing sons, were wont to caution them that they should either return armed as they were, or be brought back so, that is, when they were dead; for, as we have before observed, such as were slain in battle were nevertheless buried in their own country. When they had made their enemies fly, they pursued no longer than till the victory was out of doubt, because they would seem to fight rather for the honour of victory, than that they might put their enemies to death. According to their ancient rules of war, they were bound not to spoil the dead bodies of their enemies, but in process of time this, and indeed many other of their most excellent regulations, fell into disuse. He who overcame by stratagem, offered up an ox to Mars, whereas he, who overcame by force, offered up only a cock, the former being esteemed more manly than the latter. After forty years service a man was discharged, that is, it was no longer required of him by law to go into the field, and consequently, that if the military age was thirty, the Spartans were not held invalids, till they were seventy. Thus we have comprized the most considerable of the Spartan laws into twelve tables. Some indeed we have omitted, because we shall be obliged to speak of their being enacted elsewhere.

*The Cryptia
what, and how published.*

Lycurgus did not put any of his laws into writing, because he would have them written in the hearts of the people, and to impress them the more strongly there, he

PLUT. in vit. Lycurg. & in Instit. Lacon. ARIST. Polit. PLAT. de Legib. & de Repub. XENOPH. Inst. Lac. ÆLIAN. var. Hist. HERAC. Pont. in Fragm.

a took great pains to make it be believed, that they were given to him by Apollo, wherefore he stiled them Rhetæ, i. e. divine sanctions. It is not clear whether or not Lycurgus was the author of that political contrivance which prevailed amongst his countrymen, for lessening the number of their slaves whenever they grew dangerous to the state, and which was stiled Cryptia, i. e. the ambuscade. Such as had the care of educating the Spartan youth, picked out the stoutest of them, and having armed them with daggers, sent them out to destroy their unhappy slaves, which they did, either by surprizing them in the night, or falling upon them in the day, when they were at their work, without any crime being pretended against them, and for no other reason than that the state might be safe from their attempts by this reduction b of their number. Plato greatly condemns this law, for which reason Plutarch denies that it was made by Lycurgus; but when, or however it was made, it was indubitably against natural equity, or, to speak with greater propriety, against humanity; a cruel and unnecessary expedient, and unworthy of a virtuous people^c (A).

It is not to be conceived that such mighty changes could be wrought in a country without any opposition, neither indeed were they; for when he proceeded to the division of property, a great sedition arose, wherein at last the people proceeded to blows, and Lycurgus found himself obliged to quit the assembly in order to fly to a sanctuary; some of them however closely pursued him, and amongst the rest one Alcander, a young nobleman, of a generous, but too hasty disposition, who on Lycurgus's looking back, struck him on the eye, and, as some say, beat it out; the legislator then stopped, and shewing his face all covered with blood, the people were
c

Sedition in Sparta.
Lycurgus wounded in the eye.

^c PLUT. in vit. Lycurg. PLATO de Legib. l. i. p. 633.

(A) The cruelty of the Lacedæmonians towards their slaves or Helotes, is frequently spoken of, and generally decried by all authors, though Plutarch, who was a great admirer of the Spartans, endeavours every-where to palliate it as much as may be. To give the reader a distinct account of this matter, we must first acquaint him who these Helotes are: Helos was an ancient city in Laconia, against which on some pretence or other the Lacedæmonians made war, and having subdued it, they made all the inhabitants thereof, and of the adjacent district, slaves (1). And in process of time, when they had enlarged the number of persons in this unhappy condition by subjugating other places, they still kept up the old name, and called them all Helotes, which ceasing then to be a proper name, became common to all who were in this state of servitude. As to the terms of it, they were these: First, their lords could not set them free; and secondly, they had no power to sell them, so as that they might be transported out of the Lacedæmonian dominions (2). Hence it came to pass that they were prodigiously numerous, which sometimes alarmed the Spartans, and made them devise the law above recited to keep them under. Aristotle expressly affirms that it was devised by Lycurgus (3). Plutarch would gladly have this disbelieved, merely because he thinks it injurious to that legislator; for he offers no other reason for it whatsoever, and at the same time owns, that Plato himself had been displeased with Lycurgus for the cruelty and injustice of this law (4). Plutarch elsewhere informs us, that the Helotes were employed to cultivate the lands of their lords, that they did not give an exact account of their produce, but paid a small settled rent, which their lords could not raise without incurring public censure (5). This is Plutarch's account of the matter, from whence one would be led to conceive, that these Helotes were a kind of bailiffs, stewards, or lower sort of farmers. But other authors speak quite a different language, they tell us, that liberty and slavery were in their extremes at Sparta, that none were so perfectly free as the citizens of Lacedæmon, nor any such despicable slaves as these Helotes; they were distinguished, that is, marked out for slaves in their dress, their gesture, and in short in every thing; they wore dog-skin bonnets, sheep-skin vests; they were forbidden to learn any liberal art, or to perform any act worthy of their masters; when their lords were so disposed, these poor men were obliged to drink themselves drunk, that the free-born Spartans might see the baseness of that vice in their behaviour. Once a day they received a certain number of stripes, for fear they should forget they were slaves; and to crown all they were liable to this Cryptia, which was sure to be executed on all such as spoke, looked or walked like freemen (6). To take off somewhat from the horror and scandal of such a practice, the ephori, after they were instituted, at their coming into office declared war against them (7); against whom? why against poor naked slaves, who tilled their lands, dressed their food, and did all those offices for them which they were too proud to do for themselves. Plutarch, according to custom, endeavours to place all this cruelty far lower than the times of Lycurgus, and alledges that it was introduced on account of the Helotes joining with the Messenians after a great earthquake, whereby a great part of Lacedæmon was overthrown (8); but Ælian tells us expressly, that it was the common opinion in Greece, that this very earthquake was a judgment from heaven upon the Spartans for treating these Helotes with such inhumanity (9). Thucydides gives us a glaring instance of the jealousy of the Lacedæmonians on account of these poor men; he says that about two thousand of them being manumitted by law for their great service in the Peloponnesian war, were crowned with garlands, led about to the temples, and entertained with shows; after all which they disappeared on a sudden, nor could any body ever tell what became of them (10).

(1) Homer. Iliad. B. v. 585. Strabo Georg. lib. viii. p. 363. Pausan. Lacon. 201. (2) Strabo, lib. viii. Pollux. lib. iii. c. 8. (3) Polit. lib. ii. (4) In vit. Lycurg. (5) Instit. Lacedæm. (6) Myron. Prien. ap. Athen. Deipnos. lib. xiv. (7) Arist. Polit. lib. ii. (8) Plut. in vit. Lycurg. (9) Hist. Var. lib. iii. (10) Thucyd. de Bell. Pelop. lib. iv. vide etiam Ubb. Emm. de Repub. Lac. Græg. de Repub. Lac. lib. i. c. 13. Meurs. Misc. Lacon. lib. ii. c. 6.

so struck thereat, that they immediately asked his pardon, and delivered up Alcander into his hands to be treated as he thought fit. Lycurgus accepted the proposal, and carried Alcander home with him, where, instead of punishing, or even reproving him harshly, he received him as his attendant, caused him to wait on him at meals, and kept him always near his person; this mildness was of great service to them both; for Alcander perceiving that Lycurgus was not, as he had supposed him, a man of a harsh and morose disposition, but of a most sweet and affable temper, he became from his fiercest enemy his greatest admirer, which wrought mightily on the minds of the people, and engaged them to receive as oracles the instructions of Lycurgus. Another good it wrought was this, that it became immediately a law, from which they never receded, that no weapon whatsoever, no not b so much as a staff, was brought into their assemblies, or public councils ^a.

Method taken by this legislator to settle his laws.

WHEN Lycurgus had fully perfected his design, and wrought the commonwealth into that form, which, from the consideration of the nature of men, and of the different effects of various governments upon them he thought most eligible; his next care was to render this fixed and stable, and to prevent his countrymen from overturning that structure which he had raised, and running back into the condition wherein he found them. After some time he fell upon a method of effecting it, which was this: He called a general assembly, wherein he declared that he now thought everything was brought into its proper order, and that there remained behind but one point to be settled, which was indeed of the highest importance, and what he c could not acquaint them with, till he had consulted the oracle at Delphi; to which place he was ready to go, provided they would engage themselves to observe his rhetoric inviolably till his return. To this all ranks and degrees of people readily assented, and to bind their assent, Lycurgus took an oath upon the spot from the two kings, the senate, and the commons; after which he departed, as he had proposed, and went to Delphi. There he proposed this question to the oracle; Shall the laws established in Sparta make that city virtuous and happy? The response was, The laws given to Sparta are excellent, and the city shall continue in the highest renown, while it observes the polity of Lycurgus. This he took in writing, and sent to Sparta, after which he sacrificed a second time to Apollo, and having solemnly taken leave of his friends, d and of his son, he determined with himself to put an end to his life by fasting, that the Lacedæmonians might never have it in their power to free themselves from the oath which he had taken from them. Plutarch expresses himself in very high terms in respect to the death of Lycurgus: he commends it as one of the noblest instances of patriotism, which is to be met with in ancient history; because, says he, the legislator secured a double point by this manner of dying; he put a most honorable end to a virtuous and well-spent life, and he affixed his death as a seal to his laws, which he left as his last will and testament to his country. He tells us likewise, that his bones were carried home to Sparta, and buried under a plain tomb, which, as a mark of the divine favour, he says was afterwards blasted with lightning, an accident e peculiar to Lycurgus, and Euripides the poet. The Spartans, to do honour to his memory, erected a temple to him, and sacrificed annually thereat. But after all this pompous account, Plutarch himself acknowledges that authors are not well agreed how or where this good man died; some say he ended his days at Cirra, Apollonius affirmed that he died at Ehis, Timæus and Arifoxenus agree that he finished his days in Crete, the latter says the inhabitants shewed his tomb. Aristocrates the son of Hipparchus wrote likewise that he died in Crete, but he added that by the direction of Lycurgus the persons with whom he lodged burnt his body, and scattered the ashes thereof in the air, and on the sea, that they might never be transported to Lacedæmon, to prevent the people apprehending themselves released from f their oath. He left behind him one son, whose name was Anticorus, who dying without issue, his race became extinct. His relations and friends held an annual assembly in commemoration of the deceased, and that they might therein discourse of, and exhort each other to the imitation of his virtues; the days of this meeting were in honour of the legislator styled Lycurgides ^(B).

FROM

^a Plut. ubi supra.

^a Plut. in vit. Lycurg.

(B) The life of Lycurgus was the first which Plutarch published, as he himself observes (11). He seems to have had a mighty liking to the Spartans, and their customs; for besides this life, and those of several

(11) In vit. Theſti.

- ^a FROM the death of Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian history is for a long time very perplexed, there being no other materials from whence it may be collected, than scattered passages of ancient authors, which, as well as we are able, we shall put together. Charilaus made war on the Argives, but with little success; afterwards he fell on the Tegeate, a people of Arcadia; but in this war also he had very bad fortune, for he was taken prisoner in a battle, which was won chiefly by the valour of the women; and to purchase his liberty, he was constrained to take a solemn oath, that he would never make war on this people any more, which oath however he kept very indifferently^c. He then turned his arms against the Acheans, who had taken from the Lacedæmonians several frontier towns, which he and his colleague Teleclus recovered. Among these were Amicylas, Pbaris, and Gerontibra; the first they raised, the inhabitants of the other two cities by agreement were permitted to retire out of Peloponnesus; such were the military exploits of Charilaus or Charillus; he retained always a great respect for his tutor Lycurgus, as appears from several of his sayings which have reached our times: for being once asked, why Lycurgus had made so few laws, he answered, Men of few words need but few laws; and it being demanded of him what kind of polity he held to be most complete, That, said he, wherein most of the citizens contend in virtue without disturbing each other^d. His colleague of the other regal house was Teleclus, a prince of indifferent parts and fortune. Being told before he succeeded to the crown, by some who sought to flatter

The reigns of Charilaus and Teleclus. Year after the good 2095. before Christ 904

^c PAUSAN. in Arcad. ^d PLUT. in Apophtheg. Lacon.

Several other Spartan chieftains, we have a treatise of his on the laws and customs of the Lacedæmonians, and another of Lacomic apophthegms; he owns notwithstanding, that with respect to the family, and the time of the birth of this legislator, there is great uncertainty. He makes him however in all things a perfect hero, and alledges his behaviour as a proof that the wise man so often described, and so much commended by philosophers, was not a mere ideal character unattainable by human nature. He is very particular as to the salutation of the prophets at Delphi, which, he says, run in these words: Welcome, beloved of God, and rather God than man (12). This oracle was certainly very famous in Greece, and generally speaking believed, otherwise Socrates would not have quoted it in his defence (13), or Plutarch have so often urged it as a full answer to all the calumnies raised against his hero. Yet something may be said, not greatly to the reputation either of the oracle or Lycurgus, viz. that this was all contrivance in order to bring about what could otherwise never have been brought about, the imposing his harsh laws upon the Spartans. It is very likely that he took this hint from the conduct of Minos the Cretan lawgiver, who ascribed all his laws to Jupiter; but from whomsoever he took it, an ancient author of great note affirms, that the responses of the oracle were framed by his wit, and procured by his money (14). The reader has seen in the Athenian history many instances of a like nature, and we shall hereafter shew that Lyfander knew how to make Apollo speak kindly in his favour, as well as Lycurgus. It is clear that our law-giver depended chiefly on the people's apprehending his institutions to be divine; for this cause he would never suffer his laws to be put into writing, but trusted them to the memory, that they might at once make the greater impression, and give the government greater power. Plutarch affords us an instance of this; he says, that by a Rhetra of Lycurgus the people had power to assent or dissent from what was proposed to them by the kings and senate; but when by degrees they extended this power, and began to gloss upon the laws, to assent to one part of them, and to dissent from another, the kings and senate, that they might be even with them in their own way, added a new clause to the rhetra to this purpose, that if the people should offer any cross proposal, then the senate and kings might reject it. Which clause, by dint of a little of their legislator's art, they imposed as a genuine injunction, and thereby strengthened their own authority at the expence of the people's (15). Most politicians have held Lycurgus's invention of a senate to have been a most excellent contrivance: Plato was so much charmed with it, that from thence he stiles its author a divine spirit residing in a human nature (16); yet Aristotle, who was an excellent politician, found great fault with that institution; he thought it unreasonable that senators should be made for life, because frequently mens abilities decay, so that instead of being able to mind public affairs, they become unfit to transact those of their own family. He was likewise offended that they were left without controul, for he thought that as all men were liable to errors, so all men ought to be accountable for them, especially if their errors might any way affect the state (17). The last act of Lycurgus, of which we have any certainty, is, his sending the oracle from Delphi to Sparta, signifying the approbation given by Apollo to all his laws; that he starved himself there is improbable, but that he returned no more to his country, seems to be perfectly agreeable to his manner of acting; for he was extremely ambitious of being thought somewhat more than man, as appears from the whole tenour of his behaviour, and his life could never have been inclosed by an act more shining than this of quitting supreme power, when his countrymen unanimously desired that he should retain it. This shewed that he was truly disinterested, and did not seek any other reward for the services he rendered Sparta, than the glory of having served her. Solon, though a person of a different temper, was as disinterested as he; he settled the Athenian commonwealth, refused the sovereignty when offered to him, travelled to avoid the importunities of his countrymen, opposed tyranny in his old age, and when he found his opposition vain, went into voluntary exile. Lycurgus and Solon were both great men, but the former had the stronger, the latter the milder genius, the effects of which appeared in the commonwealths they founded.

(12) Plut. in vit. Lycurg.
(15) Plutarch. in vit. Lycurg.

(13) Xenophon. de Reb. Memor.
(16) Plato de Legib. lib. iii.

(14) Polyæn. Strateg. lib. i. c. 16.
(17) Arist. lib. ii. & lib. vi.

him, that his father had spoke slightly of him, he answered, That he was sorry a for it, because he would not have done it, if himself had not deserved it^b. His death gave occasion to the Messenian war, but after what manner cannot easily be determined. There was, it seems, a temple of Diana seated on the marches between Laconia and Messenia, to which the inhabitants of both regions resorted; some Spartan virgins repairing thither, were violated by the Messenians, and Teleclus, endeavouring to prevent this outrage, was slain; the women also famished themselves to death. This is the Spartan side of the story, the Messenians reported it thus: That Teleclus intending to surprize some of the principal persons of their country, came thither with certain of his friends in female habits, with poinards under their cloaths; and that a fray happening, Teleclus and some of his associates were slain. But there wanted not other causes of ill-will among these people, for the Spartans entertained an opinion that their kings Euristhenes and Procles were cheated by their uncle Cresphontes in the assignment of their territories, the most barren being given to them, and the best reserved to himself. While things were in this situation, an injury done to a private person kindled up the fire of war. Thus it happened; Polychares a Messenian intrusted Euephnus a Lacedæmonian with some cows, on condition that he should have a moiety of the profit arising from their milk. The Spartan sold these cows to certain chapmen, and not only the cows, but the herdsmen who kept them, his merchants agreeing to take them away by force; as soon as this was done, Euephnus went to Polychares, and told him a melancholy accident of certain robbers, who had stolen the cattle, and their keepers. But, unluckily for him, while he was in the midst of his tale, came one or two of his herdsmen, who had made their escape, and falsified all he said; upon this the Lacedæmonian confessed the truth, and told Polychares, that if he would send his son home with him, he would give him a moiety of the money, to which the Messenian readily agreed. But when they were come to Sparta, Euephnus most perfidiously murdered the lad, and Polychares coming several times to Sparta to demand justice, was forced to retire undressed and unheeded. He being exceedingly provoked with such barbarous usage, resolved to take vengeance of the whole nation, and in consequence of this resolution, killed as many of the Lacedæmonians as he could meet with, which on the other hand was highly resented by that people^c. These transactions we have thrown together, though they happened at some distance of time, because we were willing to place all the causes or supposed causes of the Messenian war in the reader's view at once; we will however interrupt this narration a little, that we may preserve in its just order the succession of the Spartan kings.

The reigns of Nicander and Alcæmenes.

To Charilaus succeeded his son Nicander, who reigned thirty-nine years, and in the thirty-fourth year of whose reign was celebrated the first olympiad; he is said to have carried on the war with the Argives, and to have done them a great deal of mischief; but for other great actions of his life, if there were any, they were not recorded. Teleclus had for his successor his son Alcæmenes, who with his colleague before-mentioned, sent to the Messenians to demand justice against Polychares, and that he should be delivered up; the Messenians were at that time governed by Androcles and Antiochus, brothers; the former was much against yielding on any terms to the request of the Lacedæmonians, alledging that they were the aggressors, and therefore ought to do justice first; the latter was against hazarding the public safety on account of a private person, and therefore declared that he would give up Polychares rather than break with the Spartans; the disputes on this occasion rose so high, that from words they came to blows, wherein Androcles was slain. Antiochus now reigning alone, sent immediately ambassadors to Sparta, beseeching the king and senate to consider that they were originally of the same stock, and that therefore they ought not to be ready on every turn to make war on each other, offering in the present case to leave the decision of this matter either to the Argives, who were their common allies, to the Amphictyonian council, or to the senate of Areopagus at Athens. The Spartans gave no answer to these deputies, and while things were in this situation, Antiochus died, and was succeeded in his dominions by his son Euphaes; to him the Lacedæmonians made no complaint, neither did they renounce their correspondence with the Messenians, yet were they all this time providing secretly for the war, and when all things were ready, engaged in it without giving the least notice. Before

^b PLUT. ubi supra. ^c PAUSAN. in Messen. STRAB. lib. vii, viii. JUSTIN. lib. iii, c. 5.

- a they proceeded to hostilities, the kings and senate called a general assembly, in which the troops appointed for the war took a solemn oath never to return home till they had entirely conquered Messenia, which shewed that this was a war of ambition rather than justice, and intended not to repair their own injuries, but to ravage the country of their neighbours ^b.

Alcarnenes king of Sparta, at the head of a complete army, entered the Messenian territory suddenly, and by night, in consequence of which he easily surprized the city of Amphea, the gates of which were opened as usual, the inhabitants not having the least suspicion of what afterwards happened. The Spartans behaved on this occasion very cruelly, they slew without distinction all who came in their way, nor

The Messenian war commences. Year after the flood 2256. Before Christ 743.

- b did even temples or altars afford a sanctuary to such as fled thither for protection. The conveniency of the city, which the Lacedæmonians knew would serve them as a proper magazine during the war, tempted them to this exploit, and in all probability engaged them to treat the people thus harshly, that they might make themselves absolutely masters of it, and its districts. Euphaes the Messenian king, on the first news of this extraordinary stroke, assembled his people, and having encouraged them to keep up their spirits, and not to believe that all was lost, because Amphea was in the hands of the Lacedæmonians; he likewise gave them his opinion of the war, and of the manner in which they might best carry it on; he observed to them that the Lacedæmonians were not only brave, but were also bred up to war, as to a trade, nay were indeed bred up to nothing else; whence he inferred that it was by no means prudent for them to engage in pitched battles with such an enemy. Wherefore his council was, that they should carry on a defensive war in the best manner they were able, till by degrees they acquired experience enough to fight the Spartans upon equal terms. The Messenians following his advice, maintained a defensive war for three years, in which they suffered the Spartans to obtain very few advantages over them. In the fourth year Euphaes ventured an engagement, but it was with great circumspection, for having intrenched his best troops, he drew out his horse and light-armed forces skirmishing with these; and when the Spartans drew nearer, and thought to have brought it to a general battle, he withdrew his army behind his entrenchments; and as the Spartans had no materials for filling up the ditch, which lay before his works, they were constrained to retire, and shortly after returned to their own country, where they met with a very indifferent reception, on account of the oath which they and their forces had taken, never to return till they had thoroughly reduced *Messenia*¹. A very short time after this both the kings died. As to Nicander we find little of him in ancient authors more than has been already mentioned; with respect to Alcarnenes, Plutarch hath preserved some passages of his life, which shew that he was a wise and gentle prince². Being once asked how a prince might best secure his government, he answered, By despising gain. When the Messenians sought by presents to have gained him to their interest, he refused them; and the reason of this being demanded, he readily answered; If I had taken them, the laws and I could never have agreed. He inherited, it seems, a great deal of wealth from his father, and increased it by his own management, living still in a plain parsimonious manner; for which being reproached, he said; Is it not a mark of virtue and good sense, when he who has abundance chuses to live, rather according to reason, than appetite? It is a misfortune to us, that we know not from whom the author beforementioned copied these sayings; and the reader, it is to be hoped, will excuse us, if, finding little to say of their deeds, we entertain him sometimes with the sayings of those Spartan kings.

- c Polydorus succeeded his father Alcarnenes in the kingdom, and Theopompus his father Nicander. With these princes the Spartans intrusted a new army, with express instructions not to act as their predecessors had done, but to put their country in possession of a prize which she had so long desired. The Messenians, under the command of Euphaes their prince, no longer fled from their enemies, as hitherto they had wont; but prepared to give them battle, as soon as a proper opportunity offered. It was not long before they had occasion to make trial of each other's valour; the Lacedæmonians then marched towards the enemy in battalia. Theopompus commanding the right wing, and Polydorus the left; the Messenians disposed their army so as best to Polydorus and Theopompus succeed in the Spartan kingdom.

¹ PAUSAN. & JUSTIN. ubi supra. Apophthegm. LACON.

² PAUSAN. in Messen. JUSTIN. lib. iii. c. 4.

PLUT. in oppose oppose the Spartans, Antander and their king Euphaes commanding their left, and Pytharatas their right; the engagement was very obstinate, the centre in both armies remaining firm; the right wing of the Spartan army was routed by Euphaes, as was the right wing of the Messenian army by Polydorus, Pytharatas their general being slain. These advantages however were so inconsiderable, that neither party durst pursue the other, and the next day a truce was agreed to, that both sides might have leisure to withdraw, and bury their dead; after which the Spartans, notwithstanding the instructions they had received, thought fit to return home, the conquest of Messenia appearing by this time a thing impracticable for the present. The reader will observe that we have ascribed this war to motives of interest, which at first sight may seem to clash with what the historians, whom we have mentioned, have said about it; but that the fact was so, putting all circumstances together, is indubitably true; nay Polydorus the Spartan king openly professed as much when he went to this war; for some of the Messenians having demanded of him, If he would fight against his brethren, alluding to their and the Lacedæmonians descent from the same parents, the king readily answered, No, but I will put in my claim to an estate, to which as yet no body has any good title. The great resistance the Messenians made on this second invasion, determined the Spartans not to carry on the war any longer in the same manner, but to content themselves with harassing and plundering the country, whereby the spirits of their own troops would be kept up, and the Messenians worn out, and destroyed; for in this lay the great advantage of the Spartans, that war was their business, in which if they were not engaged, they were idle, whereas the Messenians having their country affairs to mind, were beggared and destroyed by being thus obliged to keep many garisons, besides a standing body of troops in the field. To add to these misfortunes, which were already almost insupportable, a distemper raged in Messenia, which differed little from the plague, except that it did not sweep off such numbers. These misfortunes produced a long and serious consultation among the chief persons in the kingdom, who at length came to a resolution to abandon such villages and little towns as were least capable of defence, and to fortify a city which stood on the top of the mountain Ithome; to which the inhabitants of the demolished places might repair: from this they promised themselves two things; first, that they should be released from the expence of garisons; secondly, that in time of distress this might be made a place of certain safety.

The Argive or Thyrcan war.

THE Spartans were about this time called off from the Messenian war to engage with the Argives; the dispute was about the city Thyrea, and its district, which lying on the borders of Argolis and Laconia, had been an old bone of contention between those states. To avoid a great effusion of blood, it was by both parties agreed, that three hundred Argives, and as many Lacedæmonians, should decide the quarrel between the nations, the armies on both sides retiring. In consequence of this agreement, these six hundred men engaged, and fought with such obstinate resolution, that when night came on, there were but two Argives, viz. Alcinor and Chromius, and one Spartan, whose name was Otbryades, left alive. The Argives ran home to their city to carry the news of the victory. Otbryades remained in the field of battle, and erected a trophy; hence a new dispute commenced, both parties claiming the victory; the Argives, because two of their men were left; the Spartans, because the Argives fled, and left Otbryades in possession of the field of battle; this produced a new war, in which the Lacedæmonians were victors, a great battle having been fought between their army under the command of Polydorus, and that of the Argives, with a mighty slaughter of the latter. Some would have persuaded the Spartan king to have pursued this victory, and to have attacked Argos itself; but he answered with a generosity becoming his character, that the Spartans sent him to assert their rights, and not to rob others. Thus ended the Argive war, some circumstances of which are variously reported (C). Let us now return to the affairs of the Messenians after their fortifying Ithome.

THE

* PAUSAN. ubi supra. * PLUT. in Apophtheg. Lacon. * PAUSAN. ubi supra. * HEROD. lib. i. PAUSAN. in Argol. * SUIDAS in voce Οἰβρυάδης. PAUSAN. in Lacon. PLUT. in Apophtheg. Lacon.

(C) In the lesser treatise of parallels between the Greeks and Romans generally ascribed to Plutarch, "about the city and district of Thyrea, the Am- the abovementioned fact stands thus: "The Argives " phistions decreed that it should be decided by
" and Lacedæmonians being engaged in a dispute " combat. The Lacedæmonians chose for their cap"tain Otbryades; the Argives Ibersander; the battle being

- a THE desire of freeing themselves from this grievous war with Sparta, engaged them to send a person to consult the oracle at Delphi; the name of this man was Tifis, who in his return was attacked by some of the Lacedæmonian garison in Amphæa, from whom however he escaped, though grievously wounded; of which wounds, having first revealed the oracle to the king, he died; the purport of it was, that unless a virgin of the house of the Æpytide, that is, the royal family, was sacrificed to the gods, the war would end in the ruin of their nation; this oracle, when reported, struck the Messenians, and especially the royal family, with the utmost terror. Lots however were cast, and the daughter of Lyfiscus taken; but when she should have been sacrificed, Epebolus the soothsayer, declared that she was not Lyfiscus's daughter, but imposed upon him by his wife, who thereby sought to escape the imputation of barrenness. While the soothsayer was setting forth this matter to the people, Lyfiscus withdrew his daughter, and fled with her to Sparta. Upon this Aristodemus, one of the royal house, freely offered his daughter; a young man, who was present, alledged, that he was contracted to her, and that therefore her father had no right over her, which plea being over-ruled, he set up another, that he had consummated his marriage, and that she was actually with child by him; Aristodemus conceiving this to be a dishonour to his family, slew his daughter instantly with his own hand, after which opening her womb, he shewed it to the people. The soothsayer insisted that another should be sacrificed, the daughter of Aristodemus having rather died by the passion of her father, than as a victim; but all the family of the Æpytide joined with the king, who persuaded the people that the oracle was fulfilled by the death of Aristodemus's daughter. Public rejoicings therefore were made, and the Messenians concluded, that whenever the war should be renewed, they would be victors.

The measures taken in this space by the Messenians.

- Six years after the flight of Lyfiscus, and eight from the fortifying of Ithome, the Lacedæmonians entered Messenia again with a great army. The Messenians might undoubtedly have received great assistance from their neighbours, if they had carried on the war as they were wont, that is defensively; but they confiding in the oracle, were eager for an engagement, which suiting the Spartan method of making war, quickly fell out; this battle, like the former, though obstinately fought, was not decisive, the night parting them; Euphaes however venturing too far against Theopompus, the Spartan king, was mortally wounded, and fell down; this, far from checking the spirit of the Messenians, made them the more eager, insomuch that a warm contest began about carrying off the dying king, in which the Messenians prevailed though with the loss of Antander, one of their best captains; Euphaes being carried back to Ithome, expired in a few days, after a reign of thirteen years, which had been one continual scene of war and confusion. Euphaes leaving no issue behind him, the people claimed a right of electing out of the royal family, whereupon Cleonnis, Damis, and Aristodemus put in their claims; the people elected the last, notwithstanding the soothsayers alledging he was incapable on account of his having slain his daughter. This new monarch was no sooner seated on his throne, than he began to negotiate with the Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, in order to draw them to his assistance against the Lacedæmonians, wherein he was very successful, almost all the Peloponnesians beginning to be apprehensive of the mighty power and warlike genius of that nation. At the same time Aristodemus laboured with all his might to unite the minds of his countrymen, and to engage them to behave bravely in a war which so nearly concerned them, and on the event of which it depended whether for the future they should be freemen or slaves; with this view he showered his favours upon all, he raised his competitors to the chief dignities

The Spartans renew the war with the Messenians.

* PAUSAN. in Messen.

" over, there remained only two Argives, whose " names were Agenor and Cromius, who ran straight " to the city to carry the news of their victory.
" In the mean time while all was quiet, Othryades,
" who was not quite dead, rose from the ground,
" and having propped himself up with two pieces
" of broken lances, he drew together as many " shields as lay within his reach, and piling them up,

" wrote on the uppermost with his own blood these " words: To Jupiter the conqueror, guardian of " trophies. This creating a new dispute, which " was again brought before the Amphibylans, they " went to take a view of the place, and having " thoroughly examined all things, decreed in favour " of the Spartans. This is recorded by Chrysermus
" in the third book of his Peloponnesian history (18).

(18) Plutarch. in Paral. p. 606.

in the kingdom, he conferred honours on men of birth and fortune, and distributed a money amongst the people. Such was the beginning of Aristodemus's reign, who was an avowed and most dangerous enemy to the Spartans.*

The ephori created at Sparta.

ABOUT this time, as the best authors agree, a great change was made in the Spartan republic, which is ascribed to Theopompus, who seeing the necessity of leaving magistrates to execute the laws, when the kings were obliged to be in the field, appointed the ephori, who afterwards made so great a figure in the Spartan state^b. Some think that they were at first the king's friends, to whom they delegated authority, which is very probable; but they soon grew to have no dependence on the kings, but on the contrary made the kings dependent upon them. They were five in number, chosen by the people out of their own body, sometimes out of the very dregs of it; for whoever was a bold, factious, talking citizen, was most likely to be elected into this office; they were in fact a kind of tribunes of the people, and placed as checks on the senate and kings; they were annually elected, and in order to effect any thing, the unanimous voice of the college was requisite; as to their authority, it was in a manner boundless, they presided in popular assemblies, collected their suffrages; declared war, made peace, treated with foreign princes, determined the number of forces that should be raised, appointed the funds to maintain them, and distributed rewards and punishments in the name of the state; they likewise held a court of justice, enquired into the behaviour of all magistrates, inspected into the behaviour and education of youth, had a particular jurisdiction over the Helotes, and in short by c degrees drew the whole administration into their own hands. This Theopompus's queen is said to have conjectured on their first appointment, which made her reproach her husband with suffering the regal dignity to descend to his children mutilated, and in a worse condition than he received it from his ancestors. Theopompus answered her with great prudence, that, far from having lessened or injured the regal authority, he had strengthened and secured it, because the people being satisfied by this institution, would have less inclination to run into tumults and seditions, in which princes are never safe^c. One great privilege of the ephori was, that they did not rise up at the presence of the kings, as all other magistrates did^d; another, that from the first electing of these magistrates the year was denominated, as at Athen from the first of the archons^e; the third high mark of their authority was, that if the kings offended against the laws, or were guilty of any sort of excess, the ephori took cognizance thereof, and punished them^f. Some disputes there are as to the nature and extent of this office, which will be discussed in the notes, but it is now time to resume the thread of the history (D.)

THE

* PAUSAN. in Lacon. & Messen. * ARIST. Polit. lib. v. c. 11. Plut. in vit. Cleom. VALER. M. lib. iv. * ARIST. Polit. ii. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. PLAT. de legib. lib. iii. POLYB. lib. iv. * XENOPH. de Repub. Lacedæm. * PAUSAN. Lacon. * PLUT. Instit. Lacedæm.

(D) We have in the text placed the institution of the ephori under the reign of Theopompus, though it must be owned, that not only Herodotus in his history (19), but Xenophon also, treating expressly of the republic of Lacedæmon, ascribes the feeding the ephori to Lycargus (20). It is fit therefore that we give our reasons why we have rejected these authorities, which certainly would be admitted in any other case, and have placed the ephori a hundred and thirty years lower than Lycargus. First then, we think that the nature of this office very little agrees with that legislator's scheme of government, since he seems to have sought, as far as in him lay, to support the authority of the kings and nobility; otherwise, why did he institute the senate? or why did he leave to the people in their general assembly nothing more than a negative voice? We do admit that these arguments would be of no weight at all against such authorities as Herodotus and Xenophon, if there had not been writers of no less character on the other side. For, secondly, Aristotle is express in placing their institution lower (21); Plutarch in his life of Cleomenes introduces that prince, assigning them the same institution which we have done; besides Theopompus's answer to his queen is recorded by authors of the best credit (22). So that on the whole, it is by far more probable, that this office began under the reigns of Theopompus, and his colleague, rather than under that of Charilaus. Undoubtedly their power grew by very slow degrees, and that at their first institution they were far from having that authority, which in after-times they exercised with so high a hand. Some have imagined that they were at first appointed by the kings at their pleasure, but that afterwards the people got the power of electing them into their hands; nay, those who have this notion have assigned the time, viz. in the fifty-fifth olympiad, when Cleib was the first of the ephori, that is the Ephymus, or him from whom the year took its name; but as there is no authority of any ancient author offered in support of this notion, and as it is founded only on the supposed sense of a passage in Diogenes Laertius, it is sufficient that we have mentioned it, nor are we bound (19) Herod. lib. i. (20) Xenophon. de Repub. Lacedæm. (21) Arist. Polit. lib. v. (22) Arist. ubi supra. Plutarch. in vit. Lycarg. Valer. Max. lib. iv.

- a THE administration of affairs at home being thus provided for, the Spartan kings renewed the Messenian war, and having engaged the Corinthians to lend them some assistance, they marched with a great army towards Libome. Aristodemus, like a great captain, disposed his own forces, and those of his confederates, in the best manner possible; himself and Cleonis commanded the heavy armed forces, those who were light armed being committed to the care of Damis; the Argives and Sicyonians he opposed to the Corinthians, and the choicest of the Arcadian troops, with the flower of the Messenian infantry, he ranged against the Lacedæmonians; the light-armed soldiers were posted behind the hill, and all things thus disposed, the battle began with great vigour on both sides; the Lacedæmonians, though hard pressed, stood firmly in their posts, and the Corinthians behaved very bravely for a long time; but when on a signal given, the light-armed forces commanded by Damis took them in flank, and by a shower of missile weapons, destroyed a great many men; they were at last constrained to betake themselves to flight, with very considerable loss, though the number be not ascertained. The Spartans were exceedingly afflicted at this miscarriage, and the Corinthians were sadly distressed, for they knew not which way to retreat, having on every side an enemy's country to pass through before they could reach home^b. The Lacedæmonians continued the war, and sent deputies to consult the oracle at Delpi on its event; the Messenians did so too, to the former the oracle answered to this purpose, By fraud (i. e. of Cresphontes) Messenia was obtained, and by fraud it must be subdued. To the latter the oracle also gave an answer, but so perplexed and obscure, that no body either could explain it, or pretended to explain it; the Spartans, in pursuance of their response, contrived many stratagems, and at last fixed upon this; they pretended to condemn a hundred men for treason, secretly instructing them to fly to Libome as suppliants, from whence they might easily give their fellow-citizens notice of all the enemies councils; in this they followed the example of Ulysses, but not with the like success, for Aristodemus immediately penetrating the fraud, obliged the pretended deserters to return home, and directed them to tell the Spartans, that though their injustice was new, yet their trick was stale^c. Some time after they began to be extremely alarmed by ill omens at Libome, Aristodemus himself had ill-boding dreams, wherein his daughter appeared to him, and upbraided him with her death. They had recourse to the old remedy, sending deputies to Delpi, and these deputies brought them advice, that whoever first dedicated a hundred tripods in the temple of Jupiter at Libome, should remain masters of the place. This raised the spirits of the Messenians again, who having no money to make the tripods of brass, immediately fell to cutting them out in wood. The oracle being sent from Delpi to Sparta, one Oebalus, a crafty workman, made a hundred little tripods in clay, and disguising himself like a fowler, got into Libome, and having placed them in the temple of Jupiter, escaped. The Messenians at this were again struck with despair, especially when they found the city invested by a great army from Sparta; Aristodemus encouraged them awhile, but perceiving all things go ill, and that the city in spite of all his care would at last fall into the hands of the enemy, he fell himself into a deep melancholy, and going one night to the tomb of his daughter, there laid violent hands on himself^d. On his demise the Messenians did not elect any other king, but chose Damis their chief by the title of general only. He did for them bound to refute it. It is true, that Cleomenes in his speech recorded by Plutarch, alleges the same thing, that they were originally appointed by the kings, though he does not assign the time when their election was vested in the people; which yet it would have been natural for him to have done, if that time had been exactly known; the truth seems to be, that the election was always in the people, but that king Theopompus first devised this expedient of creating ephori for the preservation of the public peace; nor are we to regard what Cleomenes says, as the opinion of Plutarch, or as an authority indubitable in all its circumstances: for he delivered this discourse to the people after he had taken away the ephori, and therefore it is to be presumed he would say any thing which might serve to colour his designs; but we find it elsewhere recorded by the same author, that the ephori gave this account of the institution of this office, that they were intended to be arbitrators between the kings, when their disputes were likely to prove fatal to the state (23). We shall hereafter have occasion frequently to mention the conduct of these magistrates, and the methods they took to enlarge their authority; at present we have done all that was necessary in producing the reasons which have engaged us to believe, that the ephori were set up under the reign of Theopompus, but were always elected by the people.

^b PAUSAN. Messen.^c PAUSAN. Lacon.^d PAUSAN. Messen. & Lacon.

(23) Plut. in vit. Agid.

all that man could do; but all proving ineffectual, such of the Messenians as had any hopes of a good reception, fled into the adjacent countries; the rest, together with the city of Ibome, were constrained to submit themselves to the Spartans, who treated them with great rigour. Polyænus indeed tells us, that Ibome was taken by the following stratagem: Theopompus with part of the army pretended to desert his colleague, actually removing from the camp, and pitching behind the city; the Messenians greedily laid hold of this opportunity of falling on Polydorus, with whom they were no sooner thoroughly engaged, than Theopompus with his forces attacked the city, and took it by storm^a. However this matter happened, Ibome was certainly raised by the Lacedæmonians, and the Messenians who remained in their own country, were tied to these conditions; first, that they should cultivate their lands with all diligence, and render half their fruits to the Spartans; and secondly, when any of the nobles of Sparta, or either of the kings died, they and their wives were to attend at the funeral procession in their weeds, on pain of suffering the highest penalties, if they neglected. Besides the Spartans gave away a part of their territories which bordered on the sea to the Asinei, and another part to the descendants of Androcles^f; this was the end of the famous Messenian war, which makes such a figure in the Greek historians; that is to say at this time; for we shall see it break out again hereafter, and create new troubles to the Spartans.

*Sparta loses
both her kings after the Messenian war.*

SOME time after this war was over the Spartans lost both their kings, whose characters therefore we shall take this opportunity of giving our readers, with all the certainty and impartiality we may. Theopompus was a wise and gentle prince; as in a great measure appears from an answer he made to the following question; By what means a monarch might live with the greatest safety? Let him (answered the king) permit his friends to advise him freely, and be himself always ready to punish the wicked strictly, and with a good will^g. He lost his son Archidamus a little before the Argive war, which was the reason that the conduct thereof was committed to his colleague. It is very probable, that there were great stirrings in Sparta during their reigns, for besides establishing the ephori, these kings had recourse to the contrivance beforementioned, of substituting a new clause in the Rhetra concerning laws, whereby they restrained the power of the people^h. The Pilicians having received great favours from this prince, were inclined to pay him excessive honours, which he declined by this short message; Moderate honours time increases, but takes the immoderate away. He died in peace, a natural death, after a long and glorious reignⁱ. Polydorus was a prince of the most amiable qualities, brave in war, prudent in peace, mild and just in both; he was prodigiously beloved by his people, yet in the end died a violent death; for one Polemarchus, a Spartan of a considerable family, and who was himself eminent in the state, killed him, for what reason is unknown^k. The Lacedæmonians, as a grateful testimony of their just sense of his merit, honoured his memory with a statue, and, which surpassed the usual measure of their favours, ordered his effigies to be engraven on the seal which their public magistrates were to make use of for the future, as if they were desirous of placing the example of this excellent prince continually before their eyes; a noble instance surely of their gratitude, and his virtues^l.

*Eurycrates and Zeuxidamus.
Year after the first 2209.
Before Christ
707.*

Eurycrates succeeded his father Polydorus, and Zeuxidamus the son of Archidamus his grandfather Theopompus: these princes reigned with great tranquillity, there happening no foreign war in their time, neither the Messenians nor the Argives having yet recovered spirit enough to begin any new disturbances; at home however a conspiracy was discovered, which might have been very prejudicial to the state. The accounts we have of it are various from various authors, but to us it seems reasonable, that the relation of Epchorus the historian should be preferred^m. The Spartans, when they were engaged in the Messenian war, having been ten years absent from the city, because of the oath they had made, not to return till they had entirely subdued that country; the women sent to them to put them in mind, that while they were so careful to subdue their enemies, they neglected the city; upon which they decreed, that such young men amongst them as came out of Sparta under age, and so were not obliged by the oath, should return, and associating themselves promiscuously

^a Strateg. lib. i. c. 15. ^f PAUSAN. LACON. ^g PLUT. Apophth. LACON. & INF. LACON. ^h PLUT. in vit. LYCURG. ⁱ PAUSAN. LACON. ^k Idem, Ibid. ^l PAUSAN. in LACON. HERODOT. hist. lib. vii. PLUT. in Apophthegm. ^m Apud STRABON. Geogr. lib. vi. JUSTIN. lib. iii. c. 5.

- ^a with the unmarried women, preserve the city from falling to decay. This project being carried into execution, such as were born of these young women were styled Partheniæ, i. e. sons of virgins. When the Lacedæmonians returned, after the reduction of Messenia, they visibly neglected these young men, who at the same time found themselves under great difficulties, having neither parents to apply to nor inheritance to expect; they therefore began to intrigue with the Helotes, who were as unhappy as they could be, determining to fall upon the citizens at a general assembly, and to open to themselves a path to riches and honours, with their swords. They went so far as to appoint the signal for the attack, which was to be the throwing up of a cap; but some of the Helotes dreading the consequences, discovered the whole matter, and when the time was come for the assembly, in which the conspiracy was to be executed, the cryer by command of the ephori made proclamation, that no man should throw up his cap, whereby the Partheniæ understood that their design was discovered; the Lacedæmonians did not however treat them harshly, but weighing the hardships they were under, and considering at the same time their numbers, and their intrigues with the Helotes, they wisely agreed to pass the matter by, and by public decree permitted Pbalantus, who had been the ring-leader in this business, to sail with them over into Italy, where they settled themselves in Tarentum^a. Such was the issue of a very dangerous business, and which fully proves the shallowness of human policy, which in this case was driven to undo what it had before brought to pass, and which when it was brought to pass, no doubt was interpreted as an extraordinary stroke of wisdom. Farther particulars of these kings we have none except a few sayings of Zeuxidamus, which are of no great importance^b.

- Anaxander* succeeded his father Euricrates, as Anaxidamus did his father Zeuxidamus; in their reign the second Messenian war began, for these poor people having for a long time born the cruel treatment of their insulting lords, became at last unable to sustain it longer. Aristomenes the son of Nicomedes of Andania, descended of the royal blood, was the chief promoter of this revolt; he was bold, enterprizing, intrepid, a man of strong judgment, strict honour, and enthusiastically fond of liberty, and his country. He perceived that the Argives and Arcadians were friends only by force to the Spartans, wanting and wishing an opportunity to revenge the many injuries which had been done them by this haughty nation. To these Aristomenes applied, and receiving an answer more conformable to his wishes than his expectation, he engaged his countrymen unanimously to take up arms thirty-nine years after the taking of Ithome, as Pausanias relates, though Justin and Eusebius allow an interval of eighty years between the first and second Messenian war^c, which is far from being probable, though, as we shall hereafter shew, this variance is not altogether unaccountable. About a year after the revolt began, and before either party had received any auxiliaries, the Spartans and Messenians met at a village called Dere, where an obstinate engagement ensued; Aristomenes behaved himself so well therein, that he brought victory to his side, and was conceived to have performed more than mortal achievements; in gratitude therefore, respect being also had to his descent from Epytus, his countrymen unanimously saluted him king, which title he modestly waved, alledging that he took up arms to set them free, and not to make himself great: He consented however to accept the title of general, with a power of doing whatsoever he thought requisite for the service of the public. Knowing well the superstition of the age in which he lived, he resolved to intimidate the Spartans, by shewing them what he was sure they would take for an ill omen. Disguising himself therefore, he went privately to the city, where in the night he hung up a shield on the wall of the temple of Minerva, with this inscription; Aristomenes dedicates this of the spoils of the Spartans to the goddess. It was easily perceived, that this war would be both long and bloody; the Lacedæmonians therefore sent deputies to Delphi to inquire of the oracle concerning its event; the answer they brought was, That it behoved the Spartans to seek a leader from Athens. The Athenians, naturally envious of the Spartans, granted their request indeed, but in such a manner as manifested their spite, for they sent them for a general Tyrteus a school-master and poet, lame of one foot, and who was suspected to be a little out of his wits. But here their skill failed them, for this captain, notwithstanding his despicable appearance, proved of mighty consequence to Sparta, teaching them how to use good fortune, and how to bear up under ill ^a. In the mean time Aristomenes had drawn together a mighty army, the Eleans, Argives, Sicyonians, and Arcadians, having sent troops to his assistance, the Spartans in this as in the former war having no ally but Corinth. The Spartan kings, according to the custom of their city, no sooner took the field, than, notwithstanding their inferiority in number, they offered the enemy battle, which Aristomenes readily accepted; it was long, obstinate and bloody, but in the end the Messenians were victorious, and the Lacedæmonians put to flight with a great slaughter; Aristomenes, pursued them notwithstanding Theocles the soothsayer called him back, perceiving Castor and Pollux in a tree, by which there was a necessity of passing in the pursuit, which he continuing notwithstanding, when he came to that tree, lost his shield, which gave the Lacedæmonians an opportunity of withdrawing without further loss. It is scarce to be conceived how much the Spartans were struck with this defeat; they grew weary of the war, dissatisfied with their kings, diffident of their own power, and, in a word, sunk into a state of general uneasiness, and want of spirit. It was now that the Athenian general convinced them that he was capable of fulfilling all the promises of the oracle; he encouraged them by his poems, he directed them by his counsels, and recruited their broken armies with chosen men from among the Helotes; he shewed them the folly of diffidence, and roused them to the practice of those virtues for which Sparta had been famous. Aristomenes, on the other hand, acted with no less prudence and vigour, he thought it not enough to restore the reputation of the Messenians, if he did not also restore their wealth and power; he therefore taught them to act offensively against their enemies, and entering the territories of Sparta, he took and plundered Pbaræ, a considerable borough in Laconia, putting all such as made any resistance to the sword, carrying off at the same time an immense booty; this however was an injury which the Spartans could not brook with patience, they therefore sent immediately a body of forces to overtake the Messenians, which accordingly they did, but little to their profit; for Aristomenes routed these pursuers, and continued to make a mighty slaughter of them, till such time as he was disabled by having a spear thrust through his thigh, which occasioned his being carried out of the battle ^b; his cure, which took up some time, being finished, he resolved to carry the war to the very gates of Sparta, and to that purpose raised a very great army; but whether he found his design impracticable, or was really diverted by some dream, he gave out, that Castor and Pollux with their sister Helena had appeared to him, and commanded him to desist ^c. A short time after this retreat, going with a small party to make an incursion, and attempting to take prisoners some women, who were celebrating religious rites near Egila, a village in Laconia, those zealous matrons fell upon him and his soldiers with such fury, that they put them to flight, and took him prisoner; however he soon afterwards made his escape, and rejoined his forces ^d. In the third year of the war the Spartans with a great force entered Messenia, whither Aristocrates king of Arcadia was come with a great body of troops to the assistance of his allies; Aristomenes therefore made no difficulty of fighting when the Spartans approached, but they entering privately into a negotiation with Aristocrates, engaged him with bribes and promises to betray his confederates. When therefore the battle began, the deceitful Arcadian represented to the forces under his command the mighty danger they were in, and the great difficulty there would be of retreating into their own country, in case the battle should be lost; he then pretended that the sacrifices were ominous, and having terrified his Arcadians into that disposition of mind fittest to serve his purpose, he not only drew them off from both wings, but in his flight forced through the Messenian ranks, and put them too in confusion. Aristomenes and his troops however drew themselves into close order, that they might defend themselves the best they could, and indeed they had need of all their valour and skill, for the Lacedæmonians, who expected this event, immediately attacked and surrounded them on all sides. Fortune was on this occasion too powerful either for the courage or the conduct of the Messenians, so that notwithstanding their utmost efforts, most of their army were cut to pieces, and amongst them the chief of their nobility, Aristomenes with the poor remains of his shattered forces, retired as well as he could, and perceiving that it was now impossible to maintain the war against the Lacedæmonians upon equal

^a STRABO ubi supra. HERACL. de Polit. EUSEB. in Chron. Can. ^b PAUSAN. in Lacon. PLUT. in Apophthegm. Lacon. ^c PAUSAN. in Messen. JUSTIN. lib. iii. EUSEB. in Chron. Can.

^a STRAB. Geogr. lib. viii.^b PAUSAN. Messen. POLYÆN. Strateg. lib. ii. c. 31.^c Id. ibid.

- a equal terms, he exhorted his countrymen to fortify mount Era, and to make the best dispositions possible for a long defence, he likewise placed garisons in Pylus and Metbone on the sea-coasts, and to these three places he gathered all the inhabitants, leaving the rest of Messenia to the mercy of the Spartans. They, on the other hand, looked on the war as now in a manner finished, for which reason they divided the lands amongst their citizens, and caused them to be carefully cultivated, while they besieged Era; but Aristomenes quickly convinced them that the war was far from being over. He chose out of all the Messenians three hundred men, with whom he ravaged all the adjacent country, carried off prodigious booty, and when Messenia would no longer supply the wants of his garison, he penetrated into Laconia, and bore away corn, wine, cattle, and whatever else was necessary to the subsistence of his countrymen shut up in Era; so that at last the Spartans were constrained to issue a proclamation, forbidding the cultivation, not only of the Messenian territory in their hands, but also of Laconia in its vicinity, whereby they distressed themselves more than their enemies, inducing at last a famine in Sparta itself, which brought with it its usual attendant sedition. Here again all things had gone wrong, if the wisdom of the poet Tyrtæus had not supported the Spartan courage, nor was it without much difficulty that he influenced them to continue the blockade of Era, and to maintain a flying camp for the security of the country¹.

- Aristomenes*, in spite of all these precautions, committed terrible depredations b with his small corps of three hundred men. Amongst other places which he plundered, the city of Amyle was one, from whence he carried not only a great quantity of riches, but also many carriages laden with provisions. The Kings of Sparta lying with their troops in its neighbourhood, as soon as they heard of this expedition, marched after Aristomenes with the utmost diligence, and as the Messenians were incumbered with their booty, they came up with them before he could reach Era. In this situation of things, Aristomenes, prompted rather by despair than prudence, disposed his troops in order of battle, and notwithstanding they were so few, made a long and vigorous resistance against the whole Lacedæmonian army. At length, however, numbers prevailed, the greatest part of the Messenians were d slain on the spot, and Aristomenes with about fifty of his men, who survived the slaughter, were taken prisoners, that chieftain having received so many wounds, that he was senseless when they carried him away. The Lacedæmonians expressed the loudest joy at the sight of this illustrious captive, who for so many years by his single abilities had enabled his exhausted country to defend itself against the whole force of Sparta. When he was recovered of his wounds, they decreed him and all his fellow prisoners to be thrown together into a deep cavern, which was the common punishment of the lowest kind of offenders. This judgment was executed with its utmost severity, excepting that Aristomenes had leave to put on his armour. Three days he continued in this dismal place, lying upon and covered over with e dead bodies; the third day he was almost famished through want of food, and almost poisoned with the stench of corrupted carcases, when he heard a fox gnawing a body near him; upon this he uncovered his face, and perceiving the fox just by him, he with one hand seized its hind leg, and with the other defended his face by catching hold of the fox's jaw when he attempted to bite him. Following as well as he could his straggling guide, the fox at last thrust his head into a little hole, and Aristomenes then letting go his leg, he soon forced his way through, and opened a passage to the welcome rays of light, from which the noble Messenian had been so long debarred. Feeble as he was, Aristomenes wrought himself an outlet, with his nails, and travelling by night with all the expedition he could, f at length arrived safe at Era, to the great joy and amazement of his countrymen. When this news was first blazed abroad, the Spartans would have had it pass for a fiction, but Aristomenes soon put the truth of it out of doubt, by falling upon the posts of the Corinthians, who, as the allies of the Spartans, had a considerable body of troops before Era. Most of their officers, with a multitude of private men he slew, pillaged their camp, and in short did so much mischief, that the Spartans, under a pretence of an approaching festival, agreed to a cessation of arms for forty days, that they might have time to bury their dead. On this occasion Aristomenes for the second time celebrated the Hecatombonia, or the sacrifice appointed for those who had killed a hundred of the enemy with their own hands ; he had performed a the same before and after his second battle, when he lost his shield ; and he lived to do it a third time, which must appear wonderful to the reader, when he is informed that notwithstanding this truce, certain Cretan archers in the service of the Spartans, seized Aristomenes as he was walking without the walls, and carried him away prisoner *. There were nine of them in all, two immediately ran away with the news to Sparta, and seven remained to guard their prize, whom they bound, and conducted to a lone cottage, inhabited only by a widow and her daughter. It so fell out that the young woman dreamt the night before that she saw a lion without claws, bound and dragged along by wolves, and that she having loosed his bonds and given him claws, he immediately tore the wolves to pieces. As soon as Aristomenes came into the cottage, b and her mother, who knew him, had told the daughter who he was, she instantly concluded that her dream was fulfilled, and therefore plied the Cretans with drink, and when they were asleep took a poinard from one of them, cut the thongs with which Aristomenes was bound, and then put it into his hands ; he presently verified her vision by putting all his guards to death, and then carried her and her mother to Era, where, as a reward for her service, he married the young woman to his son Gorgus, then about eighteen years of age. When Era had held out near eleven years, it fell into the hands of Sparta by an accident ; the servant of one Empiramus, a Spartan commander, driving his master's cattle to drink at the river Neda, met frequently with the wife of a Messenian, whom he engaged in an amour ; this woman gave him notice that c her husband's house was without the wall, so that he could come to it without danger when the good man was abroad, and she likewise gave him intelligence when her husband was upon duty in the garison. The Spartan failed not to come at the time appointed, but they had not been long in bed before the husband returned, which put the house into great confusion ; the woman however secured her gallant, and then let in the good man, whom she received with the perfidious flattery peculiar to her sex, inquiring again and again by what excess of good fortune she was blessed with his return ; the innocent Messenian told her, that Aristomenes being detained in his bed by a wound, and the soldiers knowing that he could not walk the rounds, d had a grant to retire to their houses, to avoid the bitter inclemency of the season. The Spartan no sooner heard this than he crept softly out of doors and ran post-haste to carry the news to his master ; it so fell out that the kings were at this time absent from the camp, and Empiramus had the chief command of the army ; as soon as he received this information, he ordered his army to begin its march, though it rained excessively, and there was no moon-light ; the fellow guided them to the ford, and managed matters so well, that they seized all the Messenian posts ; yet after all they were afraid to engage, darkness, a high wind, heavy rain, together with the dread of Aristomenes, kept them quiet on the places they had seized. As soon e as it was light the attack began, and Era had been quickly taken, if only the men had defended it ; but the women fought with such fury, and by their mingling in the fray, brought such an accession of numbers, as made the business doubtful ; three days and two nights this desperate engagement lasted ; at last all hopes of preserving the city being lost, Aristomenes drew off his wearied troops. Early the fourth morning he disposed the women and children in the centre, the Messenian youth in the front and rear, the less able men in the main body, himself commanded the van ; the rear guard was brought up by Gorgus and Mantichus, the former the son of Aristomenes, the latter of Theocles, a Messenian of great merit, who had fallen with much glory in this attack, fighting valiantly in the cause of his country. When all things were ready, Aristomenes caused the last barrier to be thrown open, and f brandishing his spear, marched directly towards the Spartan troops in order to force a passage. Empiramus perceiving his intent, ordered his men to open to the right and left, and fairly give them a passage, so that Aristomenes marched off in triumph as it were to Arcadia. It should seem that writing, as we do, the history of the Lacedæmonians, we should here have done with the Messenian captain, the war being now at an end ; but it falls out otherwise, there is no keeping to the story of Sparta without following this man to his last hour *.

The Messenian war continued with the utmost vigour.

¹ PAUSAN. in Messen.

* PAUSAN. in Messen. POLYÆN. Strateg. lib. ii. c. 31. sect. 2. STEPHAN. in voce Audania.

* PAUSAN. in Messen. JUSTIN. lib. iii. c. 5.

- ^a THE Arcadians, when they heard that Era was taken, were very desirous of succouring their old confederates in this their deep distress: they therefore intreated their king Aristocrates to lead them into Messenia; but he, corrupted by the Lacedæmonians, persuaded them that it was too late, that the Messenians were all cut off, and that such a step would only expose them to the fury of the conquerors; when the thing appeared to be otherwise, and it was known that Aristomenes was on the frontiers of Arcadia, they went in crouds to carry him provisions, and to testify their readiness to afford him and those under his command all the assistance in their power. Aristomenes desired to be heard before a general assembly, which being accordingly convoked, he there opened one of the boldest and best-laid schemes recorded in history; he said that he had yet five hundred undaunted soldiers, who at his command would undertake any thing; that it was very probable most of the Spartans were employed in pillaging Era; and that therefore he was determined to march and surprize Sparta, which appeared so feasible, that all the assembly loudly commended his great capacity, and unshaken courage; Aristocrates however took care to betray him, having by various pretences retarded the execution of the project. The Arcadians, who began to suspect him, waited for and surprized his messengers as they came back; they took the letters from them, and read them openly in the assembly; the purport of them was, that they acknowledged his great kindness both now and in the battle, and promised that the Lacedæmonians would be grateful; as soon as the letters were read, the Arcadians fell to stoning their king, frequently calling upon the Messenians to assist them, which however they did not, waiting for Aristomenes's orders, who, far from triumphing in this spectacle, stood still with his eyes fixed on the ground, which he wet with his tears, his soul pierced with sorrow to see a crowned-head so shamefully and so deservedly put to death. The Arcadians afterwards erected a monument over him, with an inscription to perpetuate his infamy. As for the Messenians under the command of Gorgus and Mantichus, they passed over into Sicily, where they founded the city of Messene, one of the most famous in the island. Aristomenes remained however in Greece where he married all his daughters, except the youngest, to persons of great rank. A prince of Rhodes inquiring of the oracle at Delphi whom he should espouse, that his subjects might be happy under his posterity, was directed to marry the daughter of the most worthy of the Greeks, which answer was immediately understood to point at the virgin daughter of Aristomenes; her therefore he demanded and received, Aristomenes accompanying him back to his dominions, where he formed a scheme of uniting the Lydians and Medes against the Spartans, resolving with this view to go himself to Media, and to the court of Sardis; but while he meditated these great things, death surprized him, and thereby freed Lacedæmon from the most inveterate enemy she ever had. His son-in-law honoured his memory with a most magnificent tomb, and as for his fame, all historians have shewn the utmost regard in conserving it (E.)
- ^c VOL. II. N° 8. Messenia

7 I PAUSAN. in Messen. POLYB. lib. iv. p. 301.

(E) The history of Aristomenes, as we have related it from the best authorities among the Greeks, though it contains a great many wonderful circumstances, hath not in it however any thing absurd or incredible; but it is not to be wondered, that such as prefer the marvellous to consistent history have laid hold of this great man's character to give colour to some of their strange stories. Pliny has one concerning him, which may perhaps vie with any legend ancient or modern; he says, that when he was a third time taken, they were resolved to see wherein he differed from other men; for they could not conceive that after so many accidents had befallen him, he could possibly keep up his spirits by the ordinary supplies of nature; they therefore cut open his bosom, and thereby discovered, as they conceived, the cause of this extraordinary courage; and what should this be, but that his heart was hairy, a mighty probable cause truly (20)! In the beginning of the last Messenian war, or rather when Era was first besieged, persons were sent to consult the oracle at Delphi concerning the event; the answer was very disagreeable, being to this purpose:

Thy fate Messene, now is near at hand;
Nor can I longer the decree withstand,
Than till the he-goat from its banks shall try
To taste of Neda's streams which swiftly fly.

In the Greek the word translated he-goat is Tragos, and from hence it came to pass that the Messenians were scrupulously careful that no he-goat should come near the river; but when the fate of Era really approached, it appeared that the oracle had been quite misunderstood; for Theocles the sooth-sayer observing certain wild fig-trees which grew by the river's side, no longer shoot their leaves upwards as they were wont to do, but bending them down towards the river, recoiled that though the other Greeks called this tree Olymbos, yet the Messenians called it Tragos; he therefore gave notice of this to Aristomenes, and told him plainly, that he apprehended

(20) Plin. hist. natur. lib. xi. c. 37. Stephen. Byzan. in voce Ἀδανία.

Messenia divided by the Lacedæmonians.

Messenia once more reduced, the Spartans treated the remaining inhabitants with a severity that became proverbial, making them all slaves, and dividing the whole country, excepting the district of Mesbome, which they gave to the Argives among their own citizens; whereby they became much more formidable than hitherto they had been, and began already to affect the sovereignty of Greece. We find nothing farther which deserves notice recorded of either of the Lacedæmonian kings, unless it be a saying of Anaxander; of whom it being demanded, Why the Lacedæmonians kept no money in their exchequer, he answered, That the keepers thereof might not be tempted to be thieves.*

The reigns of Eurycrates and Archidamus.

Eurycrates succeeded his father Anaxander, as Archidamus did his father Anaxidamus; of their reigns we know nothing more than that they passed them in peace and quietness; for though various authors have recorded the names of these princes, remembrance of their actions we find none^a, unless it be the following wise saying of Eurycrates, whom Plutarch calls Eucratides; who, when it was asked him, Why the ephori sat every day to determine causes about contracts, answered, That we may learn to keep our words even with enemies^b. Archidamus was also called Agasicles, which is the reason that Herodotus, making use of the Ionic dialect, writes his name Hagisicles.

The reigns of Leo and Aristo

Eurycrates was succeeded by his son Leo, and Archidamus by his son Aristo, princes concerning whom historians are not so silent. Leo was a man of great capacity, and very solicitous for the strict execution of justice; for it being demanded of him, Under what government a man might live safest, he answered immediately, Where the inhabitants are neither wealthy nor poor, where integrity is sure to meet with many friends, and fraud with none. At the olympic games, when every body commended the victors, How much better, said he, would it have been, if these men had laid out the pains they have taken to be swift in learning to be honest! Aristo his colleague is remarkable in history for some extraordinary things which fell out in his family; he had two wives, but was so unfortunate as to have children by neither of them, which put him upon taking a third, though the wife of his friend Agetus, the most beautiful woman in Sparta. In order to obtain her, he contrived this scheme: He took his friend Agetus one day in a gay humour, and having first sworn to give him whatever precious thing he chose belonging to himself, drew from him a like oath; and when Agetus had chosen, the king in consequence of that oath demanded his wife. Agetus protested that he did not comprehend his wife to be included in the promise that had passed between them; but Aristo insisted that an oath was to be understood in the sense he who received it took it; Agetus submitted, and the king accordingly took his wife. About seven months after he had taken her, as he sat with the ephori hearing causes, a servant came in great haste to tell him that the queen was brought to bed; upon which, telling the months upon his fingers, he dropped some expressions, as if he doubted whether the child was his; however he owned the boy, and called him Damaratus^c. During the reigns of Leo and Aristo the Lacedæmonians were engaged in a war with the Tegeatae, wherein they were successful, as it should seem from Pausanias's account of the matter, though Herodotus tells it otherwise^e.

Anaxandrides succeeds his father Leo.

Anaxandrides succeeded his father Leo during the life-time of his colleague Aristo; in this time the body of Orestes, or rather his bones, were recovered and removed. He is reported also to have had two wives, which was a singular thing in Sparta, for whom he built separate houses; the reason of it was, that the ephori commanded him to divorce his first wife, because she bore him no children; but he not being able bended the oracle was fulfilled thereby; whereupon Aristomenes took a certain sacred depositum, which Lycus the son of Pandion had foretold should be preserved till the Messenians were totally destroyed; this he interred in the most private part of the mountain Libome, in doing which he hazarded his life by venturing without the walls of Ere (21). There is nothing farther which deserves to be added to this note, unless it be the explanation we promised of the different dates assigned to the last Messenian war, which is however purely conjectural. It is this, that Eusebius did not say that the second Messenian war began eighty years after the first, but that it ended at that time; which is true, if we compute from the first disturbances on account of the death of Teledorus (22).

* PLUT. in Apophtheg. Lacon. PAUSAN. in Lacon. * HERODOT. lib. i. PAUSAN. ubi supra. * PLUT. Apophtheg. Lacon. & in Apophth. Reg. * PLUT. Apophth. Lacon. * PAUSAN. in Lacon. HERODOT. lib. vi. PLUT. ubi supra. * lib. i.

(21) Pausan. in Messen. (22) Justin. lib. iii. c. 4. Euseb. Chron. Canon.

a to bring himself up to this, contented himself with taking another wife, by whom he might have children; by her, not long after his marriage, he had Cleomenes; his first wife then also conceived and brought him a child, who was called Dorieus; the ephori pretending to make some scruple whether this was really her child or no, the business was quickly after effectually cleared up by her bearing Leonidas and *Cleombrotus*¹. This king Anaxandrides was certainly a very wise man, and had very just notions of government, as, amongst others of his sayings recorded by Plutarch, appears from this: That it being demanded of him, Why the Spartans were so cautious in passing capital judgments, and why, notwithstanding his acquittal, they still demanded a recognizance of a person accused; he answered, *Because in capital cases execution can never be recalled; and in the other case they kept that recognizance, that if it so fell out, that the guilt of the person acquitted should afterwards appear, he might be liable to a juster judgment*². Aristo was also a prince of great worth and probity, and in consequence thereof mightily beloved by his people. In the reigns of these princes, Cæsus king of Lydia was vanquished, taken prisoner, and an end put to his kingdom by Cyrus; he was during his prosperity a great lover of the Greeks, and particularly of the Lacedæmonians, with whom he had frequent intercourse, and with whom he endeavoured to make a league in obedience to the command of the oracle, which directed him to ally himself to the chief among the Greeks, which he immediately understood of the *Spartans*³.

c Anaxandrides was succeeded by his son Cleomenes, as Aristo was by his son Damaratus. It was strict regard to hereditary right which induced the Lacedæmonians to place Cleomenes on the throne, for he was known to be at certain times out of his senses, and when he had them, he was cunning, ambitious, and deceitful out of measure; whereas his brother Dorieus was remarkable for his prudence, the gentleness of his temper, and his skill in the art of war; he was so much disgusted however at his brother's being preferred before him, that he demanded leave to lead out a colony, whereby he obtained an honourable excuse for quitting his country⁴. In the very beginning of his reign Cleomenes engaged in a war with the Argives, whom he beat, and having driven a considerable body of them into a wood, he caused the Helotes to set that wood on fire, whereby numbers of them were destroyed; in all his actions he appears to have been a man of a fierce, untractable temper, a great lover of war, in which he sought only victory, without inquiring whether the means by which he sought to obtain it were just or not; yet he had sometimes flights of fancy which had the appearance of a great genius; for example, he was wont to say, that Homer was the poet of the Lacedæmonians, Hesiod of the Helotes, because the former made war his subject, and the latter treated of husbandry⁵. He was early suspected of having views not much for the advantage or honour of the state; for at his return from the war with the Argives, he was accused of having let slip manifest opportunities of taking Argos itself; but the answers he gave, when the matter came to be heard before the ephori, were so satisfactory, that he was acquitted. He was a great friend to Cliftbenes the Athenian and his party, at whose request he drove the Pisistratide out of Athens; afterwards he joined with Isagoras, whom the Athenians had banished, and endeavoured all he could to vest in him the sovereignty of that city, whereby he created great mischiefs to the Greeks. The Corinthians, who, as we have elsewhere seen, were the fast friends, and steady allies of the Lacedæmonians, disgusted at the haughty behaviour of Cleomenes, and at his wasting the territory of Eleusina, without regard either to the laws of God or men, deserted them; Damaratus his colleague also, who was a very worthy and excellent person, opposed him; and while he was gone into Ægina, where he pretended to seize the principal persons in the island under colour, that they were in the Persian interest; Damaratus accused him to the ephori and the senate of being an enemy to peace, a disturber of Greece, and one who would provoke all the neighbouring states to look with an evil eye on *Sparta*⁶. These discourses had at first their effect; but when Cleomenes returned, he found means not only to get himself acquitted, but to get his colleague deposed, which he wrought after the following manner: He suggested that Damaratus's birth was liable to great suspicions, alledging the expression of his father beforementioned; the Spartans sent to the oracle at Delphi, in order to have

The reigns of Cleomenes and Damaratus.

¹ PAUSAN. in Lacon. HEROD. lib. v. ² PLUT. Apophth. Lacon. ³ HEROD. lib. i. ⁴ HEROD. lib. v. PAUSAN. ubi supra. ⁵ PLUT. Apophth. Lacon. ⁶ HEROD. lib. v. PAUSAN. Lacon.

this intricate question decided; Cleomenes forsook this, and therefore took care to corrupt the oracle, whereby he carried his point; for on the return of the deputies with the response, Damaratus was deposed, and Leotychides his cousin, the eighth in descent from Theopompus, was raised to the regal dignity. Such was the moderation of the deposed king, that instead of quitting his country, he still endeavoured to render it all the service he could, being content to execute inferior magistracies. But the intemperance of his successor vanquished at length his patience; for Leotychides being one day informed, that Damaratus was setting as inspector in the place of public exercise, sent a servant to insult him, by asking him this question, How he liked his present office after executing that of king. To which Damaratus fiercely answered, That himself knew the weight of both, which he who sent him did not; but that this question should either prove the cause of great misery, or of great felicity to Sparta. Then covering his head, he retired to his own house, where having first sacrificed to Jupiter, he then sent for his mother, and earnestly intreated her to tell him the truth as to his birth, whether, as he was reputed, he was the son of king Aristo, or whether, as his enemies suggested, Agæus was his father. She having in the most solemn terms assured him of his legitimacy, he pretended to take a journey to Delpi, but indeed resolved to quit Sparta for ever, and to retire where he might be absolutely safe; with this view he went first to Elis, from thence to Zacynthus, and at length into Persia, where he was received by king Darius with the utmost civility, had large revenues assigned him, and was in every respect used as a prince^a. In his exile he behaved in a manner suitable to his dignity, and without shewing any rancour against his country; as an instance of the former, it is recorded of him, that when the Persian monarch would have punished a nobleman, who had revolted, and afterwards at Damaratus's persuasion submitted himself to the king, the Spartan generously interposed, addressing the Persian king in these words; It is dishonourable, O king, not to have had it in thy power to punish him when he was a rebel, and as dishonourable to exert a power of punishing now he is become thy friend^b. With respect to the latter, when he found that the Persian was determined to make war on Greece, we are told he sent the first advice thereof cut in tables, which he afterwards covered with wax. He was the only king of Sparta, who was victor in the olympic games. In a word, he was a person of such merit, that none of the Persians envied the honours and revenues which he acquired in their country, where his posterity flourished many ages after^c.

Leotychides succeeds Damaratus.

Leotychides, as he was raised to the kingdom by the craft of Cleomenes, so he was intirely governed by him in all that he did; he went with him to Egina, from whence they brought away some of the principal inhabitants prisoners, and left them with the Atbenians, their mortal enemies; for which he afterwards suffered, though he acted merely by the advice, and under the influence of Cleomenes. As for that prince, he continued to act as inconsistently as formerly, that is, sometimes with extraordinary virtue, and at other times without the least regard to justice. When Aristagoras the Milesian tyrant came to Sparta with an intent to persuade Cleomenes to make war upon the Persian king, he heard his proposals both as to the method of the war, and the private advantages which might accrue to himself; but he advised his country against the former, and absolutely refused to have any thing to do with the latter, wherein he acted with great penetration as well as integrity; for the same prince prevailing with the Atbenians, thereby induced that war which had well-nigh brought on the total destruction of Greece. He likewise resisted all the solicitations of Mæander, the tyrant of Samos, who also would have tempted him with money; and not only so, but complained of him to the ephori, telling them that if they did not banish this man out of their territories, he would teach the Lacedæmonians to be knaves. When by degrees his contrivances against Damaratus came to light, and the Spartans began to shew some inclination to examine strictly into that matter, he thought it best to fly first into Thessaly, and then into Arcadia, where he immediately excited new troubles, drawing about him a multitude of Arcadians, and endeavouring by a solemn oath to bind him to his service. The Spartans knowing well his enterprizing genius, and being afraid lest he should excite the Arcadians to invade them, recalled him, and restored him to his dignity; but a short time after he returned, he fell mad, running people in the face with his sceptre as he met them in the streets; ^d

^a HERODOT. lib. xvii. PAUSAN. LACON.
PAUSAN. LACON.

^b PLUT. Apophth. LACON.

^c HERODOT. lib. vii.

- a upon which they were constrained to confine him, and to put on him fetters of wood². In this condition he was attended by a Helot, who was his keeper, from whom partly by fair means, partly by threats, he obtained a sword, wherewith beginning at the calf of the leg, he ripped himself up, and having at length cut out his bowels, fell down dead. Many of the Spartans imputed this extraordinary fact to his corrupting the oracle of Delphi, and thereby procuring the deposition of Damaratus; the Athenians attributed it to his sacrilege at Eleusina; the Argives were as positive that it befel him for burning their sacred grove (F). As for those who were for ascribing his end to natural causes, they alledged that drinking immoderately with the Scythian ambassadors, his drunkenness issued in madness³. He left behind
- b him a daughter named Gorgo, one of the most celebrated women of her time. The inhabitants of Egina upon his death applied themselves to the Spartans, complaining loudly against Leotychides, for that he in conjunction with Cleomenes had been concerned in carrying off the principal men of their island, and putting them into the hands of the Athenians. The Spartans, who, as a nation, piqued themselves much upon their justice, disclaimed the whole of this proceeding, and offered the inhabitants of Egina to deliver up Leotychides into their hands; but the deputies of that island wisely declined carrying the king of Sparta away; they contented themselves therefore with desiring he might go with them to Athens, there to use his utmost endeavours to rectify the mischief he had done them by procuring their hostages to
- c be delivered up, which accordingly he did; but his and their applications being fruitless, they suffered him to return again to Sparta, where he still retained the regal dignity, though he never reigned in the hearts of the people, who, as it is

² PAUSAN. Lacon. HEROD. lib. vi.

³ PAUSAN. ubi supra. HERODOT. ubi supra.

(F) There is no part of Cleomenes's character more unjustifiable than that which regards the Argives, against whom he made a war, without observing any laws of honour or justice. The accounts we have of his exploits against this nation are so dissonant, and the circumstances contained in them so incompatible, that it is far from being easy to judge whether the facts mentioned fell out in one and the same war, or in several; and if the latter be the truth, in what parts of his reign they happened. Without troubling our readers with a nice inquiry into these particulars, we will give them in few words a detail of the principal matters laid to the charge of Cleomenes. He is said to have been promised by an oracle, that he should take Argos; in confidence of which he marched with his army directly towards the city (23); but between him and it lay a considerable army of the Argives, who prepared to defend themselves in the best manner they might, though under great discouragements from certain responses which they had received, which gave them to apprehend that they should be overcome by fraud. In order to guard against this, in the most probable manner they could devise, they determined to govern their motions by the enemies signals, which they esteemed a certain preservative against being surprized (24). But this precaution served only to ruin them; for Cleomenes, having intelligence thereof, gave order to his forces to attack the Argives, when the signal was made for them to go to dinner. This being exactly followed, the army of Argos was intirely defeated; for they beholding the Spartan signal for dinner, went immediately to refresh themselves, but before they were well settled at their meal, the Spartans fell upon them, and slaughtered them almost without resistance. Their only refuge in this distress was a thick wood in their rear, into which they retired with all the expedition possible. Cleomenes instantly devised a new stratagem for destroying them there. He caused some who were well acquainted with the

Argives to call them by name, and promise them quarter; yet as fast as they came out, he ordered them to be slain. Thus he cut off fifty, those in the grove, because of the thickness of the trees, perceiving nothing of what passed without. At length an Argive, getting upon an high tree, discovered from thence what was doing. The Lacedæmonians then called in vain, no more of the Argives ventured out, which put Cleomenes on a more cruel expedient; he caused his Helotes to surround the grove with brush-wood, and other combustible matter; and then setting it on fire, burned all the hapless wretches. He then enquired to whom the grove was dedicated? To Argos, replied a priest. Alas! cried Cleomenes, This oracle has deceived me, this is all the Argos I shall take. He afterwards sacrificed by force on the altar of Diana, and caused the priest who would have hindered him to be chastised. The sacrifices, as some say, proving unlucky, he desisted, and was accused at his return for not taking Argos, but on hearing his defence acquitted (25). The general opinion is, that he actually attacked the city with his colleague Damaratus, but was constrained to retire by the following means: There was in that city a lady named Telissilla, who being of a very weak constitution, was directed by the oracle to addict herself to the muses. In consequence of this response, she studied poetry with such success, that though on the approach of the Lacedæmonians there were none but women in the city, she inspired them with such resolution, that they shut the gates, took arms, and forced Damaratus, who was already in the suburbs, to retire; as also Cleomenes himself, and his army. In memory of this extraordinary event an anniversary solemnity grew into use at Argos, in which women went about in mens cloaths, and men put on womens habits (26). It is agreed by all the ancient writers that Cleomenes laughed at and despised oracles; the reason is clear, because he had corrupted them (27).

(23) Herodot. Hist. lib. vi. Pausan. Argol. Lacon. (26) Herodot. ubi supra. Polyæn. Strateg. lib. viii. 33. Plut. de virtut. Mulier. (27) Plut. Apophtheg. Lacon.

(24) Herodot. ubi supra.

(25) Plut. Apophtheg.

(27) Plut.

their custom, regretted their absent prince, and were angry with the work of their own hands; the consequences of all this we shall hereafter have occasion to explain, let us in the mean time pass to the story of his colleague^a.

Leonidas succeeds Cleomenes.

Leonidas the son of Anaxandrides, half brother to Cleomenes, succeeded him in the kingdom, and married his daughter Gorgo; he was a prince of great moderation, and of a valour superior to most men of his age; some of the Spartans however, who disliked his family, could not help speaking disrespectfully to him; one of them particularly told him to his face, That except being a king, he was no better than them; to which, Leonidas smiling, answered, If I had not been better than you, I had not been a king^b. When Miltiades the Athenian fought the famous battle of Marathon, the Spartans had promised an army, but had sent none; they arrived a little after the battle, went to the spot where it was fought, where having considered attentively the prodigious difficulties the Athenians had overcome, and after highly commending them, they returned home again to Sparta. When, as the wisest of the Greeks had foreseen, this battle at Marathon only excited the Persian to attempt again the conquest of Greece; the Spartans, with a resolution worthy of the disciples of Lycurgus, determined to oppose them; Damaratus their king was constrained to accompany Xerxes in this expedition, though in respect to his country he had sent early notice thereof to Gorgo the wife of Leonidas, and the daughter of his greatest enemy. When it was apparent that Xerxes would enter Greece in person with a prodigious army, a general assembly was held at the isthmus, the resolutions of which were these: That the states of Greece should unanimously join in defending its liberty against the Persians; that for the present all their quarrels amongst themselves should be suspended; that the tenth of the spoil should be dedicated to Apollo; and that of those who deserted the common cause a decimation should be made, that is, a tenth part should be put to death without mercy^c. Warm and generous resolutions, if the same spirit had accompanied them in the execution; but, alas, when words were to be changed into deeds, of all the confederates, the Spartans and Athenians only seemed ready to do any thing. The Thessalians were the first who were to feel the weight of Xerxes and his myriads; they therefore sent to the Greeks to beseech them to quicken their preparations, or not to blame them if they submitted to an enemy they could not resist. Upon this ten thousand men were sent by sea to Thessaly under the command of Evenetus a Spartan, and Themistocles the Athenian; but when they came thither, they were convinced that this measure would prove ineffectual; for in a plain country, as Thessaly is, there could be no hopes of opposing such multitudes of men with a few, especially when it was known that many of the Thessalian princes could not be depended on, and that many of the passages into Thessaly were in the power of Alexander king of Macedon; the army therefore returned without doing any thing. At the next general council however, it was resolved to defend the streights of Thermopylae, in pursuance of which resolution six thousand foot were appointed for that service, and the command of them given to Leonidas^d. Of these three hundred only were Spartans, according to the direction of the king; and when some principal persons demanded of him whether he had not a secret design in his head, he answered frankly, I pretend to defend the streights of Thermopylae, but in truth I go to die for my country; and when they still wondered at the small number of men he took with him, he, turning to those to whom he had communicated his secret, said, There are enough, considering the design we go upon. When he took his leave of his wife, she asked him if he had nothing particular to say to her^(G); Marry some brave man, said he, and bring

^a PAUSAN. & HERODOT. ubi supra. ^b PLUT. in Apoph. ^c HERODOT. lib. vii. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xi. ^d PAUSAN. in Lacon. HEROD. Hist. lib. vii.

(G) The character of Gorgo the daughter of Cleomenes, and wife of Leonidas, deserves to be particularly considered. Plutarch, who was so fond of the Lacedæmonians, that besides his institutes he wrote a book of their wise sayings, wrote also a particular treatise of the women, which was indeed extraordinary; and the reason of it was, because the Spartan dames were of a very masculine disposition, and spoke and acted with a freedom denied to their sex every-where else. Gorgo, who is to be the subject of this note, makes a very considerable figure in that treatise; but before we proceed to acquaint the reader with what Plutarch says of this lady, it will on many accounts be fit to give him a remarkable story recorded of her by Herodotus. That noble historian tells us, that when Aristagoras, tyrant of Miletus, attempted to engage Cleomenes in a design not only of freeing Ionian, but even of subverting the Persian empire; he brought with him a chart of the known world laid down on brass; after having shewn Cleomenes on this the situation of Ionian, and expatiated with great warmth on the glory

- a bring him brave children *. When Xerxes came with his mighty army, he sent a spy to bring him advice of the posture in which Leonidas and his troops were ; this spy reported that he found them exercising themselves in their usual games, and that they were putting garlands on their heads, as if they were about to celebrate some festival ; the Persian thereupon asked Damaratus the meaning of it, These men, Sir, said he, have devoted themselves to death for the service of their country ; at which Xerxes laughed, conceiving that he mightily over-rated the courage of his countrymen, whom himself doubted not to fright away with the very appearance of his army ; but the event proved the contrary, though there were some among the confederates who were not a little terrified at the thoughts of an engagement. These
- b represented to Leonidas, That a discharge of the Persian arrows would take away the light of the sun ; Very well, replied he, then we shall fight in the shade. When they approached, the same persons came to him again ; The Persians, Sir, said they, draw near ; What of that, said he, Shall not we then be near them ? When Xerxes saw that he was mistaken, and that Leonidas really intended to fight, he wrote him a letter, wherein he told him, that the great superiority of his army might excuse his not opposing him, and that if he would embrace his interest, he should be lord of all Greece. To which Leonidas with great moderation answered, If you knew wherein the happiness of life consisted, you would not covet what belongs to others ; for my part, I had rather die for the liberty of Greece, than command over it. Xerxes then ordered
- c the Medes who led the van in his army, to fall upon the Greeks, which they did with very great resolution, but were notwithstanding repulsed with prodigious glory of an enterprize undertaken for the relief of the Ionians, pointing to his plate, he proceeded thus :

* Plot. in Apophtheg. Lacon.

 " Next these the Lydians inhabit a fertile country
 " abounding in silver : And on the confines of " Lydia, these Phrygians are placed to the eastward,
 " more rich in cattle, and living in greater affluence " than any other people I know. Adjoining to " these are the Cappadocians, by us called Syrians,
 " and beyond them the Cilicians, whose country
 " extends to that sea in which the island of Cyprus
 " is situate, and pays an annual tribute of five hundred talents to the king. Next to the Cilicians
 " are these Armenians, who possess great numbers " of cattle ; and after them the Matianians, beyond " whose territories lies this province of Cissia, in " which Susa is built upon the river Choaspes. In " this place the great king resides, and his vast treasures are here deposited. If you take this city,
 " you may boldly contend with Jupiter in wealth.
 " You will not find your account in fighting battles
 " to gain a country of small extent, narrow limits,
 " and indifferent soil, from the Messenians, who are " your equals in war, or from the Arcadians and " Argians : For none of these nations have either
 " gold or silver, the desire of which induces so " many men to hazard their lives. But when an " opportunity is offered to conquer all Asia with " facility, can you wish for any thing more ?" To " this discourse of Aristagoras Cleomenes answered,
 " Milesian friend, I defer to let you know my resolution till three days are passed." When that time was come, and they were both met at the appointed place, Cleomenes asked Aristagoras in how many days one might travel from the coast of Ionian to the place where the king was. But though Aristagoras was in other things a man of art, and much superior in ability to Cleomenes, yet he made a slip in this. For designing to draw the Spartans into Asia, he ought to have abated something of the account : Whereas he told him plainly 'twas a journey of three months : Which Cleomenes no sooner heard, than interrupting him from proceeding in his discourse concerning the way, he said, "Milesian guest, depart out of Sparta before the setting of " the sun : For you have proposed nothing to the " advantage of the Spartans, in advising us to take " a march into Asia, not to be performed in less " than three months after our landing." When he " had spoken these words, he withdrew ; and Aristagoras, taking an olive branch in his hand, after the manner of a suppliant, went after Cleomenes, beseeching him to hear ; and at the same time desired him to send away his little daughter Gorgo, who was then with him, being the only child he had, and about eight or nine years of age. But Cleomenes bid him say what he would, and not refrain for the sake of a child. So Aristagoras began with the promise of ten talents, in case Cleomenes would do as he desired ; and receiving a denial, proceeded gradually in his offers, till he came to the sum of fifty talents ; and then the girl cried, " Father, this " stranger will corrupt you, unless you go away

 " presently." Cleomenes, pleased with the admonition of the child, retired to another apartment : And Aristagoras was constrained to depart immediately from Sparta without obtaining leave to inform him farther concerning the way to the place of the king's residence (28). When the same young lady saw Aristagoras suffer his man to put on his shoes, she cried out in amazement, Father ! Father ! see this stranger, has he no hands ? At another time when a soft and delicate stranger was about to have paid his compliments to her, she put him away with her hand, adding, Stand by, poor creature ; thou hast not as much of a man in thee as a woman (29). As the last and most noble commendation recorded of her, let us remark that Damaratus, though she was the daughter of his deadly enemy, trusted her rather than any of the Greeks with the intelligence he sent concerning the motion of the Barbarians ; or, if we take this as Herodotus does, it may be placed in a stronger light ; for he says, that a slave from Damaratus brought a waxen tablet to Sparta with nothing written on it, and when the Spartans knew not what to make of this, Gorgo immediately bid them scrape off the wax, whereupon they found Damaratus's letter cut on the wood underneath (30).

(28) Herodot. lib. vi.

(29) Plot. in Apophtheg. Mulier. Lacon.

(30) Herodot. lib. vi.

slaughter; he then commanded a choice corps of Persians to dislodge them, but it was in vain; the Greeks were not only superior in valour, but they better understood the art of war; they had also great advantage from the situation of the place, so that, after numbers were slain, the Persians were constrained to retreat⁷. Xerxes now began to be in pain for his whole army, and with reason; for the dead bodies having streightened the passages still more, it seemed doubtful whether the weight of numbers would force the pass or no. At length one Ephialtes a Trachinian offered to shew them a path round the mountain, whereby they might fall upon the Grecians in the rear; Xerxes thereupon detached Hydarnes with a great body of chosen troops, with directions to follow Ephialtes; they passed the river Asopus in the night, and having forced the Phocian guard, advanced apace towards Leonidas and his troops; b that great commander, who is said to have been informed that the senate had received an oracle, purporting that either one of their kings, or the city itself must fall, as soon as he was informed of what had happened, gave leave to all the confederates to withdraw, that they might reserve themselves, as he phrased it, for better times, excepting only the Thebians and the Thebans; who with his Spartans made in all not above fourteen hundred men; with these he purposed not to wait the attack of the Persians, but to go and find them out, yet looking on his Spartans, and observing some striplings, who had scarce attained the age of men, his heart relented; calling them therefore to him one by one, he pretended to send by each of them a billet to the ephori; he would have afterwards done the same thing in favour c of some persons of extraordinary merit; but they penetrating his design, refused to obey him, one of them answering, Sir, I came to serve you as a soldier, not as a courier. Another, Let us fight first, Sir, and then I will carry your account of the battle. Having made the proper dispositions he passed the streights, and fell upon the enemy; he and all his Spartans were slain together with the Thebians, but the Thebans holding up their targets, cried out for quarter, which was given only to a few, and they were stigmatized. This victory, if we must call it so, cost the Persians twenty thousand men. The body of Leonidas being found, Xerxes ordered it to be nailed to a cross, an action which reflected dishonour upon himself, and could do no hurt to a dead body; as to the fame of Leonidas, it was out of the reach of Xerxes, d and hath remained still fresh three thousand years after his decease (H). The Persian after

⁷ HERODOT. lib. viii. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xi. PAUSAN. LACON. PLUT. Apophth. LACON. JUSTIN. lib. ii.

(H) The action at Thermopylae makes so great a figure in history, and so justly, at the same time that it so nearly concerns the Lacedæmonian history, that it would be unpardonable in us not to give such particulars thereof as may serve to set it in the clearest light, and do honour to that nation of whose affairs we are treating. In the first place let us remark, that Leonidas acted all along with great equality of mind, a philosophic courage, and the true spirit of a patriot. He went in the common cause of Greece to give a check to the Persians at their first entrance, that thereby the numerous army of Xerxes might receive a taste of the opposition it was to meet with, and the king, if he were not headstrong and irreprehensible, have an opportunity given him of retiring in time before multitudes of his men were cut off, and the strength of Asia wasted to no purpose. In fighting at Thermopylae Leonidas made use at first of all the advantages of ground afforded him by his own situation, and that of the enemy. He drew up his troops in the narrowest part of the passage, and when he retired from the field of battle, he disposed his battalions in such a manner, that they readily wheeled about, and received the enemy, who attempted to harass them, in such a manner, that there were more slain in the retreat than in the fight; if Ephialtes had not led the Barbarians round the mountains, Leonidas would have carried his first point, that is, he would have constrained Xerxes to retire (31). But when the augur Megistias, upon inspecting the sacrifices, declared that all the Grecians were threatened with death; and when this declaration was backed by intelligence that the enemy were actually passing the mountains, Leonidas put in practice his second resolution, which was the devoting his Spartans and himself to death for the safety of Greece in general, and of Sparta in particular (32). This resolution was founded upon two reasons; the first, that the streights of Thermopylae ought not absolutely to be abandoned, but sold to the enemy as dear as might be; the second, rested it upon this oracle which the Lacedæmonians had received.

Thy plains, O Sparta, Persian rage shall feel;
Thy sons shall slaughter'd fall by foreign steel,
Unless a king of the Herculean race,
In war, to save the rest, shall death embrace.

This prompted Leonidas to receive that death which he knew must some time or other happen to him, when it might avert evil from his country; it was to prevent an unnecessary carnage, that Leonidas dismissed the greatest part of the allies, and retained with him only fourteen hundred men, viz. three hundred Spartans, seven hundred Thebians, and four hundred Thebans; he then advanced without the narrow passage, because he no longer thought of defending his own party, but how he might most injure the enemy; and in that desperate attack

he

(31) Polyæn. Strateg. lib. i. c. 32. lib. vii. c. 15. (32) Justin. lib. ii. c. 11.

a after this consulted Damaratus again, adjuring him by the kindness he had shewn him to give his sentiments sincerely as to the method in which it was proper to carry on the war. The Spartan thereupon proposed to him seizing the isle of Cythera which lay over-against Laconia, and from whence he might have made the Spartans so uneasy as would infallibly hinder their sending assistance to the Athenians; or impeding him in his design of penetrating into Greece; but Achæmenes the king's brother being quite of a different opinion, fearing that if the fleet parted from the land-army both might be ruined; Xerxes preferred his council, and thereby failed in his design *. The Grecian fleet in the mean time lay at Artemisium under the command of Eurybiades a Spartan, a man of great personal courage, but timorous b as a commander, and unexperienced in sea affairs. The Persians hoping to surprize and surround them, detached two hundred ships with orders to sail round Eubœa, and fall on the rear of the Grecian navy; but this being betrayed to the Greeks, they weighed anchor in the night, and stood directly to sea to meet these two hundred sail, so that instead of surprizing others, they were themselves surprized; thirty of them sunk, and the rest forced to betake themselves to flight, wherein they were no less unfortunate; for a storm arising, most of them were shipwrecked on the coast. The Grecian fleet some time after sailed to the coast of Attica, and at the desire of the Athenians anchored near Salamis. Eurybiades had still the command though of three hundred and fifty-eight ships, of which the fleet consisted, a hundred and eighty c belonged to the Athenians. As to the battle which happened there not long after, we have already given a full account of it in our Athenian history, and therefore shall not trouble the reader with needless repetitions here *. The first step that was taken afterwards was to prepare a great fleet to prosecute this victory, the command of which was given to Leotychides king of Sparta; but it soon after appeared, that the Persians had not totally abandoned their design, Mardonius remaining in Greece at the head of a very considerable army, with which he threatened in the spring to revisit Attica; the Greeks therefore found themselves under a necessity of raising a land-army also.

d Pausanias the son of Cleombrotus took upon him the character of tutor or protector to Plistarchus the son of Leonidas, and in right thereof was the first magistrate in Sparta, the other king, as we have said, being absent, having the command of the confederate fleet. In this situation of things the dilatoriness of popular councils eminently appeared, for when the army ought to have been in the field, the Athenian ambassadors found the Lacedæmonians celebrating the Hyacinthia; in vain these ministers represented that the common cause was neglected, and that the Athenians had reason to expect better things, since they had hazarded all for the service of Greece; the ephori and senate confiding mightily in the strong wall, which by this time was erected cross the isthmus, thought but little of raising troops, till Chibœus a Tegeæan, who had a great reputation amongst them, shewed them how foolish and dishonour- e able this conduct of theirs was, since it was plain, if the Athenians were ruined Mardonius attempts the conquest of Greece.

* HERODOT. ubi supra. PAUSAN. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra. & in vit. Themist. * Universal History, Vol. II. p. 547.

he fell. Xerxes lost two brothers in this engagement, and an incredible number of troops. On the field of battle there were three monuments raised, one to perpetuate the memory of such of the troops as were slain before the confederates were dismissed, with this inscription :

Four thousand here from various nations brought,
For Greece against the Mædes three millions fought.
The second was for the Lacedæmonians only, with this distich upon it :

Go, friend, and to our brother Spartans tell,
With what applause we in their service fell.
The third was for the augur Megistias, who, though pressed by Leonidas to retire, refused, contenting himself with sending away his only son :

Divine Megistias lies beneath this stone,
Who met without concern ill fortune's frown ;
Nor would to save his life consent to fly,
When the brave Spartans had resolv'd to die.

It is alledged that Eurytus and Aristodemus, two of the three hundred Spartans being ill of sore eyes, retired to Alphei with the permission of Leonidas, and were there in the time of the last battle, on the news of which Eurytus caused his armour to be put on, and ordered his servant to conduct him directly to the field, where running, blind as he was, into the midst of the enemy, he was suddenly covered with wounds, and fell down dead ; but Aristodemus returned to Sparta, where he met with a very indifferent reception, being treated as a man who had not courage enough to die with his companions ; to aggravate their ill usage, they surnamed him the Fugitive ; he redeemed his credit however at the battle of Platœa, where having devoted himself to death, he performed such actions as are scarce credible (33).

(33) Herodot. lib. vii. Diogen. Sæcul. lib. xi. Plut. in Apophtheg. Lacœ. & in vit. Aristid.
Vol. II. N° 8. 7 L though through their delay, the Persians being masters at sea, might land what forces they would in Laconia, and bring the war home to their doors; the wall cross the isthmus being in such a case useless^b. Roused by this representation, they sent five thousand Spartans, and, which was an unusual thing with them, gave arms to seven thousand of their Helotes, Pausanias commanding in chief. This however did not hinder Mardonius from taking Athens, or from seeking the Greek army, and offering battle. Pausanias had the command in chief of the whole Grecian forces, which were no less than one hundred thousand men. The Persians were certainly double their number, nay, according to Diodorus's account Mardonius's army consisted of five hundred thousand men. When they came into the neighbourhood of Platea, an engagement happened between a great body of Persian horse commanded by Massilius, and a corps of Greeks, wherein after a great effusion of blood the Persians were routed, and their commander killed^c. A general battle being delayed, the Greek army suffered much by desertion, as on the other hand did the Persians for want of provisions. Pausanias at length thought fit to decamp, that he might procure his army fresh and more advantageous quarters, in which however he was opposed by Anompharetus, an old Spartan commander, who insisted that it was derogatory to the Spartan honour to retire in sight of an enemy. Pausanias like a wise man, and a great captain, answered, That marching this way or that was not dishonourable, when it proceeded from a right motive; but when he found all his intreaties were in vain, and that Anompharetus would not be persuaded, he gave the signal, and immediately the Lacedæmonian and Tegetean foot began to move. Anompharetus, who was hitherto of opinion that Pausanias would not desert him, when he saw him actually on his march, ordered his standards to be taken up, and moved slowly after him. Pausanias kept the high ground, the Athenians, who very exactly obeyed his orders, marched in the plain; the rest of the confederates withdrew to the temple of Juno, where they were out of reach of the Persian cavalry. At the temple of Ceres, which was on the brow of the hill, Pausanias halted with all his forces to give Anompharetus and his battalion time to come up; but they had hardly rejoined the army before the van-guard of the Persian horse attacked them with great vigour^d. Mardonius looked upon this decampment of the Greek troops in the same light that Anompharetus did, that is, as a plain flight, and therefore was eager not to fight them, but to fall upon the runaways; this eagerness, as far as we can judge at this distance of time, seems to have been the chief cause of his misfortune; for his Persians marching hastily, and without order, the rest of the corps of which his numerous army was composed did the like, which gave the Greeks great advantage. The troops under Pausanias did not much exceed 50,000 men, and on this account it was that he sent to hasten the Athenians in their march. The Athenians, who on this occasion acted with the utmost generosity, endeavoured, as well as they were able, to fulfil his orders; but were unluckily stopped short by the Beotians, and other Greeks in the service of the Persian, who on this occasion behaved with amazing courage and intrepidity. The Lacedæmonians and Tegeteans were forced to engage Mardonius's army without assistance. It is universally acknowledged, that the Persians behaved very well on this occasion; but being neither so well armed, nor so well disciplined as the Greeks, their valour was of no use but to bring them to slaughter; for, as Herodotus rightly observes, it was all the same whether one or ten Persians broke into the Grecian ranks, since the next line was ready to receive them without confusion or disorder, so that they were presently slain without effecting any thing, because they charged tumultuously; their commanders having no capacity to direct them, nor they to obey. Their number and their courage however kept the battle doubtful as long as Mardonius lived, who, mounted on a white horse, and fighting at the head of a thousand men, gave signal demonstrations of a courage deserving a better fate; but when he was slain, the Persians began to break, and to give way, which dispirited all the barbarous nations, who now followed the example of their flight, though they had not drawn their swords. The Athenians also defeated the Greeks who sided with and fought for the Persians, so that Artabazus, who was next in command to Mardonius, and against whose advice these measures were taken, judging all to be lost, retired with forty thou-

* HERODOT. lib. viii. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xii. PAUSAN. in LACON. * HERODOT. lib. ix. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PAUSAN. ubi supra. * HERODOT. lib. ix. PLUT. in vit. Themist. & Arist. DIOD. SICUL. lib. xi. JUSTIN. lib. ii. c. 14. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Pausan.

- a sand, and marched with all the expedition he was able back to Thrace; the rest of the Persian army withdrew as speedily as they could into their camp, where they strengthened the works formerly thrown up, and resolved to defend to the utmost of their power these posts against the victorious Greeks. Pausanias coming up with his Lacedæmonians, attacked the camp without hesitation, but at the same time with little success; for the Persians fighting now not for victory or glory, but for their lives, made a most obstinate resistance; besides they had the same advantage over the Lacedæmonians here, which the Lacedæmonians had over them in the field; for, as we have heretofore observed, the Spartans were unaccustomed to such attacks, avoiding, in obedience to the laws of Lycurgus, all sieges as much as in them lay; yet this state
- b of things lasted but for a small time; for when the Athenians came up, who of all the Greeks best understood the art of defending or attacking fortifications, they quickly opened a passage to the Lacedæmonians, and when that was once done, a merciless slaughter ensued, since of three hundred thousand men, whom Mardonius brought into the field, scarce three thousand escaped^a; of the Greeks however it is uncertain how many there fell; if we believe Herodotus, there died of the Spartans ninety-one; of the Tegeleans sixteen; and of the Athenians fifty-two^b. Plutarch owns one thousand three hundred and sixty to have fallen^c; but Diodorus Siculus is positive that there were very few less than ten thousand^d. When this bloody engagement was over, the rest of the allies came up to be witnesses rather than
- c assistants in gaining the victory, by which behaviour they drew on themselves contempt and scorn. Lampon of Ægina proposed to Pausanias, that the body of Mardonius should be carefully searched for, that the indignity offered to his uncle Leonidas by the command of Xerxes might be revenged thereon. To which Pausanias answered, "Friend of Ægina, I very kindly accept of your good intention, and the respect you express for me and my family; but I cannot help telling you, that your zeal hath drawn you to make a very wrong judgment of this matter; for whereas you have highly magnified my actions, the courage of my countrymen, and the action we have this day achieved, you throw all this down again by importuning me to insult the dead, and persuading me that I shall heighten my
- d glory, if I do that which is fitter for Barbarians to do, nay, which we have not spared to reproach even in them; I cannot therefore assent to these notions of the men of Ægina, nor to those of any other nation, who delight in such actions, being content to be commended by the Spartans, for neither doing, nor speaking an unbecoming thing. As for Leonidas, whose death you would have revenged, I am of opinion, that the innumerable multitude we have slain, have sufficiently repaired the loss of him, and those that fell with him at Thermopylæ. Come no more therefore to me with such discourses; offer me no more such counsels, but look upon it as a very great favour that you have escaped, even now, unpunished". When this great captain beheld the magnificent tent, and rich furniture belonging to Mardonius, with the mighty magazines of luxury belonging thereto, he gave orders to the cooks and bakers to prepare him such a supper as they were wont to do for that general; which when they had done, he ordered some of his own servants to dress a Spartan meal; which being also done, he sent for the principal officers among the Greeks; thus pointing to both the suppers, he said with a smile, See gentlemen, the folly of this king of the Medes, who living in this sumptuous manner at home, would needs come so far to spoil us who fare so hardly. Part of the prodigious spoils that were taken in the Persian camp, the Helotes, who were intrusted to collect them, purloined; part were dedicated to the gods, a tenth of all sorts was given to Pausanias, and the rest distributed among the Greeks. Having thus put an end to the war, Pausanias thought
- f next of punishing such as had betrayed the common cause of Greece; with this view he marched immediately to Thebes, the citizens of which at first attempted to make a defence, but on mature deliberation they capitulated, and delivered up the chiefs of the Median faction which were in their hands; they vainly fancied that they might redeem themselves with money, but in this they were greatly mistaken; for Pausanias disdaining their proposal, hurried them away to Corinth, and caused them there to be put to death^e.

THE same day that the battle of Platea was fought, Leotychides king of Sparta, The Greeks with Xantippus the Athenian, gained a glorious victory at Mycalæ, where the last victories as remains of the Persian fleet, and of the Persian armies, which had been drawn Mycalæ.

^a HERODOT. ubi supra. ^b ubi supra. ^c ubi supra. ^d ubi supra. ^e HERODOT. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra. CORN. NEPOS. ubi supra.

together for the destruction of Greece, were utterly defeated; the commanders of the a Persian fleet greatly discouraged their men by the pusillanimity of their conduct; for notwithstanding they had a great number of ships, they ran them all on shore, and sought to shelter themselves under the protection of an army of sixty thousand men, which under the command of Tigranes had been left to defend Ionian. The Greeks seeing this, determined to attack them on shore, and Leotychides standing in towards the coast, ordered a herald to make proclamation, when he drew near enough to be heard, in the Greek tongue, in these words: "Men of Ionian, such "among you as my voice reaches, hearken with attention to what I say, the rather "because the Persians cannot understand me; when the battle begins, every one "of you ought in the first place to remember liberty, and in the next, that the "word in our army is Hebe; let such as hear me, inform those who hear me not". This proclamation had a double effect, for it inclined many of the Ionians to favour the Greeks, and it so frightened the Persians, that they knew not whom to trust (1). The Persians, before the battle began, disarmed the Samians, having some intelligence that they had been intriguing with the Greeks; but confiding greatly in the Milesians, they intrusted them with the custody of the passages through the mountains behind them; these dispositions made, they prepared to defend their fortifications the best they could; yet neither their conduct nor their valour availed much, for the Greeks landing, the Athenians marched strait forward along the shore, the Lacædemonians took a compass by the hills. The former after an obstinate resistance forced the Persian camp about the same time that the latter attacked them in the rear; the Samians in the midst of the battle catching up whatever came to hand, fell upon the Persians in their very camp, and the Milesians, who were to have guarded the passes, as soon as the Persians fled, fell upon them, and either killed them, or made them prisoners^b. A very odd circumstance, which according to the superstition of those times passed for miraculous, contributed much to the gaining of this victory; it was this; about the time the battle began a rumour was spread throughout the army, that the Barbarians were beaten at Plataea, though, as we have observed, that engagement happened in the morning of that day in the evening of which this happened at Mycale; but of this strange business, which some modern writers have treated very obscurely, the reader hath received a satisfactory account in the note I^c.

Pausanias intrigues with Artabazus. Year after the Flood, 2508. Year before Christ, 491.

Pausanias was afterwards sent to take the command of the fleet, with strict orders to free the Grecian cities from the Persian garisons; on this design he sailed with a great fleet to Cyprus, thence to Byzantium, which according to his instructions he set at liberty, and this seems to have been the last of his exploits; for immediately

^a HERODOT.

^b WANLEY'S History of Man. BEAUCHAMP'S Essays, c. 1. sect. vi.

(1) Herodotus is no mighty admirer of Leotychides king of Sparta, for he expressly gives the preference to the Athenians, after them to the Corinthians, the Træsenians, and the Sicyonians (34); yet the truth seems to be, that Leotychides behaved with great prudence upon this occasion, as we have said above in the text; and there is one instance of his abilities as a general, which has been little taken notice of, and which it is our duty therefore particularly to mention here: He it was who contrived that miracle, as some called it, of the victory won at Plataea, not in consequence of any intelligence, for that was impossible, but believing it the best way to incline the Ionians to favour the Greeks; he industriously spread the pretended news, and at the same time openly invited the Ionians to throw off the yoke, and assert their freedom; whence, as is evident from the account in the text, this victory in a great measure proceeded (35). This conduct of his is very reconcilable to one of his sayings recorded by Plutarch: A Spartan in good circumstances asked one day this prince, How he might best preserve his happiness? Leotychides answered,

By not trusting all to fortune (36). It is certain that Leotychides was not a very adventurous admiral, but absolutely refused to accompany Xanthippus when he found the bridges removed which Xerxes had thrown cross the Hellepont; but this may be easily accounted for, without derogating at all from the courage and military capacity of the king of Sparta; the Athenians by nature, and by the constitution of their state, were inclined to maritime affairs, and enabled to obtain the empire of the sea, of which as yet Sparta had little ambition, though she possessed it; for, as Herodotus plainly says, the command was given her by the allies, who refused to follow any other than a Spartan admiral (37). Leotychides therefore did all in his power to serve the common cause, while the united fleet continued together in the Hellepont; but when slight descents were proposed, and the pillaging the enemies coasts and ships, he whose particular squadron was of no strength did not think fit to remain long at sea, because in all probability he conceived, that nothing could be further done worthy of the Spartan name and glory.

(34) Herodot. Hist. lib. ix. (35) Polyæn. Stratagem. lib. i. c. 33. Etb. vii. c. 45. Frontin. Stratagem. lib. i. c. 2. (36) Plutarch. Apophtheg. Lacen. (37) Herodot. lib. vii.

- a upon this he fell into a scandalous treaty with the Persians, affecting by the assistance of the great king to make himself sovereign of Greece; that at this time he first entered into these practices appears from hence, he sent such Persians of great quality as he took in Byzantium to Gongylus of Eretria, telling the Grecian chiefs that he reserved them for punishment, whereas he had privately given directions that they should be sent back in safety to Xerxes^a. As soon as he had conceived these strange notions in his head, he fell into the manners of the Persians, affected all their luxury, and derided the plain customs of his country, of which he had formerly been so fond; another action happened at Byzantium extremely prejudicial to his character, and which some say disturbed him to his death; he fell violently in love
- b with a young lady named Cleonice, whom her parents fearing to deny him, forced to take part of his bed; but she in great modesty desiring that the lights might be put out when she came in his chamber, unfortunately stumbled on an extinguished lamp, whereupon he awakening, and fearing that some assassin had broke into his room, caught up his sword, and mortally wounded her. His affliction for this accident put him almost beside himself^b; the allies in the mean time took great umbrage at his conduct, and privately sent to accuse him at Sparta; in the interim they deprived him of his command, and even besieged him in Byzantium^c; escaping however from thence, he fled to Heraclea, where he endeavoured, according to the methods then in use, to pacify the ghost of Cleonice. In this place he met with
- c certain persons who had or pretended to have the power of raising the spirits of persons deceased, and who at his intreaty brought up that of his mistress, who to all his questions gave him this short answer: When you come to Sparta, you will find an end to all your misfortunes^d. Accordingly, when he came home, the ephori caused him to be seized; but having no sufficient evidence, and not caring in all probability to proceed with rigour against so eminent a person on bare suspicions, he was for a time enlarged. These warnings did not deter him from carrying on the projects he had formed. Artabazus was the person he negotiated with, and between them they fixed this rule; that whoever brought any of Pausanias's epistles should immediately be put to death, that there might be no possibility of producing witnesses against
- d him^e. But growing impatient, and finding that Themistocles, notwithstanding the injuries done him by the Albenians, would not enter into his measures; Pausanias wrote in peremptory terms to Artabazus, and confided his letters to Argilius his particular favourite, and as some said his catamite. This man considering with himself that none of Pausanias's messengers were come back again, determined to open his letters, and finding by their contents that he was to have met with no better treatment than his predecessors, he carried them directly to the ephori, who discovered much from them, but yet not enough to convict Pausanias; but Argilius soon helped this out, for retiring to Tenarus, and pretending there to pay his devotions to Neptune, he set up a double tent; in one part of which he concealed certain Spartans, and
- e in the other he entertained Pausanias, who came to expostulate with him for not carrying his letters; by these expostulations, those who overheard them became direct witnesses against him, so that at his return to Sparta, the ephori determined to imprison him, of which, having some intelligence, he retired to the temple of Minerva Chalcidica, and there took sanctuary, which gave occasion to one of the most extraordinary proceedings any where recorded in history; for the Lacedæmonians not caring to invade the sanctuary, were at a loss what to do, till the mother of Pausanias taking a tile in her hand came to the temple, and laid it down at the door, after which, without speaking a word, she retired to her own house; the Spartans having considered her conduct, following her example, blocked up the gate, and thus
- f preventing his going out, reduced him to the necessity of starving in the temple. When they were sure he was dead, they opened the gate again, and taking out his body, delivered it to his relations^f. About this time Leotychides being sent with a great army to chastise the Thessalians, who had shewn themselves no friends to Greece in general, and expressed a particular enmity towards Sparta; instead of doing his duty, after he had obtained a victory, and reduced the enemy into very bad circumstances, began to receive bribes, and informations being thereupon given in a against him, was surprized in his tent with money in both hands. Returning to Sparta, and finding that the citizens were in no humour to dispense with his infidelity, he to avoid their fury fled to Tegea, and died there in exile, having survived his son Zeuxidamus, in whom he placed all his hopes^a.

^a DIOD. SICUL. lib. xi. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Pausan. ^b PLUT. in vit. Cimonis. ^c DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Pausan. ^d PLUT. in vit. Cimonis. ^e DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. JUSTIN. lib. ii. c. 15. ^f PLUT. in Paralel. x. in vit. Themist. in Apophth. Mulier. Lacon. THUCYD. lib. i. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Pausan. POLYÆN. Strategem. lib. viii. c. 51. DIODOR. ubi supra. JUSTIN. ubi supra.

The reigns of Plistarchus, Plistoanax, and of Archi-damus.

Plistarchus the son of Leonidas, to whom Pausanias was tutor, did not live long; he was succeeded by Plistoanax the son of Pausanias, the next legal heir of the royal family, as Leotychides was by his grandson Archidamus; as for Plistoanax, he was a prince of a very mild and peaceable disposition, one who gave no umbrage to his fellow citizens, and who in their quarrels with the Athenians acted according to their directions, and did not endeavour to embroil them, that he might make himself the more necessary to them^b. Archidamus was of a like disposition, and it may be truly said, that under the reigns of these princes the Spartans felt no mischiefs, but what they brought upon themselves, and had no good luck, but what was derived to them from their kings and their family; for in the nonage of Plistoanax Nicomedes the son of Cleombrotus acted as his tutor. At the end of the LXXVII olympiad a most dreadful earthquake happened at Sparta: Diodorus says, that twenty thousand persons lost their lives, and Plutarch affirms, that only five houses in the city escaped ruin; in the midst of this general confusion, Archidamus gave such an instance of his wisdom and firmness, as must render him everlastingly admired; considering with himself that his citizens were of far greater value than even their most valuable effects, and yet seeing that to save these they were ready to risque themselves, he caused an alarm to be sounded, as if an enemy had been just at hand, whereupon in haste they armed themselves, and repaired into the field, which wrought them double safety; for the Helotes now conceiving that they had a fit time to be revenged of their cruel masters, unanimously took up arms, and marched boldly to Sparta, expecting they should find none to withstand them; but they were greatly mistaken, for Archidamus, with his citizens completely armed, made such a stand, that they were constrained to retire. However, knowing they could now expect no favour from their lords, whom they had so ill treated in the time of their distress, they determined with themselves to persist in their revolt, and to trust d for a pacification to their swords, rather than to their intreaties^c. Many reasons contributed to strengthen the Helotes in this determination; the Spartans were already embroiled with the Athenians, who were inclined to dispute with them the sovereignty of Greece; the Messenians began to shew evident marks of their resentment of the indignities and oppressions which were thrown upon them; the rest of the Peloponnesian states were not a little dissatisfied, so that never were the Lacedæmonians less able to act vigorously against their rebellious subjects than at present. The first step they took after throwing off the yoke, was seizing a port in Messenia, from whence they made continual inroads into Laconia, burning and pillaging all the villages they came to; the Spartans in this distress applied themselves to Athens for assistance, e which after some opposition was granted them, and sent under the command of Cimon the son of Miltiades; they likewise solicited their other allies, who seeing the readiness of the Athenians, and considering the great services which all Greece had received from Sparta, they likewise sent their quota's, which enabled Archidamus to take the field, notwithstanding the Messenians had joined with the Helotes, and fortified Ithome^f. It is not very clear whether there happened any general battle or not; but however it was, the Helotes and Messenians thought it better to retire to Ithome, than to abide the Spartan army in the field, whereby the latter, much against their wills, were constrained to make the siege of this city; for as we have more than once observed, this was a part of the military science, in which the Lacedæmonians were but indifferently skilled; it was chiefly on this account that they besought the aid of the Athenians, and yet when their troops came before the city, and behaved themselves more actively than the Spartans themselves, they grew jealous of them, and being fearful lest the strangers in their army might be corrupted, and being countenanced by the Athenians, go over to the enemy; they dismissed the latter, telling them they had no farther occasion for their service, which exceedingly incensed the people of Athens, and made them more ready to think of any method to reduce the Spartan greatness

^a HEROD. lib. vi. PAUSAN. Lacon. ^b Idem, ibid. ^c DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PAUSAN. in Messen. JUSTIN. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Cimon. ^d DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xi.

- a than hitherto they had been¹. While things were in this situation, the Phocians made war upon the Dorians, who inhabited mount Parnassus, and took from them several cities, and amongst the rest their capital. These Dorians being originally Lacedæmonians, the Spartans dispatched an army under the command of Nicomedes; he quickly reduced the Phocians to reason, and set all things right; but returning with his army, the Athenians joined the Argives and Thebans, shut up the passages into Peloponnesus: Nicomedes upon this retired towards Tanagra in Bæotia, whither the Athenians followed him, and forced him to an engagement, wherein the Thebans deserting them, they had much the worst²; the next year the Lacedæmonians assisted the Thebans against the Athenians, but were therein so unfortunate as to be
- b totally routed at Tanagra with great loss. The Messenian war was still carried on, and was not like to be terminated even in the tenth year, Ithome being naturally a strong place, and the oracle at Delphi having threatened the Spartans, if they injured the suppliants of Jupiter Ithome, wherefore they were forced to turn their siege into a blockade, and at last hearkened to terms of accommodation, whereby it was agreed, that the Messenians should depart Peloponnesus, never to return on pain of becoming slaves, if they did³; these poor people were thereupon received with their wives and children by the Athenians, rather out of splendor to Sparta, than any great desire to render service to the distressed. They granted them Naupætus for their residence, from whence they afterwards brought them to inhabit part of
- c their own country, of which in the course of the Peloponnesian war they dispossessed the *Lacedæmonians*⁴. The next war the Lacedæmonians undertook was, that styled the sacred, by some the Phocian war; the end of it was to put the temple at Delphi into the hands of the inhabitants of the country, whereas it had before belonged to the Phocians, which the Spartans effected, and for which the Delphians by a decree conferred on the Lacedæmonians a right of first consulting the oracle, which decree they engraved on the forehead of a brazen wolf consecrated in the temple; the Athenians soon after restored the temple to the Phocians, and from them obtained the same privilege which the Delphians had granted to the Spartans, and this decree they caused to be engraven on the right side of the wolf; the *Lacedæmonians*⁵ having induced the
- d Bæotians, to revolt from the Athenians, and Tolmides, who attempted to reduce them, being slain, and Eubæa at the same time revolting, they held this a fit season for giving a mortal blow to Athens; for which cause Plistoanax was ordered to invade the Athenian territories with a great army with him; being but young, Cleondrides was sent to direct him, but he proved an unlucky guardian; for being a lover of money, he accepted a bribe from Pericles, and persuaded the king to return home without effecting any thing, for which the Spartans punished him with death, and drove their king into banishment; not long after a peace was made between this nation and the Athenians, which though it lasted for some time, yet was it far from extinguishing that hatred which for some time had burnt in the bosoms of both⁶.
- e At first the Athenians had the stronger party among the Greeks, because the Lacedæmonians had behaved with haughtiness while they held the sovereignty; but the Athenians gaining power, and making as bad use of it, or worse, almost all Greece except the states immediately under her jurisdiction, and even some of them, also hated her, and applied themselves to the Spartans: In the fourteenth year of the truce, which was to have lasted thirty, a great assembly of deputies from the states of Peloponnesus and other parts of Greece was held at Lacedæmon, where they unanimously accused the Athenians of tyranny, oppression, injustice, plundering them of vast sums of money, and in fine of a multitude of other crimes, beseeching the Lacedæmonians to stir in the common cause of Greece, and not suffer the Athenians
- f to effect what the Persian king with all his power was not able to perform. Some ambassadors of Athens, who were by chance in the city, defended the cause of their country stoutly. The Spartans however having heard both parties, were greatly inclined immediately to declare war against the *Athenians*⁷. But Archidamus like a wise and good prince, interposed, and advised them to weigh well the step they were about to take; he shewed them, that, comparing their own state with that of Athens, not only the aid of the Greeks, but of the Barbarians also was necessary;

¹ PLUT. in vit. Cimon. THUCYD. lib. i. ² DIOD. ubi supra. THUCYD. ubi supra. ³ PAUSAN. Messen. ⁴ THUCYD. lib. iv. ⁵ DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xi. PLUT. in vit. Periclis. ⁶ DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. ubi supra. THUCYD. lib. i. ⁷ DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xi. PLUT. in vit. Periclis JUSTIN. lib. iii. c. 7.

he demonstrated that the invasion of Attica would signify little, that if they went a slowly into this business, the Athenians might probably return to a proper temper, and make satisfaction to their allies, that at least they would preserve their own reputation, and would enable themselves to carry on the war with effect. But Sibnelaides, one of the ephori, declared himself of a different sentiment; he alledged, that it was a great happiness for Sparta that other states had taken umbrage at her rival, that if she was not quickly pulled down, their united strength would be too little, and that if they took not this opportunity, they might never have it in their power at all. At his motion therefore war was decreed immediately, after which deputies were sent to consult the oracle at Delphi, whence they received a response suited to their wishes: Embassadors were likewise sent to all the allies to desire them b to prepare their quotas, and also to Athens to offer peace upon certain conditions, which at the motion of Pericles were rejected^c.

The commencement of the Peloponnesian
war.

THE first action of the Peloponnesian war was the attempt made upon Platea by the Thebans; immediately after this both parties took the field, all the Peloponnesians except the Argives and Acæbeans sided with Sparta; without Peloponnesus the Megarians, Phocians, Locrians, Bæotians, Ambracots, Leucadians, and Anastorians; the Corinthians, Megarians, Sycionians, Pellenians, Eleans, Ambrosiots and Leucadians furnished ships, the Bæotians, Phocians and Locrians sent cavalry, the rest of the states furnished their respective quotas in foot. Archidamus at the head of a mighty army marched to the frontiers of Attica, from whence he dispatched a messenger to c Athens, being very desirous even to the last of avoiding if possible this war; but the messenger was sent back unheard, and the enemies of Archidamus beginning to insinuate, that out of friendship to the Athenians he betrayed the common cause, he marched into Attica, and penetrated within a few miles of Athens itself, destroying the country, and wasting all things in a terrible manner, after which he returned through Bæotia into Peloponnesus^d; in the mean time the Athenian fleet infested the coast of Laconia, and the troops on board it landing, besieged Metbone, to the relief of which Brosidas the Spartan hastened with a hundred men, and breaking with much ado through the enemy, got safe into the town, where he made so vigorous d a resistance, that the Athenians were forced to retire; the same year the inhabitants of Egina being expelled by the Athenians, fled into Peloponnesus, and had the district of Thyreæ assigned them by the Spartans. In the spring of the second year Archidamus entered Attica again, but after remaining there forty days, hearing that Pericles with a great army wasted Peloponnesus, he returned to assist his countrymen, the rather because the plague raged violently in Attica^e. In the third year Archidamus besieged Platea, which making an obstinate defence, he was constrained to turn his siege into a blockade. In the fourth year he entered Attica the third time, and wasted all the ripe corn, whereby the Athenians were greatly distressed; the same year the Mitylenians revolted from the Athenians, and in the winter of that year e Platea was reduced to such streights, that part of its garison forced their way through the Peloponnesian guards, and escaped to Athens; the rest were in the beginning of the next year forced to yield, and were all put to death, the city being razed to the ground, notwithstanding the general zeal she had expressed in the cause of Greece, in the memorable battle fought on her territories^f; this year also Archidamus died in a good old age, and after a very long reign; he was one of the best kings that Sparta ever had, and this will in some measure appear from the following saying of his, being asked, Who were governors at Sparta, he answered, The laws, and the magistrates according to these laws; he left behind him two sons, Agis and Agefilas, the eldest of which succeeded him^g.

The reign of Agis.
Year after the
flood 2331.
Before Christ
668.

In the spring after his father's death Agis invaded Attica, and while he was employed there the Athenians seized Pylus, whither he was forced to hasten, but to little purpose, a hundred and twenty of the nobility of Sparta being taken and sent prisoners to Athens; not long after the Athenians seized the island of Cythera, and filled it with a colony of Messenians, who proved the bitterest enemies, as indeed they might well, to the Lacedæmonians^h. Thyreæ was also taken, and the poor inhabitants of Egina who had settled there were massacred. To remove the war to a greater

^c THUCYD. lib. i. ^d DIODOR. THUCYD. PLUT. in vit. Periclis. ^e THUCYD. lib. ii. DIODOR. lib. xii. JUSTIN. lib. iv. CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Cimón. PLUT. in vit. Periclis. ^f THUCYD. lib. iii. PLUT. ubi supra. ^g PLUT. Apophthegm. Lacon. ^h THUCYD. lib. iv. DIOD. SICUL.

- a distance, the Lacedæmonians sent Brasidas their famous general into Thrace, where he effectually answered their expectations, and humbled the pride of the Athenians. When he was about to march with the army, proclamation was made by the command of the ephori, that such of the Helotes as were willing to enlist themselves as volunteers should be manumitted; which proposition being joyfully accepted by two thousand of them, they were accordingly set at liberty, but their liberty consisted only in being shewn a short road into another world; for they having pointed out to their jealous masters, who amongst them were most warlike; they were immediately dispatched privately, and seven hundred of the stoutest of the remaining Helotes were together with a thousand mercenary Peloponnesians sent with Brasidas^a. Thucydides
- b the historian commanded the Athenian forces at that time in Thrace, and performed there whatever could be expected from a wise man, and an experienced commander; but the fortune of Brasidas, the valour of his forces, and the proneness of the people of the country to side with him against the Athenians, gave such high advantages to the Lacedæmonians and their allies, that Amphipolis and several other cities were taken. The use made of this at Sparta was to set new negotiations on foot, partly because the war was very burthensom, and partly because Brasidas was greatly envied. With much ado a truce was concluded for a year, at the end of which Brasidas fell upon Cleon, who commanded the Athenian forces in the neighbourhood of Amphipolis, and gained a great victory, Cleon himself with six hundred Athenians
- c being slain, with the loss only of seven Spartans; and yet this victory was too dear, Brasidas being mortally wounded. He was certainly one of the bravest and one of the modestest men of his age, admired of all men for his great exploits, while at the same time he behaved with as much humility as the meanest citizen at Sparta; he exactly made good the letter he sent the ephori, when he first arrived in Thrace, and which was conceived in these words; What is for the honour of the state, I will perform, or die^b. Plutarch has preserved a saying of his, which both its good sense, and its being his, render worthy of being transcribed here. Looking one day among some dried figs, he caught a mouse, which immediately turned, and bit his fingers, whereupon he let it go; You see, said he, to some who stood
- d near him, That creatures that have but little strength can get rid of invaders, if they dare exert the little they have^c. The great mischiefs which this captain had wrought the Athenians, and the mighty loss which the Spartans conceived they had sustained by his death, determined both states to put an end to the war; Plytoanax laboured all he could to promote this disposition, persuading himself that in a time of peace he should be better able to deal with his mutinous subjects than while a war was carrying on, the various events of which put it in their power to find daily new matter of reproach against him. We have seen on what account he was banished, and we are assured that he lived in exile nineteen years; his return was wrought by a response from Delphi, concerning which the Spartans affected afterwards to have many doubts, whether it came really from the god, or from some of Plytoanax's agents^d.
- e The king however getting the ephori for the time present to join with him, procured a peace to be concluded after the war had raged ten years. The peace was hardly made before new intrigues were set on foot in Peloponnesus; the Corinthians, and in general the allies of Sparta were greatly offended with the peace, because it did not exactly answer their private purposes; besides they were apprehensive lest Sparta and Athens should enter into a close union, whereby the dominion of Peloponnesus might be left to the former, and the sovereignty of the islands with the Grecian colonies in Asia transferred to the latter. To defeat this scheme, if any such there was or should be, several of the Peloponnesian states leagued themselves with Argos, a very powerful republic, which had never any great friendship for Sparta,
- f and which at this time seemed to threaten her; this league made the Lacedæmonians very uneasy, and the more when they found that the Argives, and those who were allied with them were negotiating at Athens. Thither therefore the Lacedæmonians sent their ambassadors, who in all probability would have carried their point, if they had depended upon Nicias their old and constant friend; but suffering themselves to be deceived by the artifices of Alcibiades, who acting on his uncle Pericles's maxims sought to revive the war, they themselves were drawn to give the Athenians

^a THUCYD. lib. iv. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xii. ^b THUCYD. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.
^c PLUT. Apophtheg. Lacon. ^d PLUT. Apophtheg. Lacon. ^e THUCYD. lib. v. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xii.
 PLUT. in vit. Nic.

great suspicion^a. The next year the new ephori grew likewise fond of war, and though Nicias strongly laboured to compose all differences, yet all he could obtain was no more than the swearing to the peace anew, which he well enough understood would not content his citizens^b. In the summer when the XCth olympiad was celebrated, the Lacedæmonians received an high affront. The Eleans refused to let them sacrifice, or in any manner partake of the sacred rites, placing a strong guard on the temple in order to prevent it; the reason assigned for this was, that the Lacedæmonians, while former olympics were held, had seized the castle of Pboricus, for which they were fined two hundred drachmæ, which fine they not having paid, they insisted on excluding them. The Lacedæmonians would have excused themselves by their ambassadors, but their excuses were not accepted, and so they were forced to sacrifice at home, which highly incensed them^c (K). A quarrel happened in the winter between the Heracleans of Trachinia, and the Thebssians, wherein Penares a Lacedæmonian general was slain; however the Corinthians were with-held from joining with the Argives, which gave some hopes that the power of that republic might be weakened^d. The next year the Argives attempted to surprize Epidaurus, in hopes of securing themselves on that side against the Corinthians, and also open an easy passage to their allies the Athenians; in the winter the Lacedæmonians put a garison of three hundred men into Epidaurus. The next summer Sparta resolved to exert herself, and to crush at once the Argives and their allies. With this view the ephori and senate sent to exhort all their confederates to be in readines to take the field early, as they themselves would be; they accordingly appeared, and king Agis at the head of the Spartans, Arcadians, Boeotians, Corinthians, Sicyonians, Pellenians, Pblasians and Megarians, entered the territory of Argos with such an army as had not been seen since the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. The Argives were very ill prepared, the succours they expected from Athens not being arrived; however they resolved to fight, though with inferior forces; but at the very instant the engagement should have begun, two of the Argive captains cried out to king Agis, that their citizens were willing to do whatever was just, and to make peace with the Lacedæmonians; which made such an impression on the king, who was a prince of a mild and benevolent disposition, that he immediately consented to a truce of four months; which exceedingly provoked the allies of Sparta, who could not bear after all their

^a THUCYD. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alcibiad. ^b DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit Nic. ^c THUCYD. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PAUSAN. in Elieis. ^d DIODOR. & THUCYD. ubi supra.

(K) Of the Olympic games we have elsewhere spoken somewhat, but not enough to make either this and many other passages, which will hereafter follow, perfectly clear; and therefore we will take this opportunity of supplying these deficiencies here (38). The olympiads were not, as some imagine, celebrated every fifth year, nor were they, strictly speaking celebrated every fourth year. They were held in the second month of the fifth year, or, if it be possible to express it clearer, after the completion of four full years (39). They began on the eleventh day of the lunar month, and lasted till the fifteenth, when the moon was full; there are various accounts of the institutions of these games, but the most satisfactory is that given by Strabo, who in his description of Elis says, that an Æolian colony, together with some of Hercules's posterity, after having subdued many of the Pisæan towns, and amongst them Olympia, there instituted these solemnities (40). The care and management of these games belonged originally to the Pisæans, but afterwards to the Eleans, by whom the Pisæans were destroyed, and their very name extinguished; for the most part this nation enjoyed a profound tranquillity, the Greeks out of a religious respect to their superintendancy of these games, not suffering the sound of war to be heard amongst them; which will be the less wondered at, if we consider that during the celebration of these games there was a general truce, that all the inhabitants of Greece might be at liberty to assist at them; and in consequence of a breach of this truce, the Eleans proceeded in the manner above described against the Spartans (41). The security which for the generality these people enjoyed, made them addict themselves more to husbandry than any other people of Greece, because they were under no sort of restraint nor apprehension in their fields, but were considered as servants of the Olympian Jupiter. At first they appointed one judge only: At the fifteenth olympiad they assigned two, and by degrees these swelled to no less than twelve, one being chosen out of each of the Elean tribes (42). When the Arcadians became too powerful for the Eleans, the number decreased again; yet even in the reign of the Roman emperor Adrian there were no fewer of them than ten. All the persons who sought to contend in these games were obliged to appear ten months before at Elis, where from that time till the games were over they were obliged to reside, and to prepare themselves after a certain settled method for their exercise. At the solemnity the Hellandice, that is, the Elean judges sat naked, having the vicloral crown before them, which, when the games were over, they presented to him whole due they conceived it to be (43).

(38) Universal History, Vol. II. p. 487. (39) Joban. Tract. Chilid. 1. Hist. 21. (40) Geogr. lib. viii. (41) Diod. Sicul. lib. xi. (42) Pausan. in Elieis. (43) Cælius Rhodiginus Antiq. Inst. lib. xxii. c. 17. Alex. ab Alexand. Genial. Disc. lib. v. c. 8.

- a preparations to see nothing effected. On the return therefore of Agis to Sparta, his citizens condemned him to pay a great fine, and would have rased his house, if he had not promised them to redeem his honour by some great exploit, when he should be next employed, with which however they were hardly to be pacified; but what seems more extraordinary is, that the Argives were so unreasonable as to punish their captains for having preserved them from ruin, nay they carried their rage so far, that they had certainly knocked them in the head with stones, if they had not retired into sanctuary^a. The true reason why the Argives were so warm was, because the Athenians had sent them a supply of one thousand foot, and three hundred horse under the command of Alcibiades, at whose instigation they solemnly renounced the truce made with Agis. When the Spartans, where informed of this, they prepared to take the field; but they would not intrust their king with the command of the army, without assigning him ten counsellors or field-deputies, without whose approbation he was to attempt nothing. At Mantineæ the armies fronted each other, being the greatest that the Greeks had ever brought into the field against each other; but the Argives and their allies were more numerous than the Spartans; some therefore advised king Agis not to fight, to which he answered coolly, If we would rule many, we must fight many^b. He disposed his troops in excellent order, and gave directions suitable to the occasion; but the generals under him did not behave so well, so that while the right wing which was under his command carried all before it, the left was routed, which when Agis beheld, he notwithstanding continued his pursuit; and when the enemy was entirely broken in their left and centre, he turned short, and charged their right in flank and rear, and after an obstinate resistance defeated them also, and gained a complete victory. King Plisfoanax with a body of reserve which had been left at Sparta, hearing of the great assistance which the Argives had received, marched to the reinforcement of Agis and his countrymen; but arrived not till the victory was gained, so that his presence being no longer necessary, he returned presently after with his troops to Lacedæmon. The Argives and their allies lost eleven hundred men in this battle, in which there fell three hundred Spartans; as for the allies of Sparta, as they did little, so they suffered little^c. After this things continued in Greece in great confusion, the faction in Argos who were for oligarchy siding with Sparta, those who affected democracy with the Athenians, great stirrs there were, and little peace; the Athenians at last ventured to break the league by attacking the isle of Melos, of which however the Spartans would take no notice, only they caused proclamation to be made, that since the Athenians prey'd upon their subjects without regard to laws, their subjects might if they pleased prey upon the Athenians. The miseries which her ambition had brought upon her were so evident in this state, that she began now to act with more wisdom and mildness than hitherto she had done; the Helotes were treated with lenity, a thousand of them were actually set at liberty for the service they had performed under Brasidas; their allies were used with mildness and respect, and the consequences of these measures were, that matters began to take another aspect; the Athenians grasping too many things, and acting haughtily, were despised, while Sparta gained the command, and the hearts of most of the Peloponnesians^d. In the last year of the XCIId olympiad Plisfoanax died; the last act of his life which was memorable was resettling the affairs of the Parrhasians, who were torn with intestine wars; during the time of his exile his son Pausanias had the regal title, his uncle Cleomenes acting as his tutor; but when Plisfoanax was recalled, he again assumed the regal dignity, in which the same Pausanias succeeded him at his death^e.

- Agis* king of Sparta was sent with an army against the Eleans to revenge the Agis enters f dishonour done the republic by forbidding them to be present at the Olympian the territories games. This war was of some continuance, the first year the king penetrated as of Elis.
far almost as the mount Olympus; but an earthquake happening while he was in the Year after the field, his forces would needs return home. The next year Agis invaded Elis again, Flood, 2276.
and did a great deal of mischief; whereupon Xenias an Elean put himself at the head Before Christ of a party, and declared for the Lacedæmonians, seeking in truth to establish 723.
an oligarchy; but Thrasylus, who was at the head of the other faction, prevailed, and drove him out of the city; the third year Agis entered Elis again, and after ^a THUCYD. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra. PAUSAN. in Argol. PLUT. in vit. Alcibiad. ^b PLUT. Apophthegm. Lacon. ^c THUCYD. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alcibiad. ^d PAUSAN. Lacon. THUCYD. ubi supra. ^e THUCYD. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.

remaining there some time, he left a part of his army under the command of Lyfibratus a Spartan, with orders to support Xenias and his friends. Thrasylarus seeing plainly that his country would be ruined, came to a composition with Xenias, and by his means treated with the Spartans, whereupon a peace ensued^b. The Peloponnesian war now broke out again: The Athenians had sent a great army into Sicily, the consequence of which being considered, the Lacedæmonians sent Gylippus to assist the Syracusians with a small force, but with promise of farther supply, which was likewise performed^c. About the same time Alcibiades repaired to Sparta, being expelled his own country by a prevailing faction; he fell immediately into the Spartan manner of living, which equally endeared him to the men and to the women; to the former he promised that he would put them in a short train of ending the war, and to the latter he pretended that there were no women comparable to those of Sparta. Agis was at first so charmed with him, that he took him home to his house; but he made him a very ill return for that favour by debauching his wife. As to the promises he had made the senate, he performed them tolerably well; for when he went with Agis to invade Attica, he advised him to fortify the castle of Decelea, which had never been thought of before, and which proved such a thorn to the Athenians, as distressed them more than all that happened to them besides; for now the Spartans did not come, as formerly, once a year into their neighbourhood, but were there continually, so that either they could not plough or sow at all, or, if they did, their enemies bore away the crop^d. The Spartans were so well pleased at this counsel of Alcibiades, that they cried him up as a captain far superior to any of their own chiefs, which brought on him the envy of the nobility, which with the jealousy of Agis made him glad to quit Laconia to seek among the Barbarians a place of safety. Timea the wife of Agis brought forth about this time a son, who was called Leotychides, concerning whom Agis said publickly that Alcibiades was his father; Timea increased the suspicion as to her son's birth by her own foolish behaviour, for she was ever telling her maids, that the boy's name ought to be Alcibiades instead of Leotychides; and thus, while the child's birth was canvassed at home, Alcibiades confirmed all the suspicions abroad, by saying openly that he did not debauch Timea out of lust, but from the ambition he had of having some^d of his posterity reign over the Spartans; but his folly defeated his wickedness, as we shall see hereafter, and deprived the unhappy Leotychides of his succession. Gylippus all this while managed their affairs in Sicily with great reputation; at first he was little set by even among the Syracusians, whom he came to assist, because of the plainness of his garb, and of his speech; but when by degrees they came to know him better, when they saw that the soldiers confided in him, and that great succours were sent him from Peloponnesus, they treated him with greater respect, and at last run into the other extreme, and would have put all things into his hands; but he was far from making an ill use of his power, he knew he was sent to relieve the Sicilians, and not to oppress them; he was however covetous, and we shall see^e hereafter how that vice not only tarnished all his good qualities, but destroyed his fortune, and ruined his reputation^f. The defeat of the Athenians in Sicily filled the Spartans with great hopes; they neglected not therefore any means that could be thought of, either to depress their rival's affairs, or to raise their own; Astyocheus was sent to command the foreign troops which were raised with Persian money: King Agis managed the war in the heart of Attica, where he had all the summer a good army, besides the garison in Decelia^g. Lysander was now employed in maritime affairs, who as he proved the great hero of Sparta, and the finisher of the Peloponnesian war; it is fit that we should in this place give the reader his character. Plutarch says, that though it is not certain that he was of either of the royal families, yet it was generally agreed, that he was of the Herculean race. His education was truly Spartan, that is, he passed his younger years under all the restrictions of the Lycurgic institutes, which rendered him bold, hardy, patient, and capable of great things; he was naturally ambitious, had an extensive genius, was affable, in his behaviour modest, vigilant, and indefatigable; but with these great qualities he had some

^a PAUSAN. in Eleis. ^b THUCYD. lib. vi. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiii. PLUT. in vit. Nic. JUSTIN. l. iv. ^c DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Alcibiad. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Alcibiad. ^d DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiii. PLUT. in vit. Alcibiad. & Agesil. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Alcibiad. JUSTIN. lib. v. c. 2. ^e DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Nic. JUSTIN. iv. 4. ^f THUCYD. lib. vi. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiii.

a mean ones, he could to serve his own purposes be very supple and complaisant, which was highly repugnant to the Spartan customs ; he was not much affected with the love of Greece, but conversed freely with all sorts of people, and sought above all things to raise his own credit and authority ; the worst of all was, that he was absolutely dishonest, and, which is not a little strange, sought not to conceal it, it being a common saying of his, That children were cheated with play things, and men with oaths ; for which reason he never denied his when it made for his interest, or stuck at breaking it when to keep it would serve his purposes no longer. He found the Athenians greatly superior at sea, when he entered upon command, and yet in a very few years he left them without any power at all^a. The first thing of importance that he did, was restoring the state of affairs at Ephesus ; he found that city very convenient, he therefore engaged the principal men in it to side with Sparta, and above all things to attach themselves to him ; he shewed them how conveniently they were seated for trade, he brought his ships to be refitted in their port, and when once he had gained the confidence of the Ephesians he took equal care to promote their interests, and to make theirs subservient to his. Astyoebus having managed foolishly, and given Alcibiades an opportunity of instilling into Tissaphernes notions prejudicial to the Lacedæmonians, Lysander, who saw clearly that without the Barbarian gold Sparta could not carry on the war, determined with himself to counterplot both Tissaphernes and Alcibiades, by applying himself to Cyrus, who then resided at Sardis ; thither therefore he went, and fully opened to the young prince the treachery of his father's lieutenant ; Cyrus readily heard him, and by degrees the Spartan won so much upon him, that he made him a promise in few words to grant him whatever he should request ; Lysander modestly required that a small addition might be made to the soldiers pay, which disinterestedness so much charmed Cyrus, that he gave him ten thousand pieces of silver, which he made use of to support his soldiers, and refit his fleet. Agis in the mean time being informed of great stir in Athens, attempted to surprize it, but without effect, for the citizens on his approach united among themselves, and sallied with such unexpected fury, that they killed a considerable number of his men^b. They afterwards offered to make peace, but the Spartans considering the unsettledness of their government, refused so much as to hear their propositions ; some short time after Hegesandrides a Spartan reduced Eubæa, and if he had prosecuted his success with ardor, might have taken Athens itself ; but this opportunity being neglected, Alcibiades in a very short space so restored their affairs by defeating and killing Mindarus, who had succeeded Astyoebus, that the Spartans in their turn were forced to sue to the Athenians, who with great haughtiness rejected the propositions they offered, though highly reasonable in themselves. When Alcibiades sailed again into the Hellepont, after he had been at Athens, Lysander finding himself too weak to engage so numerous a fleet under so fortunate a general, kept in the port of Ephesus, where he carefully refitted his ships, and kept his soldiers and his mariners to their exercise. At length it so happened, that Alcibiades had occasion to go from Samos to Phœcea, whereupon he committed the care of his fleet to Antiochus a favourite of his, who proud of his command, quickly forgot the instructions which had been given him, and sailing out of port with two gallees only, went with them to the mouth of the haven of Ephesus, where he insulted Lysander ; this inconsiderate action produced in the end a general engagement, wherein the Athenians were defeated, though with no very considerable loss, and yet this accident destroyed all their affairs ; for upon the first news of it they dismissed Alcibiades, and with him their good fortune. Lysander while he lay at Ephesus projected a scheme for making himself in a manner sovereign of Greece ; he picked up enterprising men of various cities, and engaging them to settle at Ephesus, advised them to live in strict friendship among themselves, and to study political affairs, for that he would suddenly find employment for them^c. All this, and indeed the whole tenor of his behaviour, made him extremely grateful to the Ephesians, and the rest of the cities in that part of the world, so that when Callicratidas was sent him for a successor, all the Asiatick Greeks were extremely uneasy ; this uneasiness increased at the presence of the new admiral, who was the very reverse of Lysander, a man of great parts, great courage, but withal of great virtue, and unbiased integrity¹. Lyfander dealt with him very basely, he sent back what money remained in his hands to Cyrus, and said to his successor at parting, with a sneer, Let us see now, Callicradas, how you can support the charges of this army. The noble Spartan found it indeed very difficult, the people were quite drained, treasure there was none, so he was forced to go to the court of Cyrus, where being two or three times refused admittance, being sometimes told that the king was busy, at other times that he was drinking, he at last said, I must not be so eager for money, as to do any thing unbecoming Sparta: Whereupon he set sail for Ephesus. Cyrus considering better of the matter, sent him afterwards money to pay his forces, and some presents for himself; the first he took, but the latter he sent back again with this memorable message, *That there needed no private friendship between Cyrus and him, because if the king kept up to the terms of his league with the Lacedæmonians, he shou'd think himself included therein*². He defeated Conon the Athenian Admiral, and besieged him in Mytelene; he likewise beat a small fleet that was sent to his assistance; but hearing afterwards that the enemy's grand fleet was at Arginusæ over-against Lesbos, where he was stationed, he resolved to engage; when he sacrificed in the morning, the priest who consulted the intrails, told him, that the fleet should in the end prosper, but that the admiral would certainly be slain: To which he answered without any concern, Very well then, let us fight, Sparta will not lose much in losing me; but she would lose her honour, if I retired in the fight of the enemy; when I fall, let Cleander be your admiral. He was accordingly slain, and by that means the Spartan affairs were put into much disorder³. After this mishap both Cyrus and the allies of Lacedæmon demanded that Lyfander should be sent admiral again, a request directly opposite to the laws of Sparta; however to gratify their request, they gave the title of admiral to one Aracus, but lodged the power with Lyfander, who immediately sailed to the Hellspont, where after receiving great supplies from Cyrus, he drew together his fleet; but finding the Athenians much superior to him in numbers, he wisely avoided an engagement, and afterwards giving them the slip, appeared suddenly in the neighbourhood of Greece, and made descents on the islands of Ægina and Salamis; he sailed over to the coast of Attica to shew Agis, who was come thither with a land army, what a noble navy was under his power⁴. Yet having intelligence that the Athenian fleet was approaching, he stood away for the Hellspont, where he besieged and took *Lampsacus*⁵. Conon with the grand fleet of Athens bearing down upon him thither, he retired to the river Egos, there the Athenians insulting him for many days together, which Lyfander bore with wonderful patience, keeping his soldiers and mariners continually on duty, till on a sudden when the Athenians had debarked their forces, he unawares attacked them both by land and sea. Conon the admiral saw clearly that all things were lost, so he with eight gallies, and a very considerable body of men, fled away to Cyprus; the rest fell intirely into the hands of Lyfander, who in a single hour put an end to the Peloponnesian war, and to the maritime power of *Athens*⁶.

^a PLUT. in vit. Lysand. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiii. JUSTIN. lib. v. c. 6. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Lysand. THUCYD. lib. vi. ^b DIODOR. lib. xiii. THUCYD. lib. vi. ^c PLUT. in vit. Lysander. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiii.

The Athenians
entirely de-frated by Ly- fander.
Year after the food 2593.
Before Christ
406.

THIS mighty victory having put all things into the power of Lyfander, he acted rather as a universal monarch, than as a general from Sparta; he immediately visited all the neighbouring cities, and changed whether they would or not their government, placing in each of them a Spartan as chief magistrate, and with him ten of his friends from Ephesus, where, as we have before observed, he erected a kind of political university. These men as they came in by force, so they kept no measures with those over whom they ruled, they treated them with the utmost haughtiness and severity, so that from the very beginning the Lacedæmonian government was rendered ungrateful, and the people universally disposed to shake it off as soon as they could⁷. As he was no hoarder of money, he collected all the mass of wealth which his victories had brought into his hands, and destined it to be sent to Sparta, whither he had before dispatched a messenger with news of his victory, and with an assurance that he would be shortly with a fleet of two hundred sail before the city of Athens; in confidence of this the Spartans sent both their kings Agis and Pausanias with a very great army into Attica, on the coasts of which in due time Lyfander

¹ THUCYD. lib. vi. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Lyfander. ² PLUT. Apophthegm. LACON. in vit. Lyfander. ³ THUCYD. lib. vi. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiii. PLUT. Apophthegm. LACON. ⁴ DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiii. ⁵ PLUT. in vit. Lyfander. XENOPH. HELL. lib. ii. ⁶ XENOPHON, ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Lyfander. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. ejusd. JUSTIN. lib. v. c. 6. ⁷ XENOPHON, ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra.

- a arrived. As to what happened remarkable in the siege of Athens, we have already insisted thereon in its proper place. Here it is enough that we insert the Spartan decree contained in the articles granted to the dejected inhabitants of that once famous place, which decree is preserved by Plutarch, and runs thus: Know this is the decree of the Lacedæmonians. Pull ye down the Pyreum, and the long walls, quit all the towns you are now possessed of, and keep within your own territories. We grant you peace upon these conditions, provided you yield also to what shall be further thought reasonable, and receive again your exiles. As for the number of ships you may keep, observe the orders we shall hereafter give on that head. Lyfander deprived them of all their vessels except twelve, and having their fortifications delivered into his hands, he entered Athens in triumph
- b on the anniversary of the great victory at Salamis; he caused the walls to be demolished to the sound of music, which likewise played while the Athenian ships were burning, himself and his commanders having garlands on their heads; he also altered the government, established the thirty tyrants, and left a Spartan garison in the citadel commanded by one of his own creatures*. The next thing he did was to send the immense treasure he had collected to Sparta under the care of Gylippus, who had so eminently distinguished himself in Sicily, and who found a way to distinguish himself no less eminently on this occasion, though less honourably; for he, little regarding the seals upon the money bags, ript them open at the bottom, and having taken out what money he thought proper, sewed them up again. When he arrived
- c at Lacedæmon, he delivered the money as he had been directed, and desired that particular notice might be taken of the fairness of the seals; but, unluckily for him, Lyfander had put in each bag a ticket, expressing the sum of money contained therein; upon comparing these notes with the sums contained, a deficiency was discovered, but still the ephori and senate were at a loss where to fix it; at last the servant of Gylippus impeached him; and his crime, with all its circumstances, being detected, he was forced to leave his native country, and to go into exile with the scandalous imputation of being a cheat and a thief (L). The coming of this huge mass of wealth created great disputes at Sparta, many celebrated Lyfander's praises, and rejoiced exceedingly at this good fortune, as they called it; others, who were better
- d acquainted with the nature of things, and with their constitution, were of quite another opinion; they looked upon the receipt of this treasure as an open violation of the laws of Lycurgus, and they expressed their apprehensions loudly, that in process of time they might by a change in their manners pay infinitely more for this money than it was worth; at last a compromise was proposed and agreed to, whereby it was

* PLUTARCH. in vit. Lyfander. XENOPH. Hellan. lib. ii. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Lyfander. PLUT. in vit. Lyfander. DIODOR. ubi supra.

(L) Gylippus the Spartan had this vice of covetousness hereditary in his family; his father Chæarchus having, as we have before shewn, suffered banishment for accepting a bribe from Pericles, when he entered Attica with an army (42). Authors are pretty much divided as to the character of this man. Plutarch every where represents him as a person of courage, integrity and humanity, till this last act (43); but Diodorus the Sicilian gives him quite another character; he introduces him making two long speeches at Syracuse to influence the Sicilians to shew the Athenians no mercy; this is directly contrary to what other historians have written, and on what authority he reports those orations we know not (44). It is true, the favour he was in with Lyfander seems to throw a shade on his character; for we do not find that this ambitious general either loved or trusted men of strict honour, and from the beginning Gylippus was one of his creatures; it was he who preferred him to the command in Sicily, and in the present case, as a signal mark of his confidence, sent him with the treasure he had collected in the war, to Sparta; so that to speak the truth, this was not only a publick theft, but an act of private ingratitude, and therefore we need not wonder that his patron, who in other respects was ready enough to protect his friends, even in ill things, abandoned him. How Gylippus came to trust his servant we are not acquainted; but the manner in which that servant of his betrayed him, Plutarch tells us pleasantly enough. "The magistrates, says he, finding the money in the bags less than what was expressed in the notes contained in them, were surprized, but did not in the least suspect him who had the care of the money, till Gylippus's servant betrayed the secret; and told them by way of riddle, That he had observed a great many owls to roost in the Ceramicus. The ephori soon found out that by owls pieces of money were to be understood, because most of the coin then bore the impression of an owl in respect to the Athenians; and that the Ceramicus, a place in Athens so called, because of a tile-kiln that had been there, signified likewise the roof of an house by reason of the tiles called Ceramoi; thus the mystery came to be understood, and Gylippus having stained his former reputation with this mean action, was ashamed to appear any more at Lacedæmon (45)."

(42) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi.
(45) In vit. Lyfander.

(43) In vit. Nicia & in vit. Lyfand.

(44) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xii.

enacted, That the state might make use of gold and silver, but that private men should possess neither on pain of capital punishments, which resolution of theirs, as Plutarch observes, was shallow, superficial, and ineffectual, because declaring money to be useful to the state, evidently justified the inclination of private men to be possessed of it, while at the same time the law made the gratification of that inclination penal^a. Lysander in the mean time returning to the Hellepont, returned also to his old practices there, changing governments, new-modelling cities, liberally and even profusely rewarding his friends, and at the same time pursuing to death and utter destruction such as he suspected to be his enemies. While he remained in Greece, he had done some very extraordinary things, which sufficiently betrayed the height of an imperious disposition; he set up his own statue, and the statues of such of his commanders who were in his good graces, in brass; he dedicated two stars in honour of the deities Castor and Pollux, in order to keep up an opinion which his sycophants had taken care to propagate, that these stars were seen in the rigging of his ship at the battle of Egos^b. But if he acted thus in Greece, he set less bounds to his ambition in Asia, where he made not only the Greek cities dependent on him, but struck terror into the Persian governors, and particularly maltreated Pbarnabazus. This Persian grandee was a man of profound capacity, and a master in Lysander's science of dissimulation: He saw that little was to be expected from any representations he could make to this haughty general, surrounded by a number of powerful persons, made so merely by his favour; he cast about therefore to find out surer protectors, though at a greater distance, and with this view dispatched some of his emissaries to Sparta. There they began to open, without apprehension of danger, the iniquity of Lysander's conduct, they set his ambitious designs in their proper light, they charged him with an intention to render himself a general for life, and independent of his constituents; and they alledged such probable reasons for what they said, that the ephori and senate immediately dispatched a Scytale to recall this terror of Asia. They began likewise to inspect narrowly the conduct of his friends in Greece, put some of them to death, and among the rest Thorax one of his principal commanders, in whose house, in contravention of the late law, they found a large quantity of silver. The surprize of Lysander was inexpressible, when the messenger of the state presented the Scytale which recalled him (M): He had no previous intelligence of it, nor could he immediately guess by whom it was obtained, but on recollection, he determined in himself that it must have been by the procurement of Pbarnabazus; this discovery made him more solicitous, especially when he heard what had happened at home, he therefore resolved, according to his stated maxim, to eke out the lion's with the fox's skin^c; in consequence of this he demanded a conference, to which Pbarnabazus readily yielded. At this meeting Lysander made use of all his art to soften the Persian, and

^a PLUT. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra.^b PLUT. ubi supra.^c PLUT in Apophthegm.

(M) In this note we intend to explain the Scytale of the Lacedæmonians; but first, let us hear what Plutarch says of them: "The nature and use, says he, of this was; when the magistrates gave their commission to any admiral or general, they took two round pieces of wood, both exactly equal in breadth and thickness; one they kept themselves, the other was delivered to their officer, so that when they had any thing of moment which they would secretly convey to him, they cut a long narrow scrawl of parchment, and rowling it about their own staff, one fold close upon another, they wrote their business on it; when they had wrote what they had to say, they took off the parchment and sent it to the general, he applied it to his own staff, which being just like that of the magistrates, the folds fell in with each other, exactly as they did at the writing; and the characters which before it was wrapped up, were confusedly disjoined, and altogether unintelligible, appeared then very plainly (46)". There are many things omitted in this account which we shall endeavour to supply from other authors. Texetes calls them wands, which the ephori delivered to the general or admiral when he set out to take upon him the command; he says they were very short and very slender, the parchment being also narrow, which they made use of to fold round them (47). It is very probable, that our author conjectured this from the usual shortness of the Spartan epistles; for Demetrius Trichinius tells us expressly, that the Scytale was between three and four cubits long; he does indeed suggest that there was but one of them which was split in two, and one half being given to the general, the other half remained at home (48); but Aulus Gellius (49), and the scholiast on Aristophanes say expressly there were two (50); Thucydides says, the Scytale was round, smooth, and long, (51); the scholiast on Pindar, that it was made of a black wood (52). It should seem that besides this state-Scytale, private men made use of a contrivance of the like nature to prevent deceits in contracts, but then these were exactly like our tallies.

(46) Plut. in vit. Lysander.(47) Joan. Texetes. var. Hist. Chil. ix. c. 258.(48) Ad. Pindar.Olymp. Od. vi.(49) NoB. Attic. lib. xvii. cap. 9.(50) Ad. Avu. Aristoph.(51) Bell.Pelop. lib. i.(52) Olymp. vi.

- a to engage him by a letter under his hand to deny what might have been suggested in his name to the ephori and senate, to which with some difficulty Pbarnabazus agreed; he wrote this letter in Lyfander's presence, and in terms suitable to his wish; but he had before prepared a letter of quite a different nature, and substituted it while he pretended to fold the other, so that here the deceiver was deceived, and Lyfander with all his skill outwitted*. Receiving this letter, he set out immediately for Sparta, but when he was informed of its contents, he was mightily disturbed, and fearing lest he should be called to an account, pretended that he had seen a vision, wherein Jupiter Ammon had commanded him to come immediately and consult his oracle. The ephori and senate shewed a good deal of reluctance in granting his request, but as soon as he was gone, the kings of Sparta began to contrive the destruction of his friends, that he might no longer have such an interest in Asia as at this time he had. The Athenians at this time taking arms against their tyrants, Lyfander hearing thereof, returned suddenly to Sparta, where he vehemently pressed the government to support those he had established at Athens, and that they would make use of him as commander in chief in that expedition. This greatly alarmed the kings, wherefore they determined to make use of all their interest to prevent it. Pausanias therefore procured the command of the army to be vested in him, and marched, as it was generally understood, to support the tyrants against the people of Athens; but in truth his design was to reconcile the Athenians, and to compromise their differences with Sparta, that Lyfander might not have the honour of conquering this city twice, which he also effected, and which Lyfander highly resented. Not long after he had an opportunity of venting his spleen, and of reconciling himself to the people; for the Athenians according to the fickleness of their temper flying out again, the Spartans were highly incensed against Pausanias, and cried up Lyfander for a man of integrity, and true public spirit*. While things were in this situation, king Agis died, he was taken ill at Heræa in Arcadia, and being conveyed to Sparta, died there; in his last moments he owned Leotychides, moved thereto by his tears, and earnest intreaties; and at the same time that he did this, he besought the Lacedæmonians who were present to bear witness of the sincerity of his declaration, and that he from his heart retracted what at any time he might have rashly said of his suspecting the legitimacy of Leotychides; but this late recognition of his son was, as we shall presently shew, altogether ineffectual, Leotychides losing not only his pretensions to the crown, but to his paternal estate^b.
- b
- c
- d

Agis left behind him a younger brother, whose name was Agefilus, and who became not only an honour to Sparta, but to Greece itself. This Agefilus set up for the crown against Leotychides, and as he was a man of exemplary virtues, and of great capacity, he on his first declaration had many friends, and on Lyfander's espousing his interest acquired many more: for both these it is proper that we should account. Agefilus was born a younger brother, and though the laws of Lacedæmon, which began now to be greatly relaxed, did not compel the heirs apparent to the crown to endure the sharp discipline of the Lycurgic education; yet the younger children of kings were no less severely bred than the meanest Lacedæmonian, which proved a great happiness to the prince of whom we are speaking, who for the glory of a long and happy reign, was chiefly indebted to the foundation laid by this manner of education; his temper was compounded of those qualities which very rarely meet, that is, of such as render men ambitious and aspiring, and of such as make them amiable and beloved. He was brave, active, and of a high spirit; but with all this wonderfully good-natured, gentle, tractable, and fond of his country perhaps beyond comparison; for he preferred her interest not only to his own, to his peace, and to his safety, but to his honour and his reputation; he thought all things fit, which she commanded, and placed his utmost happiness in his capacity of serving her, not only on such occasions as were attended with lustre and eclat, but in those which had neither profit nor honour to recommend them^c. Such were the means whereby Agefilus gained to himself friends; as for the regard which Lyfander had for him, it sprung thus: When Agefilus was a youth, Lyfander was his lover, and this friendship of his continued when Agefilus was grown up, and mightily facilitated his mounting the throne. There was but one thing which gave this prince and his friends any trouble, and it was this ; one Diopithes, a man reputed to have great skill in oracles, produced one to the following effect :

* PLUT. in vit. Lyfander. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. * PLUT. ubi supra. ^b PLUT. in vit. Agefil. PAUSAN. LACON. ^c PLUTARCH. in vit. Agefil. & in Apophthegm. LACON. XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. iii. CORN. NEPOS. in vit. Agefil.

Tho' great thy empire, Sparta, yet refrain
From a lame reign, which come, thou shalt sustain ;
Ills unendur'd before ! and feel the rage
Of war, no force can quell, or skill assuage (N).

THIS was thought to point at Agefilas, who had one leg shorter than the other, but Lyfander outdid the interpreter even in his own science ; The oracle, said he, cannot possibly point at a lameness in the king's leg, that is a thing which the gods cannot bate, because they have caused it ; the lameness must be in the title ; beware therefore, O Lacedæmonians, of placing an illegitimate king on the throne, nay even one whose birth is suspected, for that is most likely to be the lame reign hinted at by the oracle⁴. Lyfander's explanation, backed by his authority, had the desired effect ; the senate and people excluded Leotychides alike from the kingdom, and from the private estate of his father ; half of this estate of Agis, Agefilas bestowed on that prince's relations by the mother's side, who, though they were persons of great merit, were till this time in very low circumstances, which gained the new king the hearts of the people. Instead of opposing either the ephori or the senate, he treated them with the utmost civility, and not only so, but with the greatest confidence and affection ; those who were of the opposite party at the time of his election, he was ever studious to oblige ; he preferred them, whenever their merit gave them a reasonable pretence thereto ; he relieved them when under misfortunes ; in fine, he acted so prudently and so benignly, that at last the ephori, seeing no ill qualities to be offended with, took

⁴ XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. iii. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. & Lyfand. JUSTIN. lib. vi. c. 4. CORN. NEPOS in vit. Agefil. & Lyfand.

(N) It was the custom of the Greeks, as we have shewn in this and in the Athenian history, never to undertake any act of importance without consulting an oracle, of which there were many in Greece ; but that of Delphi was the most remarkable. Many learned men seem to be of opinion, that the responses from thence were frequently supernatural, and sometimes plain and direct, justified also by the event : However that matter be, yet certain it is, that even in the most early times they were frequently corrupted, of which we have given many instances, and in the prosecution of our history shall have occasion to give many more. If public oracles were liable to such inconveniences in spite of all the care that could be taken of them, it is easy to conceive, that the collections of oracles in private hands were much more liable to alterations and interpolations. To say the truth, where-ever a superstitious humour of believing such sort of things prevails, experience shews us, that there will be always knaves equally capable and willing to impose on fools. These keepers of oracles were stiled divine or sacred persons by the Greeks, and from the instance before us, we see what mighty things they were able to effect. Plutarch speaks very respectfully of Diopithes, who produced the oracle which gave occasion to this now ; and to do justice, we must acknowledge that the oracle was fulfilled in two senses ; yet with us, this is no indubitable argument that it was genuine, since it is almost impossible to contrive an oracle in relation to a momentous event, which some time or other will not be accomplished. It is very remarkable that Diopithes, who by his profession was an interpreter of these sort of pieces, departed from the letter of the oracle in his solution, and that Lyfander should have address enough to conquer the prophet in his own profession (53) ; for, as Xenophon justly observes, the oracle speaks not of a lame king, but a lame reign, as appears from the words thereof twice cited by Plutarch (54). By the way, it may not be amiss to observe, that in all our versions of Plutarch into English, these oracles are constantly rendered wrong, the word beir being substituted instead of kingdom (55), which is of mighty consequence ; first, because it misrepresents the sense of the oracle ; and secondly, because it leaves no room for Lyfander's interpretation, though Plutarch himself acknowledges it was well received, and Xenophon ascribes Agefilas's carrying his cause to the seeming subtlety of this explanation. After all, if there was any thing supernatural in this oracle, it was never rightly understood, till very lately M. le Peire declared its true meaning to be, that Sparta should take care to preserve both her kings, or, if we may be for once allowed to make use of technical terms, to guard against the changing her dearchy into a monarchy ; and in this sense the oracle was most signally accomplished, as we shall hereafter have occasion to shew (56). In the mean time, let us observe, that Plutarch approved Diopithes's interpretation ; he conceived that Leotychides was most outrageously injured, and that the great evils which befel Sparta during the reign of Agefilas were the punishments threatened by the oracle, in case she suffered herself to be governed by a lame king. Xenophon on the contrary affirms, that Agefilas destroyed Leotychides's claim by three invincible arguments ; the first was the repeated declarations of his supposed father Agis ; secondly his mother, who ought to know best, averred the same thing ; lastly, that Neptune having by an earthquake forced Agis out of bed from his wife, who thereupon abstained from her ten months, after the expiration of which term Leotychides was born (57). To close this account, let us observe that there is no reason in the world to doubt the impartiality of Plutarch, and that the history of Xenophon is an open panegyric on Agefilas, whose friend and confidant he was.

(53) Plutarch. in vit. Lyfand. & in vit. Agefil.
Irony of Lyfander and Agefilas in Plutarch's lives both of the old and new translation. (56) Fabr. in Justin.
lib. vi. (57) ubi supra.

- a umbrage at his good ones, and laid a mulct on him for a very extraordinary crime, viz. Monopolizing the affections of the people; which however was consonant enough to the constitution of *Sparta. Before Agefilaus was well settled on the throne, his country found itself exceedingly distressed; the Persian king, to whom in the course of the war they owed such mighty obligations, declared himself at once their open enemy, and began to make mighty preparations for dispossessing them of their maritime empire. To have a just notion of this business, we must ascend a little higher: Lyfander while he commanded in Asia had paid all his court to Cyrus the younger brother of Artaxerxes, who on the death of his father ascended the Persian throne; in consequence of this friendship between Lyfander and Cyrus, Clearchus the Lacedæmonian general received orders from the ephori and senate to assist that prince to the utmost of his power in the rebellion he had raised against his brother. It was in these troops that Xenophon had a command, and it was at the head of them, after Clearchus and the other captains were taken, that he made that retreat called the Retreat of the ten thousand; this behaviour of the Lacedæmonians drew upon them the hate of the king, who ever after spoke of them in terms of disrespect, and fought as much as in him lay to destroy their power†. It is very probable that some of the wisest of the Persian statesmen managed this disposition of the king for the effecting what they rightly conceived to be the interest of his empire; this is rendered probable from the method that was immediately taken, viz. of sending relief to
- c Athens, and money into Boeotia; at the same time he determined to reduce all the Greek cities absolutely to his obedience, which was wounding Sparta in the tenderest part, she having over and over declared herself the protectress of the Grecian liberties; on this account it was that they sent Thimbro with an army consisting of a thousand Laconian foot, four thousand Peloponnesian infantry, and three hundred horse from Athens; this man managed the war but indifferently, suffering his troops, since he could make no impression on the enemy, to plunder the allies of Lacedæmon. The ephori therefore sent Dercyllidas to succeed him; this man was a great engineer, and likewise a great politician; he found his force too small to prevail against Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, the king's lieutenants; he resolved to remedy this evil by
- d making them destroy one another, in which he succeeded so well, that he prevailed upon the latter to remain inactive while he attacked the former, over whom he gained great advantages. When at the command of their masters these governors of provinces became friends, the Spartan was left to deal with them both, which he did without any loss, though his army did not exceed seven thousand men, and the Persians had twenty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse in the field, besides great garisons. Pharnabazus was indeed for fighting, but Tissaphernes, who was a better officer, and who knew well what these Greek troops were capable of, was of quite a different opinion; wherefore having entered into negotiations with Dercyllidas, he at length concluded with him a treaty of accommodation on these terms; That the
- e Greek cities should remain free; that his army should retire out of his province; that the Lacedæmonian governors should remove out of the cities; and that this treaty should subsist, till it was either ratified or disavowed by the king of Persia, and the state of Sparta. The Persian king however within a short time after began to fit out three hundred sail of ships of war, which greatly alarmed the Greek cities, and occasioned an application to Sparta; where, as we shall soon see, Agefilaus offered himself by the advice of Lyfander, and was declared general of Greece‡. But before any resolution was taken, the king sacrificing for his country according to custom, the augur, from the bowels of three several victims, declared there was some very great conspiracy on foot against him and all the magistrates of Sparta; a little of this conspiracy was discovered to the
- f bottom by the information of one of the persons concerned, whereupon the senate took such quick measures, though with some little injury to the laws, that all the conspirators were suddenly taken out of the way^b (O). Things were in this situation, when

* XENOPHON. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. & in Apophthegm. Lacon. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Agefil. † XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. i, ii, iii. DIODOR. lib. xii. xiii. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. ARTAXERX. JUSTIN. lib. v. c. 11. ‡ XENOPHON. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. JUSTIN. lib. vi. c. 1. PLUT. in vit. Lyfand. POLYÆM. Strateg. lib. vi. ^b PLUT. in vit. Agefil. . .

(O) It is a great misfortune to such as endeavour any method in his productions, whereby they may be able to reduce the facts by him related to the just order of time in which they happened. In the when Lysander, burning with an impatient desire of returning again into Asia, which ^a had been the scene of his triumphs, procured such an army to be decreed Agésilas, and thereby, as he conceived to himself, as would, if no cross accidents had intervened, have left in all probability no room for Alexander's conquests, as Plutarch hath very rightly remarked. Besides the forces already in Asia under the command of Dercylids the Spartans voted two thousand manumitted Helotes, and six thousand Peloponnesian foot; but the king after all would not accept the command, till he had a council of thirty assigned him, of whom Lysander was in all respects the chief. While the army was drawing together about Gerastrus, Agésilas went with some friends to Aulis, where the thoughts of his expedition in all probability suggested to his mind ^b a dream, wherein he was admonished to imitate Agamemnon in sacrificing, inasmuch as he was become his successor, and was on the point of going general in chief of the Greek forces against the Barbarians, an office which had never been borne but by Agamemnon and himself; Agésilas, in compliance with this vision, resolved to sacrifice; but reflecting on the barbarity which Agamemnon had been guilty of, he substituted a hind instead of a virgin, and having caused it to be crowned with garlands, he directed his own augur to solemnize the sacrifice. The Æotians hearing of this, and being extremely provoked, that in their territories he should employ one of his attendants instead of the sacrificer appointed by them, they sent deputies to forbid him to sacrifice in a manner contrary to their laws; which deputies having delivered to him their message in the temple of Aulis, and perceiving that he did ^c not give much heed thereto, they went directly to the altar, and threw the sacrifice off it on the ground. This may seem a circumstance too trivial for a history of this nature; but the reader will find hereafter, that it proved the occasion of a war which subverted the Spartan empire over Greece, and had well nigh destroyed her state. At this time Agésilas was so much discomposed, that he immediately hoisted sail, and bore away for Asia, without staying for any other rites, or offering any other sacrifice^d. On his arrival he found things in a situation he neither expected nor could foresee; at Sparta he was a king, but here Lysander was treated as if he had been somewhat more; all respect, all application was paid to him, and he received it rather with the haughtiness of a deity, than with that complaisance which the present case, he relates this story of a conspiracy, as if it had happened in the latter part of his reign (58): Whereas it is certain from Xenophon, who could not be mistaken in points of fact, that it fell out in the first year of his reign: the same author hath also recorded the several circumstances attending it, and as some of them are extraordinary, the reader will doubtless be pleased to find them here. On the discovery of the plot, it appeared that one Cinado was at the head of the conspiracy; this Cinado was a young man, very conspicuous for his valour, though not for his family; the informer likewise declared, that this Cinado had once reckoned up forty Spartans, including the kings, the senate, and ephori; and that on his demanding what he meant by that calculation, Cinado replied, These are they who are against us, the rest in town and country are of our party. The ephori then demanded of what number the conspirators consisted; the informer replied, they were not many; but that they reckoned upon the assistance of all the Helotes, the new-made citizens, and the lower sort of people, who, as often as they spoke of the Spartans, intimated as much as if they would be glad to eat them alive. They then demanded if the conspirators had arms; the informer replied they had, and that Cinado had told him, that in the first commotion, workmens tools, or those that belonged to husbandry, would serve their associates well enough, since it was not to be supposed that they should find their enemies very well armed; being questioned to the time, he replied, that he could not tell exactly, but that Cinado had ordered him to hold himself ready whenever he should be called upon; whence he conjectured, the point of execution was not far off. On the consideration of these things, the ephori were so much alarmed on taking this examination, that they were equally afraid to assist at the sessions of the senate, or to assemble the people; at length they bethought themselves of a method of extricating themselves from the danger: they sent for Cinado, and told him that they discovered at a town or small distance from Sparta, contrivances carried on against the state, in which a lady of singular beauty, and admirable accomplishments, was deeply concerned; they therefore directed him to take a small party of youth, such as he could best trust, and to bring the lady and such others as they gave him a list of prisoners to Sparta; the better to colour this business, they assigned him three waggons for his prisoners, and a troop of horse to escort him, if he should have occasion; this troop of horse, as soon as they were at a convenient distance from the city, surprized him and his companions, and one of them having discovered the names of all concerned in the plot, a trooper was sent back with this information; whereupon the conspirators were all apprehended, and Cinado upon examination having confessed that he had no other cause for being discontented, than that he disdained to see in a city where he lived any man greater than himself; upon which he and his companions were without farther process put to death (59).

^d XENOPHON. lib. iii. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiv. PLUT. in vit. Agésilai. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. ejusdem JUSTIN. lib. vi. c. 2.

(58) Plutarch. in vit. Lysand.

(59) Xenophon. Hellen. lib. iii. Polyæn. Stratagem. lib. ii. c. 14.

a is natural to man ; the rest of the commanders first stomached it, they grew uneasy at finding themselves degraded from being counsellors to Agésilæus into officers or rather ministers of one of their colleagues, they therefore complained to the king, who immediately applied a very quick remedy, which was this ; he denied every suit that Lyfander made to him, and countenanced all who did not apply to him ; which in part had, and in part had not the design he intended ; for as soon as the Greeks settled in Asia, perceived it, they no longer moved their suits by Lyfander, but continued notwithstanding to pay him as much respect as before ; this nettled the king, though he was not naturally envious, whereupon he appointed this great man overseer of his provisions, and to insult the Ionians, said openly, Let them now go
b and pay court to my butcher. Lyfander quickly took an opportunity of coming to an eclairsissement ; for the first time they were alone, he addressed the king thus : In truth, Agésilæus, you know very well how to lessen your friends. Yes, answered the king, When they affect to be greater than I ; nor can it be thought unjust that they should have power with me, who most concern themselves in promoting my power. Sir, replied Lyfander very modestly, You are pleased to exercise a greater liberty in speaking than I ever did in acting ; but I beseech you, Sir, for the sake of those strangers, who have their eyes upon us, to assign me that post, wherein I may be least suspected by you, and have it most in my power to render you service *. The king thereupon appointed him embassador to the allies of Sparta near the Hellepont, which office he executed with great diligence c and integrity ; he persuaded one Misbridates a Persian, who was at variance with Pharnabazus, to revolt with a great body of troops, and to join Agésilæus ; however, finding the king irreconcilable, he determined with himself to return to Greece, highly dissatisfied with his treatment, and not only so, but with the government of his country, which he resolved to overturn, if it was in his power ; in order to effect these purposes, he set on foot such schemes as are scarce to be paralleled in story ; but inasmuch as they were never carried into act, through the cowardice of one of his associates, when they were on the very point of execution, we conceive that entering into a detail of them here would too much interrupt the current of our history ; wherefore we have digested what is most material in them into a note † (P). After his depar-

* XENOPHON. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUTARCH. in vit. Lyfand. & Agésil. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Lyfand. † XENOPHON. DIODOR. PLUT. ubi supra.

† (P) During the whole continuance of the Spartan state, there never arose therein a greater man, whether we regard his abilities or his fortunes ; than Lyfander ; how he came to turn those vast abilities from the service to the disservice of his country, we have explained in the text ; the manner in which he conducted his conspiracy ; and with what mighty art he brought it to the very point of execution, will best appear from the following account of Plutarch, taken, as he professes, from Ephorus, an author in great esteem with Strabo and Polybius. “ Things had been a great while ripe for changes, and people were ready to break into rebellion ; he resolved therefore not to miss the opportunity, but set it on foot as soon as possible. His stratagem was this : some of the Heraclidae, who came into Peloponnesus, and mixed with the Dorians, were now grown very numerous and powerful in Sparta. Of these, two families only could claim any right to succession in the kingdom, those were the Eurytomidae, and the Agidae ; the rest, notwithstanding their high extraction, had no greater share in the government than what was common to the meanest citizen. For they only who could plead most merit had the best titles to the common reward of virtue. Lyfander was one of these, and when he had gained so great a reputation by his actions, had many friends, and much power ; he was uneasy to see that city which owed its increase chiefly to him, ruled by others no better descended than himself. So he contrived to alter the settlement which confined the government to two families only, and give all the Heraclidae an equal right to it ; say, some “ say not to the Heraclidae only, but to all the Spartans ; and make it a reward not so much of Hercules’s posterity, as of those who bravely imitated that valour which gave him a place among the gods. He had great hopes that when the kingdom was to be disposed of, no Spartan could appear with those advantages that he could : Upon which prospect, first he endeavoured to insinuate the reasonableness of this change into private people, and learned by heart a fine oration which Cleon of Halicarnassus had made for him upon that subject. But when he came to reflect on the difficulties of this undertaking, which was not to be effected by ordinary means, he had recourse to extraordinary. For as in tragedies, when any thing of great importance is to be effected, the assistance of some god is made use of, so he, to promote his designs with colour of authority, had recourse to oracles, presuming he should prevail upon more citizens by the terror of those, than he could persuade by Cleon’s eloquence. Ephorus says, that after he had in vain endeavoured to corrupt the Pythian oracle, and as unsuccessfully sent Pericles to corrupt Dodona, he went himself to Ammon, and proffered the priests prodigious sums of gold, who with great indignation rejected his bribes, and sent people to accuse him at Sparta, where he met with such favourable judges, that he was easily cleared from their impeachments ; upon which the Libyans took their leave of the Spartans in this manner : When you come to live among us in Africa, you’ll find us more impartial judges. Now there was an ancient prophecy, which foretold that the Lacedæmonians departure, Agésilas carried on the war with great success and reputation; Tissaphernes, a the implacable enemy of the Greeks, by the intrigues of his enemies, was brought into disgrace with his master, and soon after beheaded; Tithraustes succeeded him, he, as soon as he entered on his office, sent deputies to treat with Agésilas, to whom he proposed, that the Greek cities in Asia should pay the king a certain tribute only, and in all other respects enjoy their liberty, offering him at the same time large sums of money, if he would condescend to make a peace, which Agésilas refused, alledging that he had not power so to do; however he removed out of his province, and carried the war into that of Pharnabazus. Tithraustes, who was a man of great parts, when he found the king of Sparta could not be corrupted in Asia, dispatched Timocrates the Rhodian with fifty talents into Greece, to see if any of the captains or statesmen there were less honest than Agésilas; this agent of his found several such sort of people as he looked for in Thebes, Corinth, and Argos; to them he imparted such sums as he thought proper, and thereby excited a war in the heart of Greece, which no longer left the Spartans at liberty to think of extending their empire beyond it^m. The Thebans, who of all others came most heartily into this business, saw plainly, that the Lacedæmonians of their own accord would not break with any of the states of Greece; they did not care to act offensively themselves, because the chiefs of the Persian faction were afraid of becoming accountable to the people for the success of the war; they persuaded therefore the Locrians to make an incursion into a small district, which lay in dispute between the Phocians and themselves; upon this, as they rightly judged, the Phocians without more ado invaded Locris; the Locrians applied to their allies the Thebans for assistance, which was readily granted them, and upon this the Phocians addressed themselves to Sparta, setting forth that they had not been the aggressors, but that they had been forced to take arms in defence of their own territories; the Spartans were on their side glad of an opportunity of breaking with the Thebans, against whom they had long had a grudge; and thus the Persian talents disturbed the tranquillity

^m XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. iv. DIODOR. lib. xiv. PLUT. in vit. Agésil. & in Apophthegm. Lacedæ.

" Lacedæmonians should some time or other inhabit " Africa. Lyfander's design in this matter was very " subtle and intricate, and managed by very great " politicians; so in order to clear the whole in" trigue, we must trace it as we do mathematical " demonstrations up to its first principles; I shall " therefore at large explain it as it is related by " Ephorus, a great historian as well as philosopher.

" There was a woman in Pontus, who being " with child, pretended Apollo was the father.
" Many, with a great deal of reason, suspected it,
" others were so credulous as to believe it. Where" fore when she came to be delivered of a son,
" several of the greatest quality in the country
" took peculiar care of its education, and for some " reason or other gave it the name of Silenus.
" Lyfander taking hold of this occurrence, made it
" the ground of his whole stratagem, and chose " such confidants to assist him in it, whose cha" racter might bring the story into reputation with" out the least suspicion of forgery. To make the " best advantage of this story, they spread abroad
" another story, That there were very ancient oracles
" closely concealed in the custody of the priests at Delphi;
" and it was upon record that they were not to be pro" faned by vulgar hands, neither was it lawful for " any man to read them, till in some future age one " should arise, who could manifestly prove himself the " son of Apollo, and challenge to himself the inter" pretation of these mysteries. When the credit of " this report was well established among the peo" ple, Silenus was to come and demand the pre" rogative of his birth. The priests who were con" federates in this plot, were strictly to examine " into every circumstance and particular of his na" tivity, and afterwards being fully convinced that " he was the true son of Apollo, were to deliver " up their charge to him, and then the son of the " god was to unfold in public all those oracles,

" especially, that for the sake of which the whole
" plot had been contrived relating to the govern" ment of Sparta, wherein it was to be declared, " That it would be more for the honour and interest of " Sparta to break the present succession, and for the " future abuse their kings out of the most deserving " men in the commonwealth. But when Selenus was " grown up, and every thing ready for action, the " whole business miscarried by the cowardice of " one that was an agent in it, whose heart failed
" him just at the time of execution (60). Nothing " of these intrigues were discovered during the life" time of Lyfander; but after his demise, Agésilas
" being directed to search his papers on account of " some disputes with the Argives, he found among " them the oration made by Clæon beforementioned,
" which at first he designed to publish in order to con" vince the Spartans, who still revered the memory " of Lyfander, that they had quite mistaken the tem" per of the man; but Lacratides, one of the king's " friends, gave a noble testimony of his wisdom, by " advising Agésilas to let it alone; he said it would " be dishonourable to disturb the ashes of Lyfander,
" and that with respect to the oration, it would be " better to bury it with him, than to truit it abroad
" in the world; where, considering the force with " which it was penned, it might raise a spirit not easy " to be laid. Agésilas on the other hand showed his " wisdom in taking the advice of his friend, and " passing by in silence this business which must have " produced great mischiefs had it ever become the " subject of debate (61).

(60) Plutarch. in vit. Lyfand. Vid. etiam Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiv. Corr. Nepos. vit. Lyfand. (61) Plutarch. in vit. Lyfand. & Agésil.

23

- a of Greece, and put her in a new ferment. Lysander, though a very old man, grew extremely uneasy at lying idle, he had besides a private hatred to the Thebans on account of the assistance they had given to Athens, at such time as she shook off the yoke of the thirty tyrants whom he had established; he therefore gladly laid hold of this occasion to persuade the ephori and senate once more to intrust him with an army. As soon as he prevailed in his request, he began to dispose all things for the war; an army was quickly raised, at the head of which he put himself; another was raising, which was to be commanded by king Pausanias. Lysander marched with the forces under his command directly into Phocis, desiring Pausanias to lead his army round by Cytæron, in order to invade Boeotia on that side; the eagerness
- b of Lysander prompted him to quick marches, and vigorous measures, wherefore finding Pausanias loiter, he sent an express to him, who was then encamped at Platæa, with letters, informing him of the time when himself expected to arrive at Haliartus, conjuring him to meet him there; these letters Plutarch says were intercepted by the enemy, and sent to Thebes, where the Thebans resolved to intrust their city with the Athenians, who were come to their assistance, and to march directly to Haliartus. Lysander arrived in the neighbourhood of that city in the night, but when day began to dawn, and he had still no news of Pausanias, he resolved at all events to attempt the surprisal of the place; when he drew near the walls, and perceived all things quiet, he conceived great hopes; but of a sudden
- c the gates being thrown open, the Thebans and Haliartans issued out in exact order, and charged the Lacedæmonians so briskly, that Lysander was killed on the spot, with a priest who stood by him; before the forces commanded by him could recover themselves, another body of Thebans charged them in the rear, whereby they were totally broken with the loss of no less than a thousand men, the Thebans on their side lost three hundred*. The news of this defeat being brought to Pausanias, he immediately marched with all possible diligence to Haliartus, where he sought by all means to gain the dead body of Lysander; some of the ancient Spartan commanders were for attacking the enemy, and recovering it by force; but he considering that they were already flushed with victory, that their troops were more numerous than
- d his, and that Thrasybulus the Athenian had now joined them, refused to do it; but on the contrary concluded a treaty, whereby the body of Lysander was delivered to him on condition that he retired out of Boeotia, which he accordingly performed, and in his retreat buried the corps of the deceased general in the territories of the Panopæans. On his return to Sparta, such a spirit of resentment appeared against him, that he was afraid to stand his trial, for which reason he retired to Tegæa, where he led a private life. As for Lysander, his memory was gratefully revered in Sparta on account of the mighty services he had rendered his country, and because after all the opportunities he had had of enriching himself, he died miserably poor, having always preserved that generous contempt of money inherent to great minds. In
- e his latter years, he is said to have been extremely melancholy, and even peevish, which some have ascribed to his natural temper; though that seems to be not a little unjust, if we consider that he was now old, and had been extremely ill treated by Agésilas, on whose friendship he had reckoned so much. After his death, some Spartans of rank, who were contracted to his daughters, refused to espouse them, finding they had no money, for which the ephori fined them, and that very severely, assigning this reason, that such men must be of a flagitious nature, who had rather take a wife out of a wealthy family than a virtuous one*. Agésilas having subjected the greatest part of the coast, determined with himself to march into the heart of Persia, and to revenge the cruelties perpetrated by Xerxes when he invaded Greece. In the midst of his projects, and when he was on the very point of carrying them
- f into execution, a messenger from Sparta brought him a scytale, whereby he was commanded to return in order to fight his country's battles at home. Agésilas hesitated not a moment, he relinquished all his victories, and all his hopes, preferring obedience to the constitution of Sparta to the prospect of subduing the whole Persian empire, a conduct which might warrant a long panegyric, if its excellence did not deter us from attempting a theme, which may well be supposed inexhaustible, since the action of Agésilas has hitherto appeared inimitable[†]. The year before the Spartans had declared him admiral as well as generalissimo of their forces, which a charge he now bestowed on his wife's brother Pisander, leaving four thousand men to secure his conquests, and with the rest of his army taking the same rout which Xerxes had done when he entered Greece. In his passage he never demanded any leave from the barbarous nations, but only sent to inquire of them whether they would have him pass as an enemy, or as a friend; meeting with some opposition, he engaged the enemy, routed them, and continued his march^a.

* XENOPHON. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Lysand. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. ejusdem. * XENOPHON. DIODOR. PLUT. CORN. NEPOS, ubi supra. † XENOPHON. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Agésil. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. ejusd. JUSTIN. lib. vi. c. 2.

Ageſipolis ſucceeds his father Pausanias.

AFTER the flight of Pausanias, who left behind him his two sons, Ageſipolis and Cleombrotus; the former of them was declared king, but being too young to govern by himself, his uncle Aristodemus, to whom the Spartans gave the command of a very great army, which they raised as well to revenge the death of Lyſander, as to quell in its infancy this dangerous league which was formed against them, held the office of protector. This army, when it took the field, consisted of fifteen thousand men; the confederates immediately opposed it with another of twenty thousand, of which thirteen thousand were heavy armed troops: Near Corinth a battle ensued, wherein the Spartans were victorious with the loss only of eight men, if we may believe Xenophon, that is, eight of the Spartans; for of their confederates, he acknowledges that a great number fell^b. News was immediately dispatched of this victory to Ageſilaus, who, far from being pleased therewith, cried out, O Greece, what a number of brave men are slain in thy private quarrels, when with a less waste of blood thou mightest have reduced all Persia^c! Though these were his private sentiments, yet on his return he obeyed the directions sent him by the ephori, and immediately invaded Boeotia contrary to his judgment of things: On the very day he executed this order the sun was eclipsed, and he received the news of the defeat of the Persian fleet, and the death of his wife's brother Pisander; being afraid this ill news might discourage his soldiers, he gave out that the courier had brought him advice of a victory gained by his brother, on account of which he sacrificed to the gods, and sent portions of the sacrifice to his friends wearing a garland on his head, and using other testimonies of joy, though he acknowledged that Pisander had fallen in the engagement^d. Not long after an engagement happened in the neighbourhood of Cerberonea, the sharpest which happened in his time, as Xenophon relates; and of this he must have been a very good judge, because he was present. In this Ageſilaus was the victor, where he fought, and the Thebans on the other hand prevailed against that wing whereon they charged; Ageſilaus was constrained to return to try his fortune anew against these: It is generally agreed, that on this occasion he was guilty of a great oversight in attacking the Thebans in front, when if he had waited a little he might have charged them in flank and rear. Xenophon indeed gives another turn to this matter, for with him Ageſilaus was never wrong, yet it is certain that the mistake had like to have been fatal; the Thebans behaving with great resolution, killing many, and wounding more, among whom was Ageſilaus himself. At length they marched slowly from the field, leaving to the Lacedæmonians the honour of a victory, of which however they could collect no fruits^e. Ageſilaus went to Delphi, where he consecrated the tenth of his spoils, and in the mean time Gylus his lieutenant led the army in Locris, where they were so busy in plundering, that the people suddenly rose upon them, and making a good use of their disorder, killed Gylus and many others. Corinth was the head quarters of the confederates, as Sicyon was of the Lacedæmonians and their allies. At Corinth there were great seditions, many of the citizens conceiving that they were idly engaged in this war, which tended to bring them under the dominion of the Argives, resolved, if possible, to free themselves by bringing in a Lacedæmonian garrison, which in some measure they effected. The other party in Corinth sent for aid from Aibens, which was readily accorded, and between both parties the city was in the utmost danger of being totally ruined^f. The Spartans had possession only of a fort, their enemies had the city, Ageſilaus to put an end to the dispute, invaded the territory of Argos with a great army, and having passed through it, besieged Corinth by land, while his brother Teleutias blocked it up by sea; yet did not their enterprize suc-

^a XENOPHON. Hellæn. lib. iv. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xiv. PLUT. in vit. Ageſil. & in Apophthegm. Laccon. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Ageſil. ^b XENOPHON. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. ^c PLUT. in vit. Ageſil. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. ejusdem. ^d XENOPHON. ubi supra. ^e XENOPHON. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Ageſil. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. ejusdem. ^f XENOPHON. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Iphicrat. POLYÆN. lib. iii. c. 9.

- ceed, Ipbicrates, the Athenian captain preserving Corinth and its territories from feeling the effects of his resentment¹. After his return from this expedition, the Achaens demanded aid of Sparta against the Acarnanians, and according to their request, Agefilas was sent to help them with a great army; he so effectually quelled their enemies, that the next year they were glad to make peace². This war over, Agefipolis at the head of another army entered the country of the Argives, though much against his will; for as this people had desired a truce, he conceived this severity to be a kind of injustice, and therefore would not put himself at the head of the troops, till he had consulted the Olympian Jupiter, and the Delphian Apollo on this scruple of conscience. Satisfied with the answers returned by these oracles, he undertook the
- b war, but meeting or fancying he met in the course thereof many prodigies, he returned without effecting much. In the mean time Canon the Athenian threatened the Spartans with the loss of their sovereignty by sea, wherefore to soften the Persian king, it was resolved at Sparta to send Antalcidas into Persia to endeavour the withdrawing the great king from the interest of their rivals, though in the mean time preparations were made for carrying on the war in Asia, in case the proposals he was enabled to offer were refused; this was a new method of proceeding unknown in former times to Sparta, and this ambassador was a person who differed much from his fellow citizens, being extremely affable in his manner, eloquent, and in short every way well accomplished to execute a commission at the Persian court³ (Q).
- c The Athenians however took such measures as hindered his succeeding immediately. Thimbro, who commanded the Lacedæmonian troops in Asia, for a time did good service, but at last he was defeated and slain; Talutias however gained some advantages at sea, and having extremely frightened the city of Athens by an attempt on the Pyraum, inclined that city to a peace, to which indeed hardly any of the Grecian states were now averse. As for Sparta, notwithstanding her late victories, she found the expence of the war so heavy, that it forced her both to wish and to seek for peace; the Athenians, terrified with their late losses, recollected the fatal issue of the Peloponnesian war, and desired to be rid of this, lest its end should prove no better; the Argives finding that all their artifices would avail no longer, but that
- d the war would find a place in their country as well as elsewhere, wished a general pacification might take place, for their own particular interest. The Persian king had also his own profit in view, he stood in need of Greek mercenaries for the carrying on his wars, and these were not to be had at a time when Greece stood in

¹ XENOPHON. DIODOR. PLUTARCH. CORN. NEPOS, & POLYÆN. ubi supra. ² DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. ³ XENOPHON. DIODOR. ubi supra.

(Q) Antalcidas the son of Leon, was a man of great parts, though of no great probity. To gain the confidence of the Persians, he not only fell into their customs, but derided and despised those of his own country; nay, he carried this matter so far, if we may believe Plutarch, that he had the assurance in a wanton dance to mimic Leonidas and Callicratidas, two of the most worthy men in Sparta; this behaviour of his won so much on Artaxerxes, who otherwise had a violent antipathy to the Spartans, and used to call them the most impudent men living; that he sent him from the table where he was sitting, a garland dipped in an ointment, which for the extraordinary richness of its composition was used only by the king (62). All which was very agreeable to his own maxim, That the sole means of influencing men is to speak what may delight, and to do what may profit them (63). But though he diverted himself at the expence of his country's customs, he could answer others very tartly who reflected on them; for being asked in a contemptuous manner about the bigness of Sparta, and the extent of its dominions, he answered smartly, The walls of Sparta are her youth, and the points of their spears the limits of her territories. An Athenian once bragging in his presence, That his countrymen have often repulsed the Spartans from Cephi- sus; Very true, replied Antalcidas; but was had never any occasion to drive you from Eurotas. Being desirous to gain admission to the Samothracian mysteries, the priest asked him, Whether he had never done any great crime? If I have, said he, the gods know that already (64). This peace of his was very ill received in Greece by such as piqued themselves in the love of their country; nay, there were many at Sparta itself, who could not forbear expressing their resentment at the abandoning their allies to the mercy of the Barbarians, inasmuch that a person of condition said in the hearing of king Agefilas, that Greece was now in a lamentable state, since the Spartans themselves began to turn Medes: Say rather, replied the king sharply, That the Medes begin to turn Spartans (65). How little soever Agefilas approved this peace, he supported it with all his might, and constrained both the Thebans and Argives to accept it much against their wills. On the whole it must be acknowledged, that Antalcidas by his art secured the sovereignty to Sparta, and that she lost it by gratifying her own haughtiness, and her king Agefilas's inveterate hatred against the Thebans (66). As to the fate of Antalcidas we shall have occasion to mention it in the text, and shall therefore put an end to this note here.

(62) Plutarch, in vit. Artaxerx. (63) Plut. in Apophthegm. Laced. in vit. Agefil. (66) Xenophon, Hellen. lib. v. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xv.

(64) Idem. ibid.

(65) Plut.

need of all her subjects: He therefore signified to Teribazus, who immediately communicated the dispatches to the Greeks, the terms whereon the king desired the peace should be made; they were these: That the cities in Asia, with the islands of Clazomene and Cyprus, should remain to him; that all the other states small and great should be left free, excepting only Lemnos, Imbros, and Scyros, which having been time immemorial subject to the Athenians, should remain so; that such as refused to embrace this peace, should be compelled to accept it by force of arms. At first the Thebans absolutely refused to comply, because the government of Bœotia was taken from them; but Agésilas making great preparations to invade them, they in the end were forced to accede; the Argives too quitted Corinth, to which the exiles returned, and every thing else was done which the Spartans desired. Such was the peace which from its author was stiled the peace of Antalcidas, whereby the sovereignty of Greece indeed was in a manner guarantied to Sparta, but upon very dishonourable terms; the Greek cities in Asia being intirely abandoned to the Persian, notwithstanding all the promises which had been made them, and that Agésilas himself had fought in their quarrel^b. This flow of success made the Lacedæmonians lose all temper, infomuch that on the conclusion of the peace, they began to think of punishing with severity such as had injured them, or such as they had suspected during the war, as if the dominion of Greece had been a small thing, if their new subjects did not feel the pressure of their government^c. The first who experienced the weight of their resentment were the Mantineans, though they had been their confederates, and had done them great services. The Spartans, to have a pretence for making war, very modestly directed them to quit their city, and to retire into the five villages which had served their forefathers, where they might be sure to enjoy peace themselves, and not give any umbrage to their neighbours; this being refused, Agésilas was sent with an army against them, for Agésilas did not care to command against his old friends and acquaintance; Agésilas besieged the city all the summer, but when winter drew on the Lacedæmonians dammed up the current of the river, which thereupon rose to such a height in the city, as either to overflow, or throw down their houses, and this compelled the Mantineans to submit to the conditions prescribed to them by Sparta, and to retire to their old villages from that noble city which they had so long enjoyed. The Phlians were the next, it was objected to them that they had exiled some of their own citizens who were in the interest of Sparta, these therefore they were constrained to receive again, and to do whatever else the Spartans required of them^d. The Olynthians were in the third place to be chastised, because they were become powerful; to say the truth, there never was a commonwealth which imitated Sparta so nearly, as did this of Olynthus; for under pretence of freeing the Macedonian cities from the tyranny of Amyntas, they conquered most of them, and kept them to themselves; the Acanthians and Apollonians signified to the government of Sparta, that in a very short space they must be constrained either to take arms against Olynthus, or submit to her, and fight under her banners; Eudamidas was sent to assist them with two thousand men, he marched into Thrace, where he did great service, expecting his brother Phæbidas, who was raising a great army, and had orders to follow him; but he passing through Thebes, in his march had it betrayed to him by Archias and Leontidas, whereupon he seized the citadel called Cadmea, and put a strong garison into it; this was an open violation of the peace, and an act in its nature most flagrantly unjust; yet Agésilas protected its author, either from an over-weening passion for his own country, or out of an implacable aversion to the Thebans. On his motion therefore Sparta abetted Phæbidas, and transferred the government of Thebes to Archias and Leontidas, who had put it into his hands, an act highly displeasing to the Greeks, and made them very apprehensive of the power of Sparta^e. Teleutias was sent to command in Thrace, with strict orders to reduce the Olynthians at all events, which he set about so eagerly, that going in person to the assistance of some of his troops, who were repulied by the Olynthians, he exposed his whole army to a great loss, and was himself slain upon the spot. Agésilas as soon as the news reached Lacedæmon, was dispatched to supply a his place ; he fought with great success, reduced Torone, a strong city in those parts, and brought the Olynthians into great streights ; but in the midst of his conquests a fever attacked him, and carried him off in a few days. He was a prince of great worth, but of a very mild temper, which gave Agésilas room to grow upon him, and to make him subservient to his purposes, so that he made no great figure in the state ; yet he died not unregretted, the people sorrowing for the loss of one who always treated them with kindness, and Agésilas expressing great concern for a colleague with whom he had lived long, and without any difference^f.

^b XENOPHON. lib. v. DIODOR. lib. xiv. PLUT. in vit. Agésil. & Artaxerx. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Agésil. ^c DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xv. XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. v. PLUTARCH. in vit. Agésil. JUSTIN. lib. vi. c. 6. ^d DIODOR. ubi supra. XENOPHON. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Agésil. PAUSAN. in Lacon. ^e DIODOR. ubi supra. XENOPHON. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Agésil. & in vit. Pelop. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Pelop.

Agésilas having no children was succeeded by his brother Cleombrotus, but he did not succeed him in the command of the army, which was intrusted with one Polybiades, who in a short time reduced the Olynthians to such distress, that they were compelled to make a treaty with the Spartans, whereby they undertook to have the same friends and enemies with them, and to follow them as associates whithersoever they should lead them in their wars^g. The Phlians having given some new offence by not treating the exiles whom the Spartans had restored with the respect which it was thought they deserved, Agésilas marched against them with a great army, at which however they were not so much terrified, but that they made a very vigorous resistance, and defended their city for a very long time ; at last war and famine brought them so low, that they were constrained to yield at discretion, whereupon commissioners were named, part Spartans, part of their own exiles, to determine which of the citizens should have mercy, and which should be put to death. Thus did Sparta govern with pride and cruelty those whom she had most unjustly brought under her dominion ; for by the peace of Antalcidas, she had engaged that all the cities should be left to their freedom. Such Thebans as could not endure to see their country in slavery, had privately fled to Athens ; but entertaining a correspondence in their native country, they found means to be admitted secretly, and having stabbed the chief men of the opposite party, assumed the administration to themselves. The Spartans upon this sent Cleombrotus their new king at the head of a great army to restore things to their former condition, in which however he had no great success^h. At his return he left a garison under the command of Sphodrias at Thebes, as well to encourage the Thebans in the Spartan interest, as to awe the adjacent country, and lay it under contribution ; this Sphodrias, either of his own accord, or as some say prompted thereto by the artifice of the Thebans, attempted to seize the Pyreum, which drew the Athenians into the quarrel. Sparta might easily have ridded herself of this new enemy, if she had acted justly, and punished Sphodrias as he deserved. But here again, king Agésilas, being prevailed on by his son, interposed, and protected the criminal ; this effectually induced the Athenians to engage in the league formed against Sparta : upon which Agésilas was forced to undertake the command again, though he was now at that age, when the law excused him ; he invaded Boeotia, but with little success, Chabrias the Athenian having taught the Thebans to fight in much better order than they had heretofore done. Towards the end of the campaign, Phæbidas, who had been the author of this war, was killed with three hundred horse ; the next year Cleombrotus marched against the Boeotians, but the Athenians and Thebans disputing his passage, he was constrained to return. At sea the Spartans were beaten by Timotheus the son of Conon, and in short all things began to decline, notwithstanding the utmost care of Agésilas, on whom Antalcidas revenged himself, for some smart things he had said of him, when he negotiated the peace in Persia ; for the king returning home, wounded by the Thebans, the statesman cried out, *You are properly rewarded, Agésilas, for teaching these Thebans to fight whether they would or no*ⁱ. In the beginning of the hundred and first olympiad, Artaxerxes king of Persia laboured exceedingly in making peace among the Greeks, because having the reduction of Egypt in his eye, he stood in need of their assistance ; in little more than a year he accomplished it, if that can be said to be accomplished which was of so short continuance. The Thebans would never accept the peace, and the rest of the cities had very little regard to it, such seeds of discord being now sown as could not be rooted out. The Lacedæmonians had every-where established while they were in power an oligarchical government, which in consequence of this peace being in many places overthrown, the a people, as it was natural for them, began to tyrannize over their late masters, and to treat them with as little justice now they were degraded, as they had used towards them when in power. The Persian king still wrought for the bringing about a settled tranquillity, which in the beginning of the hundred and second olympiad, seemed to be nearly effected; the Athenians concurring heartily with the Lacedæmonians, and shewing no sort of countenance towards the Thebans, who still refused to hear of peace, because the Spartans insisted they should set the cities of Boeotia at liberty. In this opposition they were chiefly encouraged by Epaminondas, who demanded that before the Lacedæmonians gave laws to others, they should shew a proper regard to these maxims of equity themselves, by giving up Messenia to its ancient proprietors, and setting Laconia free *. This violently incensed Sparta, and at the same time did not a little offend Athens, who could not bear to see the Thebans act independently, who had heretofore either followed their banners, or those of Sparta. Cleombrotus with an army of twelve thousand men was sent into Boeotia, Epaminondas seized the passages through which he intended to have entered, and forced him to march round, which he did, and at length penetrated into Boeotia from the side next Phocis, advancing towards Leuctra, encamping his army in the plains in that neighbourhood. The Thebans were greatly dispirited at the sight of his numerous army, and the rather, because many evil omens had happened at their marching from home; yet Epaminondas prevailed in a council of war, and carried the question to fight the enemy; in the interim, Jason, a powerful prince of Thessaly, arrived with a thousand horse, and fifteen hundred foot, which he brought to assist the Thebans, though on his arrival he strove to make peace, and by his endeavours procured a truce to be actually concluded. As Cleombrotus was about to retire out of Boeotia, he met Archidamus son of Agesilaus, coming with a great reinforcement from Sparta; these princes, without any regard to the truce, resolved to march back to Leuctra in order to fall on the Boeotians, where they found Epaminondas and his troops ready to receive them; that great general, though he knew himself to be inferior to the enemy, resolved to have none serve under him in the day of battle, who were not thoroughly inclined to conquer; he therefore made proclamation, that all who desired to depart, might do so, which permission the Thebians and some others embraced; this done, he disposed his army in battalia, placing all his chosen troops in one wing, and those he least depended on in the other; the former he commanded in person, to the latter he gave directions, that when they found the enemies charge too heavy, they should retire leisurely, so as to expose to them a sloping front. Cleombrotus and Archidamus advanced to the charge with great vigour, but as they pressed on the Theban wing which retired, they gave Epaminondas an opportunity of charging them both in flank and front, which he did with such vigour, that the Spartans began to give way, especially after Cleombrotus was slain, whose dead body however they recovered; at length they were totally defeated, chiefly by the skill and conduct of the Theban general, who did mighty execution upon them, four thousand being killed on the field of battle, whereas the Thebans did not lose above three hundred. Such was the fatal battle of Leuctra, wherein the Spartans lost the empire of Greece, which they had held now near five hundred years †.

^f DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. & in Agid. XENOPHON. ubi supra. PAUSAN. in Lacon.
^g DIODOR. & XENOPHON. ubi supra. ^h DIODOR. ubi supra. XENOPHON ubi supra. PLUTARCH. in vit. Pelopid. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. ejusd. ⁱ DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. XENOPHON. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. & in Agophthegm. Lacon. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Agefil.

Agesipolis succeeds Cleombrotus.
Year after the
flood 2628.
Before Christ
371.

WHEN the ephori had the news of this dreadful and unexpected defeat, they were superintending the Gymnic solemnities, and though they evidently saw what the consequences would be of this mighty loss, yet they did not interrupt or adjourn the festival, contenting themselves with sending advice to their relations of the names of those who had fallen in the battle. It was at this time that the Spartan virtue shone with greatest lustre; the fathers, mothers, and those who were nearest of kin to such as were killed, assembled the next morning, shook each other by the hand, applauding the courage of their children, while the relations of those who had escaped from the battle hid themselves among the women; or if they were obliged to go abroad, appeared in tattered cloaths, with their arms folded, and their eyes fixed on the ground. Common people cried out, that now the oracle was

* XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. vi. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xv. PLUT. in vit. Agesil. & Pelopid. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Epamin. † XENOPHON. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Pelopid. & in vit. Agesil. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Epaminond. JUSTIN. lib. vi. c. 6. PAUSAN. Lacon.

- a accomplished, which forbid them to admit of a lame king, since under the sovereignty of Agefilaus this direful misfortune had overtaken them. However, in regard to his great abilities, and the little hopes they had of Agefpolis the son of Cleombrotus, who was a person but of very mean parts, they appointed Agefilaus dictator, or rather legislator, giving him a power over the laws, for this reason; such as fled from battle were by them degraded from their honours, constrained to appear in garments patched with divers colours, to wear their beards half shaved, half unshaved, and to suffer any to beat them who pleased without resistance; to execute this at present was absolutely inexpedient, power was therefore given to Agefilaus to new-mold the constitution as he thought fit. But that great prince gave on this occasion
- b such a proof of his wisdom, as shewed he was worthy of the trust reposed in him, such a proof as Plutarch confesses hath set him above comparison, and which indeed can never be sufficiently admired. He came out of the temple very gravely into the public assembly, and by one short sentence restored the public peace, preserved such as were under apprehensions, and at the same time saved the Lycurgic institutes; this sentence runs thus; Let the laws sleep this day, but to morrow let them resume their full vigour ^a. Then, old and lame as he was, he assembled an army which he led out into the territories of the Arcadians and purposely voiding an engagement, after ravaging the country, and taking a town or two, he returned home, being content to shew his countrymen that the fortune of Sparta was not entirely lost. Some time
- c after this a peace was concluded, the Mantineans took this opportunity of rebuilding their city, which exceedingly vexed the Lacedæmonians, who at length not able to contain themselves, invaded them; but the Mantineans shutting themselves up in their new city, refused to hazard their safety by a pitched battle. The Arcadians about the same time built the great city of Megalopolis, to which from all their villages they repaired; this too offended the Lacedæmonians, who thereupon invaded Arcadia, and slew Lycomedes the Mantinean general of Arcadia with two hundred men; this broke the spirit of the Arcadians, who thereupon sent to Athens for relief; but being denied there, they made their application to Thebes, from whence Epaminondas and Pelopidas were sent with a great army to their assistance; when they were
- d come into Arcadia, and found themselves at the head of fifty thousand men, they knew not what to do, the enemy being retired; at last it was resolved to invade Laconia, a thing hitherto unattempted, which accordingly they did, and under the auspice of Epaminondas appeared before Sparta itself, which till then had never heard of war in its neighbourhood; in this desperate situation of things, Agefilaus took the command upon himself, disposing the citizens with such skill, and opposing the enemy where-ever they attempted to enter with such numbers, that Epaminondas, notwithstanding he greatly desired it, found it impossible to attack the place, but was constrained to retire, wasting the country as he marched off ^a. In the midst of these misfortunes a very dangerous conspiracy broke out, two hundred of the rebels
- e seizing the temple of Diana at Ifforion. The Spartans would have immediately attacked them, and put them to the sword, but Agefilaus not knowing how far the contagion might reach, prevented them; and having only one servant near him, went in person to the place, to which, when he drew near, he called out, Sirs, you mistook my orders, I did not direct you to go all to one place, but that some of you should go there, and some there. The conspirators hearing this, believed they were not discovered, and therefore separating immediately went to the posts which he assigned them; thus separated, they were easily seized, and being conducted to examination, were afterwards put to death the same night without any respect had to the ordinary forms of law. Epaminondas, when he quitted the territories of
- f Sparta, left behind him such a mark of his virtue and magnanimity as is scarce to be paralleled in history; he rebuilt the city of Messene, and recalling the ancient inhabitants of Messenia from the several countries where they had taken refuge, he restored them to the possession of their ancient patrimony after they had lost it three hundred years. It is remarkable that these Messenians, notwithstanding their dispersion, preserved the old Doric dialect, which continued to be spoke amongst them to the times of Pausanias, the geographer and historian; when Epaminondas had accomplished

^a XENOPHON. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUTARCH. in vit. Agefil. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. ejusd.

^a XENOPHON. ubi supra. & in orat. de laud. Agefil. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. & Pelopid. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Agefil. & Epaminond. PAUSAN. in Lacon. POLYÆN. Stratagem. lib. ii.

c. 3

this, he offered the Lacedæmonians peace, on condition that they quitted all pretensions to Messenia and left Laconia free, which terms were rejected with scorn^a. The present distress of Sparta obliged her to sue for assistance to her rival Athens, which, whether from a principle of generosity or vain glory is uncertain, were readily sent them under the command of Iphicrates, who in this expedition was so unlucky as to lose a great part of his reputation; the military prudence of Epaminondas putting it out of his power to effect any thing to the prejudice of the army under his command. The next year the war continued with as great warmth as ever, Epaminondas being sent with a great army to join the Arcadians, Argives, and Eleans, who were in arms in Peloponnesus; the Lacedæmonians in the mean time applied themselves assiduously to all the methods that could be devised for restoring their affairs. They solicited their allies, they manumitted such of the Helotes as were willing to take arms, they sought the assistance of the Athenians, and even of Dionysius the Sicilian, who ordered two thousand Gauls and Spaniards to hold themselves in readiness to be transported into Greece as soon as the season would permit. In the interim, the Lacedæmonian army consisting of twenty thousand men, fortified the passes at the isthmus, and having strongly retrenched themselves, determined to abide there, in order to hinder Epaminondas and his Thebans from entering Peloponnesus. But this hope was vain, for though the Theban army was far inferior in number, yet Epaminondas having considered the extent of their works, and that they were apparently weakest, where the Spartans were posted, determined at all events to attack them there, which he did with such vigour, that he forced their lines, and broke into Peloponnesus, where he wasted the country, reduced Sicyon and some other cities, and afterwards marched to Corinth, which he had also taken, if it had not been for Chabrias the Athenian, who being cordially in the interest of Sparta, defended the place so well, that Epaminondas was forced to retire. Here the Gauls and Spaniards, who were by this time come from Sicily, did great service, and in the end of the summer, being bountifully rewarded, returned home^b.

The Arcadians routed by Archidamus.
Year after the
flood 2631.
Before Christ
367.

THE Lacedæmonians, though they were still desirous of peace, continued to make as great preparations as possible for supporting the war. Agefilaus assisted them with his counsels; Cleomenes, who succeeded his brother Agefipolis, after a year's reign, discharged the functions of first magistrate, Archidamus the son of Agefilaus having the chief command of their armies. In the first year of the hundred and third olympiad, this prince having drawn together a considerable body of Spartans, and their allies, and being assisted by Cissidas, general in chief of Dionysius's forces, he marched into Arcadia in order to revenge his country for the many inroads which within a few years before they had suffered from the Arcadians. Having taken Carye, and put those he took therein to the sword, he projected still greater conquests, till on a sudden all his attempts were checked by a declaration of Cissidas, that his commission being expired, he could act offensively no longer; in consequence of which declaration, he immediately withdrew. But in his retreat, finding himself in danger of being surrounded by the Messenians, he sent to Archidamus to beseech his assistance; the Spartan immediately marched with all his forces to the relief of his ally, and on his arrival fell with such vigour on the Arcadians, and their allies, that he utterly defeated them with the slaughter of no less than ten thousand men, without so much as one Spartan's being slain; whereby the prediction of the priests at Dodona is said to have been fulfilled, they having declared, when Archidamus marched, that this war would end without any mourning of the Lacedæmonians^c. Some time after this Epaminondas broke in again, notwithstanding all the care that could be taken, into Peloponnesus, yet without doing any great mischief; the endeavours of the Persian king having disposed almost all Greece to think of peace, which with much ado was effected, after the Laconian or Bæotic war had lasted about five years, in which, if Agefilaus was to blame, for having through his hatred of the Thebans been a principal author thereof; yet the great services he did his country therein, and his preserving the city of Sparta from being taken by a numerous and victorious enemy; were such reparations, that we may justly commend the Spartans for overlooking the failings of their prince, and making use of those high qualities

^a XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. vi. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xv. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. & in vit. Pelop. JUSTIN. lib. vi. c. 7. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Epamin. PAUSAN. in Messen. & Lacon. ^b XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. vii. DIODOR. ubi supra. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Epamin. ^c XENOPHON. ubi supra. DIODOR. ubi supra. PAUSAN. in Lacon. Athen. Deipnosoph. lib. xii. PLUT. in vit. Agefil.

which

- which were alone capable of preserving them. We have been led to this observation from the nature of this history, which shews how soon the haughtiness of any state can raise up enemies enough to pull it down, and how far the wisdom of a single person may be capable of conserving and restoring a dejected and defeated nation both to spirits and power'. In the second year of the hundred and fourth olympiad, there broke out new commotions in Peloponnesus, the Tegetæans and Mantineans making war on each other; the former requesting the aid of the Thebans, the latter of the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, gave occasion thereby to a new and fatal controversy; for Epaminondas, at the head of a great army, marching to the assistance of his allies, had notice that Agefilæus, with the whole power of Sparta, was in full march to join the enemy; whereupon conceiving in himself that Sparta must be left naked, he directed his march thither with the utmost diligence. Xenophon himself acknowledges that this measure was so well taken, and so briskly pursued, that nothing could have prevented his surprising the place; but by accident a person gave notice of his march to Agefilæus, who thereupon dispatched a courier to Sparta to desire the citizens to be on their guard; Archidamus no sooner received his father's dispatch, than he made all proper dispositions for the defence of the place; the old men and boys he placed on the tops of houses, that they might incommode the Thebans by throwing tiles and stones; such as were capable of bearing arms, he posted in all the avenues of the city, so that when Epaminondas came, he had the mortification to see that his design was discovered, and that it was impossible for him to think of entering without great effusion of blood; notwithstanding all this, he attacked the place, but was received so warmly, that he was obliged to retire; yet Archidamus following him, gave an opportunity to the Thebans to revenge the death of their countrymen, which they did by cutting off a great number of Spartans, who had thus needlessly exposed themselves by an unwary pursuit. Epaminondas, to make himself amends for this unsuccessful attempt, marched directly to surprize Mantineæ, which he rightly conjectured would be left naked by Agefilæus's march to the relief of Sparta. Yet here again an accident defeated all his wisdom; six thousand Athenian succours were just landed in Peloponnesus, and entered Mantineæ the very day that he attacked it. These being fresh, and full of spirits, had the better of his horse, and forced him to abandon his design'. These miscarriages sunk deep into the bosom of this great general, who reflecting that his commission was about to expire, and that if he retired out of Peloponnesus without effecting any thing, he should not only lose his own glory, but that authority also to which he had raised his country; he determined for the preservation of both these to risque a battle at all events. When therefore he understood that Agefilæus at the head of the Lacedæmonians and Arcadians, with the rest of the allies, being no less than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse, were arrived in the neighbourhood of Mantineæ, he led forth his army, and having drawn it up in battalia, marched off towards the hills of Tegeæ, as if he intended to encamp there; but on a sudden altering the disposition of his line to give it the form of a wedge, he marched suddenly back and fell upon the allies, when they expected no such matter; the confusion was so great, that the Thebans would have acquired a very easy victory, if Epaminondas, charging the Lacedæmonians, had not exposed his person too much; for they knowing well that the whole power of Thebes was centered in this single man, covered him with darts, many of which he pulled out of his flesh, and returned upon those who discharged them; at last one Anticletes a Spartan struck him into the breast with a javelin with such force, that it broke, and left the iron sticking therein, whereupon he fell down, which occasioned a new contest for his body, and in this with much ado his countrymen were victorious, though with the loss of their best officers. All Greece looked with concern on the issue of this business, which was this; that the contending parties fearing the continuance of so bloody a war, unanimously struck up a general peace, excepting only the Lacedæmonians, who, at the instance of Agefilæus, refused to become parties thereto, because the Messenians were comprehended therein; for which he is justly censured by Plutarch, who was likewise no less displeased at the last actions of his life, which were these. Finding that the Persian was no longer inclined to Sparta, he consented a for the sake of a large subsidy given to his country by Tachos king of Egypt to go in person to command the Greek mercenaries he had in his service ; there for a time he was of great use to the prince, at whose request he went into Egypt ; but at length, either to gratify his own resentment, or because he thought it more advantageous to his country, he deserted him, and sided with his competitor ; from whom having received a large sum of money for his good services, he embarked in order to return into Peloponnesus ; but being by contrary winds forced on the African shore, he died after a short illness, rather of age and fatigue, than of any other distempers, when he had attained the eighty-fourth year of his life, and had reigned forty-one years, leaving behind him the character of a wise prince, a great captain, and a b passionate lover of his country " (R).

* XENOPHON. ubi supra, & in orat. de laud. Agefil. POLYÆN. Stratagem. lib. ii. c. 1. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. * XENOPHON. ubi supra. DIODOR. SICUL. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. PAUSAN. Lacon. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Epamin. * XENOPHON. Hellen. lib. viii. DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xv. PLUT. in vit. Agefil. JUSTIN. lib. vi. c. 7. CORN. NEPOS, in vit. Epamin.

Archidamus

* XENOPHON. ubi supra, & in Orat. de laud. Agésil. DIODOR. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Agésil.

(R) If it may be justly esteemed a happiness to a great king to have his actions recorded by writers of eminent abilities, no prince of Greece ever was happier in this respect than Agésilas : Xenophon, the best historian of his age, and the companion of Agésilas's labours, was likewise the compiler of them. His Græcian history contains a very particular narration of the king's exploits, and his oration in praise of Agésilas is a panegyric worthy of the character of that prince, and of its writer. Diodorus the Sicilian hath also a very copious account of the transactions of this king of Sparta ; besides which, and the transcripts that have been made from ancient Greek writers by translators and epitomizers, we have his life written by Plutarch, and again by Cornelius Nepos. His expedition into Egypt when he was eighty years old and upwards is to be the subject of this note ; this let us take from Plutarch, who hath given us the detail of this expedition with peculiar exactness. " As soon as he arrived in Egypt " all the great officers of the kingdom came to pay " their compliments to him at his landing ; his reputation being so great had raised the expectation " of the whole country which did flock in to see " him ; but when they found, instead of the great " prince whom they looked for, a little old man of contemptible presence, without all ceremony lying " down upon the grass, his hair uncombed, and his " cloaths thread-bare, they fell into a laughter and " scorn of him, crying out that the old proverb was " now made good, The mountain had brought forth " a mouse. They were much scandalized at his insensibility and rudeness (as they thought it) who " when the presents usually offered to strangers of distinction were made him of all manner of provisions, took only the meal, the calves, and the " geese, but rejected the sweet-meats, the confections, and perfumes ; and when they did urge him " to the acceptance of them, he said, They might " carry them to his slaves the Helotes. Theophrastus " saith that he was taken with nothing he saw in " Egypt, so much as with the papyrus, so proper " for garlands by reason of the smoothness and pliancy of its rind ; and when he left Egypt, he " desired the king to let him carry some of it home " with him. When he joined with Tachos, he found " his expectation of being generalissimo frustrated ; " Tachos reserved that place for himself, making " Agésilas only captain of the band of mercenaries, and Chabrias, the Athenian admiral. This " was the first occasion of his discontent ; but there " followed others : He, being daily tired with the " insolency and vanity of this Egyptian, was at " length forced to attend on him into Phœnicia in " a condition much below his spirit and dignity, " which notwithstanding he was obliged to digest " for a while, till he had an opportunity of shewing " his resentment. It was soon afforded him by

" Neftanabis, Tachos's own nephew, and a great captain under him, who took an occasion to fall off " from his uncle, and was proclaimed king by the " Egyptians. This man invited Agésilas to his " party, and the like he did to Chabrias, offering " great rewards to both. Tachos had quickly intelligence of this, and had then recourse to all the " submissive methods he could think of, in order " to engage both Agésilas and Chabrias to his interest ; the latter readily yielded to his entreaties, " and endeavoured all he could to persuade Agésilas, " but he pretended to depend wholly on the orders " which should be sent him from Sparta, whither " both the Egyptian princes had dispatched ambassadors. The Lacedæmonians left the whole matter " to Agésilas, directing him to do what was most " for the profit of the commonwealth ; whereupon " he immediately changed sides, and carried off all " the mercenaries with him. He had not been " long in the service of Neftanabis before a certain " Mendesian set up his claim to the Egyptian kingdom, and brought a hundred thousand men at his " heels to support it. He attempted to tamper with " Agésilas, of which Neftanabis having notice began " to suspect him, and his suspicion increased when " Agésilas advised him to fight this multitude immediately ; he took quite a different method, retreating into a strong city, and shutting up himself " and his troops therein, the Mendesian advancing " invested the place immediately, and began to sink " a ditch, and throw up intrenchments all round " the place. Neftanabis all on a sudden talked of " fighting being afraid of being cooped up, and " starved out ; but Agésilas opposed it, for which " the Greeks blamed him, and the Egyptians called " him traitor ; but he bore all with patience being " ashamed of changing sides a second time. At last " when the enemy had almost perfected their works, " and only a narrow aperture was left, Agésilas " went to Neftanabis and addressed him thus. Now, " young man, you have an opportunity of saving " your self ; your enemies have been all this time " working for you ; if you issue out with your " forces, you will easily beat those who guard the " gap which is yet open ; and as for the rest, " their own works will hinder them from surrounding us. Neftanabis admiring his wisdom, " exactly followed his advice, by which means he " routed his competitor, and leaving the conduct of " the war for the future to Agésilas, he quickly subdued all his enemies, and settled him firmly on the " throne. After this being eagerly desirous of " doing still something more for the service of his " country, the king of Sparta embarked in order " to return to Greece, carrying with him among " other rich presents a gratuity of two hundred and " thirty talents as a free gift from Neftanabis to the state of Sparta. In this voyage he died, and

" for

■ Archidamus succeeded to his father Agefilaus, he was become the darling of the people for the glorious victory he had obtained over the Arcadians, and which because no Spartan fell therein, they transmitted to posterity by the name of the tear-less battle. In his reign broke out the Phocian or Iæced war, wherein he sided with the Phocians at the persuasion, as some writers say, of his wife Dinicha. Others affirm, that not only his wife and himself were wrought on by the bribes of the Phocians, but even the ephori, the senate, and the whole republic of Sparta; but though he espoused their quarrel, yet he was far from countenancing their cruelty, which on the contrary he openly condemned and opposed. When Philip king of Macedon began to interest himself much in the affairs of Greece, and to take highly upon him for the many victories he had gained, Archidamus is said to have sent him this message; Sir, If you will be pleased to measure your shadow you won't find it a whit longer than it was before. He was by no means pleased with the customs of his country, but on the contrary thought them burdensome and rigorous, affecting to live freely, and without restraint, supposing that it did not at all affect a man's honesty, if he eat a good dinner: For this reason he was glad of an opportunity to leave Sparta, and of residing in a foreign country, where he might live as he would without offending the laws, or giving scandal to his subjects; the Tarentines therefore requesting aid of the Lacedæmonians for their support against their neighbours, Archidamus very readily offered to command the forces that were decreed them, and passing on this occasion over into Italy, he was there slain near the city of Mandonium after having reigned fifteen years; his statue was erected at the temple of Jupiter Olympus, an honour which none of the Spartan kings had done them except himself, which Pau-sanias supposes was conceded to him, because he died fighting against the Barbarians, and did not receive those sepulchral honours which had been given to all his predecessors *.

Agis the son of Archidamus succeeded his father; he was a prince of great virtue and magnanimity; he in his youth had been sent ambassador to Philip of Macedon, who seeing him alone, whereas all other cities sent many deputies, said with an air of contempt, What! from Sparta but one? Why, Sir, said Agis, I was sent but to one?. When afterwards one of the creatures of that prince told him, Philip will not suffer you to set your foot in any other part of Greece. It is a mercy, said he, that we have a good deal of room at home?. During the reign of Alexander, though he hated the Macedonians; yet he did not think fit to expose his country to ruin by opposing them; but when after the battle of Issus abundance of mercenaries fled out of Persia, he lifted them to the number of eight thousand, and openly declared for Darius; from whom receiving money to pay his troops, and a fleet, he sailed over into Crete, part of which he subdued. After the battle of Arbela, he stirred up all Greece to revolt, by shewing them that when Alexander had subdued Persia, they must become a province of his empire, which would be no less grievous to them, than if they had been subdued by any of the former kings of Persia; for, as he rightly observed, a Grecian king reigning in Persia would be a Persian to them; besides, having been always free, he encouraged them to defend their freedom, while their capital enemy was yet afar off, and would be constrained to manage the war by his lieutenants. The Greeks, roused by these remonstrances, raised an army of twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse, of which when Antipater had notice, he composed on any terms the disturbances in Thrace, and marched strait into Greece with forty thousand men. Agis however did not retire or shun an engagement, so that a decisive battle was quickly fought, wherein after a glorious resistance, the Spartans and their confederates were routed with the loss of five thousand three hundred men, Antipater losing three thousand five hundred also. Agis himself fell, but in a manner greatly to his honour; for being covered with wounds, he was borne by his soldiers out of the battle, till seeing them on the point of being surrounded, he commanded them to set him down,

* DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xvi. STRABON. Geogr. lib. vi. PLUT. Apophthegm. LACON. PAUSAN. LACON.
 & MESSER. JULIAN. Orat. ii. 7 PLUT. Apophthegm. LACON. * Idem, ibid.

" for want of honey, which the Spartans were his deserting Tachis, which Plutarch justly treats as " wont to use in embalming, his servants wrapped an act of treachery, proceeding, as he tells us plainly,
 " his body in wax, and brought it safe to Sparta." from the Spartan maxim, that all things are just Xenophon has taken much pains to vindicate even that are profitable to one's country (67).

and preserve themselves for the future service of their country ; remaining then alone ^a with his sword in his hand, he fought it out upon his knees, killing several of the Macedonians, till at last he was shot through the body with a dart ^a. Such was the glorious death of this most virtuous king, who died in defence of liberty and his country after a reign of nine years. Yet when Alexander heard of this engagement, he was vain enough to say, While we are fighting Darius in Asia, there has been it seems a battle of mice in Arcadia ^b.

Eudamidas succeeds Agis.
Year after the
flood 2669.
Before Christ
330.

Agis was succeeded by his son Eudamidas, a prince of great wisdom, moderation and gentleness ; he governed all his days in peace, and we have of consequence nothing of him on record except certain instances of his good sense, and great capacity for governing in those troublesome times wherein he lived. The death of Agis ^b had so much provoked the Lacedæmonians, that they were for carrying on a war against Macedon at all events, which Eudamidas opposed ; and when a certain Spartan addressed him thus, Why, Sir, when all your citizens are for a war, do you alone advise them to continue in peace ? Because, answered the king, I would convince them of their mistake. Another magnifying the victories which had been obtained by their ancestors against the Persians, and encouraging them from thence to undertake a war against Macedon, You think, Sir, said Eudamidas, that it is the same thing to make war against a thousand sheep, and against fifty wolves. Coming into the school of Xenocrates the philosopher, and observing that he was very old, he asked what was his profession, and some body answering that he was a wise man, who fought after virtue, Alas ! said he, Is he seeking it at these years ? When then will he make use of it ? When Alexander caused it to be proclaimed throughout Greece, that all the exiles should return in safety to their own cities, excepting those of Thebes ; This is a hard case, O ye Thebans, said Eudamidas, but at the same time very honourable ; for it is evident that Alexander fears you only of all the Greeks ^c. All these kings had for their colleague Cleomenes the son of Cleombrotus, who reigned very long, but without doing any thing that was remarkable.

Archidamus
and Arcus
kings of Sparta.

Archidamus succeeded his father Eudamidas, as Arcus the son of Acrotatus did his grandfather Cleomenes, but not without some dispute ; his uncle Cleonymus setting up a title to the throne, though the people preferred the son of the elder brother to the younger. Cleonymus however retired to Pyrrhus, whom he brought with an army into his country to abet his cause, notwithstanding that the ephori and senate would have granted him any reasonable terms he could have asked. The Spartans sent Dercyllidas to meet him on the frontiers, and to expostulate with him on the injustice of his invasion ; but Pyrrhus by one of his courtiers bid him carry this message to Sparta, that they should receive their king Cleonymus, or he would make them know that they were no better than other men. Sir, answered Dercyllidas, If your master is a god we do not fear him, because we have done no wrong ; and if he is a man we do not fear him, because we are as good as he ^d. This expedition had well nigh accomplished the ruin of Sparta, occasioning much more loss thereto than either of the attempts of Epaminondas. It is our duty therefore to enter into a distinct detail thereof. Pyrrhus had with him twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and twenty-four elephants. Arcus was at this time in Crete, and the city was chiefly intrusted to the care of his son Acrotatus, whose amours had in a great measure occasioned this war ; for he had debauched Cbelidonis the wife of Cleonymus his uncle, which was one great reason of his flying to Pyrrhus, whom he accompanied in this expedition. When they arrived in the neighbourhood of Sparta, which was very unexpected, the citizens flattering themselves that their embassadors would have obtained peace, certain intelligence was brought to the king, that the city was so meanly provided, and the people so much amazed, that without question it would fall almost without trouble into his hands ; when this news came, it was almost evening, yet Cleonymus pressed hard for their marching thither that night ; but the king fearing that the darkness would afford an opportunity to the soldiers of possessing themselves of all the riches of Sparta, he refused to attack it till day-light ; a thing so little expected even by the Spartans themselves, that in Cleonymus's house the Helotes were busy in providing a supper, not doubting but Pyrrhus would take up his lodgings there. But when it was known that his soldiers had pitched their

^a DIODOR. SICUL. lib. xviii. CURT. lib. vi. JUSTIN. lib. xii. STRAB. lib. viii. PAUSAN. Attic.
^b DIODOR. lib. xviii. ^c PLUT. Apophthegm. Lacon. PAUSAN. L. con. ^d PLUT. in Apophthegm.

a camp near the walls, the senate assembled to consider if any thing could be done for their preservation ; and the first resolution they came to was to send the women immediately over into Crete, which resolution some way taking wind, the Spartan ladies assembled together, and having deputed Archidamia to carry their sentiments to the senate, she entered the room with a sword in her hand, addressing the assembly in these words : Do not, my lords, entertain so mean an opinion of the Spartan women, as to fancy that they will ever out live Sparta ; instead of considering whether we are to fly, consider what we are to do, and be assured we will undertake any thing for the service of our country^e. Upon this it was resolved to sink a trench directly opposite to the enemies camp, and to defend the extremities thereof by burying waggons to their axle-trees, crossing each other, in order thereby to prevent the passages of the elephants. When this work was begun, the women came out many of them in their shifts to assist the men in years, who were employed in digging ; for they would not allow any of the young men to fatigue themselves, lest they should be unable to sustain the enemies charge in the morning. The dimensions of the trench, once settled, which some tells us, were these, viz. the breadth six cubits, the depth four, and the length eight hundred feet ; the women took a third part of it, and engaged to finish it by morning^f. When day began to break, and the troops of Pyrrhus were in motion, the Lacedæmonian ladies armed their men for the fight, representing to them as they were buckling their armour, and putting their spears into their hands, how glorious an opportunity they had of conquering the enemies of their country in the sight of their mothers, wives and daughters, or of falling in its cause. As for Chelidonis, she retired to her own house with a halter about her neck, to shew that if things went amiss, she would rather end her own life, than live again with her husband. Pyrrhus saw with amazement the labour his troops were to undergo ; however, he led them in person to the assault, where they fought with the utmost fury against the Spartans, who considering for what they fought, made a most desperate resistance ; in the mean time Ptolemy the son of Pyrrhus drew off two thousand Gauls, and other choice men from the attack, and marching to one of the extremities of the ditch, employed them in dragging out the waggons, which at last with much ado they effected, and began to draw them off towards a neighbouring river. Acrotatus was the first who perceived this desperate mischief, which he immediately sought to remedy ; for rushing through the city with three hundred men, he passed round by the sides of the hills, and charged Ptolemy's troops in the rear, who thinking of nothing less, and being in no posture of defence, he forced numbers of them into the ditch, and drove the waggons they had removed over the rest to the great joy of the Spartans ; where Pyrrhus charged in person, the attack was sustained with greatest vigour, and one Phyllius a Spartan gave such a demonstration of invincible courage as is scarce any where to be recorded ; he fought in the front of his countrymen's ranks, till he found himself so exhausted through the many wounds he had received, that he was no longer able to stand ; when he called to the commanding officer, and having resigned to him his post, retired as far back as he could, that his body might be out of the reach of the enemy when he fell. The battle, as it began with the day, so it ended therewith, and Pyrrhus being extremely fatigued, retired to his tent, where he slept very soundly, till towards morning, when he had the following dream : He thought he saw himself throwing lightning on Sparta, which set it all on fire, with the joy of which he awaked ; he immediately ran to his council of officers, and communicated to them his vision ; but Lysimachus his favourite did not understand the vision in the same light with the king ; Thou knowest Pyrrhus, said he, that with us places stricken with lightning are accounted sacred ; I am therefore of opinion, that the gods have hereby signified to thee, that Sparta is as sacred and inviolable as any place stricken with lightning ; Well, replied Pyrrhus, I am ready to own, my friend, that nothing can be more uncertain than our conjectures concerning these things ; yet this remains certain still that we ought to do our duty ; and therefore without thinking more of my dream, let us prepare for the attack^g. The assault was no less vigorous than the day before, nor did the Lacedæmonians defend themselves with less vigour, the women remaining all day at the trench supplying the soldiers with arms, ammunition, meat, drink, and whatever else they wanted, binding up their wounds, and carrying them off in case they were disabled ; at last however Pyrrhus prevailed in the very attempt his son had miscarried in the day before, and of a sudden appeared within the waggons, charging at the head of a great number of horse with mighty resolution. In vain the Lacedæmonians crowded from all sides to impede his passage; they were trodden down by his horse, and Pyrrhus was on the very point of entering the city when an arrow struck his steed to the heart; the beast flouncing in the agonies of death, threw him off, and his soldiers in the first confusion, not knowing whether he as well as his horse was not slain, gave back; upon which the Spartans pressed on them so eagerly and distributed their darts with such success, that when Pyrrhus had remounted, he thought it best to retire, supposing that the third day would put an end to this contest, when after the heat of the action, the Spartans had leisure to feel their wounds; nor would he in all probability have been mistaken, if he had dealt the next day with none but those whom he engaged before. The good fortune of Sparta prevented this; for one of Antigonus's captains having intelligence of their distress; and of the noble stand they had made, adventured with a body of troops under his command to throw himself into the place, where he was scarce arrived before king Areus himself entered with two thousand fresh men. Pyrrhus notwithstanding assailed the place the third time, but with little success; whereupon he embraced an invitation given him to march to Argos, and endeavoured to rid himself of this unlucky business as well as he could; yet here again he found himself distressed, for king Areus being once come did not care to part with him so, but sent a choice body of horse to insult his rear. The king, vexed at this insult, ordered his son Ptolemy with some squadrons under his command to march to the assistance of the troops attacked, where the young prince, more ambitious of glory, than careful of life, exposing himself too much was slain. Pyrrhus when he heard the news immediately jumped on horseback, and charging with unwonted fury on the Lacedæmonians, slew many of them, and particularly their commander in chief, with his own hand; he afterwards quitted his horse, and fought on foot, and when he had satiated himself with destroying numbers of the Spartans, he continued his march to Argos. Areus is very much blamed for his conduct on this occasion: It is said that when Pyrrhus was retired, pursuing him was needless, and served only to throw away the lives of many brave men; but it seems the Spartan king was of opinion that no safety could be hoped for till Pyrrhus was out of Greece; for this reason he potted away in person to Argos with a thousand choice foot, and yet he scarce arrived time enough there to save the city, a gate of which had been perfidiously opened to Pyrrhus in the night, he entered it before the citizens were aware; however they stood to their arms, and while they were hotly engaged with the enemy, Areus came to their aid; Pyrrhus at last perceiving that he fought under great disadvantages would have retreated; but his orders being mistaken, and his forces and elephants still continuing to enter the city, he was at last beat from his horse by a woman, who standing on the top of her house, and perceiving him about to push his horse upon her son, discharged a thick tile at his head, which struck him on his temple, took from him his senses, and before he could recover them, an officer of Antigonus's army struck off his head. Concerning this Areus we know nothing of him farther than that he was a zealous defender of the liberties of Greece, as far as the broken and distressed state of his country would give him leave; for when he understood that Athens was in danger of being oppressed by Demetrius the son of Antigonus, he generously armed in its defence, and was slain valiantly fighting at the battle of Corinth. To this prince the best critics have referred that letter to Onias the high priest, which we find recorded in the book of Maccabees (S). He was succeeded in his throne by his son Acrotatus, who had so valiantly defended Sparta when attacked by Pyrrhus.

^e PLUTARCH. in vit. Pyrrh.^f JUSTIN. lib. xxv. c. 4.^g PLUTARCH. in vit. Pyrrh.

Or

^a JUSTIN. lib. xxv. c. 5. ¹ JUSTIN. Hist. lib. xxv. c. 5. PAUSAN. in Argol. PLUT. in vit. Pyrrh. ² PLUT. in vit. Demetr. ³ 1 Maccab. xii. 20. JOSEPH. Antiq. Judaic. lib. xii. c. 5.

(S) The letter above referred to runs thus:
Areus king of the Lacedæmonians to Onias the high priest, greeting;

It is found in writing, that the Lacedæmonians and Jews are brethren, and that they are of the stock of Abraham: Now therefore, since this is come to our knowledge you shall do well to write to us of your peace (69). This letter is exactly in the Laconic stile, and deserves therefore to be preferred to that which we find in Josephus, wherein Demetrius is named as ambassador from Sparta; the form of the letter is said to be square, and the common seal of Lacedæmon

- a Of the other house Archidamus the fourth of that name, the son of Eudamidas; The son of Archidamus IV. king of Sparta. governed with great reputation; he was a prince of the true Spartan race, who was desirous to maintain all Greece in freedom, and to repress, if it had been possible, the mighty power of the Macedonian kings, which like a torrent swept all before them; and though for a time they might be restrained from doing much mischief by their being obliged to turn their arms elsewhere; yet whenever they had leisure they were sure to seek such an authority in Greece as suited not with her liberty. Archidamus had struggled against the stream when it was most rapid, that is, when Demetrius Poliorcetes after subduing Albens sought to make himself master of Sparta; twice Archidamus opposed him in the field, but was so unfortunate as to be as often defeated, nor could any thing have saved the virgin city of Sparta from the rage of the victor, if the declension of his affairs in Asia had not constrained him for a time to abandon all thoughts of Greece. He was succeeded by his son, but how long he reigned, or at what age he died, is uncertain.

- Eudamidas* the son of Archidamus was the colleague of Acrotatus, he married Agistrata by whom he had two sons, Agis and Archidamus. As to his acts, we find no mention of them in history: It is probable, that being a man of small parts, the government rested chiefly in Acrotatus, who could not but be highly beloved by the people on account of his great valour, and many virtues. Aristodemus, who had made himself prince of Megalopolis, was the capital enemy of the Lacedæmonians, seeking by all means to abase a nation who were always ready to take arms for liberty, and who alike hated the oppression of tyrants themselves, or to see their neighbours oppressed by them. Acrotatus at the head of the Lacedæmonian army endeavoured to make head against this prince, who was grown formidable to all Peloponnesus; but his fortune being no way equal to his merit, his forces were routed, and himself slain, leaving the kingdom to his young son Areus, to whom Leonidas the son of Cleonymus was tutor or protector, and he dying after a very short reign, Leonidas stepped into the throne in his own right.

- Leonidas* had been bred up, or at least had long lived in the court of Seleucus, which made him extremely fond of that pomp and grandeur which he saw affected there; at Sparta he had a great opportunity of indulging his ambition and luxury, the people being greatly altered from what they were before, and the Lycurgic maxims grown not only into disuse, but contempt: One Opytadeus being raised to a chair among the ephori, took occasion from thence to gratify his unnatural prejudice against his own son, procured a law whereby all men were left at liberty to dispose of their lands by gift or sale, or by testament at the time of their decease. This subverted the very foundations of the state, for by degrees the lands were most of them transferred from the ancient Spartan families, so that though they were reduced now to about seven hundred, not above one hundred of these had any lands, but lived

• PLUTARCH. ubi supra. • PLUTARCH. in vit. Agid. • PLUTARCH. ubi supra. & in vit. Cleomen.

Lacedæmon is described as having represented thereon an eagle holding a dragon; the learned primate of Ireland hath been led into a great mistake by paying too much regard to this Jewish writer; for it is certain that this letter could never have been sent to Onias the third of that name high priest of the Jews, who flourished when there were no kings at all at Sparta; this the learned prelate was so well aware of, that to get over these difficulties, he supposes one Areus a nobleman of Sparta to have taken the title of king in the penning this epistle (70); but here again is a new and greater difficulty incurred than the former; Jonathan in his letter to the Lacedæmonians speaking of the epistle before us, says it was wrote a long time ago, which no way quadrates with the time in which Josephus and archbishop Usser place it; the truth is, this letter was not written to Onias the son of Simon, but to Onias the first, who was undeniably contemporary with this king Areus, of whom we have treated in the text. In this we have followed the opinion of the judicious Dr. Prideaux (71). We take the liberty of adding that there is the more reason to suspect some alteration in this letter by Josephus, because when he comes to give us Jonathan's letter, he has taken the liberty to alter its address also, and not at all for the better; thus it runs according to Josephus: Jonathan, high priest of the Jews, and the senate and commonalty of the Jews, to the ephori, senate, and people of the Lacedæmonians greeting (72). Whereas in the book of Maccabees the address is thus: Jonathan the high priest, and the elders of the nation and the priests, and the other people of the Jews, unto the Lacedæmonians their brethren send greeting (73). Neither ephori or senate are mentioned here, they were probably put in by Josephus to make the letter look the better. The name of Demoteles is also inserted in this letter, though we find nothing of it in the letter recorded by the author of the book of Maccabees. How the Spartans and the Jews came to be related, must be considered in another place; our business here was to fix the time when the letter from Areus was sent to Onias.

(70) Usser. Annal. V. T. A. I. P. 453x. (71) Constellation of the history of the Old and New Testament. Part ii. Book II. (72) Antiq. Judaic. lib. xiii. c. 5. (73) 1 Macc. xii. 6.

in the city lazily without employment, and without wealth, their spirits sinking a with their fortune, and with both the credit and glory of the Spartan state?

Agis the son of Eudamidas attempts to restore the constitution of Sparta.

THE colleague of Leonidas of the other house was Agis the son of Eudamidas, a young prince of great hopes; he shewed himself both just and obliging to all men, and in the gentleness of his disposition, and sublimity of his virtues, not only exceeded Leonidas who reigned with him, but all the kings of Sparta from king Agisilaus. For though he had been bred very tenderly, and in abundance of all things by his mother Agessiata, and his grandmother Archidamia, who were the wealthiest of the Lacedæmonians; yet before the age of twenty, he so far overcame himself as to renounce effeminate pleasures. He was a very handsome person, and of a graceful behaviour; yet, to give a check to the vanity he might take therein, would always go plain and mean in his cloaths. In his diet, bathings, and in all his exercises he chose to imitate the old Laconic frugality and temperance, and was often heard to say, He would not desire the kingdom, if he did not hope by means of that authority to restore their ancient laws and discipline. This maxim of his governed his whole life; he endeavoured to associate himself with men of interest and capacity, sufficient to bring about the great design he had formed of thoroughly reforming the state. Agisilaus his uncle by the mother's side was one of his principal counsellors, a man of great eloquence, but no great virtue; the part he took in this business being chiefly owing to his son's persuasions, whose name was Hypomedon, one of the worthiest men of his age. This Agisilaus brought over his sister king Agis's mother to the sentiments of her son, notwithstanding her averseness to them at first; and she in a short time brought over most of the ladies of Sparta, which was a thing of prodigious consequence, since they had always a mighty stroke in political affairs, and their husbands seldom took any step without their advice. On this occasion as on many others they shewed their great good sense and virtue; for when they had thoroughly considered the matter, and perceived that though these new regulations would take away their finery and their trinkets, yet at the same time it would restore the credit of Sparta, and give her new lustre in the world; they came into it unanimously, and endeavoured to engage their husbands to relish the proposal, which they found no difficult task to perform among the gross of the people, who partly because they saw the power of the state decline, and partly from their natural fondness for revolutions were eager to see the thing accomplished. But the few in whose hands the wealth of Sparta was centered, grew very uneasy; they applied themselves to Leonidas, telling him that as he was an older and wiser man than his colleague, he ought to interpose, and not suffer the constitution to be destroyed to gratify the ambition of a young man. For these possessors of money called that the constitution by which their usurious gains were to be preserved, and trembled at the name of Lycurgus as runaway slaves were wont to do, if they hear that of their master. Leonidas was afraid to meddle with the people, whom he saw evidently inclined to favour his colleague, and the scheme which he had formed. He therefore applied to the principal magistrates whom he laboured to bring over to his opinion, that Agis intended to establish an independent power in his own person by inclining the people to his interests; first by a remitting of debts, and then by an equal division of lands. The party he formed by these suggestions were very considerable; however Agis persisted in his resolution; and when his friend Lyfander was chosen one of the ephori actually presented his rhetra or decree to the senate; the chief articles of which were these: That every one should be free from his debts; all the lands to be divided into equal portions; those that lay betwixt the valley of Pellene and mount Tegetus as far as the cities of Mallea and Sallasia into four thousand five hundred lots, the remainder into fifteen thousand; these last to be shared by some chosen out of the adjacent countries, men able and fit to bear arms; the first among the natural Spartans, admitting also strangers to supply their number, such as were young, vigorous, well educated, and ingenious. All these were to be divided into fifteen companies, some of four hundred, some of two, with a diet and discipline agreeable to the laws of Lycurgus. The matter being hotly debated in the senate, Lyfander began to doubt the event, and therefore without staying to put the question, convoked a general assembly of the people; in this assembly both the kings, the ephori, and other considerable persons were heard, and by long orations sought to shew the conveniency or inconveniency of the scheme, according † PLUT. in vit. Agid. & in vit. Cleom.

- a as they were inclined or averse to it; at last however it was rejected in the senate, though but by one voice, and from the time of that rejection the people in general attended on and paid their court to Agis, while the richer citizens, and those especially who had placed their money out at interest, applied themselves to Leonidas. Lysander however contrived a method for removing him out of the way, he caused an accusation to be preferred against him for the breach of two old laws, the one forbidding the kings of Sparta to marry a stranger, the other prohibiting travel to foreign countries. By the help of these accusations, and practising a little on the superstitious temper of the people, he so terrified Leonidas, that he fled to the people of Minerva for shelter. Upon this Lysander stirred up Cleombrotus, who was of the royal house, and who had married the daughter of Leonidas to pretend to the kingdom, of which when Leonidas had notice, he withdrew, taking his daughter with him, who chose rather to fly with her father, than to reign with her husband^a.

- Cleombrotus* being raised to the legal dignity, concurred with Agis in all his designs; but the next year the ephori being chosen out of the opposite faction, they cited Lysander and his friends to appear before them, and answer for what they had done during their administration; they in this distress had instantly recourse to the kings; beseeching them to protect those who were threatened for having performed their command; Lysander at the same time suggested that the ephori were created only to take care of the state in case any difference happened between the kings; but that while they agreed, these magistrates had no right to call in question any acts they thought fit to authorize. Agis and Cleombrotus being persuaded of this, resolved to make Lysander and his friends easy immediately; they therefore went directly to the place where the ephori were sitting; removed them from their seats, and placed others in their room, the first of these being Agefilaus. Such a transaction as this could not well happen without a tumult, but through the great care and steady integrity of Agis no blood was spilt, nor did any ill accident happen. Agefilaus indeed had projected the murder of Leonidas as he was on the road to Tegæa; but king Agis having notice of it, sent a considerable number of his own friends to escort him; things being in this situation, the kings would have proceeded both to the cancelling of debts, and to the equal division of lands, had not Agefilaus prevented it, by pretending that it would not be safe to attempt both at one time; but that first the debts should be cancelled, and then that monied men would more readily come into a division of lands; this he said because he had himself a good estate, but was greatly in debt; wherefore he sought to rid himself of the importunities of his creditors without parting with any of his possessions. The kings and even Lysander were deceived by his specious pretences, so that they came readily into his schemes, causing all obligations to be brought in and burnt immediately, but referring the division of lands to a further opportunity, which greatly displeased the people. Agis quickly perceived this, and therefore he sought to repair his error by immediately dividing the estates; but Agefilaus still found means to put it off under one pretence or other, till Agis was obliged to go with a body of Spartan troops to the Assistance of the Acheans. In his absence he lost all bounds of modesty, and acted so tyrannically, that by the time Agis returned, a conspiracy was formed for restoring Leonidas, which was accordingly effected; and upon this Agis fled to the temple of Minerva, and Cleombrotus to that of Neptune. Leonidas shewed more resentment against his son-in-law than against Agis, he went to his sanctuary, and reproached him with his ingratitude and want of duty, and threatened him with death; but his daughter Cbelonis interceding, and holding the two children she had in her arms, prevailed so far as to have his sentence changed into that of perpetual banishment; in which she accompanied him, notwithstanding all the intreaties of her father; which extraordinary transaction hath drawn this reflection from Plutarch, that Cleombrotus was happier in being banished with such a wife, than he could be in the possession of a kingdom without her^(T).

Cleombrotus
succeeds Leonidas on his expulsion.

Leonidas

^a PLUT. ubi supra.

^a PLUT. ubi supra.

(T) The character of Cbelonis the wife of Cleombrotus is one of the most noble and most laudable in the Spartan history; we cannot therefore be blamed for inserting her speech to her father, which she pronounced in a mourning habit, and in a suppliant posture thus: "This mourning vest, these

" dejected looks, and all those other tokens of unutterable woe, which cannot be concealed, are not worn for the sake of Cleombrotus, but were put on to condole with you in your banishment; and now you are restored to your country, and to your kingdom, must I still remain in grief and misery?"

Leonidas restored to the kingdom, and Cleombrotus
banished.

Leonidas, once resettled on the throne, began to contrive all the methods possible ^a for drawing Agis out of his sanctuary; but all his attempts failed, at last he corrupted some of the king's friends, who were wont to visit him daily to condole with him, and after a time to carry him to the baths, and guard him back again. The names of these persons, for it is but just that they should be always recorded, were Amphares, Demochares, and Archefilaus. The first of these had borrowed abundance of rich goods and plate from the mother of king Agis; he therefore conceived, if that prince was taken off, he should acquire the possession of them; the other two were bribed by Leonidas; these men therefore took an opportunity when king Agis was returning from the baths, and relied entirely on their protection, to seize him; Amphares caught him by the arm, Demochares being a strong man, threw a ^b cloak over his head, and muffled him up; then their associates coming in to their assistance, they dragged their sovereign away to the common prison, where the new ephori, constituted by Leonidas, sat ready to judge him. To give the greater colour of justice to their proceedings, some senators were by, but they took care that they should be such as were of their party. As soon as the king came in, they asked him how he durst attempt to alter the government? at which he smiled without affording them an answer, which provoked one of the ephori to tell him, That he ought rather to weep, for they would now make him sensible of his presumption. Another asked him, Whether he was not constrained to do what he did by Agelilaus and Lysander; to which the king with a composed countenance answered, I was con- ^c strained by no man, the design was mine, and my intent was to have restored the laws of Lycurgus, and to have governed by them. But do you not now, said one of his judges, repent of your rashness? No, replied the king, though I see my death is inevitable, I can never repent of so just and honourable an intention. The ephori then ordered him to be hauled away and strangled. The officers of justice refused to obey, and even the mercenary soldiers declined so unworthy an action; whereupon Demochares reviling them for cowards, forced the king into the room where the execution was to be performed. Agis about to die, perceiving one of the serjeants bitterly bewailing his misfortune; Weep not, friend, for me, said he, who die innocently; but grieve for those who are guilty of this wicked act; my condition is much better than ^d theirs. Then stretching out his neck, he submitted to death with a constancy worthy both of the royal dignity, and his own great character. Immediately after Agis was dead, Amphares went out of the prison gate, where he found Agistrata, who calling herself at his feet, he gently raised her up, pretending still the same friendship as formerly. He assured her she need not fear any further violence should be offered against her son; and that, if she pleased, she might go in and see him; she begged her mother might also have the favour of being admitted, and he replied no body should hinder it. When they were entered, he commanded the gate should again be locked, and the grandmother to be first introduced; she was now grown very old, and had lived all her days with great reputation of wisdom and virtue. ^e As soon as Amphares thought she was dispatched, he told Agistrata she might now go in if she pleased; she entered, where beholding her son's body stretched on the ground, and her mother hanging by the neck, she stood at first astonished at so horrid a spectacle; but after a while recollecting her spirits, the first thing she did was to assist the soldiers in taking down the body; then covering it decently, she laid it by her son's, where embracing and kissing his cheeks; O my son, said she, it is thy too great mercy and goodness which has brought thee and us to this untimely end. Amphares, who stood watching behind the door, hearing this, rushed in hastily, and with a furious tone and countenance, said to her, Since you approve so " misery? Or would you have me attired in my " festival ornaments, that I may rejoice with you,

" when you have killed within my arms the man
" to whom you gave me for a wife? Either Cleom-" brotus must appease you by mine and my chil" dren's tears, or he must suffer a punishment greater " than his faults have deserved: He shall infallibly
" see me die before him, whom he so tenderly " loves. To what end should I live, or how shall " I appear among the Spartan ladies, when it shall " so manifestly be seen that I have not been able to " move compassion, either in my husband for the " sake of my father, or in my father for the sake " of my husband? I was born, it seems, to be dis-" honoured and disgraced both as a wife and a " daughter, in that relation which is nearest to me

" in each capacity. As for Cleombrotus I suffici" ently disowned his cause, when I forsook him to " follow you; but now you yourself will justify " his proceedings, by shewing to the world that " for the sake of a kingdom it is just to kill a son
" in-law, and be regardless of a daughter" (70).

(70) Plut. in vit. Agid.

well

- a well of your son's actions, it is fit you should partake in his reward. She rising up to meet her destiny, only uttered these few words; I pray the gods that all this may redound to the good of Sparta. Archidamus the brother of Agis, saved himself by flight, but was constrained to leave his wife, who had just lain in, behind him; her, because she was the heiress of a great estate, Leonidas compelled by force to marry his own son Cleomenes; to this the young lady was very averse, yet in the end she was forced to comply. Cleomenes behaved towards her with so much tenderness and humanity, that she became quickly reconciled to her marriage, but continued to hate her father-in-law for all that. Cleomenes was too young to consummate the marriage as yet, but having an extreme tenderness for his wife, he would often
- b beg her to relate to him the story of Agis's murder, at which he wept, and by degrees began privately to follow his example; yet he followed it according to his own disposition, which was by far more bold and violent than that of Agis. He was constrained however to bridle his desires, till after the death of his father, he well knowing that both the king and the nobles were too much dissolved in luxury and ease ever to incline to, or so much as bear with the execution of his design.

- On the death of Leonidas, Cleomenes mounted the Spartan throne alone, and in the very beginning of his reign found himself obliged to exert both his conduct and his courage. Aratus at the head of the Achéans had formed a grand project of uniting all the Peloponnesians into that league; the youth of Cleomenes seemed to
- c furnish him with an opportunity of trying the disposition of the Spartans, which he neglected not, but suddenly invaded the Arcadians their neighbours, and their friends who lived in a manner under their protection. The ephori upon this ordered Cleomenes to seize on a pass into Laconia, which was then in the hands of the allies of the Achéans, which he performed, and afterwards disappointed Aratus in a scheme he had formed for seizing Tegea and Orchomanium. Upon which the young king sent a message full of sneer to Aratus; the old statesmen deriding his youth, asked Demo-crites, a Spartan exile, who lived with him, What sort of a person this Cleomenes was? Why, my friend, replied the Spartan, I will answer you in few words; if you have any thing to do against the Lacedæmonians, let me advise you to begin before this
- d young eagle's talons are grown. In the subsequent course of the war, Aratus by his great skill obtained some advantages over the Spartans; but Cleomenes gave therein such shining instances of his courage and military virtues, that this great captain grew himself apprehensive and the people of Sparta seemed to take new spirit from their king. The ephori however were for putting an end to the war, because they did not care to run any hazard, and because they were not a little afraid of success, which they knew would raise not only the power, but the credit of Cleomenes, which they dreaded more than that of their enemies. The king, who was a man of great penetration, saw clearly that without reducing the power of the ephori, he should have nothing more left him than the title of king, with this farther
- e mortification, that he should see the power of Sparta sink daily without being able to hinder it. In this perplexity he took a bold resolution of ridding himself of the ephori at once; this he communicated to some of his friends, who agreed to assist him in it from the same generous desire of restoring the glory of their country. The first step that was taken in this business was the recalling of Archidamus the brother of Agis, who on his approach to Sparta was murdered by his brother's enemies, not without some suspicion that Cleomenes consented thereto; but this seems to agree little with his character, and Plutarch, who reports this suggestion, owns, if there was any truth in it, he was forced thereto. When it appeared a point out of dispute, that without an army a revolution could not be effected, he by money
- f prevailed on the ephori to engage in a war, and to give him the command. His mother Cratesiclea, a woman of great spirit, perceiving the difficulties her son had to struggle with, married again, that she might fix a nobleman of great interest to his party, and at the same time engaged to give up her own fortune, persuaded her husband also to come to the same terms, whenever a division of goods and of lands should be made. Cleomenes carrying such as he suspected most into the field with him, did many things there worthy of a Spartan prince; but withal, he took care so to harass his army with quick and almost continued marches, that many desired to be left behind in Arcadia; with the rest he advanced slowly towards Lacedæmon.

Cleomenes succeeds Leo- nidas.

Year after the
flood 2783.
Before Christ
216.

¹ PLUT. in vit. Agid. ² PLUT. in vit. Arati. ³ PLUT. in vit. Cleom. ⁴ Id. ibid. POLYB. l. v.

When he drew near the place, he sent a small party headed by some of his confidants, who surprized the ephori at supper, killed four of them upon the spot, and had killed the fifth if he had not counterfeited himself dead, and thereby gained an opportunity of retiring, wounded as he was, to a temple, from whence he came forth next day without being injured. On the morrow Cleomenes came into the forum, ordered all the chairs of the ephori to be removed, except one which he reserved for himself, then he made a most artful apology to the people for what he had done (U); he shewed them the necessity of restoring the Lycurgic institutions, and assured them, that though the situation of things had obliged him to make use of violence in effecting this resolution, yet for the future he would pay a strict regard to the laws, though for his own safety he proscribed at this time fourscore citizens. b He was the first who delivered up his whole substance to the public stock, wherein he was followed by his father-in-law, and other friends. In assigning the lands, he gave shares to all whom he had banished, promising to recal them as soon as was consistent with the public safety; immediately after he restored the old Laconic way of educating of youth, of eating in public, and of doing their exercises together; he also raised a considerable body of troops, and disciplined and armed them in a new manner; to shew his dislike to tyranny, and to remove any umbrage that his citizens might take at his doing all these things by his own authority, he associated his brother Euclidas in the kingdom, declaring that for the future there should be always two kings at Sparta, as there were in times past, and that he would not erect a monarchy in order to transmit it to his posterity; which declaration of his was extremely grateful to the people. But that which of all others served to establish most the power and the character of Cleomenes, was the course of his own life, which was in nothing more stately or more expensive than that of the meanest citizen. There were in his house no purple furnitures, no canopies, or cloaths of state, no superb chairs, or couches for indulging ease, but a plain king, and every thing plain about him: When any offered petitions, he stepped forward to receive them, talked graciously to every body, redressed all the injuries that were done by others, and did none himself; yet had his virtue nothing in it of austerity or affectation; he was naturally of a pleasant temper, which he indulged. When strangers dined d with him, he had plenty of wine, which was set down in a brass vessel, with silver cups near it, according to the number of the guests, every man being permitted to

(U) It is from Plutarch that we learn the purport of the king's speech on this occasion, which it is necessary for us to report here, not only as it nearly concerns the present thread of our history, but because we have referred ourselves to it elsewhere, as containing several curious particulars relating to the Spartan policy. Cleomenes then in this harangue alledged, "That the government, as it was framed by Lycurgus, was composed of the kings and the senate; and that that model of government had continued a long time, and needed no other sort of magistrates to give it perfection. But afterwards, in the long war with the Messenians, when the kings being to command the armies had no time to attend civil causes, they chose some of their friends, and left them to determine the suits of their citizens in their stead. These were called ephori, and at first behaved themselves as servants to the kings, but afterwards by degrees they appropriated the power to themselves, and erected a distinct sort of magistracy. An evidence of the truth of this may be taken from the usual behaviour of the kings, who upon the first and second message of the ephori refuse to go, but upon the third readily attended them: And Asteropus, the first that raised the ephori to that height of power, was not Ephorus till many years after their institution; therefore, whilst they modestly contained themselves within their own proper sphere, it was better to bear with them than to make a disturbance. But that an upstart introduced power should so far destroy the old model of government, as to banish some kings, murder others, without hearing their defence, and threaten those who desired to see the best and most divine constitution restored in Sparta, was unsufferable. Therefore, if it had been possible for him without blood-shed to have freed Lacedæmon from those foreign plagues, luxury, vanity, debts, and usury; and from those more ancient evils, poverty and riches, he should have thought himself the happiest king in the world; having, like an expert physician cured the diseases of his country without pain. But now in this necessity, Lycurgus's example favoured his proceedings; who being neither king nor magistrate, but a private man, and aiming at the kingdom, came armed into the market-place, insomuch that king Charilaus fled for fear to the altar: But he being a good man, and a lover of his country, readily consented to Lycurgus's project, and admitted an alteration in the state. Thus by his own actions Lycurgus shewed, that it was difficult to correct the government without force and fear; in using which, he said he would be so moderate as never to desire their assistance; but either to terrify or ruin the enemies of Sparta's happiness and safety. He commanded that all the land should be left in common, and private claims laid aside: That debtors should be discharged of their debts, and a strict search be made who were foreigners, and who not: That the true Spartans recovering their courage, might defend the city with their arms; and that they might no longer see Laconia, for want of a sufficient number to secure it, wasted by the Ætians (70)".

- a drink what he pleased, being neither desired nor forced to drink more ; being informed that Aratus and the Acheans were preparing to give him some disturbance, from an apprehension that after these alterations he durst not leave the city, he immediately marched with a body of troops into their territories, and cut them out work enough at home. In the course of the war, he gained such advantage over Aratus, as made that great statesman and captain decline being chosen captain general of the Acheans next year as he was wont ; yet did not Cleomenes make any ill use of his victories, or attempt to oppress the cities which fell into his power, but restored them to their liberty, and where they had been expelled, recalled their ancient inhabitants. The Acheans were so much frightened with this unexpected run of ill success, that they
- b were ready to listen to any terms which Cleomenes should think fit to offer. That generous victor declared that he fought nothing more than to be acknowledged general of the Greeks, and that he was ready to deliver up the prisoners without ransom, and to restore the cities he had taken. Lerna was appointed for the place of treaty, the Acheans being willing to accept of the king's terms ; but Cleomenes marching thither swiftly, heated himself very much by the way, and drinking in the midst of his heat a draught of cold water, threw himself into a fever, which was attended with the loss of his speech ; he ordered however the principal captives of the Acheans to be set at liberty, and put off the meeting to another time and place. This accident ruined him and Greece ; for Aratus, who till this time had approved
- c himself a most worthy Grecian commander, now suffered envy, jealousy and self-conceit to triumph over his virtue, and his love for his country ; and he who in his youth had expelled the Macedonians out of Peloponnesus merely from the love of freedom, now privately recalled them, fearing that Cleomenes, the most worthy of the Spartan kings, should be raised to that dignity which he so highly deserved *. When Cleomenes was recovered, he advanced towards Argos, where the Acheans held their assembly ; but when he drew near, Aratus caused deputies to be sent him, to inform him that he must either enter the city alone, or be content to treat without the place ; to which Cleomenes answered, That he was unjustly dealt with, for they ought to have told him so plainly at first, and not now, when he was come
- d to their very doors, shew their jealousy, and deny him admission. Not long after he declared war, and began to act offensively. Upon this the whole league of the Acheans was put into a ferment, most of the towns being ready to revolt, and break the union ; because on the one side the people had been made to hope for a division of the lands, and of a discharge of their debts ; and on the other the nobility grew weary of Aratus's power, and were almost all of them provoked against him for having called the Macedonians into Peloponnesus. Encouraged by these misunderstandings, Cleomenes invaded Achaëa where he first took Pellene by surprize, and beat out the Achaean garison ; afterwards he made himself master of Phæneon and Penteleon. Not long after he surprized Argos, and in a very short space of time raised him-
- e self to greater power than any of his predecessors, and his city to greater pre-eminence than she had ever held in Greece. In this space he would very gladly have treated with Aratus, offering him any terms to have engaged his friendship ; but he was immoveable in his resolution of destroying the Spartan greatness ; with this view he procured the castle of Corinth, which was the key of Peloponnesus, to be delivered up to Antigonus, who suddenly came to his assistance with an army of twenty-eight thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse. Cleomenes, though he was much inferior to the enemy, yet defended the far greater part of Peloponnesus, till Argos was betrayed ; even there he did great things, and when overpowered by numbers he could do no more, made a most glorious retreat. At this time he received from
- f Sparta the news of his wife's death, at which he was exceedingly grieved ; for though the Spartans were remarkable for being fond husbands, yet Cleomenes was distinguished for his fondness even among them. He bore his grief however like a hero, and like a king ; he went to his house, indulged his sorrow with his mother and other relations, and then returning to the camp, resumed his functions of a monarch and a general, without suffering his private concerns to interfere with public affairs. Ptolemy at this time offered him his friendship in case he would send him his mother and his son as hostages. This demand troubled Cleomenes ; he went often to break the matter to his parent, but was unable to do it ; at last, when it broke out, Cratesiclea

* Plut. in vit. Arat. POLYB. lib. ii.

burst out a laughing ; Well, said she, Was it this you were afraid of telling ? Why a do you not put me on shipboard, and send this carcase where it may be serviceable to Sparta, before age wastes it unprofitably here ? When she was going on board, she withdrew her son into the temple of Neptune, where having wept and embraced each other, Come king of Sparta, said she, let us dry our tears, that no signs of grief may appear when we go out, nor any token of weakness appear unworthy your dignity, or the honour of our country, since our actions are all that are in our power, and events belong wholly to providence. She wrote afterwards to him from Egypt : King of Sparta, do what is worthy of your country, and may redound to its profit ; nor for the sake of an old woman, and a little child, stand in fear of what Ptolemy may do. Cleomenes acted in this unequal war with all the conduct and valour that could be expected in the most excellent captain among the Greeks⁷. He had to do with a numerous army composed of veterans well armed, and well disciplined, and well paid ; his own troops were most of them new raised, many of them half armed, and nothing but what he could get to subsist them with. Yet he kept the war out of Laconia, took the city of Megalopolis, which was bigger than Sparta in the midst of king Antigonus's armies ; and when he had taken it, generously offered to restore it untouched to its citizens, but they rejecting his offer, he abandoned it to the plunder of his soldiers⁸. After this he harassed the territory of Argos, raising mighty contributions, though Antigonus and the Macedonian forces were in that very city. This even in his own time was styled rashness, arrogance, and a vain-glorious shew of short-lived success ; and it is owing to Polybius, that posterity considers it in a different light ; for he tells us, that though the generality believed Cleomenes to have acted from a desperate temerity, yet men of the best discernment and understanding agreed that he behaved with great prudence and judgment. The true state of the case is this ; Cleomenes saw that though at present he could make head against his enemies, yet in a short time he should be destroyed without fighting ; he therefore sought to provoke Antigonus to fight, where his choice of ground might give him an advantage ; and here again Antigonus gave a strong testimony of his consummate skill in military affairs ; for notwithstanding the murmurs of his own troops, the outcries of the Greeks, and the insults of Cleomenes, he kept himself where he was, and would not suffer either his own, or the passions of others, to push him upon a step which might be injurious to his fortune. But afterwards, when he had it in his power to fight, and Cleomenes by reason of his poverty could no longer decline it, he gave him battle at Sellasia, where partly through the superiority of the Macedonian troops, partly through the treachery of Damoteles, the Lacedæmonians were defeated with a vast slaughter of their mercenary troops, and with almost the utter destruction of their own ; for of six thousand Spartans only two hundred escaped. In the beginning of the action, Cleomenes had the better at least in that part of the army which he commanded in person ; but looking behind him, and seeing the other wing commanded by his brother surrounded, he cried out, Thou art lost, dear brother, thou art lost ; thou brave example to our Spartan youth, and theme of our matrons songs ! This misfortune of Cleomenes deserves the more to be pitied, since if he could have avoided fighting but two days, he must have seen Antigonus constrained to abandon the Acheans ; for within that space after the battle, messengers arrived in his camp from Macedonia, which brought advice of such disorders there as forced him immediately to return⁹. When the battle was over, Cleomenes retired to Sparta, where however he knew it was impossible for him to stay, nor indeed did he rest there above a few hours ; for after having given a few directions, he went to his own house, where without taking any refreshment, he leaned himself in his armour as he was against a pillar, and considering what he should do, he at length determined to retire to Egypt ; which resolution he and his friends immediately put into execution, going directly to Gythium, there imbarqued on board a few ships, and passed over to Ptolemy Euergetes, who entertained him honourably while he lived ; but his son growing suspicious of him, confined him, which Cleomenes at length resenting, he with twelve friends forced the place where he was confined ; but finding it afterwards impracticable to escape, they slew each other. Ptolemy Philopator in revenge of this, caused the body of Cleomenes to be exposed on a cross, butchered his mother, the rest of his family, and all her attendants. Miserable end of so great a man, who sought only to make his country free, and his

⁷ PLUT. ubi supra, & in vit. ARAT. POLYB. ubi supra.⁸ PLUT. in vit. ARAT. & Philopæm.⁹ POLYB. lib. ii. PLUT. in vit. Cleomen. & Philop. JUSTIN. lib. xxviii. c. 4.

- a countrymen virtuous ! In him ended the Herculean race of Spartan kings, if we except the short reign of Ageſſopolis which we ſhall preſently mention (X).

(X) In this note we ſhall vindicate our hiſtory of the reign of Cleomenes, which we confeſs to be very little conſiſtent with the account given us by Polybius, though we acknowledge that he is, generally ſpeaking, a moſt judicious and impartial writer, and had great opportunities of knowing the true ſtate of things at the time of which we are ſpeaking ; and yet we affirm that he has not ſpoken of Cleomenes things exactly conformable to truth, whence we conceive we had a juſt right to differ from him, notwithstanding his great and eſtabliſhed reputation. Two things therefore we ſhall endeavour to demonſtrate in this note : Fiſt, That Polybius hath injured the character of Cleomenes in his hiſtory ; and, Secondly, That the cauſes of his miſrepresentations may with probability, and even with certainty, be aſſigned. Fiſt, then, Polybius opening to his reader the cauſes of the Cleomenic war writes thus : When this war was kindled, and Cleomenes had ruined the republic of Lacedæmon, and converted a lawful authority into tyrannic power, Aratus, who ſaw that this prince made war with no leſs conduct than valour, and being at the ſame time afraid of what might be attempted by the Ætolians, thought it neceſſary to counterwork their projects (71). In this paſſage Cleomenes is roundly declared a tyrant, and undoubtedly he was ſo in the opinion of all the Achéans ; and the hiſtorians of thoſe times dealt ſo freely with his character, that the great Livy makes no ſcruple of calling him Cleomenes the fiſt tyrant of Lacedæmon (72). Pauſanias is yet more outrageous ; he ſays that Cleomenes following the example of the great Pauſanias, who gained the battle of Platæa, affected tyranny, and thereby diſgusted the Lacedæmonians ſo much, that they hated the thought of kings ever after (73). Yet all theſe great men are moſt certainly in the wrong ; nay, Polybius and Pauſanias are ſo of their own ſhewing. For the fiſt every where admits that Cleomenes was a prince of great wiſdom and mildneſs, as well as intrepidly valiant, and of a lofty ſpirit. The reaſon for which he ſtiles him a tyrant is, as appears from the foregoing paſſage, becauſe he altered that condition of the republic in which it ſtood when he aſcended the throne. It is confeſſed he did ſo, but that this could not denominate him a tyrant, we will prove from Polybius himſelf. In another part of his writings, diſcanting like a grave politician, as indeed he was, on the ruin of the Spartan ſtate, he makes uſe of theſe words : “ Lycurgus, in providing by his laws for the harmony of his citizens, for the ſecurity of his polity, and the maintenance of liberty, hath done ſo well, that his inſtitutes ſeem rather to be divine than human. An equality of poſſeſſions with a ſimple and inexpensive courſe of life could not but render men honeſt and ſociable in private life, and quiet and peaceable in public concerns ; finally, continual exerciſe, and a readineſs to undertake any kind of labour, could not fail of making them both valiant and indefatigable (74) ”. He then ſhews, that their affecting conqueſt engaged them to depart from the laws of Lycurgus, and induced their ruin ; and in the very place where he calls Cleomenes tyrant he commiſerates the Lacedæmonians for having from a ſtate of perfect freedom ſunk by degrees into that of abject ſlavery under Nabis, by a continual declenſion from the Lycurgic inſtitutes. Now if the ſlavery of the Lacedæmonians and their ruin aroſe from their leaving the laws of Lycurgus, and if the laws of Lycurgus derived their chief excellence from their enjoining an equality of poſſeſſions, a ſimple frugal life, and continual exerciſe, how could Cleomenes be a tyrant for changing that declining condition in which he found the Spartan republic, into that form as near as might be wherein Lycurgus left it ? but perhaps it will be ſaid he acted tyrannically in putting to death the ephori, and in effecting this alteration by force ; yet if this be admitted, it will ſubvert all the Greek notions of liberty. The ephori were not eſtabliſhed by Lycurgus, they had exceeded the limits of their office, they had deſtroyed the conſtitution by introducing the ſale of lands, they had moſt impiouſly murdered Agis their natural ſovereign, and in one word by keeping one of the thrones of Sparta vacant, which they did by force ; they violated the fundamental laws of the ſtate, and had, as Polybius phrases it, changed a legal authority into a moſt deteſtable tyranny, from which Cleomenes reſcued his country, and reſtored it to its ancient luſtre and liberty by the only way it could be effected, that is by force. That Cleomenes was legally king of Sparta, Polybius himſelf owns ; that the change he wrought did not make him a tyrant, we have proved, and conſequently we have ſhewn, that Livy was in an error when he ſtiled him the fiſt of the Lacedæmonian tyrants. We will next ſhew the falſhood of Pauſanias’s account, he ſays that Cleomenes affected the empire of Greece, and Polybius intimates the ſame thing, but they offer no facts to ſupport it ; and the contrary thereof is evident from the current of Polybius’s hiſtory. A tyrant is one who ſacrifices public rights to his particular views, which Cleomenes had mighty opportunities of doing, and whenever he had them, conſtantly reſected them. He brought his paternal eſtate into the public ſtock when he new-modelled Sparta ; he reſtored all the cities he took to their ancient form of government, when he might have annexed them to his own dominions ; and choſe to have allies where he might have had ſubjects ; with reaſon therefore have we concluded with Plutarch, that he did not affect the tyranny of Greece. As to the latter part of Pauſanias’s cenſure, that the Spartans ſo hated the memory of Cleomenes, it is diametrically oppoſite to truth ; for Polybius tells us, that after his flight into Egypt they remained without kings, becauſe they tenderly loved Cleomenes, and ardently wiſhed and expected his return. Theſe are his very words, and he afterwards tells us, that as ſoon as they knew that Cleomenes was dead, they reſolved to be no longer without kings. We come now to the ſecond part of what we propoſed, the cauſes of Polybius’s miſrepresentations, and they were no other than thoſe which have been and will be common in the world as long as it is inhabited by men. Polybius lived in theſe times : He was by birth of the city of Megalopolis, which Cleomenes deſtroyed ; he was an Achéan ſtateſman, a profeſſed and zealous friend of Aratus, the capital enemy of this prince whom he ſo much decries. Aratus ſought to bring all the Peloponneſian ſtates into the Achéan league, and why ? that they might be thereby ſafe againſt the Macedonian power ; Cleomenes oppoſed this, becauſe it was contrary to the intereſt of Sparta, which would have thereby become inconſiderable. Aratus endeavoured in a time of full peace to have executed his ſcheme by force on a ſuppoſition that Cleomenes being a young man might have been eaſily depoſed. After all, when Cleomenes in his own defence had humbled the Achéans, he did not pretend to reduce them into ſubjection, but offered to join with them to ſupport the (71) Polyb. Hiſt. lib. iv. (72) Liv. lib. xxxiv. (73) Pauſan. in Corinthiacis. (74) Fragment. lib. xiii.

VOL. II. N^o 8. 7 Y AFTER

The state of Sparta after the flight of Cleomenes.

AFTER the fatal battle of Sellefia, Sparta fell into the hands of king Antigonus,^a who out of regard to the merit of their ancestors, treated the inhabitants with great kindness and indulgence; they in return for this behaved for a time very quietly, and submitting to the present situation of things, acted in such a manner as might give least umbrage to Aratus, and the Acheans, who were the king's friends; as long as Cleomenes lived, though an exile, and at last a prisoner, in Egypt, the Spartans lived as well as they could under the government of the ephori and senate; but as soon as the news came of his death, and they were once thoroughly ascertained it was true new stirrs arose, in which Adimas, one of the ephori, endeavoured all he could to moderate the people; and when his colleagues had summoned them to meet in arms, he had the courage to represent to them how little their behaviour corresponded with their circumstances, and how unreasonable it was for them to involve themselves in their present unsettled condition in a new war with the Macedonians, who not long ago had vanquished them, and had ever since treated them well. The people of Sparta, like the people of most other cities, were inclined to listen to reason as soon as they began to understand it, which the rest of the ephori perceiving, they and their associates gathered about Adimas, and stabbed him; which once done they did what they pleased. Soon after this Philip the son of Antigonus arrived with a great army on their frontiers, when the Spartans sent deputies to make their submission, which when the king had heard, he suffered them to withdraw, and caused the matter to be afterwards debated in council. Most of those who composed it, after representing the Lacedæmonians as a turbulent and factious people, declared that the king ought to treat them as heretofore Alexander had done the Thebans, that is put their principal men to death, and humble the rest by a very severe chastisement. But the king, though but seventeen years old, differed from them; he said the sedition of the Spartans turned to their own hurt, that on his appearance they had offered to submit themselves, and become his subjects; and that to put their principal men to death, and mal-treat the rest would be unworthy of a prince; he therefore contented himself with telling the deputies that he should have his eye upon the Spartans for the future, and therefore advised them to be quiet; after which he dismissed them.^b

Lycurgus and Ageſipolis
elected kings.

THE Ætolians making new disturbances in Greece, were very desirous to engage the Lacedæmonians in their interest; to this end they sent Machates ambassador to Sparta; he endeavoured to persuade the ephori to chuse two kings, and to unite themselves strictly with the Ætolians; but those magistrates liking neither of his propositions, procured them both to be rejected by the people, notwithstanding that a strong party had declared themselves for Machates. This party after his departure found means to stir up the people so effectually against the ephori, that at a solemn festival they murdered them at the temple of Pallas, and elected others whom they directed to elect kings. In consequence of this, they chose first Ageſipolis a boy, the grandson of Cleombrotus whom Leonidas banished and appointed Cleomenes the son of Cleombrotus, and the child's uncle, his tutor. For the other king they set up Lycurgus, a man no way allied to the royal family, or at least never conceived to be allied to it, till by giving a talent a piece to the ephori; they declared him of the Herculean race, and the lawful king of Sparta. He after some time drove Ageſipolis into banishment, involved his country into several wars, which he waged with various success. At last Chilo conspired against him; this man conceived he had some right to the Spartan throne, and having engaged about two hundred persons to abet his scheme, he fell upon the ephori suddenly, and murdered them; after which he surrounded the house of Lycurgus, who by the fidelity of some of his ser-

^a POLYB. lib. iv. PLUT. in vit. Arat.

the liberty of Greece against the Macedonian kings; but Aratus, resolving to have all things his own way, called in these very Macedonians, delivered up to them Acro-Corinth, destroyed the Lacedæmonian kingdom, induced the ruin of his own country, and was himself poisoned by Philip king of Macedon, whom he vainly called and imagined to be his pupil. Polybius, misled by Aratus's notions, paints Cleomenes as a tyrant, though he took the only method to preserve Greece free, and Greece lost her freedom, because he failed in his design; this has appeared since, and Plutarch, who was a true friend to liberty and virtue, living without the reach of prejudice, has done that justice to Cleomenes which Polybius denied him (75).

(75) Hist. lib. iv. Plut. in vit. Cleom. Arati & Philopæm.

vants

- a wants made his escape. Chilo perceiving that the people little affected him, fled out of Laconia, and retired to the Macedonians whom he endeavoured to irritate against his country. When things were a little settled, Lycurgus was recalled, and reigned in Sparta many years. When king Philip came into Peloponnesus for the second time, and began to transact things there, not only without advice, but contrary to the opinion of Aratus, Lycurgus and the Lacedæmonians began to take heart, and to think once more of contending with the power of Macedon, notwithstanding all the mischiefs they had sustained; neither were they frightened from this purpose, when they were informed that the king was become friends again with Aratus and his son; wherefore as soon as the season of the year permitted, they invaded Messenia, which
- b immediately drew Philip that way, upon which Lycurgus retired, that he might put his country into a condition to sustain the invasion, which he plainly perceived was intended, though king Philip took all the precautions possible to hinder his design from being penetrated^c. He advanced with his army as far as Amyclæ, from whence he spoiled all the country round about: In the mean time the Messenians invaded Laconia on the other side, resolving to march through it and join the Macedonian; but while their commander, who greatly contemned the Spartans in their present distressed condition, encamped carelessly, and without throwing up any intrenchments, Lycurgus suddenly attacked them with such success, that he took the greatest part of their horses and baggage, and returned with much honour to Sparta.
- c As soon as he returned, he made the necessary dispositions for the defence of the city. In the first place, he recovered the posts which the Macedonians had seized on the mountains, and then causing the waters of the Eurotas to be dammed up, he provided a means of laying all the country between the river and the mountains under water; so that the Macedonians not being able to march that way, would be obliged to coast the foot of the mountains, and thereby expose their rear to the insults of Lycurgus and his Lacedæmonians. Philip perceiving this, resolved first of all to dispossess Lycurgus of his posts in the mountains, which at the head of a choice body of troops, he with much ado performed; however he retired with his forces at last into the city, which he preserved from any insult; and thus this great king of
- d Macedon, after having plundered and ravaged Laconia, was obliged to retire, his own camp being full of sedition, and his soldiers more inclined to mutiny than fighting. Some short time after this, the ephori having or pretending to have information, that Lycurgus intended to make himself absolute, they attempted to surprize and murder him in his house; but he having previous notice of their design, withdrew into Ætolia, and the iniquity of the ephori being clearly discovered by the people, he was shortly after recalled. What he did after this, we know not, nor how long he held the kingdom; whether he died in peace, or by the sword, in possession of the regal authority, or not; neither can we say what steps were taken by the Spartans when they lost this king of their own election: If we take him for the last of their princes,
- e or if, according to others, we look upon Cleomenes in that light, either way we shall see the oracle concerning a lame reign fulfilled; but perhaps it will be better to interpret this prophecy generally of all single reigns, which according to the constitution of Sparta could not but be lame, and under them all the people were most notoriously unhappy, falling continually from bad to worse, every succeeding tyrant excelling in wickedness his predecessor.

Macbanidas was the successor of Lycurgus, but when he attained the sovereignty, Macbanidas is very uncertain; the year in which we find him first mentioned, we have placed in the margin; by what colour he held his dignity appears not, but that he was a person of great abilities is certain. At home he ejected the ephori, as not caring

- f to have any either equal or greater than himself in Sparta; abroad he made all Peloponnesus tremble, which in all probability he would have subdued and brought under his own power, if Philopamen the chief of the Achaans had not opposed him^d. He engaged all the cities in that league to furnish troops for reducing the power of Macbanidas within bounds, which, as he plainly shewed, if not timely undertaken, would be a thing beyond their abilities. When he had drawn together this army, after exercising them for some time in slight skirmishes, he marched towards Man-tinea, in order of battle. Thither also came Macbanidas at the head of a very powerful army, composed not only of Spartans, but of mercenaries; an engagement

^c POLYB. Hist. lib. iv. PLUT. in vit. Arati. Hist. lib. xxxiv.

^d POLYB. ubi supra. PLUT. in vit. Philop. LIVY quickly followed which was very obstinate, in which at first Machanidas had the better; but he pursuing this advantage too far, Philopæmen attacked him in the rear; however the Lacedæmonians fought desperately for a time, expecting that Machanidas would come to their relief, which accordingly he did; but Philopæmen foreseeing that he would take the shortest way, and knowing that there was a ditch there of which Machanidas was ignorant, he left Polybius the Megalopolitan to push the enemy that were still fighting, and with a small party of horse advanced to the ditch to meet Machanidas, whom he presently distinguished by his purple robe. The tyrant, who with two or three friends had outrode the rest of his troops, seeing that Philopæmen and his company were but few, resolved to pass the ditch; in order to this he pushed his horse directly against Philopæmen, who turning sideways from him, as if he meant to avoid him, brought the point of his spear to bear directly against his breast as his horse leaped, so that just as he passed the ditch, Machanidas fell down dead; this put an end to the battle, for as soon as his death was known, his army fled: The Achæans wasted all the provinces which had been subject to him, the Spartans who lost four thousand men in this engagement having neither spirits nor strength to oppose them^a.

Nabis succeeds Machanidas.
Year after the
flood 2803.
Before Christ
156.

Not long after the death of Machanidas, we find Sparta under a new and yet severer bondage under one Nabis, who is reported to have exceeded all tyrants, and to have left the epithets of gracious and merciful to Phalaris and Dionysius on a comparison of their actions with his. Other evil princes had their peculiar vices, and perhaps many ways of plaguing and punishing their subjects; but Nabis had not only all, but invented and practised such acts of cruelty as were never heard of before, and have sunk into oblivion since. To all who were honest, brave, or noble, he was an open enemy, such as he could lay his hands on he murdered, such as were not immediately in his power he banished: But did he stop there? No. He sent some of his Cretan assassins after them where-ever they retired, who watched them so narrowly, that in the field, or at their tables, or in their beds, they found an opportunity to slay them. At home he reigned with a dissimulation, which some call wisdom. He kept up the state of a prince, he wore purple, was attended by guards, performed the functions of a first magistrate, kept an equal countenance, made use of smooth speeches, entertained numbers of spies and sycophants, and struck such a terror into all who were not so, that they durst not express their thoughts or their fears. Polybius tells us, that he had a painted image which resembled his wife, and this being clad in royal robes, he introduced when he fancied it impracticable to wheedle any Lacedæmonian out of his money; and such was the art with which this image was contrived, that by touching certain secret springs, it caught any who were near it in its arms, and forced them to say any thing the tyrant pleased^c. The distressed and dejected state of all Greece, which was now mightily divided, weak in its councils, and weaker still in the execution of them, and with all this mightily over-awed by the power of the Macedonian kings, and the Roman republic, gave vast opportunities to the tyrant to encrease his dominions, and to exalt his power. He in the midst of these confusions seized, under pretence of assisting some of the exiled citizens, on Argos, into which he put a garison under the command of Pythagoras his son-in-law, a man of great abilities, and who was indeed the support of his tyranny. The Achæans immediately applied to the Romans, for they began to be affrighted themselves at the apprehensions of the tyrant's growing power. Titus Quintius the Roman general arriving in Greece, they quickly made him sensible of the mischiefs that would follow, if Nabis was permitted to go on; for, not contented with holding the prime part of Peloponnesus under his sway, he began to be ambitious of the empire of the sea, and to project such schemes as threatened disturbance even to the Romans themselves. Quintius marched immediately into the neighbourhood of Argos, and had some thoughts of attacking the city, where on his approach a rising was attempted, which issued in the destruction of those who were desirous to be free. After this he marched towards Lacedæmon itself, at which Nabis was exceedingly troubled; he ordered however a general assembly of the people to be held without the city, whither as soon as they were come, he surrounded them with his troops; then he made a short speech, intimating the mighty danger they were in; for it is the mode of all tyrants to call themselves and their private concerns the interest of their country; he then

^a PLUTARCH. in vit. Philopæmen. POLYB. Fragment. lib. vii. ^c Id. Fragm. lib. xiii.

a then magnified the great pains he had taken in securing all the posts and avenues of Sparta, concluded, that since without speaking he had done so much for their service, they ought not now he did speak, to grudge doing somewhat for him, the rather because what he sought concerned likewise their own safety ; some there were amongst them, he said, who had given him just cause to suspect their conduct, these therefore he was determined to seize and imprison, till the present danger being over, he might, which he greatly wished, restore them again to liberty consistent with his own, and the public safety : Having made this goodly harangue, he caused fourscore persons of worth and honour to be arrested, the unarmed multitude looking on with amazement, and that same night he caused them all to be murdered in prison ; a little afterwards, growing jealous of the Helotes, he seized a great number of them, caused them to be scourged in the streets, till the kennels were discoloured with their blood, and then put them to death without mercy. After all, finding the Romans about to besiege him, he resolved to attempt a treaty, knowing that king Antiochus was meditating new stirs, and from thence concluded that Quintius would be glad to come to some agreement with him. His hopes were not ill grounded, that great man, having nothing so much in view as the interest of Rome, readily agreed to meet him, and hear his proposals : Nabis at this interview made a long and well-composed oration, to which Quintius made him but an indifferent return, yet promised to send him certain articles in writing ; and thus this conference ended.

b The allies laboured hard to engage Quintius not to treat any more, king Eumenes who was in his camp affirmed, that it was to no purpose, for that the tyrant would think no longer of peace than war was near him ; Agessipolis king of Sparta, who with many other illustrious exiles waited on Quintius, insisted that it would be unworthy of the Roman name to enter into treaty with so execrable a person ; the Acheans were of the same sentiments, yet Quintius remained firm to his own ; he saw clearly that they regarded their own interests, and thence he inferred that he ought to mind none but those of Rome ; acting therefore on this motive, he sent Nabis, as he had promised, an account of the terms whereon he would grant him peace, and those terms were these : That he should withdraw all his garisons from Argos, and its territories : That he should deliver up all the ships of war he had taken, and of all his fleet should retain no more than two gallies : That he should deliver up such as had fled to him from the Roman allies, and make restitution to the Messenians for plundering their territories : That he should restore to the Lacedæmonian exiles their wives and children : That he should build neither castle nor city in his own territories, nor in those of his neighbours : That he should give five such hostages as the general would chuse, and among them his own son : That he should pay down a hundred talents, and that he should continue paying fifty talents a year for eight years together. Nabis disliked these conditions, and found means to make all the Lacedæmonians dislike them, so that they determined to make an obstinate defence ;

c Quintius perceiving nothing was to be done but by force, and having with him an army of fifty thousand men, resolved to attack the place, which accordingly he did several times, but was as often repulsed. At last he penetrated into the city, and his soldiers beginning to take post in the first long street, Nabis thought of nothing but making his escape ; yet Pythagoras delivered him from this danger, by setting the street on fire at each end, and engaging the Lacedæmonians, who were yet fighting in front, to supply the rising flames with fuel. The Roman soldiers were forced again to withdraw, but Nabis was so thoroughly frightened, that, with much ado, he procured peace on the terms before specified, which was hardly concluded before advice came that the Argives had delivered themselves by expelling his garisons.

d When Nabis was free from the neighbourhood of the Roman army, he began to cast about in his mind how he might extricate himself from the mischiefs he laboured under ; for he could not bear the thoughts of losing at once those dominions which he had been so long and with so much pains acquiring. He was especially irritated at beholding himself without a sea-port, and little set by amongst his neighbours ; he therefore began to treat privately with Antiochus and the Ætolians for creating new disturbances in Peloponnesus, and having received from them great promises, he began to act offensively against the Acheans and their allies. Gysbium the sea-port of Sparta, he besieged, and recovered ; but after that and a slight victory at sea, which he obtained against Philopamen, he was routed at land rather for want of abilities as a general in himself, than any fault in his soldiers. Philopamen, phamen, though he could not hinder the taking of Gytium, yet resolved to terrify a the tyrant by marching directly towards Lacedæmon, which had the consequence he expected and desired, since Nabis drew his forces together, and led them with the utmost diligence to the relief of his capital; by this forced march he fronted the Achean army within ten miles of the city, the tyrant seizing on this occasion a very strong camp, where Philopamen intended to have lain that night. This great general perceiving that his first design was rendered abortive, immediately formed a second, and since he could not spoil Sparta, resolved to content himself with destroying an army every way superior to his own. There lay between the camps a little rivulet from which both the Acheans and Lacedæmonians were to fetch water; but it was considerably nearer to the former than to the latter. Philopamen therefore sent a b great detachment to take post privately in a copse which bordered on the river; when the troops of Nabis came to water their horses, and to fill their vessels for the camp, this detachment suddenly attacked them, and cut many of the light-armed soldiers in pieces. About the same time he sent one of his auxiliary soldiers as a deserter to Nabis with instructions to give him information that the Acheans designed to move in the night, in order to get between him and Lacedæmon. The tyrant, affrighted at this news, as soon as it was thoroughly dark, quitted a camp which Philopamen could never have forced, and leaving only a few light-armed troops in his entrenchments, marched with all the speed he could towards Sparta. Philopamen foreseeing this, attacked his camp as soon as he was out of it, and so harassed c his army with his light-armed mercenaries, that Nabis found himself constrained to retire into the neighbouring woods, where he remained all the next day. Philopamen in this space recalling his light-armed forces, left them in the camp which he had taken, and with his troops that were still fresh, marched with great secrecy, and seized the passes which led to Lacedæmon, not doubting but at the approach of night the tyrant would march again; this fell out as he expected, and as he had seized the avenues, the forces of Nabis were in a manner at his mercy, and he used his advantage so well, that the tyrant with a very small part of his army got into the city, covered with disgrace, and unable to hinder Philopamen from spoiling the country, which he did for thirty days, and then retired, leaving Nabis much dejected, d and with small forces to continue the war. His recovery of Gytium furnished him at present with little comfort, for the enemy being master of all the country, he could scarcely hold any correspondence therewith; besides his navy was very inconsiderable, and he had every day repeated advice that the Romans intended suddenly to send a new army into Greece. The Lacedæmonians themselves appeared dissatisfied, which made him afraid to lead his soldiers without the city; and pent up within it, they were scarce of any use. In the midst of these distresses and distractions, he placed all his hopes in the Ætolians, who had indeed done a great deal of mischief in Greece, and had been strongly instrumental in drawing him into this war. To these he dispatched courier after courier, not with the haughty commands of a tyrant, e but with the humble supplications of a distressed ally; he reminded them that for their sakes only he had so precipitately entered into this war at a time when none else cared to own them for allies; he shewed them truly the nature of his distress, hoping that it would make their relief quicker, and more effectual; but it produced quite a contrary effect, the Ætolians being fit confederates for such a tyrant. As soon as they had given audience to his messengers, they dispatched them with large assurances of ready assistance, while in the mean time they consulted what for their interest would be fittest to be done; the result of their consultations was, that in the days of his prosperity, and when he had a strong army of mercenaries at his command, Nabis was their goodly ally, and deserved all possible regard; but in the present situation of things, when his forces were in a manner cut off, and he scarce able to maintain himself in Sparta, 'twould better serve their purposes to remove him out of the way, and take the city to themselves. This council taken and approved, a thousand foot, and thirty horse were chosen to march to Lacedæmon under the command of Alexamenus. When they were ready to depart, the horsemen were sent for into the great council, where they received the following short and pithy instructions, that they were not sent to assist Nabis to make war upon the Acheans, or for any other purpose whatsoever than to obey Alexamenus, and to do what he directed, let it be what it would. Thus dismissed, they marched under the command of that general to Sparta, where they found Nabis very little satisfied with

- a with so small a reinforcement. Alexamenus did all he could to encourage him, he told him the Ætolians by sending him intended no more than to give him a specimen of their good will, instructing him also to inform him, that if his necessities required it, they would, whenever he requested it, march with the utmost forces they could raise to his relief; he likewise informed him that Antiochus was resolved to make war on the Romans, and intended to cover Greece with his armies, and the sea with his ships; that many of the Greek states were inclined to his party, and that the Ætolians were about to muster all their troops before the king's commissioners shortly, which was the reason why they sent so few under his command. The tyrant, encouraged by these consolatory speeches, began, by the advice of Alexamenus, to exercise his
- b forces without the city, that he might at once give them courage, and the Acheans apprehensions. At these exercises the Ætolian general failed not to assist; his guard of horse keeping, according to his orders, aloof, and he sometimes riding up to them as if it were to give them orders. These growing at last into daily practices, the Lacedæmonians sinking again into a timorous obedience, Nabis entertained fresh hopes of regaining all his dominions, and of revenging himself upon the Romans for the injuries which he conceived they had done him. The Spartan guards, which Alexamenus looked upon as the best corps in the tyrant's army, he advised to be posted, phalanx-wise, behind the rest, offering such plausible reasons, that Nabis readily yielded to it, which was the only step wanting to his ruin. When the day came whereon
- c Alexamenus resolved to execute his great and desperate design, he behaved towards Nabis with more than ordinary complaisance; he commended the appearance and discipline of his troops, applauded his cavalry, promised him the supremacy in Peloponnesus, and perceiving that his complaisance had wrought a proper effect, the tyrant testifying by his looks and gestures the highest satisfaction, Alexamenus suddenly wheeled off, and riding up to his troop of Ætolians, bid them remember the instructions they had received when they were first chosen for this service. Having said this, he turned the head of his horse, and rode with a full career against Nabis, whom he overthrew, and his Ætolians riding immediately after him one after another, buried their spears in the bosom of the tyrant. His guards were hardly informed of
- d what past, till he was dead, and then not knowing for whom to fight, they forbore fighting at all. The rest of the Lacedæmonians looked on with a mixture of joy and terror, joy that the tyrant was dead, who had so long and so cruelly oppressed them, terror at beholding so strange an accident; the reasons of which they knew not, and of its consequences were therefore afraid. Alexamenus and the Ætolians taking advantage of their amazement, marched directly into the city, their chief breaking into the tyrant's palace, and rifling all his treasures; the soldiers shortly after followed his example, so that in a short time the Lacedæmonians looked on the murder of Nabis as their misfortune; but considering how little it became the inhabitants of the famous Sparta to look on and see their riches carried away by foreigners,
- e they with much ado took a child whose name was Laconicus, and who on account of his being descended from the royal family was bred up by Nabis; him they set on horseback, and gathering about him, they surrounded many of the Ætolians, and put them to the sword; after a while they broke into the palace, where they slew Alexamenus, and those who were with him; they forced likewise a temple of Diana, to which many of the Ætolians were fled; all of whom they put without mercy to the sword. When they were in the midst of this confusion, of which none had projected any issue, Philopamen arrived, some friends of his having posted to him with the account of the death of Nabis; the forces he had were few, nor did he from them conceive any hopes of seizing the city; on the contrary he did
- f what Alexamenus ought to have done, that is, he convinced the Lacedæmonians of the madness of their proceedings, and engaged them, since they had so happily recovered their freedom, to unite themselves to the Acheans, reaping thus by his virtue all the fruits the Ætolians expected from their treachery.

It may indeed seem strange, that the Spartans, who had entertained such generous notions of liberty, submitted patiently for so long a tract of time to the arbitrary commands of lawless tyrants; but this wonder will be in a great measure taken off, if we consider two things; First, That the manners of the Lacedæmonians were greatly corrupted, which is indeed the very basis of slavery; there can be no such thing as bending the necks of virtuous people, but when once men are abandoned to their vices, and become slaves to their passions, they readily stoop to those who can

can gratify them; and this was the case of the majority of the inhabitants of Sparta at this time. Secondly, those amongst them who were distinguished by their merit and their morals were on this very account proscribed by the tyrants, and hated by their creatures; so that they were forced to forsake their country, and leave it to groan under a power which they were unable to resist. To this we may add, that such as were of mild dispositions flattered themselves with the hopes of seeing better times, and even in these consoled themselves with the thought that Sparta yet retained her independency, and was not subjected by any other state * (Y).

* TIT. LIV. lib. xxxiv. PLUTARCH. in vit. Philop. JUSTIN. lib. xxx. c. 4. lib. xxxi. c. 1, 2.

(Y) There is a point or two in the Lacedæmonian history, which though they have been handled in a curious manner already, require to be considered more largely. Aratus undoubtedly intended the preservation of the Grecian liberty, especially from the Macedonian power, but at the same time he as certainly intended to engage all the Peloponnesian states in the Achæan league, which was absolutely inconsistent with their retaining any monarchical form. On this occasion it was that he hated and made war upon all the little princes in his neighbourhood whom he stiled tyrants, and persecuted as such, as the Achæans continued ever after to do. If Sparta had acceded to the Achæan league, it is very possible that Greece might have vindicated its freedom, for some time at least, against both the Macedonians and the Romans; but Sparta had been too long at the head of Peloponnesus to think of changing her government at the first motion of Aratus and the Achæans, and therefore gladly accepted the proposal of Cleomenes to restore her ancient form of government, and with it her ancient lustre (75). Aratus seeing that this would entirely overturn his scheme, immediately called Cleomenes tyrant, and as such would have pulled him down. While the Spartans, and those who sided with the Spartans, acknowledged him the vindicator of the ancient Grecian liberty, one who desired to leave all cities to be governed according to their own laws, as well as to preferre kingly government in Sparta. It is true, that Ma-chanidas and Nabis pretended to carry on the same design, the latter actually dividing the lands as Cleomenes had done; but this they did with a view to the aggrandizing themselves and their families, and the supporting a dominion unlawfully maintained, which was far from being his case (76). That in this and in a former note we have fairly stated these matters, will clearly appear from the subsequent history of the Achæans, wherein it will be found that there was no depending upon the Lacedæmonians, till their manners were wholly changed, and the Lycurgic institutions rooted out by force. Now whether such proceedings as these of ruining a constitution that did not suit with their league, or Cleomenes's scheme for supporting every state in its pristine form, ought with greatest justice to be stiled a desire of bestowing liberty on Greece, the reader must determine.

(75) Polyb. Hist. lib. iv. Plutarch. in vit. Arati.

(76) Tit. Liv. lib. xxxiv.

C H A P. XX.

The History of the several states of Greece, from the beginning of the Achæan league to its dissolution, and thence succinctly to the present time.

S E C T. I.

The History of ACHAIA.

^a ALL Greece, in the ages we are now to write of, may be reduced to three states, viz. Achaia, Ætolia, and Athens. There were, 'tis true, at this time several other republics in Greece; but as they only acted an under-part, and in conjunction sometimes with one and sometimes with another of the more powerful states just now mentioned, their histories are so interwoven with those of the greater republics, that to deliver them separately would be only swelling the work with needless repetitions, as the reader will find in the perusal of the following sheets. We shall begin with the history of Achaia, by far the most considerable republic of Greece, in its declining times; after having premised that the name of Achaia was used by the ancients in three different senses. In the earlier ages it comprehended ^b all the provinces of that great continent, which the geographers, strictly speaking, call Greece; that is, Attica, Megaris, Locris, Phocis, Boeotia, the territory of Thebes, Ætolia, and Doris. In after-ages it was confined to that country in Peloponnesus, which was possessed by the Achæans, and extended along the bay of Corinth, and the Ionian sea, from the confines of Sicyon to the territory of Elis. In the Roman times the name of Achaia comprised not only all Peloponnesus, but such other cities beyond the isthmus as had entered into the Achæan league; upon the dissolution of which all Greece was by a decree of the Roman senate divided into two provinces, viz. that of Macedonia, containing Macedonia and Thessaly, and that of Achaia, which took in all the other states of Greece. We have already described the country ^c, and shall therefore now proceed to the history of a people, that not only maintained their own liberties amidst innumerable tyrants, but restored most of the Greek cities to their ancient freedom.

Achaia, a state originally of small account, rose by degrees to such a height of reputation and prosperity, as to rival and even eclipse the most powerful states of Greece. This great increase of power was not owing either to the vast numbers or extraordinary valour of its inhabitants, but solely to its wholesome laws and happy constitution. For the Achæans, after having shaken off the tyrannical yoke of regal power, formed to themselves, on the plan of a democracy, a new system of government, which obtaining by degrees in all the cities of their small ^d republic, united them into one body, and at the same time left them in full possession of their respective liberties, and quite independent of each other. Thus the Achæans were not only joined together by a firm alliance, and governed by the same laws, but moreover had the same money, weights, and measures, the same magistrates, council, and judges, and in short every thing so uniform, that all Achaia seemed but one city. This invited many of the Peloponnesians to embrace their form of government, and accede to the Achæan alliance, while in the mean time the authors of this institution reaped no advantage by their accession; for no sooner did any city receive their laws, but it was admitted to the enjoyment of the same rights and privileges with the rest. Neither was the fame of their wise laws and mild government confined within the narrow bounds of Peloponnesus, but even reached the Greek colonies in Italy, where the Crotoniates, the Sybarites, and the Cauloniatæ, agreed to adopt the Achaean laws, and govern their states conformably * (A). The Lacedaemonians and Thebans had such an esteem of their impartial justice and equity, that they chose them after the famous battle of Leuctra to compose some differences that were still subsisting between them. The contending parties were not induced, as our author observes ^b, to refer their differences to the arbitration of the *Achaean*s by any argument of their greatness or power, there being no state at that time in all Greece, that was not superior to them in both these respects, but merely in consideration of their justice and probity, which had acquired them the good opinion of all the world.

* Universal History, Vol. II. p. 414, 415.

THIS form of government continued from the expulsion of Gyges the last king of b Achaia to the time of Alexander the Great, upon whose death this little republic was involved in all the calamities that are inseparable from discord. The spirit of patriotism no longer prevailed among them, each city pursuing their private interest to the prejudice and destruction of their neighbours. As these dissensions and emulations were artificially sown, and carefully fomented by the Macedonian princes, so they failed not to take their advantage of them; for Demetrius, Cassander, and Antigonus Gonatus, seizing on some of their cities, obliged them to receive the Macedonian yoke. In this unhappy situation they changed masters as often as Macedon did sovereigns, and were moreover enslaved by tyrants of their own, who as they espoused the Macedonian interest, so they were supported with the whole strength ^c of that kingdom ^e.

The Achaean league revived.
Year of the
flood 3723.
Before Christ
280.

THE *Achaean*s accustomed to live according to their own laws, and inured to liberty and freedom, could not brook so slavish a subjection, and therefore in the 124th olympiad, which was coincident with the expedition of Pyrrhus into Italy, they began to revive their ancient union, and return to their former association. The inhabitants of Patra and Dyma gave the first example of this happy change. Five years after, those of Aegium having driven out the Macedonian garison, acceded to the alliance. The inhabitants of Bura followed their example, having first killed their prince or tyrant; and soon after those of Ceraunia incorporated their city into the same Achaean body, Iseas their tyrant resigning the dominion upon promise ^d of indemnity for what was passed ^d.

THE cities we have mentioned were the first that revived the ancient association, continuing for the space of twenty-five years to maintain the same form of government without being joined by any others. But at last the good order that reigned in this little republic, where liberty and equality, with a sincere zeal for justice and the public welfare, were the fundamental principles of their government, drew several neighbouring cities to join them. Sicyon was one of the first that acceded in this manner, being induced thereunto by Aratus (B) the Sicyonian, who at the age of twenty

* POLYB. lib. ii. PAUSAN. in Achaic. ^b POLYB. ibid. ^c POLYB. & PAUSAN. ubi supra.
^d Idem, ibid.

(A) Polybius tells (1) us, that great disturbances arising among the Greek cities in that part of Italy which was called Magna Graecia, ambassadors were dispatched to them from all parts of Greece; but that the council only of the *Achaean*s was chosen to cure those great evils, and compose the dissensions; which they did with such success, that all those cities by common consent agreed to imitate them, and to form themselves according to the example of the Achaean republic. Whereupon uniting in one body, they built a temple to Jupiter Homorius, appointing that place for the congress of their general assemblies.

(B) Aratus, a native of Sicyon, played on this occasion a noble part on the stage of action, which rendered his name famous all over Greece. Sicyon, having long mourned under the yoke of her domestic tyrants, attempted to shake it off by devolving the power on Clinias the father of Aratus, and one of her best citizens. The government began to flourish, and assume a new form under his wise conduct, when Abantidas found means to disconcert his measures, and take the whole power into his own hands. He killed Clinias, and with him all those who stood up for the liberties of their country; and would have likewise destroyed Aratus, who was then but seven years old, had not the infant escaped with some others amidst the disorders and confusion that filled the house when his father was killed. As he was wandering about the city in the utmost consternation and distress, he accidentally entered the house of the tyrant's sister, with a design to conceal himself there till the tumult was over, for he knew not to whom it belonged. The tyrant's sister being persuaded that this destitute infant had taken refuge under her roof by the impulse of some deity, caused him the ensuing night to be secretly conveyed to Argos, where he was educated with the utmost care by some hospitable friends of his father. The new tyranny had passed through several hands, when Aratus, being come to man's estate, began to entertain thoughts of rescuing his country from the oppression it groaned under. He was greatly respected both for his birth, and the many excellent

(1) Polyb. lib. ii.

Twenty years rescued his country from tyranny, and restored his countrymen to the enjoyment of their former liberties. Eight years after he had engaged his country in the Achaean league, he took by surprize Acro-Corinth (C), and also the city of Megara excellent qualities which he began already to display on several occasions. The Sicyonian exiles, discovering in him an early aversion to tyrants, began to call their eyes upon him as a person destined by heaven to be one day their deliverer. Neither were they deceived in their conjecture. For Aratus had scarce attained the twentieth year of his age, when he formed a confederacy against Nicocles, who was tyrant of Sicyon at that time, and pursued his measures with so much prudence and secrecy, that notwithstanding the tyrant kept a vigilant eye on his conduct, he scaled the walls of Sicyon and entered the city by night, before Nicocles had any notice or even suspicion of his design. However, he had the good luck to make his escape, leaving Aratus in possession of the city. The next morning the people being assembled in a tumultuous manner without knowing what had been transacted, a herald proclaimed with a loud voice, that Aratus the son of Clinias invited the citizens to resume their ancient liberty. These joyful words were no sooner heard, but the whole multitude, with repeated shouts and loud acclamations, flocked to the tyrant's palace, and burnt it down to the ground in a few minutes. Thus was Sicyon delivered from its tyrants without the loss of one single man on either side; for Aratus commanded his followers to abstain from slaughter, saying, that an action of this nature ought not to be polluted with the blood of his fellow-citizens. This circumstance gave him no less joy than the action itself.

Sicyon began then to recover its ancient splendor; but Aratus was not yet quite eased from his inquietude and perplexity. Antigonus king of Macedon had supported and protected Nicocles, and was ready to lay hold of the first opportunity to make himself master of the city, or establish in it some other tyrant: seeds of sedition were artfully sown among the citizens by his partizans and emissaries; and Aratus was extremely apprehensive of their effects. He therefore concluded that the safest and most prudent conduct in so delicate a juncture, would be to unite Sicyon in the Achaean league, which he did accordingly, strengthening the league with all the forces of his country, and entering himself among the cavalry for the service of that state (2).

(C) The isthmus of Corinth unites the continent of Greece with that of Peloponnesus. The citadel of Corinth, known by the name of Acro-Corinth, was situated on a high mountain between those two continents, which are there divided by a very narrow neck of land; so that this fortress cuts off all communication by land from the inner part of the isthmus, and can awe, if well garisoned, all Greece; for which reason Philip of Macedon used to call it the fetters of Greece.

This fortress Antigonus had taken by surprize with a design to enslave all Peloponnesus; but Aratus wrested it out of his hand by an action equal, in the opinion of Plutarch, to the most celebrated enterprises of the ancient heroes of Greece. After he had been long meditating with himself by what means he might gain that important place, he was by accident furnished with an opportunity of accomplishing his design.

One Erginus, an inhabitant of Corinth, had contracted an intimate acquaintance with a banker of Sicyon, who was a particular friend of Aratus. As the citadel happened one day to be the subject of their conversation, Erginus told his friend, that in going to visit his brother, who was a soldier of the garison, he had observed a narrow track hewn in the rock, which led up to that part of the hill where the wall of the fortress was very low. The banker, who was very attentive to this account, asked his friend with a smile, whether he and his brother were desirous to make their fortunes. Erginus understood him, and promised to sound his brother, by name Dioctes, on that head. A few days after he returned to Sicyon, and engaged with the banker to conduct Aratus to that part of the mountain where the wall was but fifteen feet high; adding, that his brother was ready to concur with him in every other particular relating to the enterprise. Aratus promised on his part to reward them with sixty talents, if the affair should succeed; but as he was not master of such a sum, and the borrowing it might create suspicion, he pawned all his plate, together with his wife's jewels, to the banker as a security for the promised reward.

Aratus having thus engaged the two brothers, and surmounted a great many difficulties, each of which was sufficient to discourage any other but him, the troops were ordered to pass the night under arms. He then selected four hundred men, furnished them with scaling ladders, and led them to one of the gates of the city; for the citadel was on the top of a steep rock within the city. They scaled the walls without being observed, Erginus having, with the assistance of his brother and some others that were gained over by him, killed the centinels that were there upon duty. As they were marching in great silence through the city, they met with a small guard that was going the rounds, and killed them all but one, who making his escape alarmed the city. But Aratus, notwithstanding the alarm, continued his march, and arriving at the foot of the rock, on which the fortress stood, began to climb up at the head of his men. But missing the path that was struck out of the rock, by reason of a thick fog which rose from the sea by their first entering the city, Aratus was not a little perplexed. The city was already alarmed, all the streets, and even the ramparts, blazed with innumerable lights, and the trumpets sounded to arms on all sides. While he was thus perplexed, the fog all on a sudden cleared up, and the moon, returning to shine with the same brightness as before, discovered the intricate windings of the track, which he followed at the head of a hundred of his boldest men, and arrived with much ado at the spot which had been described to him. But he found the garison, which was by this time alarmed, ready to receive him. Whereupon he immediately dispatched Erginus to acquaint the body of three hundred men, which he had left behind with orders to cover his rear, with the danger he was in. While these were waiting at the foot of the rock drawn up in a close body, Archelaus, who commanded the troops of king Antigonus, appeared at the head of a considerable band with a design to mount the hill, and attack Aratus in the rear. The three hundred Sicyonians at his approach concealed themselves among the rocks; but he was no sooner past than they started out, and fell upon him with such resolution, that he was soon put to the rout. This action was scarce over, when Erginus arrived, and acquainted them that Aratus was engaged with the enemy, and in great need of immediate assistance. Upon this notice the victorious troops, conducted by Erginus, began to climb up the rock, proclaiming their approach with loud shouts to animate their friends,

(2) Plut. in Arat.

Megara from the Macedonians, uniting them both to the Achaëans. The cities^a of Træzene, Epidaurus, and Megalopolis, were likewise prevailed upon by him to join in the alliance, the tyrants making a voluntary resignation of the authority they had usurped over their fellow citizens*. The tyrants of the Argives, of the Hermionians, and the Pblatians following their example, were likewise received into the alliance.

As these glorious successes raised the reputation of the Achæan league, so they created no small jealousy in the neighbouring states. But before we proceed to the wars which they were soon involved in by their jealous and restless neighbours, we shall give a succinct account of their happy constitution. All the cities subject to the Achæan league were governed by the great council, or general assembly, of^b the whole nation. To this assembly or diet each of the confederate cities had a right to send a certain number of deputies, who were elected in their respective cities by a plurality of voices. By this means no resolutions were taken but what were equally advantageous to the whole confederacy; and the interests of each particular city so consulted as to leave no room for complaints. As the supreme and legislative power was lodged in the assembly, it was constantly convened twice a year, in the spring and autumn; but seldom out of these stated times, unless upon some very urgent occasion. In these meetings they enacted laws, disposed of the vacant employments, declared war, made peace, concluded alliances, &c. If any city of the league did not acquiesce to the determinations and ordinances of the diet, or refused to furnish their quota's in time of war, they were compelled to it by dint of arms. The chief magistrate of the whole league, called by the Greeks Strategos, and by the Latins Prætor, was chosen in the general assembly by the majority of votes. This employment was both a civil and military one, it being the prætor's province to preside in the diet and command the army. They chose at first two prætors, but it was soon thought adviseable to reduce them to one; and the first who enjoyed that dignity alone was Marcus the Carian, who was succeeded by the famous Aratus. The prætor and other magistrates were appointed in the vernal assemblies, and seldom continued two years successively in the same employment. The former was vested with great power, especially in time war; but at the same time^d liable to be called to an account by the general assembly, and punished without any regard to his dignity, if convicted of misdemeanor or any other crime. The demiurgi were next in power to the prætor, and therefore stiled by Polybius and Livy the supreme magistrates of the Achæans. They were ten in number, chosen by the general assembly from among the most eminent men of the whole league for prudence, equity, and experience. It was their office to assist, with their advice, the prætor, who was to lay nothing before the assembly but what had been previously approved of by the major part of the demiurgi. In the prætor's absence the whole management of civil affairs devolved upon them; and in some extraordinary cases they were even empowered to summon the general assembly out of the stated times.^e

FEW of their laws have reached our times; however, from the writings of the ancients we have collected the five following, which we find to have been religiously observed while the republic continued in a flourishing condition. 1. That an extraordinary assembly was not to be summoned at the request of foreign ambassadors, unless they first notified in writing to the prætor and demiurgi the subject of their embassy. 2. That no city subject to the league should send any embassy to a foreign prince or state without the consent and approbation of the general diet. 3. That no member of the assembly should accept of presents from foreign princes under any pretence friends, and strike new terror into the enemy. The light of the moon reflecting on their arms, and their shouts, doubled by the echoes among the rocks and hollow places in the midnight silence, made them appear far more numerous than they really were. Whereupon the enemy retired after a faint resistance from the wall, and left Aratus absolute master of the citadel. In the mean time the rest of the troops arriving from Sicyon, were not only received with open arms, but assisted by the Corinthians in seizing all the Macedonians that were in the city.

* POLYB. ibid. PLUT. in Arato.

Aratus having secured the citadel went from thence to the city, and having assembled the people in the theatre, acquainted them in a long discourse with the particulars of the Achæan league, and exhorted them to accede to it. They unanimously agreed to join in the alliance; whereupon Aratus restored to them the keys of their city, which till then had never been in their power since the time of Philip the father of Alexander (1).

(2) Plut. in Arat.

what-

a whatsoever. 4. That no prince, state or city should be admitted into the league without the consent of the whole alliance. 5. That the general assembly should never sit above three days. These laws have been explained at length, and illustrated with many useful observations, by a modern writer of no mean character ^a, to whom we refer the reader and resume the thread of our history.

THE Ætolians, conceiving no small jealousy at the growing power and extraordinary success of the Achæans, began to instil the same into the neighbouring states with a view of breaking the union of those cities that were already joined, and preventing others from entering into the league. The sense of the benefits which they had a little before received from the friendship of the Achæans during their war with b Antigonus, withheld them from openly declaring war against their benefactors. However, they left no stone unturned to stir up the Lacedæmonians, and engage their king Cleomenes in a war against the Achæans; wherein they succeeded to their wish; for Cleomenes at their instigation having built a fortress in the territory of the Megalopolitans, called Aibenaum, the Achæans interpreted that as an open rupture, and declared in a general assembly that the Lacedæmonians should be reputed enemies ^f. Such was the beginning of the war, which was called the Cleomenic war (C).

THIS declaration of the Achæan confederacy was no sooner heard at Sparta, but The Cleomenic war.
the Ephori commanded their troops to take the field under the conduct of Cleomenes, who coming up with the Achæans near Pallantium, offered them battle. But Aratus c declaring against an engagement, Aristomachus the Achæan general made a retreat, which drew severe reproaches upon Aratus, both from his own countrymen, and from the enemy, whose army did not amount to five thousand men in the whole; whereas that of the Achæans consisted of twenty thousand foot and a thousand horse ^g. Not long after the two armies met again, when the Achæans were defeated; but Aratus having rallied in the flight what troops he could, marched strait to Mantinæa, and before the enemy could have any suspicion of his design, made himself master of that important place. This advantage was soon counter-balanced by the loss of another battle, wherein great numbers of the Achæans were slain with Lyfiades their general, while they were pursuing with too much eagerness and in disorder the Lace- dæmonians, who had given way and feigned a retreat. After this victory Cleomenes
d advanced into the territories of Megalopolis, where his troops committed great devastations, and got a very considerable booty. To these ravages he added insults, causing public games and plays to be exhibited in the sight of the enemy, not that he had any satisfaction in such shews and diversions, but only with a view to convince the Achæans that he entirely despised them, and was sure of victory, having to deal with so contemptible a foe ^h.

THE Achæans, now reduced to the last extremity, and under apprehension of being enslaved by the Lacedæmonians, especially if they should be joined by the Ætolians, who at that time were making great preparations for a war, began to entertain c thoughts of concluding a peace upon any terms. But Aratus dreading the consequence of a treaty set on foot between his dispirited countrymen and a victorious enemy, used his utmost efforts to divert them from it, and at the same time had recourse to an expedient which no ways redounded to his honour. This was to engage Antigonus king of Macedon in this war against the Lacedæmonians, which opened a way to the Macedonians into Greece.

^a MARTINI SHOOCKII. Respub. Achæor. & Veient. ^f Idem. ibid. ^g PLUT. in Cleom. ^h PLUT. ibid.

(C) Plutarch (2) relates the occasion of this war in a quite different manner; for he tells us, that Cleomenes, not being able to brook the authority of the Ephori, who engrossed all the power to themselves, leaving him only the empty title of king, resolved to change the form of government; and as he was sensible that few would concur with him in that view, he imagined the accomplishment of his design would be greatly facilitated by a war; and therefore endeavoured to embroil this city with the Achæans, who luckily for his purpose had given

Sparta some occasions of complaint; for Aratus, as our author tells us, not being able to prevail upon the Arcadians, who had espoused the party of the Lacedæmonians, to abandon them, and enter into the Achæan league, entered their territories in a hostile manner, ravaged their country, and in a word treated them as declared enemies. This opportunity Cleomenes laid hold of, and taking the field, treated the Achæans as they had done the Arcadians. According to this account the Achæans and not the Lacedæmonians were the aggressors.

(2) Plut. in Cleom.

The Achæans invite Antigonus into Greece.
Year of the
flood 2776.
Before Christ
227.

Aratus knew that Antigonus had great cause to be dissatisfied with his former proceedings; but he was likewise sensible that princes have neither friends nor enemies, but measure amities and enmities by the rules of interest. However, he would not openly enter into a negotiation of this nature, being well aware that Cleomenes and the Ætolians would oppose it, and that the Achæans themselves would have reason to despair, if they should see their general applying to their enemy. He therefore resolved to prosecute his purpose with such caution as to leave no room for suspicion, and to carry on his measures so as to keep them undiscovered. He was not ignorant that the Megalopolitans by their neighbourhood to the Lacedæmonians, were most exposed to the incursions of the enemies, and consequently, as they were greatly inclined to the house of Macedon for the many favours they had received at the hand of Philip, son of Amintas, they would resort for succour to Antigonus and the Macedonians. Having therefore gained over to his scheme Nicophanes and Cercidas, two principal citizens of Megalopolis, and well qualified for conducting the enterprize, by their means he brought it so about, that the Megalopolitans decreed to send ambassadors to the assembly of the Achæans, begging leave to solicit succours from Antigonus. Nicophanes and Cercidas were themselves sent to the Achæans with orders to proceed to Antigonus, if they approved the proposition. The general assembly having given audience to the ambassadors, and reflecting that they were not in a condition to yield them any effectual succours by reason of their own great straits, assented to their proposal, and granted them leave to pursue their orders. When they received audience of Antigonus, they touched upon the affairs of their own country in a few words, but enlarged, pursuant to the instructions of Aratus, on the imminent danger to which the king himself would be exposed, should the alliance, which was then talked of between the Ætolians and Cleomenes, take place. They represented to him, that if the united forces of those two states should gain over the Achæans the advantages they expected, the ambition of Cleomenes and the Ætolians would never be satisfied with the single conquest of Peloponnesus, but would aspire to the empire of all Greece, which they could not compass without first destroying the Macedonian monarchy. They therefore begged him to deliberate maturely which was the safest counsel for him to take; whether to succour the Achæans in opposition to Cleomenes, and defeat his ambitious designs, or by neglecting the occasion of gaining the friendship of so great a people, become liable at last to sustain a war in Thessaly for the empire of Macedon, not only with the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians, but with the Achæans themselves. To these remonstrances they added, that if the Ætolians continued their neutrality, the Achæans would be capable of supporting themselves with their own forces; but if on the other hand the Ætolians should join the enemy, they must then intreat him to prevent with timely succours the ruin of Peloponnesus, which might be attended with fatal consequences to himself. They likewise took care to insinuate, that Aratus would give such security for his fair proceeding and sincere intentions as should be pleasing to both parties, and that he himself would take upon him to demand assistance when he should think it needful.

Antigonus highly approved all these representations, and with great pleasure laid hold of the opportunity of engaging in the affairs of Greece. He likewise wrote an obliging letter to the Megalopolitans, assuring them of his assistance whenever the Achæans should think fit to call for it. The ambassadors having acquainted Aratus with the good disposition wherein they found Antigonus towards the Achæans, he was not a little pleased to find his project succeed so well. He wished indeed to have had no occasion to call in foreign aids, and did all that lay in his power to prevent it; and though necessity obliged him to have recourse to that prince, yet to shun the blame that might redound upon the authors of such measures, he took care they should appear as concerted by the Achæans without his privacy. The Megalopolitans having acquainted the Achæans with the kind reception their deputies had met with at the court of Macedon, and sent the letter of Antigonus to be read in the general assembly, most of them were for inviting that prince to march his army into Peloponnesus without further delay. But Aratus standing up, made a long speech, exhorting them to try first, whether they could support themselves with their own forces; adding, that if after all their efforts fortune should declare against them, it would then be time enough to have recourse to their friends. His advice a advice was approved by the whole assembly, and it was then concluded that the Achæans should employ their own forces only in the prosecution of the war¹.

THE war proved very unsuccessful for the Achæans, who being often worsted by Cleomenes, were obliged to abandon the field and retire into their strong holds. Neither were these able to stop the career of the conqueror, who in one campaign took the cities of Capbyes, Pellene, Pbeneus, Pblionte, Cleonæ, Epidaurus, Hermione, and Corinth itself. These successes allowed the Achæans no further time to deliberate; and accordingly Aratus at their entreaties dispatched his son to Antigonus, inviting that prince to come with all speed to their assistance, and assuring him that on his arrival Acro-Corinth should be put into his hands. Antigonus immediately Antigonus arrives in Greece. Year of the flood 2778. Before Christ 225.
b began his march towards Peloponnesus at the head of twenty-thousand foot and fourteen hundred horse, and arriving at the isthmus, encamped just opposite to Cleomenes, who had fortified with a ditch and rampart the whole space between Acro-Corinth and the Onion hills. As Antigonus did not think it advisable, nor even practicable to force his way through, and on the other hand had not a sufficient quantity of provisions to subsist his army till the Achæans joined him, he was preparing to decamp and transport his troops by sea to Sicyon. But in the mean time a messenger arriving at the camp, acquainted Aratus, who was come to meet Antigonus, that the inhabitants of Argos had revolted from Cleomenes and were then besieging the citadel. Whereupon Aratus, with a detachment of fifteen hundred men, immediately put c to sea, and arriving at Epidaurus, marched from thence to Argos and made himself master both of the city and castle after having defeated in a skirmish the partizans of Cleomenes, and killed Megistones who had been detached from the army to their relief². This success proved of great consequence to the Achæans, and first of all gave rise to the prosperity of the allies; for Cleomenes hearing that Argos was taken, and being apprehensive that the enemies would surround him, abandoned his lines and retired with great precipitation, first to Argos and then to Mantineæ. He appeared before Argos quite unexpected, and in that alarm got into the city, but could not keep it, the citadel being in the hands of Aratus, and Antigonus pursuing him close with all his forces.

d Antigonus having thus entered Peloponnesus without the loss of one single man, advanced to Corinth, which immediately surrendered, and thence to Tegea, Mantineæ, Orbomenes, Hærea, and Telphussa; all which places, terrified at the approach of the Macedonians, either voluntarily submitted, or made but a faint resistance. And now winter drawing near, he sent home his troops and went himself to Ægium to assist at the general assembly of the Achæans, where after having acquainted them with the motives of his coming among them, he was chosen general of the confederate army, and the important castle of Acro-Corinth was by a decree of the council made over to him.

IN the mean time Cleomenes receiving intelligence that Antigonus had sent home
e his army while he himself continued at Ægium, formed a design of surprising the city of Megalopolis, very considerable at that time, and no ways inferior in power and extent to Sparta itself. As the garison was not very strong at that time, nor the guards very strict in their duty, since Antigonus was near at hand, and the enemy weakened with frequent losses, Cleomenes imagined he might easily get into the town in the night, provided he could gain some of the inhabitants over to his interest; and accordingly applied himself to certain Messenians, who having been banished their country had taken sanctuary in Megalopolis. Being conducted by these, he arrived at the city by night, scaled the walls, and made himself master of the place without the least opposition. Most of the inhabitants retired to Messene, whither Cleomenes sent a herald to acquaint them, f that he would restore them to the possession of their city, provided they would renounce the Achæan league and join the Lacedæmonians. But they chose rather to see themselves divested of all that was most dear and valuable to them, than to violate the fidelity they had sworn to their allies. The famous Philopæmen, whom we shall have frequently occasion to mention in the sequel of this history, contributed not a little to this generous resolution. This refusal highly enraged Cleomenes, who immediately gave up the town to be plundered, sent all the statues and pictures to Sparta, demolished the houses, threw down the walls, and committed so many outrages, that he left not so much as any appearance that it had ever been a peopled place³.

¹ POLYB. ubi supra. PLUT. in Cleom. & Arat. ² PLUT. in Arat. & Cleom. POLYB. ubi supra.
³ PLUT. & POLYB. ibidem.

Antigonus having sent his troops, as we have already observed, into winter quarters in Macedonia, Cleomenes assembled his early in the spring with a design to put in execution a project, which in the opinion of the vulgar was the result of temerity and despair, but according to Polybius, a competent judge in matters of that nature, conducted with all imaginable prudence and sagacity. As the Macedonians were dispersed in their winter quarters, and Antigonus enjoying himself with his friends at Argos without any other forces but a few mercenaries, Cleomenes taking the field made an irruption into the territories of Argos, laying waste the whole country to the very gates of the city. What he proposed in this enterprize was, to bring Antigonus to hazard an engagement, which in all probability he would have lost; or if he declined it, to lessen his reputation among the Achaëans, and raise complaints against him chiefly in the city of Argos. This project succeeded according to his expectation; for the Argians seeing their country ravaged and laid waste under the king's eyes, while he continued inactive, assembled in a tumultuous manner at the palace gates, and with threats pressed him either to take the field, and protect his friends, or to resign the command of their troops to those who were less timorous than himself. But Antigonus was deaf to all their reproaches and remonstrances, and in spite of the many reflections that were publicly cast upon him on that Occasion, kept within the walls of the city, and tamely beheld the enemy insulting him at the very gates. Thus Cleomenes having frightened the enemy, and inspired his own men with new courage, returned loaded with booty to Sparta. In the beginning of the summer, Antigonus, being desirous to retrieve the reputation he had undeservedly lost among the Achaëans, took the field with an army of twenty-eight thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, and advanced into Laconia.

Cleomenes not doubting but the enemy would soon visit him, took care to guard all the passes with strong detachments, and to fortify the avenues with ditches and ramparts, filling up and barricadoing the roads with large trees laid across. He marched himself with a body of twenty thousand men and encamped at a certain place called Selasia, having reason to suspect that the enemy proposed to pass that way; nor was he deceived in his conjecture. This pass was formed by two mountains, the one called Eva, the other Olympus; between these runs the river Oenus, along the banks of which there was a narrow way leading to Sparta. Cleomenes having thrown up a good intrenchment at the foot of these mountains, posted the auxiliaries on the eminence of mount Eva under the command of his brother Euclidas, while he himself encamped on mount Olympus with the Spartan troops and the mercenaries. The cavalry he drew up along the banks of the river sustained by a body of mercenary foot. When Antigonus arrived, and viewed the situation of the ground with the fortifications and defences that Cleomenes had made, and observed with how much judgment he had posted his troops, he did not think it adviseable to attack him, but encamped at a small distance on the banks of the Gorgulus, which covered part of his army. There he remained some days the better to acquaint himself with the situation of the different posts, and the disposition of the enemy. He often marched round their camp feigning to attack them, sometimes in one place, sometimes in another; but finding every post well guarded, and Cleomenes warily watching his motions, he gave over all thoughts of forcing the enemies camp, and retired to his own, which was equally secured against all attempts. Both armies having stood thus to their defence some days without being able to gain any advantage over each other, the two generals at last agreed on a decisive battle.

It is not easy to comprehend what could induce Cleomenes to such a resolution; he was posted very advantageously; his troops were not so numerous as the enemy's by one third; he was supplied with all sorts of provision from Sparta, with which city he had a free communication. What then could make him hazard a battle, whereof the event was to decide the fate of Lacedæmon? Polybius indeed seems to insinuate the cause of this proceeding; for he tells us, that Ptolemy king of Egypt, who had promised to assist him in this war, acquainted him that he was not in a condition to make good his engagement, exhorting him at the same time to come to an accommodation with Antigonus and the Achaëans. As he was therefore incapable of bearing the whole charge of the war, and had no prospect of any supplies from foreign states, we may suppose that the desperate posture of his affairs forced him to venture a battle.

The battle of Selasia.
Year of the
A.D. 2780.
Before Christ
223.

■ POLYB. lib. ii.

BOTH

- a BOTH armies being drawn up, and the signals given, Antigonus detached a body of Illyrians against Euclidas, who was posted on mount Eva; but while they were ascending the hill some light-armed troops of the enemy advancing charged them in flank, while Euclidas, who was posted on the top of the hill, pressed them in front, and a body of mercenaries warmly attacked their rear. Philopæmen, who then served in the army as a volunteer, observing what danger the Illyrians were in, acquainted the commanders with it; but they not hearkening to him as he was but very young and had not yet bore any command in the army, without any orders from the generals, he attacked, with a small body of Megalopolitans, his countrymen, the enemies horse, and obliged them to give ground. This forced the mercenaries,
- b who had fallen on the Illyrians rear, to hasten to the relief of the cavalry; for Cleomenes had posted them at first near the cavalry on purpose to support and cover them. By this means the Illyrians being disengaged, resolutely marched up the hill against Euclidas, who, instead of moving towards the enemy, and thereby improving the advantage of the shock which the descent of the hill gave him, remained in the place where he was first posted. The Illyrians having gained the top of the hill without any opposition, now advanced against Euclidas on even ground, and attacked him with such resolution, that he was obliged to abandon the top of the hill and retire to the rocks and precipices where he was soon defeated and most of his men cut in pieces. This success against Euclidas was entirely owing to Philopæmen,
- c as Antigonus himself acknowledged, for after the battle, having asked the officer that engaged the enemy's horse how he came to fall upon them before the signal, and the officer excusing himself by saying that a young man of Megalopolis had done it without his direction, the king replied that the young man had behaved like an experienced commander and gained the victory, but that he had acted like a raw soldier.

d DURING this variety of action the cavalry of both armies had likewise engaged on the plain by the river. The Achaëans behaved with uncommon bravery, being sensible that this battle would decide their liberties. Philopæmen distinguished himself above the rest, for his horse being killed under him he afterwards fought among the foot, killing with his own hand great numbers of the enemies till he was with a javelin struck through both thighs at one stroke.

- BUT the sharpest encounter was on mount Olympus, where the two kings engaged with their light-armed troops and mercenaries, consisting of about five thousand on each side. As they fought under the eye of their princes every man strove to signalize himself, and perform something worthy of such spectators. It was a long time before victory inclined to either side; but at last Cleomenes receiving notice that his brother was defeated on the hill, and that his cavalry began to give ground on the plain, being apprehensive that the enemy would pour in upon him from all quarters, thought it adviseable to level all the intrenchments before his camp, and
- e order his troops to march out in front. The trumpets therefore having sounded the signal for the light-armed troops to retire, the phalanxes advanced on both sides with equal animosity; but the Lacedæmonian phalanx not being able to sustain the shock of the double Macedonian phalanx, gave ground, and soon fell into the utmost confusion. The overthrow then became general; the Lacedæmonians were every where cut in pieces, and those who found means to make their escape fled from the field of battle in the greatest disorder. Cleomenes with a small party of horse retreated to Sparta, whence he departed the night following to Gylbia, where he embarked on a vessel that attended him there according to his directions, and sailed to Alexandria accompanied by a small number only of his intimate friends.
- f Plutarch assures us that most of the foreign troops in both armies were slain in this engagement, and that of five thousand Lacedæmonians two hundred only out-lived that action.

Cleomenes had scarce set sail when Antigonus arrived at Sparta, and made himself master of it without resistance; for Cleomenes had advised the citizens to receive Antigonus, assuring them at the same time, that whatever might be his own condition he would always promote the welfare of his country. The conqueror treated the inhabitants in a very friendly manner, declaring to them that he had not engaged in a war against the Spartans, but against Cleomenes, whose flight had disarmed his resentment. He added that nothing could render his memory so glorious in future ages as to have it said, that Sparta had been preserved by the prince, who alone had the good fortune to conquer it. Having in this friendly manner addressed the citizens, he declared them free, and restored them to the full enjoyment of their ancient privileges. He shewed an inclination to continue some time among them, but was obliged to leave the city three days after he had entered it. His departure was occasioned by the intelligence he received that the Illyrians had invaded Macedonia, and were committing there dreadful ravages. If Cleomenes had respite^d giving battle three days only, or had fortified himself in Sparta, and held out for so short a space of time, he would have preserved his dominions. From Sparta Antigonus marched to Tegæa, which city he likewise declared free, and from thence to Argos, where the general assembly of the Achaean confederacy was then sitting. There he was thanked by the deputies of each city of the Achaean league, and by a decree of the council declared the protector of Achaia. From Argos he proceeded by long journeys to Macedon, where he gained a signal victory over the Illyrians; but on that occasion straining his voice to animate his men, he burst a vein, and having voided a great quantity of blood, he fell into an ill state of health, which soon after took him out of the world^p. Thus ended the Cleomeneic war, leaving all Greece in a profound tranquillity.

• Idem, ibid. • POLYB. ubi supra. PLUT. in Cleom.

The war of the confederates. BUT the Ætolians were soon weary of peace, which obliged them to live honestly and abstain from plunder and rapine, which they used to subsist on, leading much the same life on land as pirates do at sea; they had no sense of friendship or alliance, accounting all those as enemies whom they could prey upon, and believing they had a right to any thing they could take away. However, during the life of Antigonus, the fear they were under lest he should fall upon them kept them in awe. But he was no sooner dead, and Philip the son of Demetrius, who was then very young, placed on the throne, than they returned to their old manner of life, entering the territories of the Messenians, and carrying off their cattle and whatever else they could meet with. Complaints were made to their chief magistrates of such proceedings; but they seemed rather enclined to encourage than restrain such robberies, being sharers in the booty. The chief author of all these disorders was one Dorimachus of Trichonia, a turbulent young man, and, as our author calls him^q, every way an Ætolian, who being sent to Pbighalia, a city in Peloponnesus, but of the Ætolian confederacy, to be as a spie upon the Achaëans, encouraged the loose rabble of that place to plunder their neighbours with a view of enriching himself with their spoils. To him therefore chiefly the Messenians had recourse, demanding reparation for the damages they had suffered, and begging he would not give countenance to the disturbers of the public tranquillity. Dorimachus told their deputies that he would come himself to Messena and there hear their complaints, and see all their grievances redressed. He went to Messena accordingly, but application being made to him by the chief sufferers, he dismissed them with reproachful language and menaces; nay, while he^e still remained in the city, a band of Ætolian robbers from Pbighalia attacked in the night a certain country-house called Cbyron, killed all those who made resistance, bound the rest, and carried them off together with cattle and furniture. Hereupon the Messenians having cited Dorimachus to appear before their assembly, arrested him on his entering the council, and kept him in prison till he promised in the most solemn manner that reparation should be made for all the injuries they had suffered, and the authors of the late slaughter put into their hands. But he was no sooner returned to his own country, than he prevailed upon the Ætolians to revenge the treatment he had met with at Messena, by declaring war against the Messenians, which being proclaimed, the Ætolian pyrates began to infest the neighbouring seas, taking all the ships they met with; they even made prize of a ship belonging to the king of Macedon, and carrying her to Cythera, sold there both the ship and her company. In short they plundered all the coast of Epirus, made an attempt on Thyrea, a city of Acar-nania, and conveying some troops privately into Peloponnesus, surprised and kept possession of a strong hold called Clarium in the Megalopolitan territory, making use of it to lodge and secure their plunder. And now having a place of retreat in the very heart of Peloponnesus, they began their march towards Messena, plundering the cities of Patraë and Pbaraë, which were of the Achaean alliance, and laying waste all a the countries through which they passed, till they came to Phigalia, which they made their place of arms, making from thence frequent inroads on the lands of the Messenians.

^p POLYS. lib. ii.^q POLYS. lib. iv.

THE Achæans in the mean time assembling according to custom at Ægium, the complaints of the Patreans and Pharæans were heard, and the deputies of the Messenians sent to implore the assistance of the Achæans against the common enemy. After the assembly had deliberated on these matters, it was agreed that the state had been affronted by this insolent proceeding of the Ætolians, who had presumed to enter Achaia in a hostile manner contrary to the treaty of peace. Whereupon justly provoked by these infractions, they resolved to send succours to the Messenians, and b that as soon as the prætor should have raised them, they would then proceed further to execute what should be thought expedient by the assembly. Timoxenus, who was then prætor of the Achæans, was not at all pleased with the decree of the assembly; for his authority not being yet expired, he had no mind to head the army, which duty was annexed to his office, as having a very mean opinion of the Achæan soldiery. But Aratus, provoked at the indignities they had suffered by the audacious Ætolians, lost no time in putting the Achæans under arms, being determined to come speedily to a battle with the enemy. Five days before he entered on his charge, he dispatched orders to all the towns and cities, appointing them a day when all their young men c together pursuant to his orders at the place of rendezvous, he sent a messenger to the Ætolians, requiring them to depart the territories of Messena, and not to march into Achaia on peril of being treated as enemies. The Ætolians not being at that time in a condition to make head against the army of the Achæans, complied with his demand. Whereupon Aratus dismissed the Achæans and Lacedæmonians, who had joined him, marching only with three thousand foot, and three hundred horse, to observe the motions of the enemy, and prevent them from plundering the country. As he drew near them he observed that they were marching off with an immense booty, which so provoked him, that he could not forbear attacking them under all the disadvantages imaginable. The dispute was long and obstinate, but at last d the Achæans having the disadvantage of the ground, and being over-powered with numbers, were obliged to retire. The Ætolians pursued them close with great shouts and acclamations, and made such a slaughter of the fugitives, that they must have all been cut off had they not had at hand the safe retreats of Oreboenus and Caphya. The Megalopolitans, who had drawn all their forces together in order to join Aratus, arrived the day after the battle, and proved of no other use than to bury those whom they hoped to have relieved. And now the Ætolians having gained a complete victory contrary to their expectation, marched without fear or danger quite cross the Peloponnesus, made an unsuccessful attempt on Pellene, plundered the territory of Sicyon, and encamped on the isthmus.

Battle of Caphya lost by Aratus, Year of the flood 2782. Before Christ 221.

e IN the mean time the Achæans having called their general assembly, complaints were made against Aratus by all the allies as the cause of the loss and dishonour which they had sustained. And indeed there was no dispute, but Aratus had greatly erred in having, we may say, usurped the magistracy, by taking it upon him before he was regularly elected into his charge; and he could not deny but what he had undertaken thereupon had succeeded very ill. However, he endeavoured to prove that the loss of the battle was not his fault; adding, that if he had been wanting in any of the duties of an able commander, he asked pardon, and hoped that in regard of his past services they would not censure him with more rigour than humanity. His submission on this occasion changed the minds of the whole assembly, f and the people began to vent their rage upon his accusers, who, privately withdrawing, left Aratus in greater esteem among all ranks of people than he had ever been to that time: the assembly gave themselves entirely up to his counsel and conduct, and re-instated him in the command of the allied army. However, the remembrance of his defeat had thrown a great damp on his courage; so that he behaved as a prudent civil magistrate, rather than as an able warrior; and though the Ætolians often gave him opportunities to distress them, he made no advantage of them, but suffered their parties to lay waste almost the whole country (D).

Aratus accused before the assembly of the Achæans.

THE Achæans were therefore forced to address Macedonia again, and call in Philip, in hopes that the affection he bore to Aratus, and the confidence he had in him, would incline that monarch to send them speedy succours. For Antigonus on his death-bed had above all things entreated Philip to join with Aratus, and follow his counsel in all things relating to Greece; he had also sent him when very young into Peloponnesus to learn the art of government under the eye of so great a statesman. Philip having given audience to the Achæan deputies, and understood by their speech the injuries they had suffered from the Ætoliens contrary to the articles of peace agreed on in the reign of Antigonus, promised to assist them with the whole strength of his kingdom, and accordingly soon after set out for Greece, and arrived at Corinth. Upon his arrival the ambassadors of the confederates, who were already met at Corinth, began to concert with him what measures they should take with relation to the Ætoliens. Complaints were made to the king by almost every city in Peloponnesus against them, and war unanimously declared both by the king and the confederates. It was moreover enacted by the assembly with the concurrence and approbation of Philip, that all those who had been sufferers by the Ætoliens since the death of Demetrius, father to Philip, should be received into the confederacy, and that if any city or state had been awed into an alliance with the Ætoliens, and paid them tribute, they should be forthwith set at liberty, the security of their respective governments committed to their own hands, and all garisons withdrawn. This decree was sent to all the confederate towns, to the end that it being every-where received and ratified by the suffrages of the people, they might jointly in their different states proclaim war against the common enemy. Which was done accordingly, and the war from thence called the Confederate war.*

THE Ætoliens on the other side prepared for war, and chose for their prætor one Scopas, who had been the chief author of all the violences they had committed. Philip having concerted with the Achæans the operations of the ensuing campaign, marched his army back into Macedon, where he employed all the winter in making the requisite military preparations. He won over Scerdilaidas to the Achæan league.† He was a petty king of Illyria, and had engaged in an alliance with the Ætoliens, but was at that time highly incensed against them for refusing to give him, according to the articles agreed upon between them, share of the spoils which had been got at the taking of Cynæba. This breach of articles so disgusted him, that he was easily prevailed upon by Philip to enter into the common alliance, and furnish a fleet of thirty ships on the terms of being paid yearly the sum of twenty talents". The Achæans likewise sent to invite all their allies to join them in the confederacy. The Acarnaniens without any hesitation declared war against the Ætoliens, though they were most exposed to the enemy's insults, as lying nearest the Ætolian territories, and noways in a condition to defend themselves. Our author bestows the highest encomiums on this people, telling us that there is no nation among the Greeks, with which friendship may be more safely contracted, there being none that profess more regard to public or private faith, or will venture further for the love of liberty; that both in public and private treaties they prefer honour to all other considerations, and that, however weak, they have often in defence of their reputation engaged in the greatest dangers". The Epirots refused to declare war, till Philip should first proclaim it. The Messenians, for whose sake the war was undertaken, declared that they would not engage in it, unless Phigalia, which commanded their frontiers, were first drawn off from the Ætolian league. The Lacedæmonians had declared at first for the Achæans, but the contrary faction prevailing, they joined the Ætoliens. Thus

* POLYB. ubi supra. PLUT. in Arat. † POLYB. ibid. p. 294, 299. " Idem, ibid. p. 305, 306. " Idem, ibid. p. 330.

(D) Aratus was accused in the assembly, first of having taken the command upon him before he was duly elected: secondly, he was blamed for having dismissed the Achæan troops, while the Ætoliens were still in the heart of Peloponnesus, notwithstanding he had before been well assured that they did all they could to engage Peloponnesus in a war. The third article against him was his venturing to join battle with so few troops, when he might have made with great ease a safe retreat to the neighbouring towns, and there reinforced his army. The last and heaviest charge against him was, that after he had resolved to give the enemy battle, he did not make one soldier-like step in the whole conduct of the action.

- a all things falling out to the wish of the Ætolians, they entered on the war with great hopes of success, while the Achaëans had but a melancholy prospect of their affairs. For Philip, on whom chiefly they relied, was yet but forming his army; the Epirots were slow in their preparations, and the Messenians continued neuter, while the Ætolians, assisted by the Eleans and Lacedæmonians, attacked them on all sides^{*}, and gained very considerable advantages. Embassadors were therefore dispatched to Philip, who hearing the danger his allies were in, marched out to their relief with fifteen thousand foot, and eight hundred horse, and crossing Thessaly, arrived in Epirus. Here he was prevailed upon by the Epirots to lay siege to Ambracia, which took him up forty days, and gave the enemy time to prepare against his coming;
- b whereas if he had led his army directly into Ætolia, he would in all likelihood have at once put an end to the war. While Philip was employed at Ambracia, Scopas, at the head of a numerous body of Ætolians, took his march through Thessaly, and entering Macedonia, ravaged the country without the least opposition, returning home in a short time with an immense booty. However, this did not hinder Philip from pursuing the siege of Ambracia, and after the surrender of that city, entering Ætolia, and seizing on a great many important places. He would have soon reduced all Ætolia had he not been obliged to repair to the relief of his own country, which the Dardaniens were upon the point of invading. At his departure he assured the embassadors of the Achaëans, that as soon as he should be able to compose his affairs at home, he would return into Greece and assist them to the utmost of his power. His unexpected arrival so terrified the Dardaniens, that they dismissed their army after they had got near the frontiers of Macedonia, and retired home. Whereupon Philip returning to Thessaly, spent there the remaining part of the summer in the city of Larissa[†].

IN the mean time Dorimachus, whom the Ætolians had just before appointed their prætor, drawing together their troops, led them into the upper Epirus, laying waste the whole country, not so much in prospect of profit to himself, as out of malice to the Epirots. He did not even spare the temple of Dodona, but laid it in ashes, carrying home all the ornaments and rich furniture of that stately edifice.

- d Philip having notice of these ravages, though it was now the depth of winter, left Larissa, and taking with him three thousand Chalcaspides, so called from their carrying brazen shields, two thousand buckler-men, three hundred Caudioti, and about four hundred horse, marched through Thessaly and Eubœa to Corinth, where he arrived without any one's having the least notice of his march. On his arrival he sent for Aratus, and dispatched letters to his son, who bore the same name, and was that year prætor, and commander in chief of the Achaean forces, requiring him to assemble the troops as soon as possible, and appoint a place of rendezvous. Caphya was the place agreed on, whither while Philip was marching he met with a detachment of two thousand Eleans, who, under the command of Euripidas, were advancing to plunder the territory of Sicyon, and having attacked them unexpectedly, for they were quite ignorant of Philip's return, he took about twelve hundred of them, and cut the rest in pieces. Three days after he arrived at Caphya, where he halted two days to refresh his troops, and then together with Aratus the younger, who had there drawn together ten thousand Achaëans, he advanced to Psophis, with a design to besiege it. This was a bold attempt, for the city was accounted impregnable both on account of its natural situation, and the many fortifications which had been added to it (E), and besides was furnished with a strong garison commanded by Euripidas, who had escaped from the late defeat. Philip encamped on an eminence at a small distance from the town, and after viewing the fortifications and situation of the place,
- e f was a long time doubtful whether he should attempt it or not; but at length reflecting on the great importance of such a fortress, he resolved at all adventures to begin the siege. Having therefore ordered his troops to refresh themselves, and be in a readi-

Psophis taken by the confederates.

* Idem, ibid. p. 334.

† POLYB. ibid.

(E) Psophis was the most ancient city of Arcadia, situated in the very heart of Peloponnesus, and on the west borders of Arcadia towards the frontiers of Achaia. It was surrounded on the west side by a rapid stream, which during the winter was no where fordable; on the east by the Erymanthus, a great and violent river; on the south by a torrent which emptied itself into the Erymanthus; on the north it was defended by an eminence very strong by nature, and greatly improved by art, which served for a citadel; and besides, the walls and works about the town were very considerable both for their height and thickness.

nels under their arms by break of day, he commanded them to march down and pass the bridge over the Erymanthus; which they did without opposition, the garison not suspecting they would venture on such a dangerous enterprize. Having crossed the river they approached the town, and lodged themselves at the very foot of the wall. This struck Euripidas and the garison with great terror; for they never imagined that the enemy would be so bold as to make an essay of their strength against a place so well fortified and provided, or to undertake a long siege by reason of the winter and bad weather. What they chiefly apprehended was, that Philip might become master of the place by intelligence. But when these fears were over, there being none in the town so much as inclined to the king's party, they betook themselves to the defence of the works, the greatest part of the Aetolians mounting the walls, while the Elean mercenaries made a sally by a gate in the upper part of the town in hopes of surprizing the enemy on that side. In the mean time the king having appointed three several attacks to be made, ordered ladders to be raised by men destined for that particular service against each place, with a strong guard of Macedonians to support them; then commanding the signal to be given, they advanced to the assault on all quarters of the town. The garison for some time made a brave resistance, overturning many of their ladders; but their darts beginning to fail them, and the Macedonians bravely maintaining the attack, notwithstanding the opposition they met with, they deserted at length their posts, and betook themselves by flight to the citadel, leaving the Macedonians possessed of the walls. At the same time the *Candiot*s, who had engaged the party that had made the sally, beat them back, and in the pursuit entered pell-mell with them into the town; so that it was taken in all quarters at once. The inhabitants with their wives and children took sanctuary in the citadel, as did Euripidas, and such as had time to provide for their safety*. Euripidas foreseeing what must inevitably befall him, capitulated with Philip, and yielded up the citadel, after having obtained indemnity for all that were retired thither both townsfolk and strangers. The king being obliged by the bad weather to take up his abode here for some days, he assembled all the Achaëans that were with him, and after shewing them of what importance the city of Psophis was to them in the war they had on their hands, generously gave it up to their deputies, assuring them at the same time that he would let no occasion pass of shewing them the strongest proofs of his affection to their nation, and zeal for their interest.

FROM Psophis the king led his army to Lasion, which he found abandoned both by the Elean garison and the inhabitants. This town likewise he delivered up to the Achaëans, as he did the city of Stratus to the Telphussians whom the Eleans had driven out. From Stratus he continued his march to Olympia, where after he had allowed his troops three days rest, he entered the territories of the Eleans, sending detachments abroad to plunder and lay waste the country, while he encamped with the main body of the army in the neighbourhood of Artemissium. This territory had been formerly accounted sacred in regard of the Olympic games, which were solemnized there every fourth year; and all the nations of Greece had agreed never to turn their arms against it. But the Eleans had forfeited this privilege by engaging in the wars of Greece, and adhering to one party against another. As the territory of the Eleans was the best peopled, and the most fruitful of all Peloponnesus, and the inhabitants so fond of a country life, that they could never be prevailed upon to inhabit their towns, the allied army found here so great a booty that they could scarce carry it off, the soldiers being over-loaded with the rich moveables of their country-houses, besides the many prisoners and numerous herds of cattle which greatly embarrassed them in their march. Philip therefore found it necessary to retire out of the Elean territory, and re-encamp at Olympia, taking on his march the fortress of Thaleme, whither many of the Eleans had conveyed their most valuable effects*.

WHILE Philip was thus employing his arms in defence of the Achaean liberties, one of his courtiers formed a project of reducing them to a state of slavery. Among the many tutors and governors left by Antigonos to king Philip, who came a child to the crown, Apelles held the chief rank, and had preserved a powerful influence over the young prince. This minister took it into his head to reduce the Achaëans to the same condition, in which the Thessalians were at that time; that is, to subject them to the caprice of the ministers of Macedon, leaving them only the bare name of liberty,

Disturbances raised by Apel-les.

* POLYB. ibid. p. 336.

* Idem, ibid.

which

- a which was the case of the Theffalians. To compass this design, his first essay was on the patience of the Achæan soldiery, whom the Macedonians by his orders often dislodged, taking possession of their quarters, when they found them better provided than themselves, and depriving them of their plunder; when they complained of this hard usage he caused them to be put under arrest and severely punished by the common executioner, imagining that by this sort of usage he should be able by degrees to bring the Achæans to bear any burden the king should think fit to lay upon them. But Aratus complaining to the king of this injurious treatment, and imparting to him the project of Apelles, that prince assured him that care should be taken for the future to prevent any such injuries. And accordingly he ordered Apelles never to lay
- b any commands on the Achæans without the concurrence of their prætor or chief officer. The Achæans, over-joyed at the favour the king shewed them, and the orders he had given for their peace and security, were ever bestowing the highest encomiums on his equity and other exalted qualities. And indeed, if our author is to be credited, he was possessed of all those virtues which can endear a king to his people; such as a lively genius, an uncommon understanding, a happy memory, an agreeable utterance, an unaffected grace in all his actions, and a beautiful aspect heightened by a majestic air, which bespoke the greatness of his mind; but his brightest virtues were the sweetness of his temper, his affability, and a great desire to please and content all who lived under his government^b. How he forfeited this great character
- c our author gives him, and from a glorious king became an inhuman tyrant, we refer to a more proper place.

THE king having thus settled matters between the Macedonians and Achæans, decamped from Olympia, and having caused a bridge to be laid over the Alpheus, entered the territory of the Tripbalians (F), reduced the city of Aliphera (G), and in a few days brought all that country under subjection. The rapidity of his conquests struck such terror into all the neighbouring states, that most of them voluntarily submitted, and the rest, after a faint resistance, were forced to receive the yoke. Having thus greatly weakened the Ætolian confederacy, he returned loaded with spoils and glory to Argos, where he passed the remainder of the winter^c.

- d Apelles had not yet so given over his project as to be without hopes of bringing by degrees the Achæans to a servile subjection. But he well knew that both the Aratus's, father and son, withstood his design, and that the king held them in great esteem, especially the father, in whom he reposed the greatest confidence. He therefore resolved to attack them both, and by fraud and address put them, if possible, in disgrace with the king. With this view he sent for all those who were of the opposite faction among the Achæans, and enemies to Aratus, and having instructed himself in their several interests and characters, he employed all his arts to engage them in his friendship, acting in their favour with the king, whom he endeavoured to persuade, that if he continued to treat Aratus with so much deference, he
- e could never hope to gain any thing on the Achæans further than was stipulated by the articles of confederacy. But if he would be pleased to countenance those he should recommend, he might soon compass whatever he desired, and dispose of all matters in Peloponnesus at his pleasure. The new friends enforced these reflections, and improved on the arguments of Apelles. As the time of electing a new prætor was drawing near, he prevailed with the king to be present at the Achæan assembly, and to employ all his interest in favour of one Eperatus a declared enemy to Aratus, who was accordingly elected in preference to Timozenus, whom Aratus had set up. Thus Philip, notwithstanding his excellent parts, became the tool of his prime minister; what Apelles endeavours to put Aratus in disgrace with the king.

^b POLYB. ubi supra, p. 338, 339.

^c Idem, p. 343.

(F) This country, which took its name from an Arcadian youth, lies on the sea-coast of Peloponnesus between the Eleans and Messenians, on the north-west skirts of Achaia. Its towns were Santhium, Lepreum, Hypano, Typanæa, Pyrgus, Æpyium, Bolan, Styllagium, and Pbryna. All these places the Eleans had lately reduced to their obedience, together with Alipbaræa a town of Arcadia, and Megalopolis itself, a city at that time of great note (3).

(G) Aliphera was seated on the top of a high and steep hill, which was defended by a strong fortress. In this fortress was to be seen a brazen statue of Minerva, famous for its size and the excellence of the workmanship. The inhabitants themselves, as our author tells us, could give no clear account why it was placed there, nor at whose charges. It was the work of Hecabodorus and Sofratus, and generally esteemed the most beautiful and finished piece they ever performed (4).

(3) Polyb. lib. ii. p. 339, 343.

(4) Idem, ibid. p. 343.

then

then can be expected from a weak prince that devotes himself to the will of a crafty intriguing Apelles? And now Apelles began to think that he had advanced far in his enterprize, having obtained an Achaean prætor of his faction. He therefore renewed his attempts, being determined totally to destroy the interest of Aratus with the king. An incident which happened at that time armed him with new calumnies. Amphidamus, chief of the Eleans, who had been taken prisoner, persuaded the king that it would be no difficult matter to procure him the friendship of his countrymen, and that he could easily make them covet his alliance. Hereupon the king discharged him without ransom, empowering him to assure the Eleans that on condition of their entering into an alliance with him, he would suffer them to live in the entire enjoyment of all their privileges, and exempt them both from garisons and tribute. ^b But the Eleans would not listen to any conditions how advantageous soever, declaring that no consideration should be capable of inducing them to abandon their ancient allies. This so unreasonable a refusal Apelles ascribed to the ill services done clandestinely by Aratus, telling the king, that he had kept Amphidamus from enforcing, as he had engaged to do, his offers to the inhabitants of Elis, and that on Amphidamus's departure from Olympia towards Elis, he had conferred with him and made him change his mind, being by him persuaded that it would be no ways for the interest of Peloponnesus that Philip should acquire any power over the Eleans. The king immediately sent for Aratus, and insisted upon Apelles's charging him to his face with what he had brought against him in private. This Apelles did not scruple ^c to do, and that with such an air of assurance as might have disconcerted innocence itself. He even added, that since the king had discovered his insincerity, by which he had rendered himself so unworthy of his kindness and good offices, the whole matter should be referred to the general assembly of the *Achaean*s, and the king in the mean time return with his army into Macedon. This was what he wanted, not doubting but he should get him condemned there by the powerful influence of his authority. Aratus beseeched the king not to give credit over-hastily to what he heard, shewing that it was a piece of justice owing by a king more than by any other man to a person accused, to command that a strict enquiry be made into the several articles of impeachment, and till then suspend his judgment. In consequence of this ^d he required that Apelles should be obliged to produce those who were witnesses to the conference, whereof he had been accused, and likewise the person who had given Apelles the information, and that in short nothing ought to be omitted whereby the king might arrive at the certain truth of the matter, before he discovered any thing to the assembly. The king thought Aratus's request very just and reasonable, and engaged his royal word that he should be gratified in it. Not long after Amphidamus being suspected by the Eleans to favour the king's party was obliged to fly his country, and retire to Dymas, whither the king was come to settle some affairs. Aratus laid hold of this opportunity, and begged the king that he himself would examine Amphidamus, since the secret was said to have been ^e imparted to him. He complied with his request, and upon a strict examination found that there was not the least grounds for the charge. Accordingly Aratus was pronounced innocent, and restored to the king's favour and confidence ^f.

As Philip began to want both money and provisions for his army, he prevailed upon the Achaean magistrates, by means of Aratus, to convene a general assembly at Sicyon, where on the report he made of the state of his exchequer, and of the urgent want he was in of money to maintain his forces, it was decreed that the instant his troops should set out on their march, fifty talents should be advanced to the king, with ten thousand measures of wheat; and that afterwards so long as he should carry on the war in person in Peloponnesus, he should receive fifteen talents a month. ^f This renewed his esteem for Aratus, to whom he was indebted for so large a supply, as he himself acknowledged in a private conference which he had both with the father and the son after the council was dismissed. On this occasion he imputed all that had passed to the artifices of Apelles, begging them to forget their wrongs, and continue to him their affection in the same degree as heretofore, since he considered them now more than ever ^g.

AND now the armies beginning to move from their winter quarters, it was resolved to prosecute the war likewise by sea, in order to divide the ene-

^a Idem, ibid p. 344, 349.

^e Idem, l. v. p. 350.

a mies forces, and be able to carry their arms with more ease whithersoever they should judge it most expedient, for they had to do at once with the Ætolians, Lacedæmonians, and Eleans. Pursuant to this resolution the king ordered the fleet, both his own and the Achaean ships to rendezvous at the port of Lechaëum, where he commanded the Macedonian phalanx to be instructed in the use of the oar.

WHILE Philip was thus employed in training up his Macedonians for naval expeditions, Apelles, who could not brook the diminution of his credit with the king, nor suffer that the counsels of Aratus should be followed, and not his, took secret measures to defeat all the king's designs. He agreed with Leontius and Megaleas two chief officers who were to act in the army, that they should secretly thwart and obstruct all his measures, while he making his abode at Chalcis, should take care to shorten and retard his supplies, so that he should be obliged for want of money and provisions to pass the whole summer in a state of inactivity. His view was to make himself necessary to his sovereign, and to force him by the ill posture of his affairs to throw himself into his arms. With this prospect he acted his own part so well, that by stopping the convoys of money and provisions that were sending to the king, he reduced him to such straits that he was obliged to pawn all his plate to supply his wants.

Philip thinking his Macedonians now sufficiently instructed in the use of the oar, embarked with six thousand of them, and twelve hundred mercenaries, steering c his course towards Patra, where he arrived the next day. From Patra he dispatched messengers to the Epirots, Messenians, Acarnanians, and Scardilaidas, requiring them to hasten with their ships and join him at Cephalenia. He then left Patra and came to Paleis a strong city in the island of Cephalenia. Here finding plenty of corn on the ground to maintain his army, he disembarked and set down before the place drawing his vessels ashore, and securing them with a good ditch and pallisadoe. He had appointed the confederates to meet him at this place, and was mighty desirous to become master of it before their arrival. It was of great use to the Ætolians, who from thence made all their descents in Peloponnesus, and plundered the coasts of Epirus and Acarnania. Philip therefore having viewed the situation of the town, caused the d military engines to be planted before it, ordering his Macedonians to undermine the walls. They went cheerfully to work, and in a very short time undermined great part of the wall, propping and supporting it with great wooden stakes. The king then summoned the town to surrender, which the garison refusing to do, fire was set to the posts that sustained the walls, and a breach made six hundred fathoms wide. Leontius was ordered to mount the breach, and enter the town over the ruins of the wall. But he, mindful of his agreement with Apelles, having corrupted some of the chief officers that served under him, attacked the enemy so faintly, that he was repulsed with great loss, when he had the fairest opportunity that could be wished for of taking the town. This obliged the king to raise the siege, though he e was joined by the Epirots, Acarnanians, Messenians, and by fifteen vessels sent him by Scardelaidas†.

WHILE Philip was thus employed at the siege of Paleis, Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian marched at the head of a numerous army into the territories of Messenia, and Dorimachus the Ætolian with a strong detachment into Thessaly, both with the same design of obliging the king by this double diversion to break up the siege. Whereupon ambassadors were dispatched to him from the Acarnanians and Messenians, the former advising him to make an inroad into Ætolia, and thereby oblige Dorimachus to return to the defence of his own country; and the latter entreating him to sail directly to Messenia, where he might easily surprize Lycurgus, who was not under f any apprehension of being attacked. Leontius strongly seconded this advice, foreseeing that if the king followed it he would be obliged to spend the whole summer there, while the Ætolians would be at liberty to put all to fire and sword in Thessaly and Epirus; for during the season of the Etesian winds which continued most part of the summer, it was impossible to return back, as they were not in those days very expert mariners. Aratus therefore did not fail to declare in favour of the former opinion, shewing how advantageous it would be to fall on the Ætolians, while their country was unfurnished with troops, and adding that the opportunity of making descents was not to be neglected now, that Dorimachus with the Ætolian troops was employed elsewhere. The king, who ever since the cowardly behaviour of Leontius at Paleis began to suspect his fidelity, followed the advice of Aratus, and having wrote to Eperatus the Achaean prætor to assemble his troops and march to the relief of the Messenians, he himself weighed anchor, and arrived the next day at Leucas. There he landed his forces, and having caused his vessels to be carried over the isthmus of Dioryetus, he passed into the gulph of Ambracia, which runs far up into Ætolia, and came before day-break to Lemnæa. Here he commanded the soldiers to take a short refreshment, and to be in a readiness to march without any baggage, but what was absolutely necessary. While the king was on the point of setting out from Lemnæa, Aristopontes, the Acarnanian general, came to join him with all his forces; for that people, having been great sufferers by the *Ætoli*ans, greedily embraced so fair an opportunity of repaying them in their own coin; and on this occasion not only such as were obliged by their laws to bear arms, but even those who were exempted in regard of their age or long services, took the field. The Epirats incited by the like motives were not less forward, though by reason of the extent of their country, and the sudden arrival of king Philip, they had not been able to draw all their forces together. The king being thus reinforced, departed from Lemnæa in the close of the evening, leaving the baggage under a strong guard, and arrived by day-break at the river Acbelous, intending to surprize the important town of Thermæ. Leontius foreseeing that this enterprize would be attended in all likelihood with success, advised the king to encamp on the banks of the Acbelous, and allow the army some rest after so fatiguing a night's march, being willing that the *Ætoli*ans should have some time to bethink themselves and provide for their defence. But Aratus, being now sensible that Leontius opposed all promising designs, pressed Philip by no means to consent to any delay, nor upon any reason whatsoever respite his march, the success whereof lay in dispatch. The king followed his advice, and setting out that instant, marched directly to Thermæ through a very rugged and almost impracticable road, cut between two steep rocks, and exceeding narrow. Thermæ was the capital of Ætolia, and the place where their yearly assemblies and fares were held. As it was reckoned impregnable by reason of its situation, and no enemy had ever before dared to approach it, the *Ætoli*ans had lodged in it all their most valuable effects. So great therefore was their surprize when they saw Philip all on a sudden appear before it, that they had not so much presence of mind as to shut the gates, or make the least resistance. The Macedonians and allies were permitted to plunder the town, which abounded with all sorts of provisions, military stores, and valuable moveables. The army remained that night in the town, and the next morning every one chusing out of the booty what was most valuable and easy to be carried away, they made a heap of the rest and burnt it before the camp. They likewise saved the best arms which were found in their armories, exchanging them with such of their own as were less serviceable, and burning the rest to the number of fifteen thousand suits.

† Idem, ibid. p. 350, 365.

Thermæ the metropolis of Ætolia surprized and plundered.

THE Macedonians did not stop here; but calling to mind what the *Ætoli*ans had done at Dium and Dodona, they set fire to the portico's of the temple, and levelled that magnificent structure with the ground, throwing down, defacing and breaking in pieces to the number of two thousand statues of exquisite workmanship, and at that time greatly esteemed even in Greece. They respected however such as were known either by their form, or the inscription to represent any of the gods. The desolation was such as to strike the king himself and those about him with a kind of terror, though at the same time they believed that they had not over-acted their revenge for the sacrilegious impieties of the *Ætoli*ans at Dium.

Philip having plundered the town marched back the same way he came; the booty he placed in the van guarded by his heavy-armed troops; the Acarnanians and mercenaries were posted in the rear, and the king himself with a body of light-armed Macedonians ready to face the enemy in what part soever they should appear; for he was extremely solicitous to pass the straits before the *Ætoli*ans could draw together a body of troops to oppose his passage. But he had scarce begun his march when three thousand *Ætoli*ans, headed by Alexander the Trichonian, fell on his rear, and put them in great confusion. This Philip had foreseen, and accordingly placed a detachment of Illyrians in ambush behind a rising ground. These unexpectedly apa peering, fell on the enemy, who had charged beyond them, and having killed about a hundred of them, and taken as many prisoners, obliged the rest to save themselves by flight among the rocks and woods. He was again attacked near Stratus, but having repulsed the enemy with great courage and resolution, he arrived safe and unmolested at Lemnæa, where he had left his baggage and vessels. Here he sacrificed to the gods by way of thanksgiving for the success that had attended his arms in that expedition, and at the same to express his joy gave his officers a royal entertainment. Leontius and Megaleas were present, but every one soon perceived by their behaviour, that they looked with an evil eye on the good fortune of their master. During the whole entertainment they could not help throwing out against Aratus b the most injurious and shocking raileries. But words were not all; at the breaking up of the banquet, being heated with wine, and fired with anger, they pursued him with stones till he got into his tent. This put the whole army in an uproar, not only the Achaëans, but the Macedonians themselves running from all quarters to his assistance. The noise soon reached the king's ears, who after a strict enquiry into the whole affair, condemned Megaleas, for Leontius absconded, in a fine of twenty talents, and put him under arrest. The next day he sent for Aratus, and after expressing his sense of the violence that had been offered him, he gave him new assurances of his protection. Leontius in the mean time being informed how the king had proceeded with Megaleas, came boldly with a crowd of soldiers to the royal c tent, thinking thereby, as the prince was but young, to put him into some apprehension, and awe him into another resolution touching the offenders. Being come into the king's presence, Who has been so bold, says he, as to lay hands on Megaleas? It was I, replied the king in a majestic tone, and whatever has been done is by my express command. This resolution in the king so frightened Leontius, that he immediately retired from his presence. He no sooner withdrew, but the king called a council to examine into the affair, and hear what was alledged against Leontius, Megaleas, and their accomplices. Aratus charged them with all those criminal practices we have already taken notice of, and discovered the whole conspiracy of Aetles. As he urged nothing against them but what was vouched by competent witnesses, they were d all found guilty. The king however by an unseasonable clemency, pardoned them, and even set Megaleas at liberty, Leontius binding himself for the payment of the fine the king had laid on him^b.

DURING Philip's expedition into Ætolia, Lycurgus king of Sparta made an inroad into the territories of the Messenians, but did nothing worth recording. Dorimachus likewise, who had led a considerable body of Ætolians into Thessaly with a design to lay waste the country, and thereby oblige the king to raise the siege of Pakis, returned without compassing either, having found the Thessalians ready to give him a warm reception. He therefore kept on the mountains till he heard that the Macedonians had invaded Ætolia, when he left Thessaly and hastened to the relief of his own e country. But before he arrived the king was retired^f.

IN the mean time Philip having embarked his troops at Leucas, and plundered the coast of Hyanthes in his way, arrived at Corinth, where landing his forces, and ordering the vessels to be carried over to Lachæum, he dispatched messengers to the confederate towns of Peloponnesus, appointing them to rendezvous their troops at Tegæa. He then marched from Corinth, and came the next day to Tegæa, whence he proceeded with such of the Achaean horse as were there ready, holding his rout over the mountains with a design to fall by surprize on the Lacedæmonian territories. After four days march through a desert country, he gained the top of those bills that command the city of Sparta, and thence advanced to Amycla, a town distant f from Sparta about four miles. The Spartans, who had heard of the success he met with at Thermæ, were strangely alarmed when they saw the young monarch appear so suddenly in their territories, and approaching to the very gates of their metropolis. Several skirmishes were fought, in which Philip was always victorious; but we shall omit the particulars, which would swell the history to an undue length, and only say, that this expedition proved no less glorious to the king's arms than that of Ætolia; for he laid waste the enemy's country far and near, took and destroyed several towns, beat Lycurgus, who with a body of two thousand Lacedæmonians had attempted to cut off his retreat, and returned with an immense booty to Corinth.

The confederates enter the country of the Lacedæmonians.

^b POLYB. ubi supra, p. 368, 376. PLUT. in Ant. p. 1049.

^f Idem, p. 372.

Here he found ambassadors from Rhodes and Cbios, who came to offer their mediation, and incline both parties to a peace. The king dissembling his real intention, told them that he was willing to conclude a peace with the Ætolians on reasonable terms, and charged them on their return to dispose his enemies to it. The king at that time had formed a project of making a descent on the territories of the Phocians, and executing there an enterprize of great importance. Having therefore dismissed the ambassadors, he hastened to Leontium, proposing to embarque his troops there.

Leontius, Megaleas, and Ptolemy raise a tumult among the troops.

BUT he was scarce gone when Leontius, Megaleas, and Ptolemy, who was also one of Philip's chief officers, began to employ the authority they had over the forces that remained at Corinth, to draw off their affections from their prince, and win them over to their own interest. They represented to them, chiefly to the light-armed troops, and the king's guards, that they, who were the first in all hazards, and secured the rest of the army from all danger, were not treated according to their merit, and that instead of being distinguished by any particular reward for their service, they had been even deprived of the booty which they had taken; notwithstanding the constant custom in like cases to the contrary. The soldiers, especially the youth, were so inflamed by these seditious discourses, that assembling in parties they plundered the houses of the king's chief favourites, and carried their insolence to that height as to force the gates of the king's own palace. The king receiving timely notice of the tumult, flew to Corinth, and assembling the Macedonians, made them sensible of their fault in a long harangue intermixed with gentleness and severity. The tumult being appeased, some advised the king to seize on the authors of the sedition, and punish them with the utmost severity; others thought it more adviseable to gain them by gentle methods, the king being still young, and his authority not yet entirely fixed in the minds of the people. This advice he followed for the present, stifling his resentment, and pretending to be very well satisfied, he returned to Lacbaum after exhorting his troops to union and concord. But it was now too late to undertake any thing against the Phocians, who had drawn together their forces, and were prepared to receive him.

IN the mean time Leontius being well apprised that the king, though he carried it very fair with him as to outward appearance, would not fail in due time to vent his just resentment upon him, had recourse to Apelles, giving him notice of the danger he was in, and pressing him to leave Cbalcis, and hasten to court. Philip had been informed by Aratus of the whole conduct of Apelles, but had kept his thoughts so close, that no body could discover from his behaviour any change in him with respect to his prime minister, who continued to govern at Cbalcis more like a sovereign prince than a subject (H). He therefore no sooner heard of the danger his client was in, but he left Cbalcis, not doubting but he should be received at court after the usual manner, and change the king's mind at his pleasure. As he drew near to Corinth, Leontius, Megaleas, and Ptolemy, who were the chief officers in the army, prevailed by their authority on the flower of the king's forces to meet him and attend him by way of guard into the town; so that he made his entry with a pompous train, and went directly to wait on the king. But the officer who was on duty at the gate of the royal palace, and had received orders to that effect, stopped him and told him that he must wait, for the king was not then at leisure. Apelles was thunder-struck at so unexpected a reception, and after having waited some time in silence retired to his lodgings attended only by his own domestics, all the rest having already deserted him (I). Megaleas seeing the prime minister, on whose protection he relied, fallen into disgrace, made his escape to Athens, leaving Leontius, who was his surety for the sum of twenty talents, to shift for himself. Here-

Apelles how received by Philip.

(H) Apelles during his residence at Cbalcis governed all things with an arbitrary sway, as if he, and not Philip, had been invested with the sovereign power. Wherefore the magistrates, and such as had charge of the affairs in Macedon and Thessaly, applied to him alone, and took his directions in all matters of importance. When any of the Greek towns had occasion to publish new laws or ordinances, or confer honours or preferments, there was scarce ever any mention made of the king, but of Apelles (5.)

(I) Behold the uncertain state of mortal greatness, says our author; in one and the same moment men are raised to the highest preferments, and sunk to the lowest ebb of fortune; and this chiefly in the courts of princes, where, like counters, their value rises and falls according to the place they are set in; for those, who follow the court, are great and little at the pleasure of their master, who carries their fortune in his hands (6).

(5) Idem, l. v. p. 350, & seq.

(6) Idem, ibid. p. 351.

a upon the king having sent the buckler-men, whose chief officer was Leontius, to Tripbalia, under the command of Taurion, pretending to have some extraordinary occasion for their service, caused Leontius to be accused, giving out that it was for the payment of the twenty talents which he was bound for, but in reality to have him in his power, and to sound the disposition of the soldiery. The troops which he commanded no sooner received notice of his arrest, but they sent a petition to the king, importing, that if the commitment of Leontius was on any other account than that of his being surety for Megaleas, the king would be pleased not to determine any thing against him during their absence; and that they should interpret any sentence in his prejudice as an injury done to them, and resent it accordingly; but in case Leontius was under arrest to secure the payment of the money due on account of Megaleas, they would readily contribute towards satisfying the debt. But their affection shewn to Leontius proved unseasonable, and was taken by the king so ill, that it became the occasion of his death sooner than was expected^a.

Leontius arrested.

DURING this interval the ambassadors returned from Ætolia, bringing with them proposals for a truce of thirty days; they assured the king that the Ætolians were inclined to peace, and that they had appointed a day for their general assembly to meet at Rhium, where they prayed the king to be present, promising all the advances possible on their part towards a general pacification. Philip accepted of the truce, and sent his dispatches to the confederates, requiring them to send their respective deputies to Patra to negotiate a peace with the Ætolians. He himself immediately set out from Lechaum in order to assist at it, and arrived the next day at Patra. There letters were delivered to him directed by Megaleas to the Ætolians, encouraging them to pursue the war against Philip and the Achaëans, since the king was in the utmost distress for want of money and provisions. They contained likewise most reproachful and injurious reflections on the king, which shewed his hatred to him, and convinced him that the whole faction of Apelles sought his destruction. He therefore ordered him immediately to be taken into custody together with his son and a youth his favourite, and so sent to Corinth. At the same time he enjoined the magistrates of Thebes to prosecute Megaleas, who had retired thither from Athens; but he prevented his trial by laying violent hands on himself. Not long after Leontius received sentence of death, and likewise Apelles with his son and favourite. History can scarce furnish us with a more remarkable example of the ascendancy which a favourite may gain over the mind of his sovereign, in order to satiate with impunity his avarice and ambition. It was with the utmost difficulty that Aratus roused the king from his irresolution and servitude, and prevailed upon him at last to exert himself after he had been so long deaf to the repeated complaints of his subjects, and blind to all the faults of his favourite minister^b.

A thirty days truce granted to the Ætolians.

Megaleas lays violent hands on himself. Leontius and Apelles put to death.

As to the Ætolians they were sincerely disposed to peace, being grown weary of a war, in which all their projects had succeeded quite otherwise than they expected. They had flattered themselves that they had to do with a young unexperienced prince, Philip not being yet arrived, as they imagined, at an age of conduct and experience; but they found him an able and enterprising leader, and well qualified both for counsel and execution. However, when they came to hear of the mutiny of the troops, and the conspiracy of Apelles, hoping these troubles would beget distractions at court, they postponed their meeting at Rhium. Philip and the confederates, who had a hopeful prospect of the issue of the war, and wished for nothing more ardently than to break off all negotiations of peace, were glad of the opportunity which the enemy furnished them with, and accordingly animated each other to the prosecution of the war. As winter was drawing near, Philip after engaging the allies to meet him with their forces early in the spring, weighed anchor and returned to Corinth. There he gave the Macedonians leave to return to their winter quarters in their own country; while he coasting Attica went to Demetrias in Thessaly, where Ptolomy, the only conspirator that remained, was sentenced to die, and executed accordingly.

The confederates resolve to pursue the war.

By this time Eperatus, who had been chosen prætor of the Achaëans by the influence of Apelles, as we have related above, was become universally despised, as being no ways qualified for that trust, which is commonly the case in forced elections. No one would pay obedience to his orders, and the country being open and defenceless, great havock was made in it by Pyrrhias at the head of three thousand Eleans and Ætolians. The Achæan troops being in arrear of their pay, refused to obey the prætor's orders when at any time they were commanded to march out to the relief of the country, and deserted in great numbers. All this was owing to the insufficiency of Eperatus; but, happily for the Achæans, his authority was almost expired, and early in the summer Aratus appointed to succeed him^a. The new prætor found the Achæan mercenaries corrupted by an universal decay of military discipline, and the cities no ways disposed to contribute towards the carrying on of the war. In the general assembly, after having warmly exhorted their deputies to the prosecution of the war, he wrested from them a decree empowering him to levy eight thousand mercenary foot, and five hundred horse, besides three thousand foot and three hundred horse which were to be raised at home. By the same decree the Megalopolitans were to contribute three hundred foot and fifty horse, and the Argians the like number^b.

^a Idem, p. 373, 374.

^b Idem, ibid. p. 376.

WHILE the Achæans were thus preparing for the prosecution of the war, Lycurgus, and Pyrrhias prætor of the Eleans, taking the field, made an inroad into the territories of the Messenians, but were soon forced to retire by Aratus, who advanced with the mercenaries to cover the frontiers of Messene, Megalopolis, Tegæa, and Argos, which were most exposed to the insults of the Lacedæmonians. Not long after Lycus, whom Aratus had appointed to command the troops while he assisted at the general assembly, gained a considerable victory over the Eleans, who under the conduct of Euripidas their new prætor, had advanced as far as Plaræa plundering and laying waste the whole country. The plunder which he got on this occasion produced a great sum of money; so that the troops took better heart in prospect of better pay, and the people conceived hopes that they should now be exempt from taxes and contributions towards the war.

Thebes of Phthiotis taken
by the confederates.
Year of the
flood 2786.
Before Christ
217.

IN the mean time Philip having ordered such stores and provisions as he had provided during the winter to be brought from Larissa, set out on his march towards Greece, with a design to begin the campaign with the siege of Thebes called Phthiæ (L), whence the Ætolians used to make continual inroads into the territories of Demetrius, Pharfalia, and even Larissa. Accordingly having divided his army into three bodies, he invested the town, and with an hundred and fifty catapults, and other engines for casting of stones, began to batter the walls night and day without intermission. The inhabitants at first made a vigorous resistance; but great numbers of them being killed by the many darts and stones that had been cast into the town, and the rest quite tired out by incessant attacks which kept them continually in action, their resolution began to fail, and the Macedonians advancing their mines, and now preparing to give the assault, they thought fit to surrender at discretion. Philip plundered the town, sold the inhabitants, and re-peopling it with a colony of Macedonians, changed the name of Thebes into that of Philippopolis.

NOT long after the town had surrendered, new ambassadors came to him from Chios, Rhodes, Byzantium, and from Ptolomy king of Egypt, to propose the concluding of a peace. The king replied as he had done before, that he was inclined to put an end to the war, and that they needed but apply to the Ætolians to know whether they were willing to concur with him in restoring Greece to its former tranquillity. Philip was in reality very far from being inclined to a peace; but as he did not care to declare his true intentions, he only told the ambassadors, that in the mean time he was determined to pursue his enterprizes.

HE afterwards set out with his friends and favourites for Argos to be present at the Nemæan games. While he was one day assisting at one of these public sports, he was interrupted by an express sent him from Macedon, with advice that the Romans had lost a great battle in Tuscany near the lake Thrasymenus, and that Hannibal was master of all the open country. This news Philip imparted to none but Demetrius of Pharus, enjoining him all possible secrecy. Demetrius, glad of this opportunity, advised him to put a period to the Ætolian war with what expedition he could, in

^a Idem, p. 377.

^b Idem, p. 378.

(L) This city was situate near the sea about eight and thirty miles distance from Larissa; and was on the frontiers of Magnesia and Thessaly, its territory bordering on Magnesia towards Demetrius, and on Thessaly towards that tract which was inhabited by the Pharfaliens and Pharæans.

a order to invade Illyricum (M), and afterwards cross over into Italy. He added that such a design would gain him the affections of the whole Greek nation, that the Achaens would join him out of the affection they bore him, and the Ætolians through fear after the calamities they had suffered in the present war; that such an expedition would be his first step to universal monarchy, which none had a better claim to than himself; and that the present distress of the Romans offered him a favourable opportunity of executing so mighty a project. Such council as this could not but charm a king, who was in the flower of his youth, successful in his exploits, bold, enterprising, and of a race which had always grasped at universal empire.

b HOWEVER, as no man could better conceal his real intentions, a very rare quality in so young a prince, he did not shew that strong inclination for peace which he had in reality conceived. He only dispatched letters to the confederates, exhorting them to send their deputies to the assembly to negotiate a peace; and in the mean time the better to hide his inclinations, he advanced with his forces to Losion, and after taking a small fortress which was built on the ruins of that place, he made as if he intended to possess himself of Elea. Both parties were grown so tired of the war, that his summons was received every where with great joy, and plenipotentiaries from all parts hastened to Naupactus which was the place appointed for the conferences. The king, to give a more expeditious issue to the affair, came at the head of his army, and encamping within less than a league of the place, attended there the result of their conferences. The first article which the king caused to be proposed to the Ætolians by the ambassadors of the confederate cities was, that every one should continue in possession of his conquests; which article being agreed upon, the rest met with no difficulty, so that the treaty was soon concluded and ratified by Philip and the Achaens on one side, and the Ætolians, Lacedæmonians, and Eleans on the other.^o c AT the first opening of the assembly, Agelas of Naupactus made a speech before the king and the confederates, which deserves a place here, since Polybius has thought it worthy of relating at length in his history. He told them, that the Greeks ought above all things to shun all occasions of war among themselves, and render thanks to the gods, that, becoming now of one mind, and leading each other, as it were, by the hand, like those who ford a river, they had a prospect of uniting in a mutual defence of themselves and their cities against the barbarians, whose designs they had so much cause to apprehend. That though they could not give perpetuity to the present union, it behoved them at least in that juncture to agree as one man in the preservation of their liberties, since none could be ignorant of the great power of the barbarians, and the mighty war they were like to have on their hands with that people. That it was evident to every one who was ever so little skilled in politics, that the conquerors, whether Carthaginians or Romans, would not confine themselves to the empire of Italy or Sicily, but extend their conquest further, even to Greece itself. Wherefore he exhorted them, especially Philip, to keep a watchful eye on the danger that threatened them; saying, that this prince would be able to avert it, if, instead of impairing the strength of the Greeks as he had hitherto done, and rendering them by that means an easier prey to their enemies, he would now take their affairs to heart, and act for the whole Greek nation as if Greece were his inheritance. That by this means he would win the affection of the Greeks, who would be inviolably attached to him, and concur in all his measures. That if his mind was bent on great enterprizes, and he thirsted after glory, he should extend his prospect towards the west, and keep an eye on the war which had set all Italy in a flame; that he should watch the event of it, improve it to his advantage, and generously aspire to the dominion of the world. That if he had any disputes with the Greeks, he should leave the decision of them to another season; for if he once suffered the storm, that was gathering in the west, to reach Greece, it might justly be feared, that it

^o POLYB. ibid. p. 435.

(M) Scerdilaidas, a petty king of Illyria, whom we have mentioned above, thinking himself ill treated by Philip, who had not yet paid him the money that was due to him according to the treaty agreed on by both parties, fitted out a squadron with orders to take by reprisal what was due by agreement. This squadron being admitted into the port of Leucas, for Scerdilaidas was in alliance with the Achaens, seized there some Macedonian vessels, and sent them together with the Macedonians that were aboard into Illyricum. From thence they sailed to Malea, taking all the king's vessels they could meet with. A war with this prince Demetrius thought would prove very favourable to his present project.

would

would then no longer be in their power to make war, conclude a peace, or manage a their affairs as they pleased.

A peace concluded.

THIS speech, which was a clear prediction of what happened afterwards to Greece, inspired both the confederates and Philip with an eager desire of peace. And this is the first time that the affairs of Italy influenced those of Greece. For after this neither Philip, nor the other powers of Greece, regulated their conduct from the state of their respective neighbours, but kept their eyes fixed on Italy as the only object of their attention. The Asiatics, and the inhabitants of the islands did the same soon after, having no more recourse in their disputes to Antiochus or Ptolemy, to southern or eastern princes, but turning their eyes westward, and sending ambassadors, some to the Carthaginians, others to the Romans. In like manner the Romans, awakened by the growing power and enterprising genius of Philip, dispatched ambassadors into Greece, to obviate betimes the dangers that threatened them from that quarter, as will be seen in the sequel of this history ^p.

AS SOON as the peace was ratified, the Achaëans raised Timoxenus to the prætorship, and then returned to their ancient manner and custom of life, after having re-edified the walls of their cities, rebuilt their temples and altars, established their worship, and repaired the public and private damages which they had sustained during the war.

Philip changes his conduct.

BUT this happy state of tranquillity was soon disturbed by that very prince who had procured it. Philip having concluded an alliance with Hannibal, began to change c his conduct, and thinking it necessary to bring all Greece to an absolute subjection before he made any attempts upon Italy, he began with the Messenians, who had been lately admitted into the Achaëan confederacy. The city of Messene was at this time rent into two factions, the nobility striving to humble the people, and the people to lessen the power of the nobility. These contentions became so violent, that both factions agreed to call in Philip, and refer their differences to his arbitration. The ambitious prince was glad of this opportunity, and flew to Messene with a design to make himself master of the city. On his arrival he found Aratus employing his best endeavours to compose their differences in a manner that no ways suited his private ends. He therefore did not think fit to advise with him, but held private conferences with such of the Messenians as resorted to his palace. The nobility he encouraged to curb the insolence of the unruly rabble with the utmost severity of the laws; but used a quite different stile in talking with the heads of the popular faction, telling them that they were to blame for suffering themselves, being so many, to be oppressed by a few, as if they had no hands to defend themselves against tyrants. Thus both parties, presuming on the king's assistance, thought it advisable to exert themselves before he was gone, since he seemed so well disposed to countenance them. Accordingly the nobility gave orders for the apprehending of some orators, who stirred up, said they, the people to sedition; this alarmed the populace, who falling upon the nobility, murdered in their rage above two hundred of them. This was what Philip had proposed from the very beginning, being well apprised, that if one party were destroyed, it would be no hard task for him to get the better of the other. Neither did Aratus the younger forbear reproaching him with it in very bitter and offensive terms. But the king, who on such occasions had a marvelous command of his temper, smothered his resentment, and taking Aratus the elder by the hand, he asked him whether he would not attend him up to the castle of Ithome, where he intended to sacrifice. This castle commanded the city of Messene, and kept the further parts of Peloponnesus in awe, as Acro-Corinth, which he was already possessed of, did the hither. Ithome was held by some of the popular faction, who looking upon Philip as their deliverer, admitted him without the least jealousy. f While the sacrifice was performing, the entrails of the victim being, according to custom, put into his hands, he shewed them to Aratus, and with a smile asked him, whether they prognosticated, that being now in possession of so important a place, he should tamely part with it, or rather keep it for his own use. Aratus made no reply, but Demetrius Pharius, though the king had not asked his advice, gave this officious answer: If you are a soothsayer you must quietly be gone from hence; but if you are a king you must not let slip so fair an opportunity, but hold the ox fast by both his horns; alluding thereby to Ithome and Acro-Corinth, which Disturbances at Messene.

^p Idem, ibid. p. 436, 437.

- a were called the two horns of Peloponnesus. The king however would have Aratus by all means to give his opinion, who told him, that if the place could be kept without breach of faith, he would do well to keep it; but if by seizing of Ibome he must lose the strongest castle he had, his credit, he thought it far more advisable to deliver it up to its owners. This advice Philip followed for the present, but ever Aratus retired after maintained a private grudge against Aratus, which he perceiving, retired from Philip's court, and led a private life at Sicyon, where he had leisure to repent his ever calling the Macedonians into Peloponnesus. Philip having now got rid of so troublesome a censor, marched his forces into Epirus, where he seized on the town of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia, which he was soon forced to raise in a most shameful manner, his camp being surprized by the Roman prætor Lævinus, and he forced to make his escape half naked. After this disappointment he returned to Peloponnesus, not having yet laid aside the thoughts of subjecting the Messenians. But they being now on their guard, refused to admit him into their city; whereupon calling them his enemies, he laid waste the whole country, and retired without being able to reduce the city, the Achæans, who were his confederates, refusing to lend him any help for such an enterprize; for Messenæ, as we have observed above, was at that time a member of the Achæan body. This backwardness of his confederates he ascribed to Aratus, and therefore as he did not now scruple to commit the most heinous crimes, he resolved to sacrifice both the father and son to his resentment. He dared not employ open force and violence in regard of their great reputation, and the respect which was universally paid to their virtue, and therefore charged Taurion, one of his officers, to dispatch first the elder Aratus secretly during his absence. Taurion obeyed the wicked command, though not without some reluctance; he insinuated himself into Aratus's friendship, and often invited him to dinner, which gave him an opportunity of poisoning him with a poison which was sure, but slow in its operation. Aratus was not ignorant of the cause of the lingering distemper which he fell into; but reflecting that complaints would only stir up the Achæans against him, and create new disturbances, he bore it patiently as if it had been a common and natural disease. One day only happening to spit blood before one Cephalion, who was his bosom friend, and seemed somewhat surprized, he said, Behold, my dear Cephalion, the effect of friendship with kings. This brought him to his end in Ægium, being then in the fifty-seventh year of his age, and prætor of the Achæans the seventeenth time. The Achæans were for burying him in the place where he died; but the Sicyonians claimed this honour as due to the place where he was born. Accordingly changing their grief into mirth, they went crowned with chaplets of flowers, and clad in white robes, to bring the body of their deceased hero to Sicyon, dancing before it, and singing hymns and odes in commendation of his eminent virtues, and exalted qualities. He was interred with the utmost pomp and solemnity in the highest part of the city, which was ever after called Aratium. The Achæans decreed that divine honours should be paid him, and appointed a priest for that purpose. Plutarch tells us, that in his time two solemn sacrifices were still offered him annually; the first on the day that he freed the city from the yoke of tyranny, and this sacrifice was called Soteria, the other on his birth-day. During the sacrifice the young men and children walked round the altar singing odes to the lyre in honour of their deliverer, and the senate crowned with garlands of flowers followed the procession. To this they are said to have been encouraged by an oracle of Apollo.
- Aratus* was without all doubt one of the greatest men of his time, and may justly be styled one of the founders of the Achæan republic, he having brought it to that form and splendor by which it became one of the most powerful states of Greece.
- f However, his talent lay more in contriving a warlike stratagem, in forming and projecting extraordinary enterprizes, than in executing them. In his administration he was guilty of one very great error, which was the calling in the kings of Macedon to the assistance of the republic, an expedient which no well-wisher to his country could approve of, and was the more dishonourable in him as he was prompted to it out of jealousy to Cleomenes king of Sparta. For that prince after having reduced the Achæans to the last extremity was willing to restore them their prisoners, and all the places he had taken, on condition they would create him prætor of Achaia. The Achæans were inclined to accept of a peace on these terms: But Aratus thinking it would be very dishonourable for him, who had bore for many years the chief sway a in the republic, to be thus supplanted by a young man, used his utmost efforts to dissuade the Achæans from yielding to the conditions proposed by Cleomenes; and because they could no longer hold out against that warlike prince with their own strength, he had recourse to Antigonus king of Macedon, put him into possession of Acro-Corinth, and thereby enabled him and his successors to manage the affairs of Greece at their pleasure¹. But for this he atoned both with his own death, and with that of his son, which was more deplorable; for Philip growing compleatly wicked, as Plutarch expresses it, commanded a kind of poison to be given him, which deprived him of his understanding, and prompted him to commit such abominable actions as would have reflected eternal ignominy on his name, had they been b done deliberately, and while he was in his senses; insomuch that though he was then in the flower of his age, his death was looked upon not as a misfortune, but as the greatest blessing that could befall himself and his family².

Philip causes him to be poisoned.
Year of the flood 2787.
Before Christ 216.

New troubles
in Greece.
Year of the
flood 2792.
Before Christ
211.

The Ætolians
defeated.

THESE inhuman and tyrannical proceedings in Philip highly incensed the Achæans against him, as he afterwards found by experience when they were more at liberty to act as they pleased. At present they were not in a condition to support themselves without him, the Ætolians, their irreconcilable enemies, having entered into an alliance with the Romans against the king and his confederates. The main article of this new alliance was, that the conquests should belong to the allies, but the booty and slaves to the Romans. Their calling in thus the Barbarians, for so the Greeks c styled all nations except their own, provoked them more against the Ætolians, than all the mischief Philip had done them. Wherefore they resolved in their general assembly to join the king against the Ætolians and their confederates. Thus a new war was kindled in Greece, between Philip and the Achæans on one side, and the Romans, Ætolians, Lacedæmonians, Eleans, king Attalus, and Scerdilaidas on the other. The Ætolians immediately began hostilities, invading and laying waste the Achæan territories. Whereupon the Achæans dispatched deputies to Philip, who was then in Thrace, imploring his assistance. Philip readily complied with their request; but the Ætolians being joined by some Romans, and the forces which Attalus had brought with him out of Asia, marched out to meet him before his con- d junction with the Achæans. Both armies met near Lamia, a city of Thessaly. The Ætolians were commanded by Pyrrhus, who had been that year appointed their general in conjunction with king Attalus. Philip proffered him battle, and he thinking it would be disreputable in him to decline it the very first year of his command, rashly engaged, and was entirely defeated. However, to retrieve his reputation, he gathered together the scattered remains of his army, in hopes of performing some worthy action before the end of the campaign. But Philip attacked him the second time, cut most of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest to shut themselves up in Lamia. This double overthrow so disheartened the Ætolians, that they sent embassadors to treat of a peace with Philip and the Achæans; for the Romans after e having put the Ætolians in motion were retired to Corcyra, fully persuaded that the king had so much business upon his hands at home, that he could not have time to think of Italy or Hannibal. Philip put off the negotiations of peace till the next assembly of the Achæans, and in the mean time granted the Ætolians a truce of thirty days. When the assembly met, the Ætolian embassadors being introduced made such unreasonable proposals as took away all hopes of an accommodation. Whereupon Philip and the Achæans being resolved to pursue the war at all events, began to make greater preparations than ever, having so many enemies to oppose at the same time. The king leaving four thousand men with the Achæans to defend their country, went to assist at the Nemæan games in the city of Argos, and from thence f returning into Achaia, marched in conjunction with Cycliadus the Achæan prætor against the city of Elis, which had received an Ætolian garison. After they had plundered the territory, they advanced in battle-array to the very gates of the city, hoping thereby to draw the Ætolians to an engagement. Accordingly they sallied out, when Philip was greatly surprized to find that the garison partly consisted of Romans. For Sulpitius having left Naupactus with fifteen gallies, and landed four thousand men, had entered the city the night before the engagement. The fight was very bloody, and many fell on both sides. In the heat of the combat Damo-

¹ Plut. in Cleom. & Arist.

² Plut. ibid.

- a phantes, general of the Elean horse, spying Philopæmen, who commanded that of the Achæans, advanced against him with great ardor and fury. The latter waited for him without stirring from his post, and having unhorsed him at the first encounter, fell upon the enemy's cavalry with such resolution, that they quickly betook themselves to flight. But the Romans charging the Macedonians with great vigour, the latter began to give way, which Philip observing, spurred on his horse, and rushed headlong into the midst of the Romans, where his horse being wounded threw him. The Macedonians then returned with new vigour to the charge, each party signalizing themselves in a very extraordinary manner, the Romans with a view to take the king prisoner, and the Macedonians to save him. The king was carried off in spite of the utmost efforts of the Romans, and the Macedonians obliged to retire at a greater distance from the town. The next day Philip invested and took a strong hold of the Eleans, where he found a great booty consisting of twenty thousand head of cattle, besides four thousand Eleans whom he sold for slaves. This made amends for his disappointment at Elis: But in the mean time news was brought him that the Dardaniens had made an incursion into Macedon; whereupon he immediately set out to defend his own country, leaving with the Achæans a body of two thousand five hundred men. At the same time Sulpitius sailed back with his fleet to Ægina, where he joined king Attalus, and passed the winter. During the king's absence the Achæans gained a considerable victory over the Ætolians and Eleans near the city of Messene.

Philopæmen's gallant behaviour.

EARLY in the spring Sulpitius and Attalus quitting their winter quarters, sailed with their fleets to Lemnos, and thence advanced to Oreum, a chief city of Eubœa, which was treacherously delivered up to them by Plator the Macedonian commander. Attalus laid siege to the city of Opus in Achaia, which Philip having notice of, advanced with incredible diligence to the relief of his allies, having marched upwards of sixty miles in one day. The city had surrendered a little before his arrival, but Attalus the instant he heard of his approach abandoned it, and retired with precipitation to his ships.

*Oreum in Eubœa betrayed to the Romans.
Year of the
flood 2796.
Before Christ
207.*

- WHILE Philip was thus employed against Attalus and the Romans, Machanidas, who had succeeded Lycurgus tyrant of Lacedæmon, advanced at the head of a powerful army to the borders of Achaia with a design to lay waste the country, and by that means oblige Philip to leave the enemy and relieve his allies. He could not have chose a more improper season for such an expedition; for Philopæmen had been that year appointed for the first time commander in chief of the Achæan forces. As we shall often have occasion to mention this great warrior, it will not be improper to say something here of his extraordinary parts, which rendered him worthy of all those honours that were afterwards heaped upon him by the Achæan republic. He was born in Megalopolis, a city of Arcadia in Peloponnesus, and from his very infancy discovered a strong inclination to the profession of arms. He was nobly educated by Cassander of Mantineæ, a man of great probity, and uncommon abilities. He was no sooner able to bear arms but he entered among the troops, which the city of Megalopolis sent to make incursions into Laconia, and in these inroads never failed to give some remarkable instance of his prudence and valour. When there were no troops in the field, he used to employ his leisure in hunting, and such other manly exercises. Thus he spent his time till he attained the thirtieth year of his age, when Cleomenes king of Sparta attacked Megalopolis. We have seen what courage and greatness of soul he displayed on that occasion. He signalized himself no less some time after in the battle of Selasia, where Antigonus gained a complete victory over Cleomenes. Antigonus, who had been an eye-witness of his prudent and gallant behaviour, made him very advantageous offers to gain him over to his interest. But he rejected them with scorn, having an utter aversion to a court life, which he compared to that of a slave, saying that a courtier was but a slave of a better condition. As he could not live idle and unactive, he went over to the isle of Crete, which was then engaged in war, and served there as a volunteer till he acquired a complete knowledge of the military art; for the inhabitants of that island were in those days accounted excellent warriors, being scarce ever at peace among themselves. Philopæmen having served some years among the troops of that island returned home, and was upon his arrival appointed general of the horse,

*Philopæmen appointed prætor of the Achæans.
His character.*

¹ POLYB. lib. x. p. 612, & seq. LIV. lib. xxvii. n. 39. 33. PLUT. in Philop.

² LIV. ibid.

He defeats Machanidas tyrant of Sparta.
Year of the
flood 2797.
Before Christ
206.

Philopæmen
kills Macha-
nidas.

in which command he behaved so well, that the Achaean horse, heretofore of no reputation, became in a short time famous all over Greece. He was soon after appointed general of all the Achaean forces, when he applied himself in good earnest to the re-establishing of military discipline among the troops of the republic, which he found in a very poor condition, and universally despised by their neighbours. Aratus indeed was the first that raised the Achaean state to that pitch of power and glory to which it arrived. But the success of his enterprizes was not so much owing to his courage and intrepidity, as to his prudence and politics. As he depended on the friendship of foreign princes, and their powerful succours, he neglected the military discipline at home. But the instant Philopæmen was created prætor, or commander in chief, as he was a great captain, he roused the courage of his countrymen, in order to put them in a condition to defend themselves without the assistance of or dependance on foreign princes. With this view he made great improvements in the discipline, changing the manner of their exercise, and likewise their arms, which were both very defective. He had thus for the space of eight months exercised his troops every day, making them perform all the military motions and evolutions, and accustoming them to manage with dexterity their new arms, when news was brought him that Machanidas was advancing at the head of a numerous army to invade Achaia. He was glad of this opportunity to try how the troops had profited by his discipline, and accordingly taking the field, met the enemy in the territories of Mantineæ. Machanidas had brought into the field a vast quantity of military engines to gall the *Achaean*s during the engagement, and disorder their ranks. To prevent this danger, Philopæmen ordered his light-armed troops to advance a great way before the rest of the army, which Machanidas observing, thought proper to send his light-armed foot to make head against them, and observe their motions. Thus the battle began, and each general sending new supplies, the mercenary foot came to a close engagement, being so far advanced before the main bodies of their respective armies, that they could know only by the dust they raised which party advanced, and which gave ground. By this means the engines which Machanidas chiefly relied upon were hindered from doing execution by the interposition of his own men. The first onset was very furious, and the success a long time doubtful, but at last the mercenaries in the tyrant's army prevailed, their numbers, and the skill they had acquired by being so long inured to a military life, giving them the superiority. The Illyrians in Philopæmen's army being but lately come, and not yet well exercised in the use of their arms, could not withstand so furious an onset, and were therefore entirely broke, and obliged to save themselves with the utmost precipitation under the walls of Mantineæ about a mile from the field of battle. Philopæmen was so far from being discouraged at the ill success of the first attack, that turning to those who were about him, The flight of our mercenaries, said he, will give us a complete victory. He observed, that Machanidas instead of making use of this disadvantage, and falling that instant on the main body, suffered himself to be hurried away by the fire and impetuosity of his soldiers in pursuit of those who were flying. He was no sooner out of sight, but Philopæmen advanced against the Lacedæmonians that were drawn up before him. The two armies were parted by a ditch, dry at that time, and therefore easily passable, especially by the foot. The Lacedæmonians, elated with the success of their mercenaries, and despising the *Achaean*s, ventured over the ditch to meet them; but as that put them into some disorder, Philopæmen taking advantage of their confusion, charged them with such vigour that they were drove into the ditch again; which so disordered their ranks, that not being able to make head against the *Achaean*s, who pursued them close and in good order, they betook themselves to flight. Philopæmen, who knew better how to use his victory than Machanidas had done, suffered only a part of his army to pursue the flying enemy; a strong body he kept with himself to guard a bridge that lay over the ditch, knowing that Machanidas must return that way. Accordingly on his return he made directly to the bridge, but was greatly disappointed when he found that the enemies were masters of it, and his own army driven out of the field. However, with a strong body of horse he attempted to make his way through and join the rest of his army; but he met with so warm a reception from Philopæmen, that his horse were at the first onset put to the rout. Machanidas himself attended only by two horsemen rode along the ditch looking for a convenient place to get over. He was easily known by his purple mantle, and the costly trappings of his horse. Philopæmen therefore appointing another to command at the bridge a bridge in his room, followed Mechanidas at a small distance waiting till he should attempt to cross the ditch, which he no sooner did than Philopæmen spurring on his horse attacked him in the ditch, and there slew him with his own hand. His head he struck off, and carried it from rank to rank to encourage his victorious Achæans, who continued the pursuit with great slaughter and incredible ardor to the city of Tegea, which they entered together with the fugitives. The Lacedæmonians lost on this occasion above eight thousand men, of which four thousand were killed on the spot, and as many taken prisoners. The loss of the Achæans was very inconsiderable, and those that fell were mostly mercenaries *.

b THE Achæans to perpetuate the memory of this victory, which was entirely owing to the conduct of their general, cast a brazen statue representing Philopæmen in the same attitude in which he killed the tyrant, and placed it in the temple of Apollo at Delphos.

THIS victory over the Lacedæmonians, and the many advantages gained by Philip over the Ætolians, inclined the Ætolian faction to sue for a peace in good earnest. King Attalus was returned home to defend his own kingdom against Prusias king of Bythynia, who had invaded it. The Romans had so much business on their hands at home, Asdrubal being ready to enter Italy, and join his brother, that they concerned themselves very little with the affairs of Greece, leaving their friends there to shift for themselves. The Ætolians therefore, finding themselves thus deserted by their

c most powerful allies, concluded a peace with Philip and the Achæans upon very disadvantageous conditions. Scarce was the peace agreed on when P. Sempronius the proconsul arrived with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirty-five galleys, to succour the Ætolians. When he heard how affairs went in Greece, he was very much offended at the Ætolians for concluding a peace without the consent of the Roman senate, contrary to the express words of the treaty. However, he was easily prevailed upon to come into their measures, and in the name of his republic strike up a peace with Philip and his allies. For the year following it was agreed by the mediation of the Epirots and Acarnanians, that the Romans and Philip should be included in the treaty, and thenceforth live in amity. Philip caused the king of Bitynia, the Achæans, the Bœotians, the Thessalians, Acarnanians and Epirots, to be included in the treaty; the Romans on their side named king Attalus, Pleuratus a petty prince of Illyricum, Nabis tyrant of Sparta, the people of Elis, the Messenians, and the Albanians. This peace was very acceptable to both parties; to Philip, that he might have leisure to settle the affairs of his own kingdom; to the Romans, that they might carry on the war against the Carthaginians with more vigor †.

THE peace thus concluded was not of long continuance. Philip having settled his affairs at home, and finding that the fortune of the Carthaginians his friends in the west declined apace, began to study how he might enlarge his dominions in the east. Accordingly he invaded at the same time the Rhodians, the Athenians, and king Attalus, contrary to the late treaty of peace. Whereupon war was declared against him by the Romans, and Sulpitius the consul appointed to carry it on. The Achæans and Lacedæmonians joined with Philip; the former he gained over to his interest by restoring to them the cities of Orbomenos, Heræa, and Triphylia, which he had formerly appropriated to himself. He likewise put the Megalopolitans in possession of the city of Aliphera, to which they laid claim, and by these means kept them for some time in his alliance ‡. The Romans watched all opportunities of engaging so powerful a people in their interest, and at last found a very favourable one. When the Roman consul Sulpitius arrived first in Greece, one Cycliades was prætor of the Achæans, a man entirely devoted to the Macedonian party, being supported in his tyrannical government by the protection of Philip. The Achæans, suspecting that he aimed at an absolute power, and was concerting measures with the Macedonians to bring their republic under subjection, as Nabis had lately done at Sparta, expelled him, and put the government into the hands of Aristenes, who on all occasions had given signal proofs of his affection to the Romans. This opportunity the consul laid hold of to bring Achaia into an alliance with Rome, but left the execution of the design to his brother Quintilius, who immediately sent a deputation to the Achæans, offering to put them in possession of Corinth, which had formerly belonged to them, if they joined with the Romans. This was a powerful attractive. How-

A general peace concluded.
Year of the flood 2799.
Before Christ 204.

The Achæans join Philip against the Romans.

The Achæans solicited by Quintilius to declare for the Romans.

* POLYB. l. xi. p. 629, 631. PLUT. in Philop.

† LIV. l. xxix. n. 12.

‡ LIV. l. xxxii. n. 5.

ever as Philip had done them many important services, they were unwilling to disoblige him. Besides, they were under no small apprehension of Nabis tyrant of Lacedaemon, who had openly declared for Philip. At the same time they were afraid of the Romans, who seemed to be an over-match for the Macedonians. These were the dispositions of the Achaëans, when they assembled at Sicyon to hear the Roman ambassadors, who came attended with deputies from king Attalus, the Rhodians, and the Athenians, on purpose to dispel their fears, and make the strongest impressions on the minds of so wary a people. Philip likewise sent an ambassador to the assembly, named Cleomedon, whose intrigues the Romans had reason to fear, he being a man of great interest in Achaia. The ambassadors being introduced, L. Calpurnius, who spoke for the Romans, was first heard; after him the deputies from Attalus, and the Rhodians, and then Cleomedon. What the latter said was heard with great attention; but the Athenians, who spoke the last, effaced in a great measure the prejudices, which Cleomedon had raised. All these different speeches divided the Achaëans more than ever; infomuch that they broke up the session, which had lasted the whole day, without coming to any resolution.

THE next day the assembly met again, the deputies only of the Achaean cities being admitted to give their opinions, and come to some final resolution. An herald, as was the custom, invited those to speak, who had a right of voting; but they all continued in a deep silence gazing at one another; and not daring to pronounce in so perplexed an affair. At last Aristenes, president of the assembly, broke silence, and addressed the deputies in this manner: What is become of that warmth and vigour with which you used to dispute at your banquets, sometimes contending for Philip against the Romans, and sometimes for the Romans against Philip? You were then decisive, and now in an assembly summoned for no other purpose, after hearing the speeches and reasons on both sides, you are mute. If the love of your country cannot extort a word from you, will not your inclination for one or the other party loose your tongues? especially as you know that it will be too late to speak after the resolution shall be once taken.

THESE reproaches, however reasonable and judicious, could not prevail with any of the members to give their opinion. There was an universal silence in the assembly, till Aristenes resumed the discourse, and in a long harangue represented to them the situation of their affairs, urging the necessity of their joining the Romans, who, he said, were in a condition to force them to the compliance which they had condescended to request. But his discourse did not bring the Achaëans to an agreement among themselves. The disputes grew warm, some applauding what Aristenes had said, and others opposing it with great violence. Even the demiurgi or heads of the deputies were not unanimous. Five of the ten were for decreeing an alliance with the Romans. The other five protested against it, declaring that it was against law to decree any thing in the assembly with relation to their alliance with Philip. And indeed that prince had caused a clause to be inserted in his treaty with the Achaëans to this effect, that the affair of his alliance should no more be canvassed in the general assembly. The assembly was to sit but one day longer, and even this short time was spent in warm disputes, the father disagreeing with the son, and the deputies of one and the same city being ready to fall upon one another. Memnon of Pellene was steady for Philip, and his father, whose name was Rhapius, no less sanguine for Rome. The father conjured him a long time not to oppose the welfare of his country; but finding that his prayers did not avail, he openly protested that he would treat him as an enemy, and put him to death in case he did not yield to his opinion. Such menaces uttered by a father made so deep an impression in the mind of Memnon, that he immediately came over to the party of Rome. At last the majority were for the Romans; but before the decree was passed, the deputies of Dyma, and Megalopolis, and some of the Argians withdrew from the assembly; which no one took offence at, because they had particular obligations to Philip. The deputies of the other cities followed the most prudent advice, and immediately concluded an alliance with Attalus, and the Rhodians, but deferred the entire conclusion of that with the Romans till the return of the ambassadors they sent to Rome to obtain the ratification from the senate.

After long debates the Achaëans conclude an alliance with the Romans.

* Liv. l. xxxii. n. 22.

* Liv. ibid.

- a BUT in the mean time the Achæans lent assistance to the Romans to reduce Corinth. Corinth besieged by the Romans and Achæans. The city was attacked on the side of Cenchrea by Quintilius, at the gate Sicyon by the Achæans, and on the side of the port Lechæum by Attalus. They at first carried on the attack but very faintly, hoping that a quarrel would soon arise between the garison and the inhabitants. But *Androsthene*s, who commanded in the place for Philip, had gained the affection of the Corinthians, and being supplied with a reinforcement of fifteen hundred men, and a great many Roman deserters, who expected no quarter if the city should be taken, he obliged the besiegers to drop the enterprize^b.
- THEY were no sooner retired than Philocles, one of king Philip's generals, march- The siege raised. ed his troops into the heart of Achaia, which had so lately joined the Romans, and drew near the city of Argos. He was not ignorant that the citizens still retained an affection for the Macedonian party; for they had very lately given a signal proof of The Macedonians possess themselves of Argos. it. It had long been a custom among the Argians to invoke Jupiter, Apollo, and Hercules, on the first day of their assembly, and add to the names of these gods that of the king of Macedon. But after the Achæans had entered into an alliance with Year of the flood 2806. Before Christ 197. the Romans, the herald, who pronounced the form, thought it his duty to omit Philip's name. This omission displeased the Argians, who loudly demanded that the king's name should be joined to those of the tutelary gods of their country. Philocles therefore depending on this affection for his master, advanced his troops near Argos, and in the night posted them on an eminence which overlooked the city. But the city was defended by a strong garison which the Achæans had placed there under the command of one Ænesidemus, who was greatly attached to the Roman interest. To him therefore Philocles sent a messenger summoning him to deliver up the city which he could not defend against the Macedonians without, and the citizens within the walls, who were all of the same mind, and determined to shake off the Roman yoke. This summons did not move the brave commander, who thought himself in a condition to withstand the menaces of the Macedonian, though his garison consisted only of five hundred men. But he was not a little surpris'd, when he saw all the citizens take up arms, and in a tumultuous manner command him to march out of the city. Ænesidemus well knew it was a rash and fruitless attempt to oppose the multitude with such an handful of men; he had also compassion for the brave youth under his command; and therefore having agreed that they should march out unmolested, continued himself in the city with a small number of his friends and clients. Philocles was surpris'd to see the commander remain in his post after the soldiers were gone, sent to ask him, Why he continued in the city, and what he intended to do? To which the brave Achæan answered, To die in the place committed to my care; whereupon Philocles ordered his Thracians to discharge their arrows at him, which they did accordingly, and he fell dead upon his buckler. Thus, notwithstanding the alliance which the Achæans had concluded with the Romans, Philip still possessed two of their strongest cities, Corinth and Argos^c.
- e IT was of the utmost importance for Philip to preserve the city of Argos; but the difficulty was how to continue master of a place in the heart of Achaia, and at so great a distance from his hereditary dominions. He therefore delivered it up to the famous Nabis, who had usurped the sovereignty of Lacedæmon, and was in a condition to defend it; the conditions upon which he delivered it were, that he should possess it as his own, if Philip lost his life in the war, but restore it if he were alive at the concluding of a peace. The tyrant willingly complied with these conditions, having nothing in view but to plunder the place, and enrich himself with the spoils of the unfortunate Argians, who foreseeing what must befall them, refused to admit the Lacedæmonians within their walls. But Nabis by the help of Philocles was brought into the city in the night, and before the inhabitants were aware had possessed himself of all the advantageous posts, and caused the gates to be shut. Some of the chief magistrates made their escape in the tumult, and this the tyrant made use of as a pretence to begin his depredations. He confiscated the estates of those that had fled; and then knowing that no body was able to oppose him, set no bounds to his oppressions. He commanded the inhabitants to bring him all their gold, silver, and jewels, putting to the rack, and treating like slaves, such as he suspected to conceal any part of their riches. He assembled the magistrates, and at their first meeting notified to them two decrees, which he obliged them to pass; by the first he cancelled all old debts; and by the second ordered a new division to be made of the lands, whereof every citizen should have an equal share. Thus he set the rich against the poor, and put the whole city in a flame^d.

^b Liv. ibid. n. 25.

^c Liv. l. xxxii. c. 25:

Nabis joins the Romans.

Nabis was sensible he could not keep Argos without a powerful protection, and therefore forgetting on what conditions he held it, ambassadors were sent to Flaminius and Attalus inviting them to an interview. The proconsul and Attalus accepted of the invitation without examining over-nicely into the injustice and treachery of the tyrant, and a place near Argos was appointed for their conferences. In the interview Flaminius insisted upon two conditions; first, that Nabis should put an end to the war in Achaia; and secondly, that he should furnish the confederates with his contingent of troops to act against Philip. The tyrant agreed to the second article, but would allow only a four months truce with the Achaëans. The treaty however was concluded, and Nabis, who was so infamous for his cruelty and injustice, joined in confederacy with the Romans, which reflected no small dishonour on their general^e.

The Macedonians defeated by the Achæ-
ans.

THE Achæans continued steady in the Roman interest during the whole course of this war, and their prætor Nicostratus signalized himself on the following occasion. Philip had left one Androsthenes with a body of six thousand men in Corinth to protect that city and its districts from the insults of the Achæans, and other Greeks of the Roman faction. Androsthenes thinking it beneath him to be thus confined within the narrow bounds of the Corinthian territory, marched out at the head of his little army, and over-run great part of Achaia. Nicostratus the Achæan prætor had but two thousand men under his command, and these were too few to oppose the superior forces of the Macedonian, who advanced to the very walls of Sicyon to insult the prætor there in garison. As Androsthenes was under no apprehension of being attacked by so contemptible a foe, his troops were often dispersed in small bodies, and his army scarce ever in one place. This gave Nicostratus hopes of being able to surprize him. And accordingly he sent orders to the garisons of the neighbouring cities to appear at a general rendezvous on a day appointed at a little city called Apelaurum in Argolis. His orders were obeyed, and the prætor set out from thence at the head of five thousand seven hundred foot, and three hundred horse. The horse he detached to observe the enemies motions, and by them received advice, that they were encamped on the river Nemea (N), between Corinth and Sicyon, and that the Macedonian having divided his army into three bodies, had detached one into the territory of Sicyon, another into that of Pellene (O), and the third towards Pblius (P). Upon this advice Nicostratus placed his mercenaries in a forest, through which the Macedonians were to pass in their return to Corinth; while he led the rest in two bodies to attack Androsthenes in his camp. The Macedonians were greatly surprized when they saw the Achæans making directly to their camp. Androsthenes ordering the trumpets to give the signal for assembling the troops that were straggling about in the villages, drew up the small body he had with him on the banks of the river. But the parties that were out not returning soon enough to join him, he was easily defeated. This advantage encouraged Nicostratus to fall upon the Macedonians that were laying waste the territory of Sicyon; there few of them escaped, being surrounded on all sides before they knew that the enemy had taken the field. As for those who were ravaging the country about Pellene and Pblius, they were either murdered by the inhabitants, or cut in pieces by the mercenaries, who lay concealed in the forest. This action freed Achaia from all fear of the Macedonians, and doubled Philip's concern, who heard of it a few days after the great overthrow which he received in the plain of Cynocephalæ^f.

^d Liv. ibid. c. 28.

^e Liv. ubi supra. POLYB. l. xiii. sub finem. PLUT. in Flamin.

^f Liv. ibid.

(N) The river Nemea watered part of Peloponnesus, and discharged itself into the gulph of Corinth. It is now called the Largia.

(O) Pellene, called by Stephanus Pellina, was a city of Achaia Propria, and bordered upon the territory of Sicyon. Genissus calls it Cercoba, and Le Noir gives it the name of Zaracha. The natives now call it Diaopton. It is about sixty furlongs distant from the gulph of Corinth.

(P) This city Livy calls Pblosus (?). We must take care not to confound it with another bearing the same name in Argolis. The Pblius here spoke of was in Achaia.

(7) Liv. lib. xxxiii. c. 14.

- a THESE repeated losses obliged Philip at length to accept of a peace on such conditions as Rome and her allies were pleased to impose. The main article relating to Greece was, that Philip should evacuate all the places he possessed in Greece, and withdraw his garisons before the celebration of the Isthmian games (Q). Pursuant to this article ten commissioners were sent from Rome to settle the affairs of Greece, and restore each city to the full enjoyment of its former rights and privileges. All Greece received the news of this peace with the greatest transports of joy. The Ætolians alone were discontented, and inveighed bitterly against the Romans, because among the cities that were to be set at liberty, no mention was made of Corinth, Chalcis, Oreos, Eretria, and Demetrias, which were all in the hands of the Romans. The Ætolians suspected that Rome designed to appropriate them to herself, in which case Greece, said they, would indeed change its masters, but not its condition. The suspicion of the Ætolians was not ill grounded; for the ten commissioners, pursuant to the instruction of the senate, had omitted the names of these cities with a design to keep them, as they were the keys of Greece, and thereby prevent Antiochus from entering that country. But the proconsul prevailed with them to extend the decree to all the cities in Greece, not one excepted. By this means the Achæans were put in possession of Corinth. Nevertheless it was resolved in the council of the ten commissioners, that the citadel of Corinth, and the two cities of Demetrias and Chalcis should be held by the Romans as long as they were under any apprehensions of a war with Antiochus ¹⁹⁶.

A peace concluded with Philip.
Year of the flood 2807.
Before Christ 196.

- AND now the time of the Isthmian games drawing near, the expectation of what was to be transacted there kept every body in suspense. The decree of the Roman commissioners was not yet divulged, and the future fate of Greece was the topic of all conversations. Some, but very few, hoped well; most of that numerous assembly could not be persuaded, that the Romans would part with the cities they had taken. The multitude were in this uncertainty, when the appointed day came for beginning the games. The proconsul Flaminius attended by the ten commissioners took his place; silence was proclaimed by sound of trumpet; and the herald advanced into the middle of the arena, as it were to pronounce the usual form of words; but the Greeks to their great surprize heard him pronounce the following words: The senate and people of Rome, and Quintius Flaminius proconsul, after having overcome Philip, and quieted Macedon, declares the Corinthians, the Phocæans, the Locri, all the Eubœans in the island, the Magnesiensians, the Theffalians, the Perrœbi, the Achæans, and Phthiotes, free from all kind of servitude. All these nations shall live in an independent state, and be governed only by their own laws. In this vast assembly all had not heard equally the voice of the herald by reason of the noise and confusion which immediately arose. Such as were at a greater distance left their places to ask those who were nearer what they had heard. At last there was an universal outcry from all corners of the stadium, demanding that the herald should repeat the proclamation. Then the trumpet sounded again, and the herald with a more distinct and loud voice proclaimed liberty to all the Greeks without exception. He was heard with the most profound silence, and not a single word of the decree was lost. And now being fully assured of their happiness, they expressed their satisfaction with such transports of joy as are not to be conceived or imagined (R). They all crowded round Flaminius, calling him the deliverer of Greece, and pressing to kiss his hand. The croud was so great, and they threw so many crowns and garlands upon him, that he would have run the hazard of being stifled, had not the vigour of his age, being then in his thirty-third year, and that joy which so glorious a day raised in his breast, enabled him to undergo so great a fatigue. At length the games began, but the spectators could look at nothing but the protector and restorer of their liberties, admiring the disinterestedness of the Romans in general, and the conduct of the proconsul in particular.

The Greeks declared free by the Romans.

¹⁹⁶ LIV. l. xxxiii. c. 30, 35. POLYB. excerpt. Legat. p. 795, 800. PLUT. in Flam.

(Q) On the Isthmus of Corinth some games were annually celebrated, and thence called Isthmian. They are said to have been instituted by Theseus in honour of Neptune. The most skilful athletes in Greece came thither to dispute the prize in running, leaping, wrestling, &c. This was one of the most numerous assemblies of Greece.

(R) Plutarch tells us, that the air was put into such a violent agitation by the acclamations and shouts of so numerous a body of people, that some crows which were accidentally flying over the assembly, fell down in the arena (8).

(8) Plut. in Flamin.

ticular^b. But after all, Rome found her account in these acts of generosity; for they gained her the hearts of the Greek nation, and by that means increased her power without enlarging her dominions.

Demetrias,
Chalcis, and Acro-Corinth evacuated by the Romans.

AFTER this the proconsul, to complete the work, convened a general assembly at Corinth, and there declared that he would evacuate Demetrias, Chalcis, and Acro-Corinth, which he did accordingly, and then began to prepare for his journey to Rome. The Greeks, with tears in their eyes, assured him that they should ever retain a grateful remembrance of so gracious a protector; and to give him before his departure some pledge of their affection, they sought for all the Romans that were reduced to slavery on the coasts of Greece, and delivered them up to him. They amounted to twelve thousand in number, the greatest part of them having been taken by Hannibal in Italy, and sold to the Greeks. The Achaëans alone bore the charge of their redemption, which came to a hundred talents. With this attendance the proconsul, after having withdrawn the Roman forces from Acro-Corinth, Demetrias, and Chalcis, embarked at Oricum on his return to Italy, leaving Greece to enjoy the happiness which he had procured it^c.

Nabis left in possession of Sparta.

THE only thing that reflected some dishonour on Flaminius, and stained his reputation, was his leaving the usurper Nabis in possession of Lacedæmon, without ever once mentioning in the treaty of peace the unhappy Agésilus, who was the lawful heir, and had fought during the war under the Roman standards. Plutarch accounts for this strange proceeding, and tells us, that Flaminius proposed only such conditions as he hoped the tyrant would not reject, being impatient to return to Rome, because the reputation of Philopæmen began to eclipse his. They were both in the same camp, and in the same confederacy, and the soldiers in their discourses often compared them together, always preferring the Greek general to the Roman. They imputed the proconsul's successes to the bravery and intrepidity of his legions; but unanimously agreed that Philopæmen's victories were entirely owing to himself. And truly, says our author, no one understood better than Philopæmen how to draw up an army, seize advantageous posts, suit the disposition of his troops to the ground, order evolutions at a proper time, make an attack seasonably, or judge of the critical time for a retreat^d. Flaminius on the other side, though inferior to the Achaean in the art of commanding armies, yet far surpassed him in all other virtues and qualifications. Nevertheless he was very uneasy to see himself surpassed by a Greek in that character, which most dazzles the eyes of the multitude; and this made him so zealous for putting an end to the war, contrary to the opinion of the most judicious among the Greeks, who were for pursuing Nabis to the last extremities, knowing that Greece would never enjoy a lasting peace so long as Nabis enjoyed the crown of Lacedæmon.

WHAT they foresaw was soon brought to pass: For not long after the departure of the Romans, Nabis began to raise insurrections in the maritime cities, which he had been obliged to give up by the treaty of peace. As they were garisoned by the Achaëans, he attempted to drive them out, and even laid siege to Gythium, an important maritime city which Flaminius had taken from him. These hostilities obliged the Achaëans to have recourse to the Romans, who sent the great Flaminius again into Greece to enquire into the state of affairs on the spot. At his arrival he found Nabis yet engaged in the siege of Gythium, and the Achaëans assembled at their general diet, which was held at Sicyon: They had immediately recourse to him, and desired his advice. The assembly were for taking up arms immediately, and invading the Lacedæmonian territories; but Flaminius advised them to wait till the Roman fleet arrived, which the prætor Bæbius was ordered to bring to their assistance. Nevertheless the assembly was still in suspense what part to act, and the leading men divided among themselves; some were for following the advice of Flaminius, others for falling on the Lacedæmonians without loss of time: they only waited for the decision of Philopæmen, who was then prætor, and presided in the assembly. But that prudent general was not in haste to give his opinion: It is a wise institution of ours, said he, that our prætors shall not deliver their opinions when the assemblies are deliberating about war. It is your business to determine what to do, and mine to execute your orders; and I will take all possible care that you shall not repent of your choice, whether it be for war or peace. These words inclined the assembly more powerfully to a war, than if he had openly declared for it; and a decree was issued ordering troops declare war against Nabis tyrant of Sparta.

The Achæans
Year of the
flood 2812.
Before Christ
191.

^a PLUT. in Flam.

^b LIV. l. xxiv. c. 4. PLUT. in Flamin.

^c PLUT. in Flamin. & Philopæm.

a to be levied without delay, and leaving the whole management of the war to *Philopæmen*¹.

THE brave Achæan being invested with this power, was at first in doubt what to do; on one hand he thought it would be of great advantage to wait till the arrival of the Roman fleet, according to the advice of Flaminius; on the other side he judged it might be dangerous to suffer Nabis to pursue the siege of Gytium, and expose the Achæan garison to the rage of the tyrant. He therefore took a middle way, which was to get ready the Achæan ships with a design to give the besieged some relief, and suspend the attacks of the enemy at least towards the sea. But this design required a man of some experience in maritime affairs, whereas Philopæmen, tho' not inferior to any land-officer whatsoever, had never been on board a ship but in order to go over to Crete as a passenger. However, he took upon him the command of the Achæan fleet, imagining that he should be as successful by sea as he had been by land. But he found, to his cost, how useful experience is on all occasions; for Nabis, who had fitted out a few ships filled with rowers and soldiers used to sea-fights, fell upon him, and at the very first onset dispersed his fleet, took some of his ships, and sunk others. Philopæmen himself was very near being taken, but as he had the caution to go on board a light vessel before the engagement, he made his escape, and though pursued close by the enemy, got safe into the port of Patra^m.

THE shame of this ill-concerted expedition did not discourage the brave Philopæmen, but only made him act with greater caution and prudence for the future. Nabis, elated with this advantage, thought that no more attempts would be made to throw any succours into Gytium, and therefore turning the siege into a blockade, left only the third part of his forces before the place, and with the rest guarded the passes through which succours might be brought to the besieged city, especially a port called Pleia. In this camp Philopæmen resolved to attack the Lacedæmonians. And accordingly having gathered together some boats, and manned them with Achæans, he ordered them to advance towards Pleia, while he himself marched along the shore to the same place. Both the boats and Philopæmen with his army arrived at Pleia in the dead of the night, and found the enemy fast asleep without any watch, as thinking themselves in a secure place. Upon the first signal firebrands and burning matter were thrown from the boats, and the Achæan general at the same time surrounded the camp to fall on those who made their escape. As the Lacedæmonians were not furnished with tents, they had made barracks of branches of trees, which taking fire, obliged them to fly in great confusion. But such as escaped the flames were cut in pieces by the Achæans, who had seized on all the passes; so that very few got safe to the camp before Gytium. Philopæmen having thus retrieved his reputation, which had been somewhat lessened by his maritime expedition, assembled the Achæans in order to consult with them about the measures he should take for the relief of Gytium. It was resolved in the assembly that he should advance to Lacedæmon, as if he designed to lay siege to that city. This, they thought, would be the only means to make a powerful diversion, and force Nabis to raise the siege. But in the mean time the attacks being carried on with great vigour, the place was taken the very day that the Achæan army appeared before Lacedæmon. Nabis therefore without loss of time hastened to Lacedæmon, and found the Achæans marching through a narrow pass, their several bodies being at a considerable distance from each other. Philopæmen was not a little surprized at the sudden appearance of the enemy, and the narrowness of the place doubled his concern. However, without shewing any uneasiness, he drew up his men in the most artful manner possible. He posted his Achæans in the first line, and behind them the Cretan auxiliaries. His cavalry he drew up by the side of a brook for the convenience of watering their horses. He placed his baggage on the top of a rock with a detachment to guard it. In this disposition he waited till the enemy came up without fearing the consequences of an engagement. In the mean time night drew on, and both armies remained in the same posture. Philopæmen in the night-time posted a strong body of his best troops in a valley, ordering his horse to retire till they drew the enemy into the ambuscade he had laid for them. Early next morning the action began, and the horse engaged first; the Achæan cavalry was commanded by Lycortas the father of Polybius the historian. At first the dispute was warm, and the advantage equal. But Lycortas, according to the orders he had received, in the heat of the engagement began to give ground, and retiring ^a in good order, drew the enemy into the ambuscade; and then facing about attacked them in front, while the troops that lay concealed flanked them with incredible fury. The victory was then no more doubtful; the Lacedæmonian cavalry betook themselves to a precipitous flight, and most of them would have been cut in pieces, had not the Achæan general, who was more afraid of the narrow roads than of the enemy, sounded a retreat. Nabis suspecting that Philopæmen designed to seize the passes leading to Lacedæmon, and thereby cut off his retreat, marched off with part of his troops to prevent him. This report Philopæmen had caused to be spread in the Lacedæmonian camp by one of his own men who fled thither as a deserter; and accordingly took his advantage of it. For Nabis was no sooner gone but he attacked his son-in-law Pythagoras, who was left to guard the camp, and forcing the trenches, possessed himself of the baggage and warlike engines. He left a detachment in the enemies camp, and with the rest of the army pursued the fugitives with great slaughter. The Lacedæmonians being now entirely dispersed, he divided his army into a great many small bodies, ordering them to lie concealed on the roads that led to the gates of Lacedæmon, being well apprised that by the favour of the night such as were rambling in the woods would attempt to enter the city. His design succeeded, and the Lacedæmonians were either cut in pieces, or taken prisoners, as they were in the dead of the night making towards the city. Thus the tyrant lost the flower of his troops, and Philopæmen after having laid waste great part of Lacomia, ^c returned home loaded with spoils and glory ^a.

¹ PLUT. in Philop. LIV. lib. xxxv. c. 15.

^m PLUT. & LIV. ibid.

Sparta joined to the Achæan league.
Year of the
flood 2812.
Before Christ
191.

A great instance of Philopæmen's disinterestedness.

BUT what most of all raised the fame and reputation of Philopæmen, was his joining the powerful city of Lacedæmon to the Achæan commonwealth, by which means the Achæans came to eclipse all the other states of Greece. This memorable event we have related at length in the foregoing chapter, and therefore shall only add here one circumstance, which in our opinion reflects greater lustre on Philopæmen than all his warlike exploits. The Lacedæmonians, overjoyed to see themselves delivered from the oppressions they had long groaned under, ordered the palace and furniture of Nabis to be sold, and the sum accruing from thence to the amount of a hundred and twenty talents to be presented to Philopæmen as a token of their gratitude. Deputies ^d therefore were to be appointed, who should carry the money, and desire Philopæmen in the name of the senate to accept of the present. And on this occasion it was, says Plutarch, that the virtue of the generous Achæan appeared in its greatest lustre; for so great was the opinion which the Spartans had of his probity and disinterestedness, that no one could be found who would take upon him to offer the present. Struck with veneration, and fear of disobliging him, they all begged to be excused. At last they obliged by a public decree one Timolaus, who had formerly been his guest, to go to Megalopolis, where Philopæmen lived, and offer him the present. Timolaus with great reluctance set out for Megalopolis, where he was kindly received and entertained by Philopæmen. Here he had an opportunity of observing the severity of his whole conduct, the greatness of his mind, the frugality of his life, and the regularity of his manners, which struck him with such awe, that he did not dare once to mention the present he was come to offer him; insomuch that giving some other pretence to his journey, he returned home with the present. The Lacedæmonians sent him again, but he could no more prevail upon himself now, than the first time, to mention the true cause of his journey. At last going a third time, he ventured with the utmost reluctance to acquaint Philopæmen with the offer he had to make to him in the name of the Lacedæmonians. Philopæmen heard him with great calmness; but the instant he had done speaking he set out with him to Sparta, where after expressing the greatest obligations to the Spartans, he advised them to lay out their money in corrupting and purchasing the wicked, and such as divided the citizens, and set them at variance with their seditious discourses, to the end that being paid for their silence, they might not occasion so many distractions in the government. For it is much more advisable, said he, to stop an enemy's mouth than a friend's; as for me, I shall always be your friend, and you shall reap the benefit of my friendship without expence ^e. Such was the disinterestedness of this brave Achæan.

THE Achæan republic was now become formidable; the addition of Lacedæmon had greatly increased its power; but at the same time divisions arising among the

^a PLUT. ibid. LIV. I. XXXV. c. 28.

^e PLUT. in Philop.

- a confederate cities, the Romans began to let them know that the republic of Achaia was in some degree subject to that of Rome. Messene and Elis, two cities of Achaia, Messene and Elis revolt from the Achæans. had sided with Antiochus, and refused to come to the Achæan diet. Whereupon Diophanes, at that time prætor, raised some troops and advanced at the head of them into the territories of the two rebellious cities, laying waste the country in order to bring them to their duty. The inhabitants had recourse to Flaminius, who then resided at Chalcis, protesting that they had rather surrender themselves up to the Romans, than live subject to the Achæans. Flaminius immediately left Chalcis, and hastening to Megalopolis, sent orders from thence to Diophanes, enjoining him to desist from hostilities, and meet him at Megalopolis. The prætor obeyed, and Flaminius after having gently reproved him for disturbing the peace, advised him to disband his troops, assuring him at the same time that he would settle the affair of the Messenians and Eleans to the satisfaction of the Achæans. Accordingly he subjected them to the diet, and obliged them to deliver up the Achæan exiles they kept in their cities. This proceeding of Flaminius was greatly applauded by the Achæans, for the Messenians earnestly intreated him to put a Roman garison into the city, protesting that they had rather be subject to Rome than to Achaia. But Flaminius in so doing had another point in view, which was to persuade the Achæans to deliver up to him the island of Zacynthus (S), which they had lately purchased. Diophanes could not by any means be prevailed upon to part with it; whereupon Flaminius ordered the assembly to be called, and there gave a signal proof of his abilities, convincing the Achæans that the parting with an island which they had lately purchased would prove very advantageous to their republic. The speech he made on this occasion is entirely accommodated to the genius of the Greeks. "I look on Achaia, said he, "as a sort of tortoise which nature has guarded with its shell. If it thrusts out its head or feet ever so little beyond its armour, it is in danger of being trod upon and hurt. The frontier cities, which surround you, Achæans, are your shell and your natural defence. But as to any acquisitions beyond the continent, those are parts of your state which are exposed to insults, and which you cannot secure without being at a greater charge than they are worth." This speech, which was founded on good sense, convinced the Achæans that their new purchase would prove rather prejudicial than useful to their republic, and therefore they all unanimously voted that it should be delivered up to the *Romans*⁹.

- IT was not long ere new disputes arose among the Achæans, which gave the Romans a fair opportunity of exerting their authority even over their allies, and those very nations which they had declared free. The general assembly of the Achæans had been held time out of mind at Ægium; but Philopamen, who was then prætor, thought fit to divide the honour and advantages which those assemblies brought to the places where they were held, among all the cities of the Achæan league, and had named Argos for the place of the next diet. But the inhabitants of Ægium opposed this regulation, and had recourse to M. Fulvius Nobilior, who after having reduced the Ætolians, and made himself master of Cephalenia, resided in that island to decide, as he said, such disputes as should arise between any of the Greek cities or republics. Thus under the character of a peace-maker, he was in reality the sovereign of Greece, and gave laws to the whole country. The island of Cephalenia being now in the hands of the Romans, a way was open for the legions into Peloponnesus, which was only divided from it by a small arm of the sea about twenty-four miles over. Fulvius therefore upon the first notice of this dispute crossed over into Peloponnesus, and the whole matter was referred to his determination. His inclination indeed led him to favour the inhabitants of Ægium; but seeing that the other party was far more numerous, he withdrew from the assembly without declaring his opinion. It was enough for him that the dispute had been brought to his tribunal¹.

New disputes among the Achæans.

⁹ LIV. l. xxxvi. c. 32.

¹ LIV. l. xxxviii. c. 28—30.

(S) Zacynthus, now Zante, is a pretty considerable island in the Ionian sea. It is said to be twenty-five miles in length, twenty in breadth, and sixty in circuit. It had for a long time belonged to Philip of Macedon, who had given it up to Amy- nander king of the Atbamanes. This prince made the famous Philip of Megalopolis governor of it, and he transferred it to Hierocles of Sicily, who after the defeat of Antiochus at Thermopylae sold it to the Achæans.

The Lacedæmonians attempt to withdraw themselves from the Achæan league.
Year of the flood 2814.
Before Christ 189.

THE quarrel that arose between the Lacedæmonians and Achæans was of more consequence. Flaminius had given all the places on the coast of Laconia to the Achæans, who kept garisons in them even after Lacedæmon had acceded to the Achæan league. This some of the leading men among the Lacedæmonians could not brook, and therefore to deliver themselves from this slavery, they attacked in the night a small city on the coast called Las (T), but were repulsed by the inhabitants and the Lacedæmonian exiles, who there enjoyed quiet under the protection of Achaia. This attempt alarmed the exiles, who brought their complaints to the council of the Achæans. Philopæmen, who was an avowed friend and protector of the exiles, for they had been driven out for opposing the tyrant, was then prætor. He represented to the assembly the attempt upon Las as an insult offered to all Achaia, and caused a decree to be enacted, commanding the Lacedæmonians to deliver up the authors of that enterprize on pain of being treated as enemies. Embassadors were sent to Lacedæmon to give them notice of this decree; but this served only to exasperate the minds of a proud people. They immediately put to death thirty of those who were known to be in the Achæan interest, dissolved their alliance with Achaia, and sent embassadors to Fulvius the proconsul, intreating him to come and take possession of their city. But these proceedings, and the powerful protection which they were imploring did not deter Philopæmen from declaring war against Lacedæmon. However, as the season was far advanced, the Achæans contented themselves with plundering part of the Lacedæmonian territory, and harassing the inhabitants with frequent incursions.

AT the return of the spring both parties made preparations for war, and hostilities were carried so far that they forced Fulvius to leave Cephalenia, and come into Peloponnesus. On his arrival he ordered an assembly to be convened at Elis, to discuss the pretensions of Achaia over Lacedæmon. But after hearing both parties, he was so perplexed that he could come to no determination. He did all that lay in his power to reconcile the contending parties, but they were too untractable to come to an accommodation. He therefore advised them to send embassadors to Rome, and while the cause was trying there to suspend all hostilities. They followed his advice, and deputies were immediately dispatched to Rome. The Achæans appointed two great men to plead their cause, who were of a very different character. These were Diophanes, a man of moderation, and of a tractable disposition; and Lycortas the father of Polybius, a man entirely addicted to Philopæmen. Diophanes referred the decision of the cause to the arbitration of the senate. Lycortas maintained the decree of Philopæmen, and urged that it could not be reversed without making void the regulations of Flaminius, who had committed the care of the coast to the Achæans. The senate was unwilling to disgust the Achæans, but at the same time thought the Lacedæmonians worthy of compassion. They returned therefore a dark and ambiguous answer, which each party interpreted in their own favour. The Achæans pretended that it gave them full power to inflict on the Lacedæmonians the punishment they deserved. Whereupon Philopæmen, who was continued in his prætorship, taking the field, marched to the very walls of Lacedæmon, and there summoned the city to deliver up the authors of the attempt upon Las, promising that they should not be condemned without a fair trial. Upon this promise, all those whom Philopæmen demanded by name set out for the Achæan camp, attended by the chief citizens of Lacedæmon, who looked upon their cause as their own. Being arrived at the camp their malecontent countrymen crowded round them, and with an insulting air began to vent the most injurious expressions against them. Nay, from words they came to blows, and the Achæan officers had occasion to exert all their authority to appease the tumult. As the Lacedæmonian exiles continued complaining of their hard treatment, they engaged the Achæan soldiers in their quarrel, and all on a sudden fell upon the Lacedæmonians with such fury, that seventeen of them were killed upon the spot. Seventy-three were with the greatest difficulty rescued out of the hands of the enraged multitude. Philopæmen did not intend to pardon them, but was unwilling it should be said that they had been condemned without a trial. They were therefore the next morning produced before the multitude, who without scarce suffering them to answer for themselves, condemned and executed them all. This severe proceeding struck all the Lacedæmonians with such terror, that they surrendered at discretion; and Philo-

Lacedæmon reduced by the Achæans.

(T) Las was situated on the Laconic gulph south of Sparta on a stony soil, and in a country full of rocks, whence it borrowed its name; the word Las signifying in Greek a stone.

a pæmen, whose main point in view was to humble the Lacedæmonians, treated them as if their city had been taken by storm. He commanded them to demolish their walls, disband all their mercenaries, drive out of their city all the slaves whom the tyrants had set at liberty, receive the exiles, and lastly renounce the laws of Lycurgus, and for the future govern themselves only by those of Achaia. Hard conditions imposed upon the city by Philopæmen.

THE Lacedæmonians readily demolished their walls; for Lacedæmon had long subsisted without any other defence but the bravery of its citizens. The recalling of the exiles was what they were most averse to; but Philopæmen and the Achèans were inexorable, and would by all means have the exiles re-instated in their ancient honours, from which they had been driven by the tyrants. But the most fatal blow was the abolition of the laws of the wise Lycurgus, which, severe as they were, the Lacedæmonians had observed for the space of seven hundred years. Such was the fate of one of the most illustrious cities of Greece (U).

THE Lacedæmonians sent ambassadors to Rome to complain of this cruel treatment; and Lepidus, who was then consul, writ a letter to the Achèan confederacy, acquainting them that the senate did not at all approve of such inhuman proceedings. Hereupon the Achèans immediately dispatched Nicodemus of Elis to Rome to justify their conduct. Upon his return he acquainted his republic that Rome was not pleased with the subversion of the government of Sparta, with the demolition of the walls, and the putting to death so many of the inhabitants; but at the same time did not annul the decrees which the assembly had enacted. Rome had then affairs of greater importance on her hands, and therefore put off the discussion of this point to a more proper season.

THE Achèan league was at this time in great repute all over the east, and the friendship of so powerful a state courted by all the princes of Asia. Ptolemy king of Egypt sent ambassadors to renew his ancient alliance with the Achèans, and to offer the republic six thousand shields, and two hundred talents. His offer was accepted, and Lycortas with two others deputed to thank him for the present, and renew the alliance. King Eumenes also sent an embassy for the same purpose, offering a hundred and twenty talents, the interest of which should be settled on the members of the public council. Embassadors came likewise from Seleucus king of Syria, offering the republic in the name of their sovereign ten ships of war completely equipped, and desiring to have the ancient treaty of alliance confirmed by the assembly. All these embassadors were heard in the diet, and the alliance with Ptolemy and Seleucus renewed; but it was not judged expedient to accept at that juncture of the ships which the latter offered. As for Eumenes, Apollonius of Sicyon exhorted in a long speech the Achèans, not only to reject the present that was offered by his embassadors, but to look upon him as an enemy, since he attempted to bribe the members of that venerable assembly; which he would not have done, if he had not something in view prejudicial to their true interest. His speech was heard with great applause, and the renewing of the alliance postponed till a farther opportunity.

THE Romans having now got the better of all their enemies in the east, resumed the cause of the Lacedæmonians with a design to humble the Achèans, whose great power began to raise no small jealousy at Rome. Three commissioners were therefore named, of which Q. Cæcilius was the chief, to go first into Macedonia, and from thence into Achaia, to examine matters on the spot. These having settled the affairs of Macedon, pursuant to their commission, hastened to Peloponnesus. Aristenes, who was then prætor, hearing of their arrival, assembled all the chiefs of the republic at Argos, and invited Cæcilius with his colleagues thither. Cæcilius being introduced to the council, began his speech by commending the zeal of the Achèans for the welfare of their country, and extolling the wisdom of their governors. He then added that he could not forbear telling them, that their behaviour towards the

* LIV. l. xxxviii. c. 30—34.

* LIV. ibid.

* POLYB. in legat. c. 41. p. 850, 852.

† POLYB. ibid.

(U) This cruel treatment of so renowned a city as Sparta reflects no great honour on Philopæmen. Plutarch, who justly ranks him among the greatest commanders of Greece, seems in a certain manner to palliate this action, since he could not justify it. His insinuating upon the re-establishment of the exiles was no way blameable; for most of them had been banished by Macbanidas, Lycurgus, and Nabis, for attempting to place on the throne Agessipolis, to whom the kingdom of Sparta of right belonged. But all the other steps Philopæmen took on this occasion betrayed a great deal of passion, and a revengeful temper, which could not be satisfied but by the utter destruction of his enemies.

Lacedæmonians had been very much censured at Rome; and therefore he exhorted them ^a to atone some way or other for their imprudent conduct on that occasion. Aristenes, who acted under-hand in concert with Cæcilius, did not make any reply. Diophanes of Megalopolis, who was a professed enemy to Philopæmen, made other complaints against him; but took no notice of his proceedings at Lacedæmon. Upon this Philopæmen, Lycortas, and Archeon spoke in their turns, and their Speeches in defence of the late proceedings at Sparta made such an impression on the council, that when Cæcilius withdrew they came to a resolution, that nothing should be altered in the decrees that had been enacted, and that this answer should be given to the Roman commissioners. When Cæcilius heard it, he desired that the general assembly might be convened. But they replied that he must first produce a letter from the senate of Rome, whereby the Achæans should be desired to meet. As Cæcilius had no such letter, they told him plainly that they would not assemble. This exasperated the Roman to such a degree, that he left Achaia without making any further enquiries ².

ON his return to Rome he acquainted the senate with what he had transacted in Peloponnesus. Whereupon Apollonidas, whom the Achæans had sent to plead their cause before the senate, was introduced. He endeavoured to justify the conduct of Philopæmen and his Countrymen with respect to the Lacedæmonians, and told them for what reason they had refused to call, at the instance of Cæcilius, a general assembly. After the Achæan ambassador those from Sparta were admitted. Philopæmen, as we have observed above, restored the Spartan exiles; and these very exiles were the men, who since their return had most zealously contended for the recovery of the ancient splendor and liberty of their native country. Two of these, Areus and Alcibiades, were on this occasion appointed by the Lacedæmonians to implore the justice of the Roman senate. They represented with great eloquence, and in a very moving manner, the miserable condition to which Sparta, once mistress of Greece, was reduced; how its walls were demolished, and the citizens dragged into Achaia, and there sold for slaves (W); how the sacred laws of Lycurgus, to which Sparta owed her grandeur and glory, were entirely abolished, &c.

THE senate after hearing and weighing the reasons on both sides, ordered Appius Claudius, and two others, who were soon to set out for Macedon, to put an end to this dispute, and referred the contending parties to the judgment which they should give on the spot in the assembly of the Achæans. In the mean time they required the Achæans to convene their general assembly whenever the Roman ambassadors should desire it; since the Roman senate admitted them as often as they required an audience ³.

SOMETIME before the arrival of the Roman commissioners in Peloponnesus, Lycortas, at that time prætor, summoned the general assembly to examine the affair of the Lacedæmonians, that he might be ready to answer the questions which the commissioners should ask him, and at the same time know how his own countrymen stood affected. He represented to them such things as they might fear from the Romans, who seemed to favour the interest of Lacedæmon more than that of Achaia; he expatiated chiefly on the ingratitude of Areus and Alcibiades, who, though they owed their return into their own country to the Achæans, had yet been so base as to speak in the senate against them, as if they had drove them from their country. He ended his speech with these words: "But after all they are our subjects, and it is rebellion in them to bring a process against their masters. What punishment then have they deserved?" At these words loud cries were heard from all parts of the assembly, desiring the prætor to put the affair to the vote, and nothing being listened to but passion, a decree passed condemning Areus, Alcibiades, and all who attended them in their embassy, to be put to death. But in the mean time the Roman commissioners arrived, and the scene was changed. The assembly of the Achæans was then sitting at Clitor, a little city of Arcadia, and as soon as Appius appeared there he took the highest place, and acted rather as a judge than a private deputy. The harangue with which he began discovered his intentions, and espouse the cause of the Lacedæmonians.

The Romans

² POLYN. in legat. c. 41. p. 853, 854.

³ POLYN. ibid. c. 42. LIV. l. xxxix. c. 33.

(W) Philopæmen ordered those slaves, who had been set free by the tyrants, to be sought out and sold; and with the money arising from the sale, he rebuilt a portico, which the Lacedæmonians had destroyed at Megalopolis his native city.

a made the Achaëans fear the worst. He told them, that the senate had been strongly affected with the complaints of the Lacedæmonians, and could not but disapprove of all the steps that had been taken on that occasion. He inveighed against the perfidiousness and cruelty of those who had massacred the envoys from Lacedæmon, a city venerable for its antiquity, and exclaimed against the abolition of the laws of Lycurgus, which had been so much admired by all the nations of the world. Lycortas the prætor, who was a friend to Philopæmen, on whom the accusation fell, undertook to defend the common cause of the republic, and the conduct of a great man whom he loved. His speech, for which we refer our readers to Livy^a, was very apposite, and well becoming the head of a nation. But Appius was little affected with it; without descending to particulars, or taking any notice of the arguments Lycortas had produced to justify their conduct, he desired them to restore Lacedæmon her ancient rights and privileges voluntarily, lest Rome should force them to it. These words drew sighs from the whole assembly; but fear had got the better of their resentment. They desired the commissioners to do what they thought fit, but not oblige the Achaëans to break their oath by annulling themselves the decree which they had sworn to observe. This submission appeased the anger of Appius, who contented himself at present with only repealing the sentence that was just before pronounced against Areus and Alcibiades. With this act of power and authority they put an end to the sessions, and leaving Greece returned to Italy^b.

c THE commissioners having made their report in the senate, it was decreed, that those persons who had been condemned by the Achaëans should be recalled and restored; that all sentences pronounced in the assembly of Achaia against Lacedæmon should be repealed; and lastly, that for the future the Lacedæmonians should be deemed members of the Achaean body, and treated accordingly. Pausanias adds an article that is not mentioned by Livy, viz. that the walls which had been demolished should be rebuilt^b. Q. Marcius was appointed to go into Greece and see this sentence executed; which he did accordingly, obliging both parties to accept and sign the decree.

d BUT this storm was scarce appeased when a new one arose. The city of Messene The city of Messene withdraws itself from the Achaean league. had been a member of the Achaean body ever since the war of the confederates, as we have related above. But one Democrates, who had a particular enmity to Philopæmen, drew it off from the league, and was arming the Messenians his countrymen in order to defend the city against Philopæmen, who was then prætor the eighth time. The brave Achaean no sooner heard of the revolt, but he made what haste he could to seize the city of Corone (X) before the rebel had made himself master of it. But as he was sick, and actually kept his bed with a fever when the first news was brought him of the disturbances at Messene, Dinocrates got to Corone before him. Then the Achaean general assembling the Megalopolitan youth, who had offered to follow him as volunteers, and making a counter-march advanced towards Messene, with e a design to fall upon the revolted while Dinocrates was busy at Corone. But on his march he met with Dinocrates, attacked him, and put him to flight at the first onset. Philopæmen on this occasion forgot his sickness, and the fatigues of the day before; for he had marched from Argos to Megalopolis, which was above sixty miles, in twelve hours. While the Megalopolitans were pursuing the rebels, a body of above five hundred men, whom Dinocrates had had the precaution to leave in the open country about Messene to defend it, came and joined him. The Messenians being encouraged by this reinforcement, faced about and renewed the action. The Megalopolitans, though led on by Philopæmen and Lycortas, were too weak to make head against such a body of fresh men; Philopæmen therefore made it his chief business to Philopæmen marches against the rebels. retire in good order, which branch of the military art he understood better than any general of his age. To this end he marched into rough and narrow ways, whither the enemy could not without danger follow him; he placed Lycortas and the Megalopolitans in the van, and brought up the rear himself, facing about from time to time, But is defeated.

^a LIV. l. xxxix. c. 35—37.^b LIV. ibid.^c PAUS. in Achaic. p. 414.(X) Coron or Corone was a city of Messenia, and is still in being in the province of Belvedere, and known by the same name. Plutarch (9) insteadof Corone puts Colonis or Colone, which was also a city in the territory of Messene, as appears from Plutony.(9) Plutarch in Philop.

Philopœmen
taken prisoner.

Philopœmen
put to death by the Messeni-
ans.
Year of the
flood 2820.
Before Christ
283.

and keeping the enemy at some distance. As his troops retreated with too great a precipitation, he was left quite alone in a defile, and surrounded by the enemy. However, they durst not even then attack him, but keeping at a distance drove him with showers of arrows into a narrow place, where he could not turn his horse. Yet still he supported himself, though quite wore out with sickness, the fatigues of his march, and old age, being then in his seventieth year. He spurred on his horse cross the rocks, and was very near rejoining the main body of his small army, when his horse stumbled and threw him. By the fall he received a deep wound on the head, and lay senseless till the enemies thinking him dead began to strip him. He then opened his eyes and seemed to revive, when Dinocrates, who never before had dared to look him in the face, ordered his hands to be tied behind his back, and in that condition carried him to Messene. When the Messenians received the news of this victory, and heard that Philopœmen was taken prisoner, they all ran to the gates of the city to see what they could no otherwise believe. Great was the joy of the rebel city, when the news was confirmed by the relation of those very Messenians who had taken him. But upon the sight of the hero of Greece reduced to captivity more by an accident than any want of valour, most of the spectators were so much touched with compassion, that they could not refrain from tears; they remembered the exploits of this great man, under whom many of them had fought; they remembered the favours they had received at his hands, and how they had been by his means delivered from the oppressions of the tyrant Nabis. As many had not been able to see him by reason of the croud, they desired he might be carried to the theatre, and there shewn to the multitude. But the magistrates fearing lest the esteem and love which the Messenians had formerly shewn him should revive, did not suffer the illustrious prisoner to be long exhibited in this manner. They hurried him away on a sudden to a vault called the treasury, without doubt, because the public money had been formerly kept there. This was a subterraneous place, whither neither light nor air entered from without, and was stopped by a large stone raised up and let down by a crane. In this cavern Philopœmen wounded, sick and fatigued, spent a miserable night. Early in the morning the senate and people met. The latter were for getting favourable terms in exchange for their prisoner, and sending him back to his own country. But the senators, who had been the authors of the revolt, and consequently were afraid they should find in him an implacable enemy, agreed to put him to death. And accordingly without delay sent the executioner into the vault with orders to force the prisoner to drink a dose of poison. The moment the illustrious Megalopolitan saw him carrying a cup in his hand, he guessed what he was bringing him, and raising himself up with great difficulty, for he was very weak, he asked the executioner with great tranquillity, Whether Lycortas and the Megalopolitan youth had got into a place of safety. Not one of them is killed, answered the executioner, they have all made their escape. That is enough, replied Philopœmen, I die content. He then took the cup of poison with great cheerfulness, and drank the fatal potion with joy. Thus died one of the greatest heroes that Greece or any other country ever produced. He was no ways inferior in valour, military knowledge and virtue, to any of the boasted heroes of Rome. Had Achaia been nearer to an equality with Rome, he would have preserved his country from the yoke which the Roman republic forced it to bear. Both the Greek and Roman writers put him upon the level with Hannibal and Scipio, who were his contemporaries, and happened to die the same year. They all allow him to have been not only one of the greatest commanders, but one of the greatest statesmen of his age. To his valour and prudence Achaia owed all her glory, which upon his death began to decline, there being none after him in that republic able to oppose her enemies with the like steadiness and prudence; whence Philopœmen was called the last of the Greeks, as Brutus was afterwards stiled the last of the Romans.

WHEN the news of his death was spread among the cities of the Achaean league, the rage of the people against his assassins was as great as their grief for the loss of so great a man. The general assembly was immediately convened at Megalopolis, and Lycortas, at that time the most famous general in Achaia, put in the room of the deceased. The new general without loss of time entered the Messenian territory at the head of an army which was soon raised, all the young men that were fit to a bear arms, shewing a great eagerness to revenge the death of a man to whom their country owed all its splendor. Lycortas had been his particular friend, and therefore was determined at all events to bring the authors of his death to condign punishment. Thus both the general and soldiery breathing nothing but revenge, they advanced to the very walls of Messene, after having laid waste the whole territory, and summoned the rebellious city to surrender. The people in spite of the prætor and senate opened the gates to the Achæan troops, and put them in possession both of the city and castle. This submissive behaviour asswaged the wrath of Lycortas, who did not think it adviseable to treat the rebels as their furious revolt seemed to deserve. He only insisted upon their delivering up the ring-leaders of the rebellion, and such b as were any ways concerned in the death of Philopæmen. They readily complied with his request, and the assassins loaded with irons were brought before him; but Dinocrates, to prevent a more cruel death, laid violent hands on himself; the rest were afterwards carried to Megalopolis, in order to be sacrificed at the tomb of the deceased hero^d.

* LIV. l. xxxix. c. 48. PLUT. in Philop. p. 366, 368. POLYB. in legat. c. 52, 53.

Messene surrenders to the Achæans.

AND now nothing remained but to pay the funeral honours to the body of Philopæmen, which had been left unburied in the bottom of a dungeon. It was taken from thence with great pomp, burnt according to custom on a funeral pile, and his ashes deposited in an urn adorned with festoons and fillets. Lycortas being now to leave the conquered city, did not disband his troops, and send them to their respective c homes as usual. They all marched out of the city in good order as it were in funeral triumph. The infantry marched first crowned with laurel to shew their victory, but shedding floods of tears for the deceased hero. Next came the urn carried by Polybius the historian son of Lycortas, surrounded by the prime nobility of Achaia, and the Messenian prisoners bound in chains. The urn was followed by the cavalry in their richest apparel and caparisons. All the inhabitants of the neighbouring towns and villages flocked to meet the solemn procession; but it was visible in every one's countenance, that their joy for the victory was damped with real grief on this mournful occasion. In this manner they advanced towards Megalopolis, Philopæmen's native city, and arriving there paid him the last honours with the utmost pomp and magnificence. The Messenian captives were stoned at his tomb, and each city of Achaia
 d gave some signal proof of the esteem they had for him while alive, and of the real grief they felt for the loss of so great a hero. Statues were erected to his memory in most cities of Greece with noble inscriptions. The magistrates of Megalopolis passed a decree, ordering a bull to be yearly sacrificed at his tomb; during which sacrifice a panegyric was pronounced, and a company of young children sung hymns in his praise^e (Y).

Philopæmen's ashes carried in great pomp to Megalopolis.

WHEN news was brought to Rome that the Achæans had restored the city of Messene to the league, their ambassadors there were addressed in quite different terms from those which had been used before. The senate told them that they had been careful e not to suffer either arms or provisions to be carried from Italy to Messene. This plainly shews the insincerity of the Romans, and the little regard they had to truth in their transactions with other nations. For when the Achæans demanded the succours which they were obliged to furnish them according to the treaty, and desired at least that they would not suffer arms or provisions to be transported out of Italy to Messene, it was answered, that when any city broke off from the Achæan league, the senate did not think themselves obliged to enter into those disputes, nor concern themselves with the claims and pretensions which each city might have. This was giving, as it were, the signal to all the cities engaged in the Achæan league to take up arms, and separate as they pleased from the alliance. But now they endeavour to persuade the f Achæans that they had prohibited the subjects of the republic from lending any kind of assistance to the Messenian rebels, and make a merit with them of what they had not done. The Achæans at this time were masters of all Peloponnesus, Philip king of Macedon was preparing anew for war, the Ætolians were disgusted with Rome, and

^d LIV. FLUT. POLYB. ubi supra.

^e Idem, ibid.

(Y) Several years after when Corinth was taken and destroyed by Mummius, a Roman brought articles of impeachment against Philopæmen, in order to have the statues and monuments erected all over Greece to the memory of this great man thrown down and abolished. He accused him of having been an enemy to the Romans, and shewn on all occasions his hatred to the republic. The cause was heard in council before Mummius, and the charge refuted with great eloquence and solidity by Polybius.

Antiochus ready to pass over into Greece. No wonder then that Rome was very cautious of giving any umbrage to the league in so critical a juncture.

The Lacedæmonian exiles recur to the Romans.

WE have observed above that the Roman senate had decreed among many other articles that Sparta should be admitted into the Achaean league, and that Marcus had been sent into Greece to see this decree put in execution. However, the Achaean ambassadors on their return from Rome acquainted the assembly that the Lacedæmonian exiles, who had behaved with great ingratitude towards them, were not included in that decree, and consequently might be driven anew from the city without disobligeing the senate. Upon their report the exiles were again ordered to depart the city, notwithstanding the strong opposition made by Diophanes, who undertook to defend their cause. Being thus reduced to their former state of misery, they sent ambassadors to Rome imploring the protection of the senate. The senators were touched with their complaints, and wrote letters to the council of Achaia, desiring them to give the Lacedæmonian exiles leave to settle again in their native country. These letters were delivered to the exiles, and by them on their return to the council of Achaia, which returned no other answer than that the matter should be considered after the arrival of the Achaean ambassadors from Rome. Not long after the ambassadors returned, and declared before the council, that the senate had wrote in favour of the exiles, not out of any regard to them, but to redeem themselves from their importunities^f.

Callicrates betrays his country to ingratiate himself with the Romans.

AFTER the ambassadors had been heard, Lycortas was of opinion that no notice should be taken of the letters which the senate had wrote; but Hyperbates, who was then prætor, and Callicrates were of a different opinion. Lycortas however carried it, and it was resolved that ambassadors should be sent to acquaint the Roman senate with the reasons which had moved them to adhere to their former resolutions, notwithstanding their recommendation. Callicrates, Lyfades, and Aratus, were appointed ambassadors, and instructions given them agreeable to the deliberations that had been made. When they arrived at Rome, Callicrates acted in direct opposition to his orders; for being introduced to the senate, he exhorted them to exert their authority over his stubborn countrymen, telling them, that if the Greeks paid no regard either to their letters or decrees, they ought to blame themselves for it, such a neglect being entirely owing to their lenity and indolence. In our commonwealth, said he, "there are two parties, one of which maintains that an implicit obedience should be paid to all your orders; the other party pretends that the laws of the country should prevail over your will; and this suits best with the genius of the *Achaean*s, and has a great influence over the populace. Hence such as blindly comply with your ordinances are hated by the people, while those who oppose them are honoured and applauded. We see at this present time the first employments of our republic filled by men, whose only merit consists in a pretended zeal for the laws of their country, in contradiction to the express orders of this august assembly. If you continue to shew such an indifference on this head, all the chief men will certainly oppose you, this being a sure way to ferment. But if you shew favour to those only who espouse your interest, the leading men in all the republics of Greece will declare for you, and the populace soon follow their example. What I have said is plainly confirmed by the present conduct of my countrymen. How long is it since you desired them to recal the Lacedæmonian exiles? Nevertheless they are so far from complying with your request, that they have bound themselves by oath never to restore them^g". Thus the Greeks began to forge their own chains, and ambitious men prostitute to their private interest that liberty which their ancestors had purchased and maintained at the expence of their lives. Callicrates was so transported with ambition, that he chose rather to betray and ruin his country, than suffer any other to have more authority in it than himself.

A speech so well calculated to favour the interest of Rome could not but be very agreeable to the senate. As Callicrates had treacherously pointed out the methods by which they might easily weaken and crush the Greek republics, it was concluded that they should exert themselves in heaping favours upon such as maintained the authority of Rome, and humbling those who presumed to oppose it. Our historian observes, that this was the first time the fatal resolution was taken of depreciating

^f POLYB. in Legat. c. 54.

^g POLYB. in Legat. c. 58.

a those, who in their respective countries had the most noble way of thinking; and raising such as declared right or wrong for the Romans; a resolution which in all countries lessened the number of the true friends of liberty. Henceforth it was a constant maxim of the Roman policy to increase the power and authority of such as favoured their ambitious views in defiance of the laws and constitutions of their respective countries, and oppress by all possible methods those who were sincere friends to the liberty which they had received from their ancestors. This single maxim is sufficient to give us a true idea of the pretended equity and moderation which the Romans discovered on some occasions.

b FROM this period Rome began to treat the Achaëans in a quite different manner from what she had done in former times. Peremptory orders were sent them to restore the Lacedæmonian exiles, and pay a blind obedience to the decrees of the senate. Letters were at the same time directed to the Ætolians, Boeotians, Acarnanians, and other free states of Greece, enjoining them to see the orders of the senate put in execution, and exhorting them to employ in their respective commonwealths men only of such noble sentiments as Callicrates. Thus the Romans requited the eminent services which the Achæans had done them in their wars with Philip and Antiochus, and the inviolable fidelity, with which they had adhered to them, when they were despised by the other states of Greece (Z). Callicrates on his return to Pelponesus spread so artfully the terror of the Roman name, and intimidated the people to such a degree that he was elected prætor; in which employment he restored the Lacedæmonian and Messenian exiles, and omitted nothing that could any ways oblige his patrons the Romans. The Achæans commanded to restore the Lacedæmonian exiles.

c BY these violent methods Rome got numbers of flatterers, but lost many of her best friends; and on the other side Perfes, who had succeeded Philip in the kingdom of Macedon, spared no pains to win over to his party such as were dissatisfied with the Romans. That prince being determined to shake off the yoke which the Romans had laid on him, made it his whole business to draw off the Greek cities and nations from their alliance with Rome. To this end thinking his presence necessary among nations, who would perhaps sooner hearken to a neighbouring king, than a distant republic, he advanced towards Delpbos under pretence of discharging a vow, but in reality to make alliances in Greece. With this view he crossed mount Oeta, and surprized the Greeks with his sudden appearance among them. The terror spread into Asia, and alarmed Eumenes in Pergamus. But Perfes after consulting the oracle returned into his own kingdom, passing through Phthiotis and Thessaly without committing any hostilities in his march. His father had formerly been guilty of great cruelties in all those countries, and therefore the son not only took care to commit no violence on his march, but sent deputies to all the free states, or circular letters remonstrating that they ought not to continue the hatred, they might have conceived against the father to the son, who courted their friendship ^h.

d THE Macedonian's chief attention was to gain over the Achæan republic, which had carried its hatred so far against the Macedonians, that they were not suffered upon any pretence to enter Achaia. It was not only hatred, but policy, that had induced them to make such a decree. For though Philip had greatly disobliged them, especially by putting the two Aratus's to death, yet he had proved in many other respects very beneficent to them; whence they were with much ado prevailed upon to forsake him; and even after they had entered into an alliance with the Romans, some of their leading men still favoured their ancient ally. Wherefore it was thought necessary for the preservation of concord among themselves to use great circumspection, lest by his agents he should foment divisions in the state. Besides, by hearkening to his messages they might give jealousy to their new allies. On these considerations the general assembly of Achaia had enacted a decree, forbidding any Macedonian on what pretence Perfes endeavours to gain over the Achæans. Year of the flood 2825. Before Christ 178.

^h Liv. l. xli. c. 12.

(Z) Polybius ascribes this violent proceeding of the Romans to the compassion which the Spartan exiles raised in the breasts of the senators. The Romans, says he, are easily moved to pity by the complaints of the miserable, and think it their duty to relieve all who fly to them for protection. And this it was that inclined them to espouse the cause of the Lacedæmonian exiles. But we must remember that this in other respects impartial historian wrote this in Rome, and under the eyes of the Romans, after they were absolute lords of Greece (10).

(10) Polyb. legat. c. 58.

- a and told them that they might spare themselves the trouble and expence of marching their troops to join him, since in the present posture of affairs he did not want any foreign succours. With this answer Polybius sent back his colleagues, but remained himself in the Roman camp. In the mean time the Achaëans acquainted Polybius that Appius, who commanded the Roman troops in Epirus, had demanded of their republic five thousand men, which body they were ready to send into Epirus, if the consul approved of it. But Marcus was so far from consenting that any succours should be sent to Appius, that he immediately dispatched Polybius home with orders not to suffer any troops to be sent to Appius, nor his republic to be put to such useless expences. It is difficult, says our historian, to discover the real motives that induced
- b Marcus to act in this manner. Was he for saving the Achaëans the trouble and charges of so long a march? or did he intend to put it out of Appius's power to undertake any thing, since he had not been able to undertake any thing himself? Whatever was his motive, Polybius readily complied with the inclinations of the consul, and returned home. But when the matter was debated in the council of Achaia, difficulties were started by Polybius's friends, and those of his party. For as he was sure to incur the displeasure of the consul, if he did not act agreeable to his charge; so on the other hand orders given him by word of mouth, and in private, did not seem sufficient to warrant the conduct of the council in refusing succours to Appius, who really wanted them. In this case therefore they had recourse to a decree which
- c had been lately published in all the cities of Greece, by two commissioners sent for that purpose from Rome. The purport of this decree was to forbid the Roman generals to exact any thing of the nations in confederacy with Rome without an express order from the senate, and prohibiting the allies to submit to any exaction or even demands of the consuls, prætors, tribunes, &c. without such an order. The tyranny which the commanders of the Roman fleets and armies exercised over their most faithful allies, gave occasion to this decree. For want of an order from the senate, the messenger sent by Appius was dismissed without the succours he demanded. Thus Polybius made his court to the consul, and at the same time consulted the interest of his country¹.
- d THE ensuing year Paulus Æmilius, who succeeded Marcus in the command of the army in Macedon, being informed that Perfes was drawing together a mighty army with a design to come to a decisive battle, sent to solicit succours from the allies, especially the Achaëans, who upon the first summons sent him what troops he wanted under the conduct of the most experienced commanders they had. These distinguished themselves in a very particular manner at the famous battle of Pydna, which put an end to the Macedonian war, Perfes being entirely defeated, and soon after reduced to such straits, that he was obliged to deliver up himself and all his children to the conquerors. And now the Romans, having by this victory triumphed over their enemies in the east, began to treat their friends in a quite different manner
- e from what they had used while they stood in need of their assistance. Ten commissioners were appointed to settle the affairs of Macedon, and inspect those of Greece, that is, to prosecute and punish without any regard to justice and equity all those who during the war had betrayed any inclination to the Macedonians. These haughty judges summoned all the heads of the Greek nations to appear before their tribunal at Amphipolis, in order to compose their differences, as they gave out, and restore Greece to its ancient tranquillity. The Ætolians appeared first in mourning habits, and making great lamentations. The subject of their complaints was, that two members of their assembly, Lyfischus and Tisippus, whom the protection of the Romans, to whose interest they were devoted, rendered very powerful in Ætolia, had surrounded the senate with
- f soldiers lent them by Babius, who commanded in the country for the Romans, and put to death five hundred and fifty of their senators for no other crime, but because they were thought to favour Perfes. The commissioners after hearing their complaints confined their enquiries to this point alone, whether those who had been thus massacred were for the Romans or Perfes, and having found that they had spoke in the senate for Perfes, the council passed a decree by which the murderers were acquitted, and those who had been put to death declared to have suffered justly. Babius alone was blamed for employing the Roman soldiers in an execution which had no relation to military affairs^m.

The haughty behaviour of the Romans
after the defeat of Perfes.

¹ Liv. ibid. POLYB. legat. c. 77.

^m Liv. l. xlv. c. 28, 32.

Tear of the
flood 2836.
Before Christ
167.

THIS sentence spread great terror among those who had shewn any affection for Perfes, and increased beyond measure the pride and insolence of the partisans of Rome. In each city the leading men were divided into three factions. The first, and without doubt the most numerous, adhered to the Macedonians; the second was devoted to the Romans, and the third in opposition to the other two were neither for the Macedonians nor the Romans. The latter, whose party was the least numerous, as it consisted only of prudent men, were afraid that whatever party should prevail, their liberties might be in danger, and their concern was to preserve their country both from the Macedonian and Roman tyranny. These were in great esteem, and beloved in their respective cities, and had acted prudently in all the measures they had taken. But this was not sufficient, as we shall see, to screen them from the vengeance of the Romans. The commissioners first wreaked their anger on those who had favoured Perfes, for the emissaries of Rome flocked to Amphipolis from all the countries of Greece to accuse them before the council. These treacherous men informed the commissioners, that besides those who had openly espoused the cause of Perfes, there were many others, who were no less averse from the Romans in their hearts; adding, that they would never have their authority quietly settled in Greece, till they had utterly destroyed both the favourers of Perfes, and those who had affected to stand neuter, and not to fall in with either party. The ten commissioners entirely approved what the informers advanced, and made it the rule of their conduct to quash in all the Greek cities, not only the Macedonian, but the neutral party, and confer honours on those only, who preferred the interest of Rome to all other regards whatsoever. What justice could be expected from an assembly that was determined to treat all those as criminals who were not of the Roman party, and confer employments on such only as declared themselves their accusers and enemies? We leave the reader to judge from hence of the so much boasted equity of the Romans. They were just and honest when they found their account in justice and honesty, but ever ready to sacrifice both to their boundless ambition.

THE most sanguine of these informers were Callicrates and Andronidas both Achaëans, and greatly attached to the Roman party. They laid claim to the chief employments of their republic, or were willing to maintain themselves in them with the assistance of the Romans. With this view they informed against all those among their countrymen, who were in a condition to dispute the highest posts with them; and their accusations turned upon this, that their rivals had been friends and partisans of Perfes before his overthrow. Besides the Achaëans Callicrates accused a great many others, and gave in a long list of such as had either declared for the Macedonians, or stood up for the defence of their own rights and privileges in Acarnania, Epirus, and Boeotia. All these were ordered by Paulus Æmilius to follow him to Rome, and there give an account of their conduct. But as to the Achaëans the commissioners thought it advisable to judge them in their own country, and to send two of the chief members of the council into Achaia to try them there; and accordingly C. Claudius and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus were named and set out for Achaia. Three reasons induced them to act in this manner: the first was, because they apprehended that the Achaëans, who were very powerful, and no less jealous of their liberty, would not obey their orders should they be commanded to justify themselves at Rome; the second, because they had not found any of their letters among Perfes's papers; and the third, because it was necessary to protect Callicrates and the other informers against the insults of their countrymen.

Unwarrantable proceedings of the Romans.

ONE of the two commissioners sent into Achaia, Pausanias does not say which, a man of a most vile character, complained in the assembly of the Achaëans that many of the chief men of the league had assisted Perfes against the Romans, and therefore desired that all those might be condemned to die, whom he should name after sentence given. After sentence given, cried out the whole assembly, What justice is that? Name them first, and let them answer for themselves; which if they cannot do, we engage to condemn them. Since you promise to condemn them, replied the haughty Roman with an assuming air, all your prætors, all who have bore any office in your republic, or commanded your armies, are guilty of this crime. At these words Xenon, a person of great credit, and highly respected by the whole league, spoke to this effect: I have commanded

* JUSTIN. l. xxxiv. c. 1. PAUSAN. in Achaic. p. 416.

a commanded the army, and have had the honour to be the chief magistrate of the league; I protest I have never done any thing contrary to the interest of Rome; and if any one can charge me with that crime, as it is now styled, let him appear; I am ready to clear myself either in the assembly of the Achæans, or before the Roman senate. The Roman took hold of this expression, and said, That since Xenon had named the senate, he and the rest could not appeal to a more impartial judge; then he began to name all those who had been accused by Callicrates as more in the the Macedonian than the Roman interest, ordering them to appear and plead their cause before the senate. They were above a thousand, all men of distinguished merit, and who had nothing so much at heart as the welfare of their country; and this was the only crime that could be laid b to their charge. This sentence was a mortal wound to the liberty of Achaia. That unhappy republic was deprived at once of all those who had shewn any zeal for the preservation of her liberty. Such tyrannical proceedings had been unknown there even under Philip and his son Alexander; for neither of these princes ever thought of causing those who opposed them to be sent into Macedon, but referred their trials to the council of the Amphistions their natural judges. Upon the arrival of these unhappy men at Rome, they were banished into different towns of Italy, and kept there close prisoners, as if they had been already tried and condemned by the assembly of the Achæans. When news of these tyrannical proceedings was brought into Achaia, the assembly sent embassy after embassy to acquaint the senate that their banished countrymen had not

c been tried at home, but referred for their trial to the Roman senate; they begged that they would give them a hearing, condemn such as they should find guilty, and allow the others to return home. But the republic was inexorable; she obstinately insisted upon their having been found guilty in Achaia, and sent to Rome only to hear what punishment she was pleased to inflict upon them. Hereupon the Achæans sent a solemn embassy to the senate to protest that the pretended guilty persons had never been tried, or even heard by their assembly. Euratas, who was at the head of this embassy, being introduced to the senate, declared the orders he had received, earnestly intreating the senate in the name of his republic, that they would but once hear the persons accused, and not suffer them to perish without being condemned. It were to be wished, d said he, that the Roman senate, that august and venerable assembly which has never been known to swerve in its decisions from the strictest rules of equity, would take the cause of these unhappy men into their own hands; but if affairs of greater importance do not allow them leisure to examine the matter themselves, let them refer it to the assembly of the Achæans, who are ready to punish with the utmost rigour such as they shall find guilty of any crime that may be laid to their charge. As this demand was very equitable, the senate was greatly puzzled what to answer. They did not think it advisable to try the cause, as knowing that the accusation was groundless. On the other hand to dismiss the exiles, and suffer them to return to their own country, was to disoblige their partisans in Greece, who placed all the hopes of their preferment in the ruin of those who had a better title to favour than themselves.

e After several consultations, the senate for want of a better answer returned this, That they did not think it expedient for the welfare of Achaia that these men should return home. Such tyrannical proceedings caused an universal consternation in Achaia, all the inhabitants appeared in mourning habits, and lamented the loss of their countrymen no otherwise than if they had been their dearest relations. Callicrates and Andronidas became more than ever the objects of the public hatred. They were never mentioned in the assemblies but with horror and detestation. Even the children fell upon them in the public streets, calling them traitors and enemies to their country. Nay, the Achæans carried their rage so far, that when the two informers had one day gone into a public f bath at Sicyon, no body would wash with them, or even after them, till the water was let out, and the place purified. This general uneasiness made Achaia still the more suspected by the Roman senate, who kept the prisoners more closely confined than ever. These were the first seeds of a war, which we shall soon see break out between Rome and Achaia; the first sparks of that fire which consumed Corinth.

THE Achæans however did not give over soliciting the senate for the release of the exiles. They sent new deputies to beg their return as a favour, left in taking upon them their defence, they should seem to oppose the will of the senate. The deputies appeared at Rome in the attire of suppliants, and took care not to say any thing in the

A thousand Achæans commanded to appear before the Roman senate.

* LIV. l. xlv. c. 31. PAUSAN. in Achaic. p. 417. POLYB. legat. 105.

harangue they made before the senate that could give offence. Their speech was a modest, and extremely reserved; but the conscript fathers continued inexorable, declaring that they would not upon any account whatsoever alter the measures they had taken. The Achæans on the other hand would not give over soliciting and importuning the senate in behalf of their countrymen. They sent several embassies at different times, and made what interest they could among their friends at Rome, and elsewhere, to get their petition backed by persons who were better received than themselves. But all was to no effect; they could not be prevailed upon even to suffer Polybius, who was one of the exiles, and kept under close confinement at Rome, to appear before the senate and plead the common cause. This is the so much vaunted equity of the Romans; these the civilizers of barbarous nations, the asserters of the rights and liberties of mankind.

The Achæans
after seventeen years confinement are sent home.

SEVENTEEN years were already past, and the far greater part of the unfortunate exiles dead in their confinement, when the senate at last was prevailed upon to suffer those few who were still alive, to return home. Polybius, as we have hinted above, was one of these unhappy Achæans; but had been kept at Rome, whither his reputation had reached before him, and procured him that distinction. During his confinement in that city, his merit, wisdom, and learning, gained the love and esteem of the greatest men in the senate. He was particularly dear to the two sons of Paulus Æmilius; the eldest of these had been adopted into the family of the Fabii, and the youngest into that of the Scipio's. The latter, who afterwards destroyed Carthage and Numantia, at the request of his friend solicited Cato the censor to speak in the senate in favour of the Achæans, knowing that his opinion would be of great weight with the members of that assembly. Cato, out of complaisance to young Scipio, promised to back the petition of the new deputies that were then come from Achaia to intercede for the exiles. When they were admitted to audience, warm debates arose, as usual, among the senators, some few being for sending them home, and the others opposing it, when Cato rose up, and with great gravity said, "That to see the Roman senate dispute with great warmth whether some poor old Greeks should be buried in Italy, or in their own country, would make one think that they had nothing at all to do". This pleasantry coming from so grave a man as Cato, made the senators ashamed of so long a contest, and determined them at last to send back the exiles into Peloponnesus. Polybius was for supplicating the senate, that they might be reinstated in all the honours and dignities they had enjoyed before their banishment; but before he presented that request to the senate, he thought proper to hear Cato's opinion, who told him smiling: "Polybius, you do not imitate the wisdom of Ulysses. You are for returning into the cave of the Cyclops for some poor tatters you have left there". Accordingly the exiles returned to their own country, but their number was much diminished; for of the thousand and upwards that came from Achaia, no more than three hundred returned thither. The rest had perished in Italy with hunger and grief, and some had suffered like criminals for attempting to make their escape. Such inhuman proceedings deserve no other name but that of the most wanton and oppressive tyranny. The republic of Achaia was not subject to, but upon a level with that of Rome. Those brave Achæans, who were thus barbarously treated, had most of them served under the Roman standards, and greatly contributed to that very victory, which rendered the conquerors thus haughty and over-bearing.

As for Polybius, he made no use of this permission, but remained in Rome, where that very virtue which had brought him into distress was not only the means of his relief, but of his exaltation to greater dignities than those he lost. He attended Scipio Æmilianus in all his military expeditions, and signalized himself no less in the service of Rome, than he had formerly done in that of Achaia.

THE exiles on their return found Achaia rent into different factions, and the minds of the common people entirely estranged from the Romans. They only wanted an opportunity to make Rome repent of the rigorous treatment she had shewn to the Achæan prisoners. This aversion was artfully fomented by their chief magistrates, and the leading men in the republic, who were for the most part professed enemies to the Romans. Such an universal hatred could not be long kept within the bounds of moderation; it soon broke out into an open war, which ended in the entire reduction of Achaia, and the dissolution of the Achæan league.

- a To trace this war back to its first origin: a certain dispute arising between the Albenians and the inhabitants of Oropus (A), the latter had recourse to the Achæans. Menalcidas, by birth a Lacedæmonian, was then prætor of Achaia; to him the Oropians applied, agreeing to give him ten talents if he prevailed on the diet, in which he presided, to espouse their cause, and assist them with troops. The Lacedæmonian, who preferred his own private advantage to the good of the public, accepted the proposal, and in order to gain his point, promised to divide the money with Callicrates if he could by his interest extort from the general assembly their consent to send troops to the defence of Oropus. Callicrates, allured with this bait, prevailed on the assembly to take the city of Oropus under their protection; and accordingly Menalcidas b was immediately dispatched with a strong body of chosen troops to make head against the Albenians, who had already taken the field. But Menalcidas came too late, the Albenians had already plundered Oropus, and retired with an immense booty; however the avaritious prætor demanded the ten talents, as if his assistance had been effectual; but could not prevail on himself to divide them with Callicrates: he first put him off with fair promises, and at last told him in plain words, that he would keep the whole sum to himself. Callicrates, who was as revengeful as the other was deceitful, accused him, as soon as he was out of his office, of having used his utmost endeavours with the Roman senate to withdraw his country from the Achæan league. The process was carried on with such rigour, that Menalcidas would have c been sentenced to death, if he had not by a present of three talents prevailed upon Diaus, who succeeded him in the prætorship, to acquit him in spite of all the evidences that were produced against him. This drew on Diaus the hatred of all the nation, as if he likewise was inclined to the Lacedæmonians. This was a great stain on his reputation, which he endeavoured to wipe off by this bold step. He maintained in the general assembly, that the Lacedæmonians were subject to the Achæan league even in criminal cases. Rome had decreed the contrary; but this screened him from the hatred he had incurred by favouring Menalcidas the Lacedæmonian. When news was brought to Lacedæmon that Diaus was endeavouring to get this new law approved by the general assembly, the whole city was in an uproar, for the Roman senate had in d express terms allowed them to judge their criminals in their own private assemblies; they were for sending deputies to Rome, but Diaus pretended that only the general assembly of the whole nation had a right of sending ambassadors thither.¹
- THESE arbitrary proceedings greatly exasperated the Lacedæmonians; but as they were no ways in a condition to make head against the whole strength of Achaia, they humbled themselves so far as to send deputies to Diaus, who was advancing at the head of a considerable army, intreating him not to use force till other means of a reconciliation proved fruitless. The prætor answered the deputies, that he had no quarrel with the Lacedæmonians in general, but only with a few disturbers of the public peace, whom he named to the number of twenty-four. Upon the return of e the deputies the council of Lacedæmon assembled, when Agefisthenes, a man of great authority, moved that those, who had been named by Diaus, should of their own accord abandon their country, as if they had been banished, and carry their complaints to Rome. The motion was applauded by the whole Assembly, and the persons, that had been named, withdrew without delay from their native country. When the council of Lacedæmon heard that they were got out of Laconia, sentence of death was pronounced against them in a full assembly, which assuaged the anger of Diaus and his Achæans. But when they heard that the exiles, together with Menalcidas, were embarked for Italy to lay their complaints before the senate, Diaus and Callicrates made what haste they could after them to plead the cause of the Achæans f against the Lacedæmonians. But they did not both reach Rome; Callicrates, who had great interest in that city, died at Rhodes, whither his affairs had called him. Diaus therefore and Menalcidas only appeared before the senate, and by their Greek eloquence disguised the truth with such artifice, that the senators could not come to any determination. Commissioners were therefore appointed to determine the dispute on the

What gave rise to the war with the Romans.

New troubles in Peloponnesus.

¹ PAUSAN. in Achaia.

(A) The ancient geographers mention three cities bearing this name; one, called by Aristotle Græco, stood in the island of Eubœa; another, the native city of Selenus Nicator, belonged to Mace- don; the third, which is the city we are now speaking of, stood in Boeotia, near the borders of Attica, forty-four miles north of Athens. It is now a village called by the natives Rops.

spot. But as they were too dilatory in setting out, Menalcidas and Diaus arriving a in Peloponnesus long before them, put all the country in a flame, which they on their arrival could not extinguish. Diaus assured the Achaean assembly that every thing would be determined by the commissioners in their favour. On the other hand, Menalcidas brought the Lacedaemonians word, that in a short time their city and territory would be separated from the Achaean league, and declared an independent state. The *Achaean*s hearing this resolved to take up arms, and force the Lacedaemonians to change their language^a.

Metellus endeavours to oppose them.

Metellus, who was then busy in settling the affairs of Macedon, being informed of the troubles in Peloponnesus, desired the ambassadors, which Rome was sending into Asia, to take Corinth and Lacedaemon in their way in order to persuade the *Achaean*s b to suspend all hostilities till the arrival of the commissioners, who had been nominated to compose their differences in an amicable manner. These ambassadors arriving in Achaia found Democritus, who had succeeded Diaus in the office of prætor, in full march with a design to fall upon the Lacedaemonians. They exhorted him to disband his men and return home, but the prætor despising their advice advanced to the very walls of Lacedaemon, and there gained a considerable advantage over the Lacedaemonians, who having lost a thousand of their men, retired with such precipitation into the city, that if Democritus had warmly pursued them, he might have entered Lacedaemon with the fugitives. But he was over-hasty in founding a retreat, contenting himself with the advantage he had gained; which so displeased the general assembly, that they fined him in fifty talents, a sum which he not being able to raise, was obliged to lay down his office, and save himself by flight out of the Achaean territories. Then Diaus, who had been the author of all the troubles, and was a declared enemy to Lacedaemon, was again elected prætor. Metellus no sooner heard of his promotion, but he sent a deputation to him, intreating him to forbear hostilities, till the arrival of the commissioners. Diaus complied with his request, but was not in the mean time idle; for he gained over to the *Achaean*s by secret negotiations all the cities that bordered upon Laconia, and having fortified them, kept that country and its capital in a manner blocked up. In this distress the Lacedaemonians thinking no man so proper to extricate them out of these difficulties as d Menalcidas, who had governed the whole Achaean republic, appointed him commander in chief of their troops. Menalcidas was a man of great valour, but betrayed want of prudence in the very first step he took. For to give some reputation to his arms, he immediately took the field, and surprising the city Jafos, which was within the borders of Laconia, but subject to the *Achaean*s, plundered it, and divided the booty among his soldiers. This was breaking the truce which had been granted by the *Achaean*s at the instance of Metellus, and drawing upon himself the resentment of the Romans. The Lacedaemonians themselves were well apprised that such unwarrantable proceedings might give a bad turn to their cause, and therefore would have punished their general with the utmost severity, had he not prevented them by laying violent hands on himself^e.

Commissioners sent from Rome into Achaia.

Not long after the death of Menalcidas the Roman commissioners arrived in Peloponnesus. As they were sent to put an end to a civil war, which was kindled in the heart of Achaia, they landed at Corinth, which was looked upon as the capital of the Achaean league. There they summoned the assembly, which Aurelius Orestes, who was at the head of the commissioners, opened with a speech calculated rather to create than compose divisions. Polybius is of opinion that he exceeded the instructions he had brought from Rome, and changed the menaces of the senate into absolute orders^f; for he told them, that Rome had been long endeavouring to establish a happy union among the free cities of Greece, but was at last convinced that such an union could never be effected so long as their present form of government subsisted. “Flaminius, said he, set your cities at liberty, a blessing which they might have enjoyed separately; “ but you chose to form a league among yourselves, a league which should depend “ on a general assembly, and be governed by a prætor chosen by a plurality of “ voices. In this you endeavoured to secure your common safety; but your precaution has only produced troubles and divisions. Your deputies do not agree “ among themselves; your assemblies make laws, which every particular city will

^a PAUSAN. ubi supra, p. 421, 428. POLYB. legat. 143, 144. Id. in excerpt. de virt. & vit. JUSTIN. l. xxxiv. c. 1. FLOR. l. iii. c. 16. ^b PAUSAN. POLYB. &c. ibid. ^c POLYB. legat. 143.

^d not

- a " not observe. This obliges you to have recourse to arms; and hence these eternal " divisions, hence these hostilities, which makes it necessary for you to be always " under arms, and to look upon your confederates as enemies. Rome is concerned " to see so many intestine wars kindled among you, knows the cause of these evils, " and is resolved to put a stop to them. When you are less united you will be " more happy, and will never be completely so till you make the necessary separa-
 " tions. Attend then to the orders of the senate, which I am going to declare,
 " and put them in execution with readiness. It is the will and pleasure of the " Roman senate, and people, that all the cities, which were not formerly of the " Achæan league, that is, Corinth, Lacedæmon, Argos, Heraclea (B), and Orcho- b " menos (C), be separated from the general alliance, and governed by their own " laws independently of the confederacy *".

No sooner had Aurelius pronounced these words, but the Achæan deputies, without giving him time to end his speech, left the assembly, and calling together the people of Corinth in the market-place, acquainted them with the decree which the commissioners had brought from Rome. The whole city was in an uproar, and the multitude being enraged to the highest degree, fell upon all the Lacedæmonians they could find in the city, and either stript them or put them to death. Even those who fled to the house of the commissioners for refuge, were dragged from thence, and treated like the rest. Aurelius and his colleagues in vain cried out, that c their republic would revenge the injuries done to the Lacedæmonians; the incensed multitude was deaf to their remonstrances; nay, they would have treated the commissioners themselves in the same manner, had they not saved themselves by a timely flight *.

- THE commissioners on their return to Rome not only set the insults they had received at Corinth in the strongest light, but are said to have exaggerated them beyond measure; they represented the tumult, not as a sudden commotion, but as a premeditated plot. The senate was highly incensed at such proceedings, but thought it advisable to use moderation: Carthage was not yet taken, nor the two pretended sons of Perfes entirely subdued; they thought it therefore necessary to d be very cautious in treating with so powerful a republic as that of Achaia in so critical a juncture. Hence they voted only for sending three new commissioners into Achaia, instructing them to complain in a very gentle manner, and only to exhort the Achæans not to give ear to bad counsel, lest by their imprudence they should draw upon themselves a war which it was in their power to avoid, by punishing those who had exposed them to it. The commissioners embarked without delay, and after their arrival in Peloponnesus met a deputy sent by the Achæans to acquaint the senate with their proceedings against Orestes; but the commissioners carried him back with them to Ægium, where the diet of the nation had been summoned to assemble.
Sextus Julius, a man of great prudence and moderation, was at the head of this new e deputation; when he was introduced to the assembly, he spoke with that air of mild-ness which was natural to him, seasoning his reproaches with the most tender expressions. " We can excuse, said he, the first commotions of a multitude led astray by " a mistaken zeal for their country; we are sensible that the magistrates cannot " govern them on such occasions. If our ambassadors have suffered any ill treat" ment in those blind transports, the fault may be easily repaired. The Romans
 " will be appeased with the least signs of repentance. All the satisfaction Rome re" quires of you is, that you leave Lacedæmon in peace, and restore tranquillity to " Peloponnesus *".

- THESE moderate remonstrances, in which Julius designedly omitted saying one f word of separating any cities from the Achæan league, was received with great applause by the major part of the assembly. But Critolaus and Diæus endeavoured to efface the impressions, which Julius's speech had on the minds of the assembly, by insinuating that it was dangerous to trust the seeming moderation of the Romans;
 that Rome only suspended her revenge till Carthage was destroyed; that they would

The commissioners ill used and insulted.
 Year of the flood 285th.
 Before Chr. 147.

New commissioners sent into Achaia.

Critolaus and Diæus stir up the people against the Romans.

* Idem, *ibid. Idem, *ibid. Idem, Legat. 144.

(B) This city of Heraclea stood in Phthiotis, a province of Thessaly, near the pass of Thermopylae. It was called Heraclea Trachinea, to distinguish it from several other cities bearing the same name.

(C) Orchomenos was one of the largest cities of Boeotia, and famous for a temple dedicated to the three graces, which was one of the most ancient and wealthy of Greece.

soon see her legions laying waste Peloponnesus, as they had done Africa, and consequently that it was necessary to prevent such hostilities by raising up enemies against the Romans, and utterly destroying their friends. Such were the discourses of Critolaus and Dicus in their private conventicles among men of their own stamp, and devoted to their faction. But in public they spoke a very different language, and treated the commissioners with great civility. Critolaus, who was then prætor, invited them to Tegæa to meet an extraordinary assembly, in which the affairs of Lacedæmon should be amicably adjusted to the satisfaction of both parties. Accordingly Julius and his colleagues went with the Lacedæmonians to the place appointed, where they waited a long time for the arrival of the deputies: but no Achaean appeared. While the Romans were thus attending in a corner of the province, Critolaus was sending expresses from city to city, forbidding them to send their deputies to the congress. Julius began to be impatient, and express his uneasiness, when Critolaus came all alone to Tegæa, and to the great surprise of the Romans, told them, that the dispute between the Achaean and Lacedæmonians was of too great importance to be decided in a private assembly; that it was necessary to refer it to the general diet, which could not be assembled according to law in less than six months.

Julius was highly affronted at such deceitful proceedings; he dismissed the Lacedæmonians, and returning to Rome, complained that the republic had been insulted, and her ambassadors personally ill used and derided. On the other hand the prætor gloried in having mortified Rome in her envoys, and took no one step to appease her wrath. He was out of hatred to the Romans desirous of war, but would not commit hostilities the first, for fear of being censured by his own nation. He therefore treated the ambassadors in the manner we have related, being well apprised that contempt would as effectually exasperate that haughty people as open hostilities.

Metellus endeavours in vain to bring Critolaus to reason.

HOWEVER, Rome was not in haste to come to an open rupture; notwithstanding the loud complaints of Julius and his colleagues, the senate would not resolve on a war, but contented themselves with referring the affair to Metellus, who was settling the province of Macedon, after having conquered the two false pretenders to that crown. The orders sent him were to treat with Critolaus, as of himself, in order to bring him to reason. Metellus immediately dispatched four Romans of distinguished birth, viz. Cn. Papirius, Ælius Lamia, A. Gabinius, and Q. Fannius into Peloponnesus, enjoining them to lay before the assembly of Achaia, the evils which Critolaus and his partisans were by their rash behaviour drawing upon them.

IN the mean time Critolaus ran from city to city, summoning assemblies under colour of communicating to them what had passed in the conferences at Tegæa; but in fact to vent invectives against the Romans, and put an odious construction upon all they had done. In order to increase his party he published an edict, forbidding all judges to prosecute or imprison any Achaean for debt, till the dispute between the assembly and Lacedæmon was at an end. By this means he disposed the multitude to receive willingly what orders he thought fit to give them; incapable of making suitable reflections on the future, they fell in with the passions of a madman, who neither foresaw his own misfortunes, nor those of his nation.

His deputies insulted and abused.

DURING these transactions the four deputies sent by Metellus landed at Corinth, where the general assembly was then sitting. This new embassy ought to have been received with respect, as it came from a victorious general, whose army was encamped in Macedon, within reach of Greece. But Critolaus treated them worse than those who had been sent from Rome. He would not suffer them to appear before the assembly, but commanded them to declare their business to the populace assembled in the market-place. To this factious assembly, consisting of artificers, and the refuse of the people of Corinth, Cn. Papirius spoke with, at least, as much moderation as Julius had done before the heads of the nation. His discourse tended to shew that it was the interest of Achaia to keep up a good correspondence with Rome; he took care not to mention the separation of Lacedæmon, and the other cities from the Achaean league. This was interpreted by Critolaus as a proof of their fear; and upon this prejudice a great crowd of artificers fell upon the ambassadors, loaded them with reproaches, and drove them with a with all manner of affronts out of the market-place¹. All the cities of Achaia were at that time seized, we may say, with a kind of madness, but Corinth was more furious than the rest. They were persuaded that Rome intended to enslave them, and absolutely destroy the Achaean league, which persuasion made them deaf to all the remonstrances of those who disapproved the wild measures of Critolaus.

THE turbulent prætor finding all things succeed to his wish, harangued the multitude in order to inflame them against such of the nobility as refused to enter into his views. He even named two men of unblameable characters, accusing them of informing the Roman ambassadors of all that passed in the national assemblies. b One of these by name Strategius immediately gave the prætor the lie, and steadily insisted on his innocence. But the multitude was for the prætor, and Strategius condemned, notwithstanding he called the gods to witness that he had never discovered any thing transacted in the assemblies. This notorious piece of injustice convinced Critolaus that he had gained an absolute ascendant over the people; whereupon, carrying his fury to the utmost extremity, in the same assembly he caused war to be declared with Lacedæmon, and consequently with the *Romans*².

UPON the declaration of war the ambassadors parted; Papirius repaired to Lacedæmon to watch the enemies motions. Ælius set out for Naupactus, and the other two for the camp in Macedon, to excite Metellus not to delay revenging the affronts offered to Rome in her ambassadors. Accordingly Metellus without waiting for the orders of the senate put himself at the head of his army, and began his march towards Achaia, with a design to enter it by Thessaly. War declared with the Lacedæmonians and Romans.

THE cities of Thebes in Boetia, and Chalcis in Eubœa having been disobliged by Metellus since his abode in Macedon, joined the *Achaean*s. The inhabitants of Thebes had been condemned by Metellus, to make the Phocians satisfaction for the losses the latter had suffered by their frequent incursions, and moreover to deliver up to the inhabitants of Amphissa in Locris (D) the third part of their harvest, for having reaped the corn of their neighbours as if it had been their own. The inhabitants of Chalcis had ravaged part of Eubœa, and Metellus had obliged them to make restitution. Upon these motives the two cities entered into the rash measures of Critolaus, and joined him with their troops. With such feeble aids the Achaean prætor believed himself able to cope with the most powerful state in the world; so far had his rage and hatred against the Romans got the better of his reason. Both Critolaus and Dicus had been of the number of those exiles, whom the Romans had kept so long in Italy in a kind of slavery, and were therefore determined to revenge themselves even at the expence of their country.

Critolaus being joined by the troops of Thebes and Chalcis took the field, and marched against Heraclea, a city of the Achaean league, which refused to send its contingent to the prætor. While he was besieging this town, news was brought c him that Metellus was drawing near, which struck him with such terror that he immediately broke up the siege, and withdrew into Achaia. He might easily have seized the pass of Thermopylae, and there stopped at least, if not defeated, the Roman army. But his courage failed him all at once, and his retreat had all the appearance of a flight. Metellus pursued him close, and at last came up with him, and routed him. Historians have not told us the particulars of this battle, but we may well conclude that it cost the *Achaean*s dear, for their army was entirely defeated, and above a thousand of them taken prisoners. Critolaus himself lost his life on this occasion; for he never appeared afterwards, neither was his body found in the field of battle: some say he poisoned himself in some remote corner of Greece, f others that he threw himself down from mount Oeta into a marsh, and was drowned³. Heraclea besieged by the Achaean.

IT was an established law among the *Achaean*s, that when their prætor died, Dicus succeeds during his office, his immediate predecessor should succeed him, and govern the republic till the next general assembly, which met at a stated time. By this law Dicus took upon him the government of the republic, and the command of the The siege raised, and the Achaean defeated.

¹ FLOR. in Epit. FLOR. l. 2. c. 16. PAUSAN. ubi supra. OROSIUS, &c. ² POLYB. Legat. 144. PAUSAN. in Achaic. ³ POLYB. PAUSAN. ibid.

(D) Amphissa stood on the banks of a little river, bearing the same name, and was one of the greatest cities in Locris. Some think it stood where Solona now stands; but Niger thinks its ancient situation agrees better with that of a little village now called Lumbino.

scattered army. But scarce was he invested with this dignity, when news was brought him, that a body of above a thousand Arcadians, who had joined the Achaean league, and after the battle retired to Elatea in Phocis, had been all to a man cut in pieces by Metellus. This was a melancholy piece of news; however, as he had been the chief author of the war, it behoved him to maintain it; he therefore sent deputies to all the cities of Achaia, enjoining them to raise new troops with all possible expedition, and caused an edict to be published in all the places that were subject to the Achaean league to this purport; That no less than twelve thousand slaves, who had been born in the country, should be enlisted; and that, if it was necessary, some of the slaves that had been brought from foreign countries, should be taken into the service to complete that number; that all those who were fit to bear arms, whether in Achaia or Arcadia, should repair to Corinth, and there take the military oaths; that all persons of substance, whether men or women, should bring all the gold or silver into the public treasury. This convinced all Achaia of the danger that threatened them; but as they were embarked in a war with an enemy, whom they had so highly provoked, they blindly pursued the mad scheme. The cities of Elea, Messene, and Patrae, were so terrified when they heard that a consular army was coming from Rome, and that a consul with new legions was to take the place of the praetor Metellus, that the inhabitants gave themselves up to despair, and either abandoned their country, or laid violent hands on themselves, through fear of falling under the conqueror's power. These cities were exposed to the first attacks of the enemy after their landing, and expected the most severe treatment. Some had recourse to the clemency of Metellus, flying to his camp for refuge. There they informed against the most factious among their countrymen, though no enquiry was yet made after them^b.

Thebes taken by Metellus.

IN the mean time the Roman praetor entered Arcadia, and drew near Thebes, which had openly declared for the Achaean league. Pythias the chief magistrate of that city had stirred up all the inhabitants against the Romans, and treated with great severity such as were unwilling to enter into his measures. It was chiefly with a view to seize him that Metellus turned his arms against Thebes; but Pythias had retired from his native country with his wife and children before the arrival of the army. Most of the citizens had followed his example, and abandoned the city, which Metellus entered without opposition. The few citizens that remained he treated with great clemency, and saved the temple and houses from being plundered, but set a price on Pythias's head. This mixture of mildness and severity was very pleasing to the people, but struck the magistrates with new terror. From Thebes the Roman general marched to Megara, which important post was guarded by one Alcamenes, with a detachment of four thousand men. But the cowardly governor at the approach of the praetorian army left the place, and retired to Corinth, where he joined Dicus. The inhabitants of Megara opened their gates to the Romans, and put them in possession of the most fruitful territory of Achaia.

Megara submits.

Metellus sends new deputies to treat of a peace.

AND now Metellus seeing most of the *Achaean*s struck with terror, and inclined to peace, thought that such a favourable opportunity of gaining Dicus and his faction was not to be neglected. He had been informed, that the consul Mummius was charged with the war in Achaia, and had already set out from Rome, with orders from the senate to settle affairs in Greece, by the destruction of Corinth. To deprive therefore Mummius of this glory, and at the same time save that noble city, he sent new deputies to treat of a peace. For this embassy he did not chuse Romans, but three *Achaean*s of great distinction and credit in their own country, who had taken sanctuary in the Roman camp. These were Andronidas, Logius, and Archippus, men well affected to the Romans, but strongly touched with the misfortunes which threatened their country. Upon their arrival at Corinth they found the people in general inclined to peace, but the praetor and his faction more than ever bent upon a war. They were by his order thrown into prison after he had produced them before the assembly of the people, and declared them traitors and enemies to their country. Neither could he be prevailed upon to alter his measures, either by the remonstrances of Pbilo an Achaean of great authority, who came on purpose from Theffaly, or by the entreaties of Stratius a man of distinguished merit, and his particular friend. In spite of all their efforts the mad praetor sentenced the

They are treated as enemies.

^b POLYB. & PAUSAN. ibid.

a three deputies to die, and prevailed upon the chief members of the council, who were devoted to his faction, to confirm the unjust sentence; nay, they joined with them in the same condemnation one Soficrates, a venerable senator, whose only crime was his having voted for treating of a peace with the Romans. Soficrates was executed a few days after, and no kind of torture spared to extort from him such a confession as Diaus wanted; but he maintained to the last, that peace was preferable to war, and this inflexible constancy made no small impression on the minds of the people. As for Andronidas and his colleagues, the avaritious prætor sold them their deliverance at a great price. A few days before Diaus had caused one Pbillius and his children to be put to death, only because they were suspected of corresponding b with Menalcidas at Lacedæmon, and inclining to favour the Roman faction. Thus were the unfortunate Achæans governed by magistrates, who had no other rule of conduct but their passions, and no other talent for war but a savage fierceness, and a blind desire of revenge c.

AN account of the many advantages gained by Metellus being transmitted to Rome by one Posthumius, without the general's knowledge, the consul Mummius hastened his departure for Achaia, which had fallen to his lot. Why the senate would not suffer Metellus to finish a war, which he had prosecuted so far, is what we find no where recorded. When the consul landed the numerous army he brought with him, Metellus was advancing to Corinth, with a design to use his utmost efforts, c in order to bring Diaus to accept of a peace before the arrival of the consular army, and thereby deprive Mummius of the glory of finishing the war. But the obstinate prætor would hearken to no conditions how advantageous soever, which gave Metellus great concern, and made him lose all hopes of settling Achaia in peace before the arrival of the consul.

THIS was the posture of affairs in Achaia, when Mummius appeared before Corinth with a consular army, consisting of three thousand five hundred horse, and twenty-three thousand foot, besides a body of Cretan archers, and the Pergamean troops sent by Attalus the son of Eumenes. His first care was to send back Metellus and his forces into Macedon, lest he should share with him the glory of concluding the war.
d He then drew near the city, and encamped on the isthmus of Corinth, posting advanced-guards round the town. But as no enemy appeared, the Achæan army being shut up in the city, the Romans straggled about the fields, and neglected their posts; which the Corinthians observing made a vigorous sally, fell upon the legionaries, and pursued them with great slaughter to their camp. This small advantage encouraged the Achæans, and inspired Diaus with hopes of conquering the consul, who on his side did all that lay in his power to confirm him in his foolish persuasion; he kept his legions close in the camp, and pretended not to be able to bear the sight of the enemy. Diaus now becoming audacious and sure of victory, assembled all those who were able to bear arms, and formed them into a phalanx, which with the e auxiliaries from Chalcis made up an army equal, if not superior, in number to that of the Romans. They wanted experience and discipline; but Diaus thought that despair and the importance of their cause would supply that want. He therefore advanced with his troops, and offered the consul battle, which he declined in order to draw the Achæans into a valley called Leucopetra, at the extremity of the isthmus which joined Attica to Peloponnesus. Accordingly the prætor fell into the snare, and repaired thither long before the consul. Diaus was so sure of victory, that he had invited the women and children of Corinth to be spectators from the neighbouring hills of the slaughter he was going to make of the enemy; he had also ordered a great number of waggons to follow the army, which were to be loaded with the spoils f of the Romans d.

NEVER was there a more rash and ill-grounded confidence. The faction of Diaus had removed from the service, and from the public councils, all those who were capable of commanding the troops, or directing affairs, and had substituted in their room others who had no experience in civil or military concerns: the soldiers had never before seen the face of an enemy, and were quite unacquainted with military discipline; and nevertheless the rash prætor promised himself victory over a consular army, inured to the greatest dangers. While the Achæans were thus triumphing in the plains of Leucopetra, and only solicitous lest the consul should

The consul Mummius arrives in Greece.
Year of the
flood 2857.
Before Christ
146.

The Achæans defeated by Mummius.

c Idem, ibid.

d PAUSAN. ubi supra. Auth. de vir. illustr.

find means to make his escape, he unexpectedly appeared with his army drawn up in battalia. He had the day before placed in an ambuscade, a strong body of horse, with orders to fall out in the heat of the action, and attack the Achaean phalanx in flank. The *Achaean*s advanced furiously, but their cavalry was soon put to the rout. The phalanx made a vigorous resistance; but at length being attacked in front by the legionaries, and by the cavalry in flank, it was broke and dispersed. The slaughter then was dreadful; we are told that the two seas which were divided by the isthmus of Corinth, were dyed with blood. If Dion had retired into Corinth, he might have held it a long time, notwithstanding the loss of the battle, and obtained an honourable capitulation from Mummius; for Corinth was at that time one of the strongest places in the world, and the consul's sole aim was to deserve a triumph by putting a speedy end to the war. But Dion abandoning himself to despair rode full speed to Megalopolis his native country, and entering his house set fire to it, threw his wife into the flames, lest she should fall into the enemy's hands, and put an end to his unhappy life by poison^e.

AFTER this defeat all things were in the utmost confusion at Corinth. The inhabitants finding themselves without council, leaders, or courage, fled to other places for safety, leaving the city deserted. The gates were open, and no body appeared on the walls to defend them. The consul hearing this could scarcely believe it, and fearing some ambuscade restrained the ardour of his soldiers, who were very eager to enter Corinth, and enrich themselves with the plunder of so wealthy a city. Mummius was thus in suspense for the space of three days, at the end of which after having taken all proper precautions, and narrowly observed all places, both within and without the city, he entered it at the head of his troops, and gave it up to the rage and avarice of his soldiers. The men, who had not been able to prevail upon themselves to forsake their native country, were all put to the sword, and the women and children sold for slaves to the best bidder. Then the town was ransacked by the greedy soldiers; and who can reckon up the immense treasures they found? There were more vessels of all sorts of metals, more fine pictures, and statues of the greatest masters, in Corinth, than in any city of the world. All the princes of Europe and Asia, who had any taste in painting and sculpture, furnished themselves here with their richest moveables; here were cast the finest statues for temples and palaces, and all the liberal arts brought to their greatest perfection. Many inestimable pieces of the most famous painters and statuaries fell into the hands of soldiers, who not knowing their value either destroyed them, or parted with them for a few drachma's. Polybius was an eye-witness of the want of taste in the Romans of those days. This brave Achaean, upon the first news that his countrymen had taken up arms again Rome, left Africa where he was attending Scipio at the siege of Carthage, and hastened to Achaia to do his country what service he could. He was in the Roman army when Corinth was plundered, and had the mortification to see the Roman soldiers playing at dice on a picture of Aristides (E), which was accounted one of the wonders of the world. They set no value on that master-piece, and therefore willingly parted with it for a more convenient table to play upon. But when the spoils of Corinth were put up to sale, Attalus, king of Pergamus, offered for it six hundred thousand sesterces, that is, near five thousand pounds of our money. The consul surprized that the price of a picture should be carried so high, thought there was some magical virtue in it, and therefore interposing his authority retained it, notwithstanding the complaints of Attalus. He was not actuated in so doing by his private interest, for he did not appropriate it to himself, but placed it in the temple of Ceres, where Strabo had the pleasure of seeing it before it was consumed in the fire, which reduced that temple to ashes^f. Mummius was a great warrior, but seems to have had no taste for painting or sculpture; for when he put the pictures and statues he had taken in Mummius enters Corinth, and plunders it.

^e PAUSAN. IN ACHAE. ZONARAS, l. 9. c. 31. & 10. CIC. DE OFFIC. l. 1. c. 76, 77.

^f STRAB. l. 8. p. 381. PLIN. l. 35. c. 4.

(E) Aristides, who was contemporary with Apelles, flourished at Thebes about the 122d Olympiad. He is said to have been the first that attempted to represent the passions of the soul in colours.

The piece here spoke of was a Bacchus so exquisitely done, that it was proverbially said of any extraordinary performance; It is as well done as the Bacchus of Aristides (11).

(11) Plin. l. 35. c. 4. & 10.

^a Corinth on board the transports, he told the masters of the vessels very seriously, that if any of them were either lost or spoiled, he would oblige them to find others at their own cost. As if any other pieces could have supplied the loss of those inestimable originals done by the most celebrated masters in Greece¹. Were it not to be wished, says the historian who has transmitted this fact to posterity, that this happy ignorance still subsisted? would it not be far preferable to that delicacy of taste for such rarities which prevails in the present age²? He spoke at a time when the governors of the provinces used all manner of frauds and extortions to enrich themselves and their families with such valuable moveables.

Corinth being thus pillaged, nothing remained but to reduce it to ashes, pursuant to the decree of the senate, which the consul was obliged to put in execution. Corinth reduced to ashes.

Fire was set to all the corners of the city at the same time, and the flames growing more violent as they drew near the centre, at last united there, and made one general conflagration, which is said to have produced that famous mixture, which art could never imitate. The gold, silver and brass, which the Corinthians had concealed, were melted and ran down the streets in streams. Some of the greedy soldiers in attempting to save part of those metals perished in the flames. When the fire was extinguished, a new metal was found composed of several different ones (F), and greatly esteemed in the following ages. The walls of the city were demolished and razed to the very foundations. Thus was Corinth destroyed the same year that ^c Carthage was laid in ashes. By the destruction of two such cities the Romans intended to strike terror into the rest of the world, and keep all nations steady in their obedience to Rome. Corinth was destroyed nine hundred and fifty-two years after its foundation, by Aletes the son of Hippotes, sixth in descent from Hercules. Cicero, who approved of the destruction of Carthage and Numantia, wished that Corinth, where the arts of painting and sculpture seemed to have taken up their habitation, had been spared³.

It does not appear that the Achaëans had any thoughts of raising new troops for the defence of their country, or summoned any assembly to deliberate on the measures it was necessary to take. No one took upon him to propose any remedy for the public calamities, or endeavoured to appease the Romans by sending deputies to implore their clemency. One would have thought that the Achaean league had been buried under the ruins of Corinth; so much had the dreadful destruction of this city alarmed, and universally dismayed the whole confederacy.

It was now necessary to determine the fate of the Achaëans in general. As to the Corinthians and such slaves as had taken up arms against Rome, they were all condemned to slavery, and carefully sought out in all the places whither they had fled. After this the whole nation was ordered to assemble in the open fields, where they were surrounded by the Roman legions; and because they were all afraid of being involved in one common misfortune, proclamation was made, that only the natives of Corinth, and such slaves as had served in the troops should be made captives, and be sold. The consul granted the rest of the inhabitants of Achaia their liberty, and sold the lands of the citizens of Corinth, which were in great part purchased by the Sicyonians. Thebes, Chalcis, and some other cities that had joined the Achaëans, were by the consul's orders dismantled. Achaia was condemned to pay the Lacedaemonians two hundred talents for the damages they had suffered during the war. Soon after ten commissioners arrived from Rome to regulate the affairs of Greece in general, and of Achaia in particular, in conjunction with the consul. These abolished popular government in all the cities, and established magistrates, who were to govern each city according to their respective laws under the superintendency of a Roman prætor. Thus the Achaean league was dissolved, and Greece reduced to a Roman province, called the province of Achaia, because at the taking of Corinth the Achaëans were the most powerful people of Greece. The whole nation paid an annual tribute to Rome, and the prætor, who was sent thither every year, was charged with the care of collecting it. The Achaean league dissolved, and Achaia reduced to a Roman province.

^a VEL. PAT. l. 1. c. 13.

^b Idem, ibid.

^c CIC. de Offic. l. 1. c. 35.

(F) Pliny tells us that there were three sorts of Corinthian brass, viz. the red, the white, and that which was of the colour of money, according to the different proportions of gold, silver, and copper, that were in it (12).

(12) Plin. l. 7. c. 38.

WE have observed above, that Polybius on his return into Peloponnesus had the mortification to see the city of Corinth reduced to ashes, and his country become a Roman province. If any thing was capable of mitigating his affliction on so mournful an occasion, it was the opportunity he had of defending the memory of Philopamen his master in the science of war. A Roman out of some private grudge to that great hero accused him before Mummius, as if he had been still alive, of having been an enemy to the Romans, and always opposing their designs to the utmost of his power. What the accuser proposed by this new prosecution was, that all the statues and monuments erected to the memory of Philopamen in most cities of the Achaean league should be destroyed, and his glorious feats buried in oblivion. The accusation was not without foundation; for as that brave Achaean was a true friend to his country, so he was an enemy in his heart to the Romans, being well apprised that nothing but the absolute subjection of Greece could satisfy their pride and ambition. However, Polybius boldly took upon him his defence, and represented him as the greatest man Greece had produced in later times; he owned, that he might perhaps have carried his zeal for the liberty of his country a little too far; but that he had rendered the people of Rome considerable services on various occasions. The ten commissioners, at whose tribunal he pleaded so noble a cause, moved with his reasons, but more with the gratitude he shewed in defending his master, decreed that the statues of Philopamen should not be touched, and that his monuments should remain till they were over-turned by the destroyer of all things. Polybius taking the advantage of Mummius's good disposition begged of him the statues of Aratus, and Achaëus the founder of the nation; which were granted him, though they had been already transported out of Peloponnesus into Acarnania. At the same time he gave a signal proof of his disinterestedness, which gained him as much esteem among his countrymen, as his defending the memory of Philopamen. After the destruction of Corinth, the effects of those, who had been the authors of the insults offered to the Roman ambassadors, were sold by auction. When those of Diaus were put up, the commissioners ordered the quaestor, who sold them, to let Polybius have out of them whatever he pleased without taking any thing from him on that account. But Polybius refused the offer, saying that he look'd upon it as a very dishonourable thing to enrich himself with the spoils of his fellow-citizens^x.

THIS action gave the commissioners such an idea of his virtue and probity, that upon their leaving Peloponnesus, they appointed him to visit all the cities of Greece, and every-where settle the new form of government. A very honourable commission, which he discharged both to the satisfaction of the senate of Rome, and the people of Achaia, who erected many statues in honour of their benefactor, and among others one with this inscription: *To the memory of Polybius, whose counsels would have saved Achaia, if they had been followed; and who comforted her in her distress*¹.

Mummius on his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph, which was embellished with all the finest paintings and sculptures, that Greece had ever produced; and as he had made an absolute conquest of Achaia, he ever after bore the surname of Achaicus. Thus the Romans destroyed every thing that gave them umbrage, and plundered other nations to enrich themselves; which was making war, notwithstanding their boasted politeness, after the manner of Barbarians. From this time Achaia was governed, like the other Roman provinces, by a prætor sent thither annually from Rome, till the reign of Nero, who restored all Greece to the enjoyment of its ancient liberties, reducing at the same time Sardinia to a Roman province, and laying on that wealthy island the tribute, which Achaia had paid^m. By this means he favoured the Greeks without impairing the revenues of the empire. But they did not long enjoy the effects of his kindness, being soon after reduced by Vespasian to their former state of subjection. This misfortune they brought anew upon themselves by their domestic broils and discord, which could no otherwise be composed, but by depriving them of that liberty, which they no longer knew how to enjoyⁿ. Under Nerva some shadow at least of their liberty was restored to them; but they were still governed by a Roman prætor, and also in Trajan's in Achaic. PLIN. l. 4. c. 6. EUTROP. c. 4.

^x POLYB. in excerpt. p. 190, 192.

¹ PAUSAN. in Achaic.

^m SUET. in Nero. PAUSAN.

ⁿ PAUSAN. ibid.

a time, as appears from a letter of Pliny the younger to Maximus, who was sent to govern Achaia, wherein after having exhorted him to use his power with moderation, he concludes that it would be barbarous and inhuman to deprive the Achaëans of that faint image, that shadow which remained of their ancient liberty^o. In this condition they remained with little alteration till the reign of Constantine the great, who in his new partition of the Roman provinces subjected Achaia to the Præfæctus prætorio for Illyricum. Upon the division of the empire, Achaia with the rest of Greece fell to the emperors of the east. Under Arcadius and Honorius all those provinces suffered greatly by the incursions of the Goths, who under their king Alarick laid waste the whole country, reducing the stately and magnificent structures, that were then remaining, to heaps of ruins^p. From that time we find no account of any thing that passed among them till the reign of the emperor Emanuel or Manuel, who in the twelfth century parcelling Peloponnesus out into seven principalities, divided it among his seven sons, stiling them despotes or lords of Morea. Its resemblance to the leaf of a mulberry-tree, called in Greek Morea, and in Latin Morus, gave occasion to this appellation. In process of time these dynasties were not only bestowed on the emperors children, and the princes of the blood, but also on such others as had distinguished themselves in the service of their country. In the thirteenth century, when Constantinople was taken by the western princes, the maritime cities of Peloponnesus, with most of the islands, were allotted to the Venetians. In the fifteenth century Constantine Dracofes, despote of Morea, being raised to the imperial throne, divided that province between his two brothers, Demetrius and Thomas, bestowing Sparta on the former, and Corinth on the latter. These princes falling out and making war upon each other, Mohammed II. took advantage of their divisions, and under pretence of assisting the one against the other, stripped them both of their dominions. Thomas fled to Rome; but Demetrius, who had implored the assistance of the Barbarians against his brother, was carried captive to Adrianople. The Mahomedans having thus got footing in Morea, soon drove the Venetians from the cities they possessed on the coast, and made themselves absolute masters of that fruitful province, holding it till they were in their turn driven out by the Venetians, d under the conduct of general Morosini in 1687. By the treaty of Carlowitz in 1699, the Barbarians yielded it up to the republic of Venice; but retook it in 1715, and in their hands it still continues, being governed by a Sangiack, under the beglerbeg of Greece, who resides at Modon^q.

^o PLIN. l. 8. epist. 24. ^p SYNESIUS, epist. 235. CLAUDIAN, in Ruffin. l. 2. ^q Vide P. CORONELLI descrizione di Morea, ALESSANDRO LOCATELLI, racconto della Veneta guerra in Levante.

S E C T. II.

The History of ÆTOLIA.

THE republic of Ætolia (G) was, in the times we are now writing of, next in The Ætolian power to that of Achaia, and formed much upon the same plan, being governed by a general assembly, a prætor, and other magistrates of an inferior rank and authority. The general assembly, called by the ancients Panætolum, met usually only once a year, and that in autumn; but the prætor was empowered to summon it out of the stated time upon any extraordinary occasion, the whole power of enacting laws, declaring war, making peace, and concluding alliances, being lodged in that court. Besides the Panætolum or great council of the nation, which consisted of members chosen by each city of the Ætolian alliance, there was another called the council of the Apocleti; this was composed of the most eminent men in the nation, their office answering that of the demiurgi among the Achaëans, which we have spoke of above: but as to their number we are quite in the

(G) Under the name of Ætolia was formerly comprehended that country, which is now called the Despotat, or little Greece. It was parted on the east by the river Evenus, now the Fidari, from the Locrenses Ozolæ; on the west from Acarnania by the Achelous; on the north it bordered upon the country of the Dorians, and part of Epirus, and on the south extended to the bay of Corinth. See the account we have given of the country, and its inhabitants, p. 409, & seq.

dark. Their chief magistrates after the prætor were the general of the horse, the public secretary, and the Ephori. The two first were held in great esteem; for in the last alliance they concluded with the Romans, they allowed them to chuse forty hostages out of the whole nation without excepting any but the general of the horse, and the secretary, as if the republic could not subsist without them. The Ephori were introduced in imitation of the Lacedæmonians, with whom they were many ages straitly united, as Thucydides, Xenophon and Polybius inform us; but as to their number the ancients are quite silent; their office was much the same as that of the Spartan ephori, but they acted in subordination both to the general diet and the prætor. The Ætolian confederacy was formed some time after that of the Achæans, whose example they followed, uniting several cities, which were before independent of each other, into one republic, and thereby enabling themselves to withstand the attempts of the Macedonian princes who aspired to the sovereignty of all Greece.

Character of the Ætolians.

THE Ætolians were a restless and turbulent people; seldom at peace among themselves, and ever at war with their neighbours; utter strangers to all sense of friendship, or principles of honour; ready to betray their friends upon the least prospect of reaping any advantage from their treachery; in short, they were looked upon by the other states of Greece no otherwise, as our author informs us, than as out-laws and public robbers. On the other hand, they were bold and enterprising in war; inured to labour and hardships; undaunted in the greatest dangers; jealous defenders of their liberties, for which they were on all occasions willing to venture their lives, and sacrifice all that was most dear to them. They distinguished themselves above all the other nations of Greece in opposing the ambitious designs of the Macedonian princes, who after having reduced most of the other states were forced to grant them a peace upon very honourable terms. But the gallant behaviour of this warlike people in defending the common liberties of Greece against those powerful invaders we shall have occasion to relate in the history of Alexander and his successors, as in a more proper place; our present province being confined to those occurrences only that happened after they had formed themselves into a republic. The constitution of the Ætolian republic was, as we have hinted above, copied from that of the Achæans, and with a view so form, as it were, a counter-alliance. For the Ætolians bore an irreconcilable hatred to the Achæans, and had conceived no small jealousy at the growing power of that state. The Cleomenic war, and that of the allies, called the social war, which we have described in the history of Achaia, were kindled by the Ætolians in the heart of Peloponnesus, with no other view, but to humble their antagonists the Achæans. In the latter they held out with the assistance only of the Eleans and Lacedæmonians, for the space of three years, against the united forces of Achaia and Macedon; but were obliged at last to purchase a peace, by yielding up to Philip all Acarnania. As they parted with this province fore against their will, they watched all opportunities of wresting it again out of the Macedonian's hands; and one very favourable for their design soon offered.

M. Valerius Lavinius had been appointed by the Roman senate to guard the coasts of Italy, on the side of Greece, and to watch the motions of Philip, who after concluding an alliance with Hannibal was preparing to pass over into Italy. The Roman had under his command a fleet of fifty ships of war, and a legion for land-service. But as he was no way in a condition with so small a force to oppose the designs of Philip, he cast his eyes on the Ætolians, who were highly dissatisfied with the peace they had lately concluded with the Macedonians and their allies. This general discontent Lavinus resolved to improve to the advantage of his republic; and by stirring up the Ætolians against Philip, to divert him from any attempts upon Italy. As he was therefore then cruising with his squadron on the coasts of Greece, he invited some of the Ætolians on board, and entering into private conference with them, found that it would be no difficult matter to engage the whole nation in the interests of Rome. To this end he went to their general assembly, where he gave them an account of the victories Rome had lately gained over Hannibal, and the conquests of Marcellus in Sicily; he extolled the great generosity and constant fidelity of the Romans towards their allies; adding that the a Ætolians might expect to be ever look'd upon with an eye of distinction by Rome; if they were the first nation beyond the seas that joined her; that Philip was a dangerous neighbour, and his over-grown power would prove fatal to them, unless they were supported by some more potent state; that the Romans in conjunction with the Ætolians would easily oblige him to quit Acarnania, which he had usurped, and keep himself upon the defensive in his own dominions. He concluded his speech by assuring them, that if they entered into engagements with Rome, Philip should never obtain a peace without restoring Acarnania to its former owners'.

Scopas at that time prætor of the Ætolians, and Dorimachus a man of great authority, strongly enforced the arguments and promises made by Lævinus, expatiating in commendation of the Romans, with all the eloquence which they were masters of; for Lævinus out of modesty had said but little in commendation of his republic. These two chiefs were not only for entering into an alliance with the Romans, but for sending deputies to the neighbouring states inviting them to accede to the same alliance. Accordingly they sent ambassadors to Elis (H), Lacedæmon, and Attalus king of Pergamus (I); to Pleuratus (K), and Scerdelaidas king of the best part of Illyricum. In the senate of Lacedæmon two orators, Cblæneas and Lyciscus made long harangues, the first in favour of the Ætolians and Romans, the other in favour of king Philip^u; but the Ætolians carried their point, and Lacedæmon with Elis declared for Rome; the kings Pleuratus and Scerdelaidas followed the examples of Lacedæmon; so that the treaty was drawn up in these words:

The Ætolians conclude an alliance with the Romans.

c "If the inhabitants of Elis, the Lacedæmonians, Attalus, Pleuratus and Scerdelaidas think fit to enter into an alliance with the Romans, let them immediately arm and make war upon Philip. The Romans shall furnish the confederates with twenty ships at least: all the conquests that shall be made between the confines of Ætolia, and the sea of Corcyra shall belong to the confederates, and the captives and booty to the Romans. The latter shall do their utmost to put the Ætolians in possession of Acarnania. The Ætolians shall not conclude a peace with Philip, but upon condition that he withdraw his troops from the territories of Rome and her allies, nor the Romans with Philip, but upon the same terms".

d THESE articles were not signed till two years after, when they had been confirmed by the Ætolians at Olympia, and the senate at Rome. This delay was occasioned by the dilatoriness of the Romans in sending ambassadors into Ætolia. When they were ratified and confirmed by both nations, the senate ordered them to be placed in the capital, as a lasting monument of their first alliance with the Greek nation. However, hostilities began as soon as the treaty was concluded: Lævinus seized on the island and city of Zacynthus (L), took Eniada and also Nafus (M), two cities of Acarnania, and restored them to the Ætolians. After this he retired with his fleet to Corcyra, where he wintered, fully persuaded that the king would now give over all thoughts of invading Italy^e.

Year of the flood 2791. Before Christ 211.

e THE king was at Pella making preparations for his expedition into Italy, when news was brought him of the new treaty concluded by the Ætolians. Where-

^u Fast. capit. LIV. l. 26. c. 24—26. ^v Vide POLYB. l. 9. c. 22—23. ^w LIV. l. 26. c. 24. ^x LIV. ibid.

(H) See an account of this country p. 405. The greatest part of this province bears now the name of Belvedere, as does Elis its capital. This country was anciently dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, whence to commit there any acts of hostility was deemed a great profanation.

(I) Attalus mentioned here is Attalus the first, who succeeded his father Eumenes the first brother to Philetærus. Philetærus was treasurer to Lysimachus king of Thrace; but afterwards acquired the dominion of Pergamus, which he erected into a little state, as we shall see in the history of the kings of Pergamus.

(K) Livy (13) makes this Pleuratus one of the kings of Thrace; but Polybius speaks of him as king of a country in Illyricum (14).

(L) This is an island in the Ionian sea over-against Peloponnesus, and is now called Zante. It is said to have borrowed its name from Zacynthus the son of Dardanus. We must not confound it with another island bearing the same name in the Archipelago or Ægean sea (15).

(M) Nassus or Nafus was a city of Acarnania not far from the mouth of the Achelous. There were two cities that bore the name of Eniada; one in Acarnania on the Ionian sea near the mouth of the Achelous: This city, according to our modern travellers, is now called Dragomesto; the other was, according to Stephanus, in Thrace, not far from mount Oeta.

(13) Liv. l. 26. c. 24.

(14) Polyb. l. 9. c. 23.

(15) Pausan. in Arcad. Strabo, l. 10.

upon he altered his measures, and resolved to fall upon his new enemies the next summer. Accordingly he took the field early in the spring, laid waste the Ætolian territories, and then marched back his forces into Macedon, in order to oppose the Mædi (N), who were ready to fall upon his dominions. During his absence, Scopas then prætor, and general of the Ætolians, entered Acarnania, in hopes of reducing that country before Philip could return to their assistance. This conquest had been begun the last campaign by Lævinus, who had taken Æmiadæ and Nafus, and was now near enough to assist the Ætolians with his fleet and legion. The Acarnanians were sensible that they could not oppose two such powerful nations at the same time; but nevertheless resolved to stand to their defence, and sell their lives at the dearest rate. Accordingly having sent into Epirus b all their women, children, and such as were not able to bear arms, those who remained from the age of fifteen to threescore bound themselves by oath, not to return home till they had utterly destroyed the Ætolians: they only desired the Epirots to place the ashes of those, who should fall in battle, in one tomb with the following epitaph; Here lie the Acarnanians, who died fighting for their country, in opposition to the violence and injustice of the Ætolians. This resolution so terrified the Ætolians, that they returned home without offering to enter the borders of Acarnania, or to do any thing that might provoke a people resolved to conquer or die.^r

THE Ætolians not daring to invade Acarnania turned their arms against Anticyra c (O), a city of the Locri, and in the neighbourhood of Ætolia. This place they invested by land, and Lævinus at the same time by sea; as it was battered night and day on all sides, it was soon obliged to surrender at discretion. Lævinus, pursuant to the treaty, delivered up the city to the Ætolians, reserving for his own troops the captives, and the plunder. The Ætolians flushed with this success, leaving Lævinus at Anticyra entered Achaia, and there committed such ravages as obliged Philip to leave Demetrias (P), where he was encamped, and draw near to Greece. On his march he met the Ætolian army commanded by Pyrrhias prætor for that year (Q), who had advanced as far as Thessaly to give the Macedonians battle. The two armies met near Lamia, a city of Phthiotis in the Ætolian interest. Pyrrhias had d been reinforced with a strong detachment of king Attalus's troops, and a thousand legionaries sent him by P. Sulpicius, who had succeeded Lævinus as pro-prætor of Greece. Notwithstanding this re-inforcement the Ætolians were twice defeated, and forced to save themselves under the walls of Lamia. After this victory Philip encamped in the neighbourhood of Phalara near the mouth of the Sperchius, with a design to surprize a strong detachment of Ætolian cavalry, which was to return from Thessaly, and pass that way. But while he was encamped here, ambassadors arrived from Ptolemy Philopator king of Egypt attended with a great number of deputies from the islands of Chios and Rhodes, and the city of Athens. Their errand was to prevail on Philip and the Ætolians to put an end to the war. e This was not so much out of good will to the latter, as jealousy of the former, who by reducing the Ætolians might easily enslave all Greece, and have a ready access to the cities, which Ptolemy possessed out of Egypt. Philip put off the conferences till the next diet of the Achæans, and in the mean time granted the Ætolians a truce of thirty days. In this interval Philip was invited by the Greeks to preside at ^r Idem, l. 26. c. 25.

(N) The Mædi possessed a part of Thrace beyond mount Rhodope, and therefore Ptolemy calls their country Medica, but others give it the name of Macedonian Greece, because it bordered on Macedon on the side of the Ægean sea.

(O) Anticyra stood near the river Sperchius over against mount Oeta. Its territory bordered upon Thessaly, and near it was an island of the same name, abounding, as Pliny informs us (16), with hellebore. Ptolemy and Strabo mention another city, bearing the same name in Phœtis, near Crissa on the confines of Bœotia (17).

(P) The city of Demetrias, now Dimitriada, was built by Demetrius Poliorcetes on the sea coast of Thessaly near the territory of the Magnesiæ. Pliny confounds this city with that of Pagasæ; but Strabo and Ptolemy make them two different cities, and place them both at the entrance of the Pagasæus sinus, now the gulf of Armiro. Demetrias was for some time the seat of the kings of Macedon (18).

(Q) The prætorship of the Ætolians was, according to Licij (19), divided between Pyrrhias and king Attalus; the general assembly of the Ætolians having bestowed that honour upon the king of Pergamus, though then absent.

(16) Plin. l. 25.

(17) Strabo, l. 9.

(18) Strabo, ibid.

(19) Licij. l. 27. c. 30.

- a the Heræan (R), and Nemæan games. This was a distinction, which the Greeks had shewn him, and confirmed by their suffrages, pretending that the first king of Macedon was a native of Greece. In this station the king behaved like a voluptuous prince, and pursued debauchery to excess. But at last the diet was held, which drew him from his pleasures to Rhium, the place appointed for the assembly. The negotiations began, and most of the nations engaged in the war inclined to a reconciliation, fearing Attalus and the Romans would take advantage of their divisions, and get footing in Greece. At the opening of the assembly one of the orators exhorted the contending parties to mutual concord in a speech, which is preserved to this day, and may be look'd upon as a master-piece of the kind^a.
- b The discourse moved the whole assembly, and it was no sooner ended but Philip's ambassadors were introduced, who declared, that their master was ready to give peace to Greece, if the Ætolians would consent to it, and charged them with all the evils that would inevitably attend the prosecution of the war. The Ætolians, however, came to no resolution; and in the mean time news was brought them, that Attalus was arrived with his fleet at the island of Ægina (S), and Sulpicius with his at Naupactus (T), which made the Ætolians put an end to the conferences.

^a POLYB. l. II. c. 4.

(R) The Heræan games, or Heræan festivals were celebrated by the Argians with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. They were called Heræan from the Greek word Hērē signifying Juno, whom the inhabitants of Argolis worshipped as their tutelary goddess, and in whose honour this festival was first instituted. The ceremony consisted in a pompous procession made by the Argian youth under arms. The statue of Juno, which was of ivory and gold, and thought one of the best performances of the famous Polyclitus, was carried in a chariot drawn by two white oxen. In the driver's seat was placed the image of one Trochilus the son of Callisthea, who was the first priestess of Juno Argiva. This ministry, which was granted to none but women of great distinction, was held in such esteem among the Argians, that they dated their public acts by the priesthoods of the priestesses of Juno, as we do by the reigns of our kings. The Argian youth marched in good order from the city of Argos to the temple of Juno, which stood at a small distance, and was one of the most stately edifices of Greece. Upon their arrival at the temple an hundred oxen were sacrificed, and their flesh distributed among all that were present. When the religious ceremonies were over the sports began, and the youth entered the lists disputing the honour of carrying off a buckler which was fixed to the wall of the city. The conqueror was rewarded with a crown of myrtle, and walked through the city for several days successively, amidst the acclamations of his fellow citizens, making a shew of the buckler he had gained. Some ascribe the institution of these games to Archinus tyrant of Argos, and others to Lyncæus who is said to have reigned in Argolis in the year of the world 2558. The Heræan games were common to some other nations of Greece, and also to the islanders, namely, to the inhabitants of Samos, Ægina and Cos. At Corinth this ceremony had the air of a mournful one; it being a received tradition among them, that Medea after having killed her children instituted the Heræan games by way of atonement for her crime. The Corinthians therefore renewed the memory of her cruelty by sacrificing a goat to Juno (20).

As to the Nemæan games most of the ancients agree, that they were instituted in honour of Archemorus, the son of Lycus, according to some, or of Lycurgus king of Thrace, as others will have it. We are told, that an army of Argians commanded by Adrastus king of Argos being in great distress for want of water as they were marching towards Thebes to assist Polynices, addressed the nurse of the young prince Archemorus, whom they accidentally met, and that she laying down the child she had in her arms, on a branch of smilage, out of compassion led the thirsty soldiers to a fountain. But in the mean time a serpent attacked and put to death the child, before Adrastus and his Argians could bring him any relief. However, to allay the grief of Lycurgus for the death of his son, they instituted solemn games in honour of the deceased, which were first celebrated near Nemæa, a city of Argolis. Some say they were renewed annually, others every five years, and others every tenth year. Many are of opinion that they were instituted before the Theban war; but all agree that they were revived by Hercules, and consecrated to Jupiter in thanksgiving for his victory over the Nemæan lion (21). Eusebius is of opinion that they were instituted in the fifty-first olympiad (22). This festival was celebrated with sports, namely chariot-races, foot and horse races, tournaments, boxing, wrestling, &c. The conqueror in any of these exercises was rewarded with a crown of olive, and also of smilage, which was made use of in funeral ceremonies, and renewed the memory of the death of Archemorus. Clemens Alexandrinus informs us, that on this occasion an orator used to pronounce a funeral oration in honour of the young prince, and that the judges, appointed by the cities of Greece to distribute the rewards, were clad in mourning. These games were common to the Argians, Corinthians, and the inhabitants of Cleonea, who had a right to chuse the president by turns (23).

(S) Ægina, now Engia and Lagina, or Lalana, is an island in the Ægean sea, between the territory of Athens and that of Epidaurus, in the Saronic gulf; to which it gives its name. It is about thirty-six miles in circumference; and was anciently famous for the skill of its inhabitants in sea-affairs, and its athletes or wrestlers. Stephanus takes it for one of the Cyclades, and Tzetzes for one of the Sporades; but they are both mistaken, as is plain from Strabo and Pausanias (24).

(T) Naupactus or Naupactum was formerly a considerable city in Ætolia. The present inhabitants call it Epactos or Nepactos, the Turks Einebazi, and the Italians Lepanto. It stood near Antirrhium, within the Griffæan bay, and was called Naupactum, because (20) Pausan. in Corinth. Suidas. Polian. Athenæus. &c. Chron. (23) Pausan. Athenæus. Polian. &c. ubi supra.

(21) Pausan. ubi supra. (22) Euseb. in (24) Strabo. l. 8. Pausan. in Corinth.

For they declared that they would consent to no peace, unless Pylus (U) was restored^a to the Messenians, Atintania (W) to the Romans, and the country of the Ardians (X) to Pleuratus and Scerdilaidas. This was giving law to all Greece, which so incensed Philip that he left the assembly, after having made a short speech, wherein he acquainted them that he was sincerely desirous of peace, and would hearken to any reasonable proposals, but could not by any means brook such insults, meaning the terms proposed by the Ætolians, from those he had conquered^a.

Year of the
flood 2793.
Before Christ
208.

THE assembly being dismissed, the king went to Argos to preside in the Nemean games, as he had lately done in the Heraean. But while he was giving himself up, without restraint, to the enjoyment of such diversions as were no ways seasonable in times of war and alarms, the pro-consul Sulpicius setting out from Naupactus landed between Sicyon and Corinth, and being joined by the Ætolians laid waste all that fertile country. This unexpected invasion obliged the king to interrupt his diversions, and take the field. His arrival struck the enemy with such terror, that leaving the booty behind, they hastened to their ships, and re-embarked for Naupactus. Philip returned to the games, where he was received with an universal applause, the circus, the theatre, and all the streets of the city ringing with his name. But he gained more on the affections of the Greeks, who were zealous republicans, by his affable behaviour, and the popular airs he affected, than by his victories. He appeared at the shews without his diadem, purple robe, or any other ensigns of royal dignity; a sight very pleasing to the inhabitants of free cities^b.

SOME days after the games, news was brought him that the city of Dyme on the confines of Elis had declared for the Ætolians, though it stood in Peloponnesus, and had received an Ætolian garrison. Hereupon Philip crossing the Larissus (Y) entered the territory of Elis, and ravaged the country, and encamped under the very walls of the capital. But he was soon obliged by the Romans and Ætolians to retire at a greater distance, as we have related in the history of Achaia. However, he took by storm in sight of the Romans and Ætolians, a strong hold of great importance, where he found a very considerable booty. While he was dividing the prey among his soldiers, advice was brought him that the Dardanians had entered Macedon, and possessed themselves of a small district called Orestida (Z); that the Dassaretæ had revolted, and that several cities were ready to join the rebels. The Barbarians had been encouraged to shake off the yoke, and invade the kingdom of Macedon by a false report of the king's death. Philip in pursuing the Roman and Ætolian foragers between Corinth and Sicyon, had struck his head against a tree with such violence, that he broke his helmet in pieces. These pieces were gathered up by an Ætolian, and brought to Scerdilaidas, who knew that they belonged to the king's helmet: and hence arose the report that Philip had been killed in a battle in which he had gained the advantage. His presence therefore because the Heraclidæ built there the first ship that carried them into Peloponnesus. It first belonged to the Locri Ozolæ; but they were driven out by the Athenians, who gave it to the Messenians, whom the Lacedæmonians had obliged to abandon Peloponnesus. After the battle of Ægos Potamos the Lacedæmonians took it from the Messenians, and reunited it to the Locri. Afterwards Philip the father of Alexander having seized it, bestowed it upon the Ætolians, and from that time it was always deemed a city of Ætolia (25).

^a LIV. l. 27. c. 29—33. POLYB. l. 10. p. 612.

^b POLYB. & LIV. ibid.

(U) We find three cities mentioned by the antiquaries bearing the name of Pylus. The first stood on the western coast of Messenia over-against Spargia or Spalleria, now Sapienza, a small island in the Ionian sea. The second was situate more to the north in Tryphilia, a province of Elis. The third stood more to the northward of the other two, not far from the mouth of the river Peneus. These three cities laid claim to the honour of having been governed by the famous Nessus the son of Neleus.

It is very plain that the city of Pylus in Messenia was the subject of dispute between Philip and the Ætolians; for the Messenians could have no pretensions to the two latter cities, which belonged to the Eleans, in whose territory they stood (26).

(W) The Atintanes, according to Thucydides (27), inhabited part of the country of the Molossi; but Livy and Polybius place them on the confines of Macedon, towards Illyricum.

(X) The Aryæans or Ardians inhabited the eastern part of Illyricum; they had been conquered by Philip, who united their country to Macedon.

(Y) The Larissus, now the Risa, divided Elis from Achaia propria; it watered the territory of Dyme, and fell into the Ionian sea.

(Z) Orestida was a country in the south-west part of Macedon. Orestes, having fled into this country after the murder of his mother Clytemnestra, built a city there, and gave his own name to the province. It bordered upon Epirus, the country of the Atintanes, and the Adriatic sea (28).

(25) Strabo, l. 9. Pausan. in Phocicis.
l. 4.

(27) Thucyd. ibid. Polyb. l. 11. c. 40. Liv. l. 27. c. 30.

(26) Vide Paus. in Messen. & Eliae. secunda. Thucyd.
l. 2.

(28) Thucyd. l. 2. Liv. l. 31.
being

a being necessary in his own dominions, he hastened home, leaving only a body of three thousand men to protect his friends in Greece^e.

DURING his absence the Romans, Ætolians, and king Attalus possessed themselves of Oricum, Opus, Torone, Tribonos, and Drymus. Whereupon ambassadors being dispatched to him from all the nations that were in his alliance, he settled the affairs of Macedon in the best manner he could, and marched back with incredible expedition into Greece. Upon his arrival Attalus re-imbarked his forces, and returned to Pergamus, Sulpicius, having but one legion on board, retired to the island of Ægina; and the Ætolians, thus abandoned by their allies, were forced to shelter themselves in their strong holds, not being able to make head against the united
b forces of Macedon and Achæa, with the assistance of the Lacedæmonians alone. Philip being thus left master of the field, retook most of the cities which had been reduced in his absence, laid waste great part of Ætolia, put the Lacedæmonians to flight, and then, as winter was drawing near, marched his forces back into Macedon. Early in the spring he returned into Greece, and entering Ætolia at the head of a numerous army obliged the Ætolians to conclude a peace upon very disadvantageous terms. The Romans employed in a more important war at home had left their friends in Greece to shift for themselves; but nevertheless took it very much amiss that they had made a peace without their consent and approbation. Sempronius the pro-consul endeavoured to stir them up anew against Philip, but to no purpose, c they were quite exhausted with such an expensive war, and no-ways in a condition to lend the pro-consul any assistance. He therefore altered his measures, and instead of making war began to treat with the king and his allies of a peace, which was soon agreed on by the mediation of the Epirots^d.

A general
peace concluded.
Year of the
Rome 2799.
Before Christ
214.

THIS peace was not of long continuance; for the Romans having, a few years after, resolved upon a war with Philip, sent Furius Purpureo into Ætolia to engage that nation anew in the interests of Rome. Furius was attended by the envoys of Athens, a city greatly addicted to the Romans; and at the same time ambassadors from Philip arrived with very advantageous proposals, in case the Ætolians would either join their master, or stand neuter. The Ætolian nation was never more d honoured than at this time, when they saw their friendship and alliance courted by a great king and two powerful republics. On the arrival of the ambassadors an extraordinary diet was convened at Naupactus, whither the envoys from Rome, from Athens, and from Philip, immediately resorted. Democritus presided in the diet in quality of prætor; and as he had been bribed by Philip, he directed, that the Macedonians should be heard before the Romans; his pretext for this preference was, that the alliance between Philip and Ætolia was yet fresh, and had been but lately concluded. The speech made by the Macedonian ambassadors was full of invectives against the Romans, they enlarged on their proceedings at Rhegium, Capua, and Tarentum, as instances of their treachery and cruelty; and concluded with exhort-e ing the Ætolians to observe the conditions of peace which they had concluded a few years before with Philip. The Athenians, who spoke next, endeavoured to efface the impressions which this discourse had made: they expatiated, in an affecting manner, on the cruelty and impiety of Philip, who, according to his barbarous method of making war, had shewn no regard to the august temples of the Gods, or the venerable tombs of the dead; they extolled the courage and piety of the Romans, and lastly, conjured the Ætolians to join in the common cause of the two most formidable powers, heaven and Rome. Afterwards Purpureo was heard, and his speech chiefly turned on justifying the conduct of the Romans with regard to the three cities mentioned by the Macedonian orator, he expatiated on the lenity and f moderation shewn by his republic to the Carthaginians, and returned the reproaches of cruelty upon Philip; he did not forget the advantages, which the consular army had already gained over the king; and lastly, advised the Ætolians to lay hold of the present opportunity of renewing their confederacy with the Romans, unless they chose rather to perish with Philip than conquer with Rome^e.

THE diet was inclined to favour the Romans; but Democritus suspended their determination, by declaring that nothing which related to peace or war could be resolved upon out of a general diet, which this was not. The artful prætor made a merit with his countrymen of his address in this affair, pretending that his design was only to gain time, till he could judge which of the two contending parties was most likely to prevail; and then join the strongest^f.

^e POLYB. & LIV. ibid.

^d LIV. l. 30. c. 7.

^e LIV. l. 31. c. 29.

The Ætolians
again join in alliance with the Romans,
and invade Macedon.
Year of the
flood 2806.
Before Christ
197.

IN the mean time, the proconsul Sulpicius having penetrated into the king's dominions and defeated him near Otlophum, the Ætolians at last determined to side with the conqueror, and accordingly in conjunction with Aminander king of the Atbamanes (A) made an irruption into Macedon, and laid siege to Cercinium, a city of Magnesia (B). This sudden invasion alarmed all the nations in the neighbourhood of the lake Boebis (C), who abandoning the country fled to the neighbouring mountains; so that the Ætolians finding no more booty there fell upon the province of Peræbia, took the city of Cyretia (D) by assault, and obliged Mallæa (E) to take up arms, b and join them against the king of Macedon. From Mallæa Aminander was for marching against Gompbi (F) which was very near Atbamania, and might have been easily reduced, as it was defended only by the inhabitants. But the Ætolians chose rather to pillage Thessaly, than assist Aminander in taking a city, which was so conveniently situated to protect his small dominions from the inroads of the Thessalians. The Ætolians having entered Thessaly, committed there great devastations, dividing themselves into small bodies, and lying down in the open fields without keeping guard, or securing themselves with trenches. Aminander seeing he had reason to apprehend some sudden attack, being in an enemy's country, advised them to be upon their guard, and encamp in a regular manner. But they despised his advice, and advancing to the very walls of Phecadum (G), and there lying down on the grass, gave themselves up to eating and drinking, as if they had been in the heart of Ætolia. Hereupon Aminander thought it advisable to withdraw to a rising ground about five hundred paces from the Ætolians, and there secure himself with a ditch and rampart. He was scarce gone, when Philip appeared at the head of a numerous body of horse, fell upon the Ætolians, and cut most of them in pieces; those that escaped fled to Aminander's camp, whither they were pursued by the Macedonians. But Philip, contrary to his expectation, finding the camp well fortify'd, and the Atbamanes ready to receive him, put off the attack to the next morning, his infantry being tired with the long march they had taken to surprize the enemy. In the night, the few Ætolians that remained, and the Atbamanes decamped together, and under the conduct of Aminander escaped through by-ways, and arrived in their own countries^g.

THE next year they entered Thessaly again, and took the cities of Cymines and Angea at the first onset. From thence they advanced to Theuma, Calabrama, Acborra, Ximia, and Cyphara (G), all which cities they took and pillaged. Thus great part of Thessaly fell a prey to the most cruel and avaritious of all the nations that were in alliance with Rome. For the Ætolians, where-ever they came, left nothing ^f Liv. ibid. c. 30.

^g Liv. l. 31. c. 40.

(A) The Atbamanes had then a separate district of their own, surrounded by Thessaly, Epirus, Acarmania, Ætolia and Doris; whence some have made it a part of Thessaly, others of Epirus: Pliny places it in Ætolia; Stephanus makes it a part of Illyricum. According to Ptolemy it was divided from Epirus by the bay of Ambracia (29); and according to Strabo (30) from Ætolia, by the river Aschelous.

(B) Magnesia was a small country, lying at the eastern extremity of Thessaly, between the gulf of Armire and the Saronic gulf. Circinium stood at the foot of mount Offa, near the lake Bæbis, between Sotbussa, and the Macedonian sea (31).

(C) The lake Bæbis, which some place in Bæstia, was near the confines of Magnesia, not far from mount Offa. It is now called the lake of Esero.

(D) Ptolemy reckons Cyretia among the cities of Æstiotis, a country of Thessaly. Sanfon places it between the rivers Pamisus and Curalius. The Pamisus, now called Pentigna Moranta, falls into the Peneus. The Curalius, now Onocera, rises in the province of Pelasgiotis, and empties itself into the same Peneus.

(E) Mallæa, or Malia, was a city of Phthiotis, not far from mount Ossa and Thermopylae. Near it were the hot mineral waters mentioned by Catullus in his elegies. Some are of opinion that the Mæliac gulf, now the gulf of Zeiton, borrowed its name from this city (32).

(F) The city of Gompbi was situate in that part of Thessaly which the ancients call Æstiotis, near the springs of the Peneus (33). According to Livy it was the nearest city of Thessaly to the confines of Epirus (34).

(G) All these cities belonged to Thessaly, but we cannot give any certain account of their situation.

(29) Prot. l. 4.
(33) Strabo, l. 9. Plin. l. 4.

(30) Strabo, l. 10.

(31) Strabo, l. 9.
(34) Livy l. 32.

(32) Strabo, l. 10. c. 13.

- a in the cities or houses but the bare walls, destroying in the flames what they could not carry away, and either putting to the sword the inhabitants, or selling them for slaves to the best bidder. Such was their inhuman method of making war¹.

THE Ætolians continued steady in the interest of Rome during the whole course of the war, and were favoured by the Roman commanders above the other nations of Greece, as being the first that had joined in alliance with their republic. But after the famous battle of Cynocephala, in which Philip was entirely defeated, the affection between the two nations began to cool, and Flaminius, who commanded in that action, to treat the Ætolians in a quite different manner from what he had done formerly. They without all doubt gave some occasion with their boasting speeches to this change. Their cavalry did wonders in the engagement, and by covering the Roman infantry, which was put in disorder at the first onset, gave them time to rally, and saved them the shame of a dishonourable flight. Hence they ascribed to themselves all the glory of the victory, giving out, that without their timely assistance, the Romans had been defeated and cut in pieces. In the songs which they dispersed all over Greece, they named themselves as the chiefs, and the Romans as their auxiliaries (H). Flaminius, who was already disgusted with the Ætolians for plundering the enemy's camp, while the Romans were busy in making prisoners, was now more fired at these insolent reports, which greatly lessened his reputation among the Greeks. His resentment was still warm, when three envoys came from Philip, under pretence of asking a truce to bury the dead, but in reality to solicit a peace; the pro-consul received them, and gave them an answer, without consulting the heads of the Ætolian nation, who were then in the camp, and had greatly contributed to the victory. The Roman was glad of this opportunity to mortify their vanity, whereas he ought to have dissembled, and been more tender of allies, who had proved so useful to him on all occasions. Flaminius agreed with the deputies of Philip upon a truce of fifteen days without admitting to the conference any but the officers of the Roman army; and even promised to grant their master an interview during that time. This air of absolute authority and independence on the other allies shocked the Ætolians to such a degree, that they spread a report in all the cities of Greece, that Flaminius was betraying the common cause, and that he had been bribed by Philip. But notwithstanding these reports, the proconsul appointed a place for the conference, and after having treated the king's ambassadors with uncommon civility, he ordered them on their departure to tell their master, that he desired him not to despond. This message highly offended the Ætolians, who were utter strangers to all humanity and politeness, and confirmed them in their opinion, that the Roman had sold himself to Philip. The place appointed for the interview was a narrow pass, which led into the vale of Tempe. Thither Flaminius resorted, after having invited all his allies to assist at the conferences, which he would not begin till he had consulted the heads of the confederates upon what terms they thought it proper to grant Philip a peace. Aminander and the Acbaeans spoke with a great deal of moderation, and only begged that he would conclude such a peace as might enable Greece to preserve her liberties in the absence of the Romans: as to the particulars of such a treaty, they referred them entirely to his prudence and judgment. But Alexander, one of the heads of the Ætolians rising up, haughtily addressed the pro-consul in the following terms: "You have done wisely, to call us to the conference: you have at last thought fit not to treat of a peace without your allies. But, pray, what do you propose by granting a peace to Philip? Greece will never enjoy its liberties so long as he enjoys the throne of Macedon. You are greatly mistaken, if you fancy it will. Philip must be driven out of his kingdom, before Greece can an Ætolian by nation. He was far inferior to the famous Alcaeus, who was cotemporary with Sappho. The latter lived about the 44th Olympiad, and is famous for the Alcaic verses which took their name from him (35).

¹ Liv. l. 32. c. 13.

(H) Thirty thousand Thessalians, said one of their poets, were killed on the spot. The Ætolians subdued so powerful an enemy with the assistance of the Latins, whom Flaminius had brought to ruin Emania. The author of this distich was one Alcaeus.

(35) Plut. in vita Flam.

" promise herself a lasting tranquillity. You Romans have flattered us with hopes " of liberty ; but there is no liberty for the Greeks till Philip is dead, and his do" minions entirely ruined." When Alexander had done speaking, Flaminius directing his speech to him ; " You are unacquainted, said he, with the character and " sentiments of the Romans ; my republic does not carry her resentments to excess :
 " she knows how to revenge injuries ; but upon the first appearance of submission
 " her anger is appeased ; Hannibal and Carthage are convincing proofs of our mo" deration. As to myself, I never intended to carry on an irreconcilable war with " Philip ; but was always inclined to grant him a peace whenever he should yield " to the conditions that my republic thought fit to prescribe him. You yourselves,
 " O Ætolians, never once mentioned the driving of Philip from his throne till our " late victory. Shall we then be inexorable, because we are conquerors ? When an " enemy attacks us, it is our duty to repel him with all possible bravery ; but if " he yields, it is the part of a generous victor to use him with gentleness and hu" manity ; for animosity dies after victory, and brave men are courageous in acti" on, but mild after it. Nay, it is not your interest to destroy the kingdom of " Macedon, which serves you as a barrier against the Thracians and Gauls (1), who,
 " were they not checked by it, would certainly over-run all Greece ^b." Flaminius concluded with declaring, in the name of all the officers of the Roman army, " That " a peace ought to be granted to Philip if he complied with the conditions which " the other allies should propose, adding, that if the Ætolians did not like it, they c
 " might take what resolutions they pleased on that occasion." Pbineas, the Ætolian prætor, answered Flaminius, and represented to him in very strong terms, " That " Philip, if he were left in possession of Macedon, would soon kindle a new war in " the heart of Greece." But before he ended his harangue, the pro-consul rose from his seat in a passion, and saying with a loud voice, " That he would put it " out of Philip's power to make any further attempts upon Greece," dismissed the assembly ¹.

BUT after all, it was not good nature or compassion that prompted Flaminius to urge the conclusion of a peace with the king of Macedon, but the advice he received that Antiochus, surnamed the Great, was ready to march out of Syria at the head of a powerful army, and make an irruption into Europe. This prince had long kept a correspondence with Philip ; and if these two monarchs should join their forces, such an alliance might prove of dangerous consequence to the Roman republic. Besides, Philip, tho' conquered and driven out of the field, might shut himself up in his strong holds, and dispute inch by inch the conquest of his kingdom. This Flaminius dreaded, being sensible that in the mean time another might be sent to succeed him, and reap all the advantages of his repeated victories ^m.

THE next day Philip appeared at the congress with an air of submission suitable to his present circumstances, and without any preamble declared, that he accepted the articles which he had hitherto rejected, and referred all other matters to the Roman senate. After he had uttered these words, there was a deep silence in the assembly, most of those who were present being touched with compassion. But Pbineas the Ætolian prætor, finding that no body made him any reply, took the liberty to ask him, whether he was willing to restore to the Ætolians the cities of Larissa, Pharsalus, Thebes in Phthiotis, and Ecbina. Will you restore them to you, reply'd Philip. Flaminius was greatly offended at the pretensions of the Ætolians to the city of Thebes, and replied with some warmth, It belongs to the Romans.
 I was the man who appeared before it, and to me it surrendered ; it is therefore become subject to the Romans. Pbineas insisted, that according to the terms of the treaty concluded between Ætolia and Rome it belonged to the former ; the dispute f

^b LIV. l. 33. c. 14. POLYB. l. 17. c. 29.

¹ Idem, ibid.

^m Idem, ibid. c. 15.

(1) It is uncertain whether Livy speaks here of those Gauls who had settled in that part of Asia, which was from them called Galatia, or of another Gaulic nation, which was nearer to Greece, and had made a new settlement about the conflux of the Danube and the Sava. These newcomers took the name of Scordisci, as Justin informs us. Strabo (36) places them about Sirmium, between the Danube and Macedon. About fourscore years before the time we are here speaking of, the Gauls had spread terror and desolation in all the countries of Macedon and Greece, not sparing even the famous temple of Delphi...

a grew warm, but at length the assembly determined in favour of Flaminius. By these steps the Ætolians began to raise that violent storm, which we shall soon see gather and discharge itself upon that unhappy nation*.

THE king having accepted the conditions, a truce was granted him for four months, to negotiate a peace at Rome; but Flaminius demanded his son Demetrius, with some of the chief lords of his court, for hostages, and moreover two hundred talents, upon condition, nevertheless, that both the money and hostages should be restored if the peace did not take place*. Philip comply'd, and immediately dispatched his ambassadors to Rome, as also did the Ætolians; the former to solicit a peace, and the latter to obstruct it. When they arrived at Rome, the republic had just chosen new consuls, L. Flurius Purpureo and M. Claudius Marcellus. The latter being desirous of having Macedon for his province, and there finishing the war, strenuously opposed the peace, and being seconded by the Ætolians in his opposition had like to have prevailed in the senate. But the tribunes bringing the affair before the people, the tribes unanimously voted for granting Philip his request*.

THE Ætolians were the only people in Greece dissatisfied with the peace; they had been refused some cities which they claimed, and thought their services very ill rewarded by the Romans, who could not have conquered, say they, without their assistance. They carried their complaints to the general diet of all Greece, called the Pylaicum (K), and there endeavoured to stir up new enemies against Rome. But finding that the free states of Greece were all well pleased with the late treaty of peace, they determined to have recourse to Antiochus king of Syria, to Nabis tyrant of Lacedæmon, and even to their sworn enemy Philip king of Macedon. It was natural enough for them to suppose, that Macedon and Lacedæmon would readily enter into a league against the Romans, who had lately imposed very hard conditions upon them. And as for Antiochus, his interest, his honour, the steps he had already taken, and the advice he received from Hannibal, all inclined them to believe, that he would not delay passing over into Europe, and declaring war with Rome. Nor did they despair to see Carthage also join so many confederate nations, and make some efforts to shake off the yoke which Rome had laid on her. All these considerations encouraged the Ætolians, and gave them no small hopes of seeing the imperious republic humbled in her turn. They chose for their prætor one Tboas, a man fit for their design, being an inveterate enemy to Rome, and a sanguine opposer of the peace lately concluded with the Macedonians. Tboas immediately assembled a general diet at Naupactus, and there convey'd into the breasts of all the deputies the irreconcilable aversion which he bore to the Romans. A decree passed without opposition, empowering him to send ambassadors to all the princes who were dissatisfied with the Romans, and stir them up to war against the common

* Liv. l. 32. c. 13.

• Idem, ibid.

• Idem, ibid.

(K) Livy by the Pylaicum concilium means, that assembly of the Amphyctones which met every year at Thermopylae, to deliberate on the common interests of Greece. These diets were established by Amphyction the third king of Athens, in order to unite all the Greeks in one body. He believed, and with a great deal of reason, that if he could succeed in this point, he should render them formidable to the barbarians. Many years after Acrisius, king of Argos, enlarged the privileges of this council, and granted it an unlimited power. He likewise added several deputies of other provinces, who had not till his time been admitted to the council. Some have inferred from hence, that there were two different sorts of Amphyctones; of general assemblies; the one instituted by Amphyction, the other by Acrisius; whereas the king of Argos only improved what the king of Athens had begun. Æschines speaks of twelve Amphyctonic nations, (for so the Greeks called those that had a right to send deputies to this assembly) but names only eleven; viz. the Thessalians, Boeotians, Dorians, Ionians, Periæbæi, Magnesians, Locrians, Oecæans, Phthiotæ, Maleans and Phocæans: the name of the twelfth has been probably lost by the negligence of the transcribers. The Dolopes not mentioned by Æschines in this enumeration, are said by the ancients to have enjoy'd the Amphyctonic right. Each of these nations chose two deputies, whom they sent to the general assembly; one of those was charged with the care of religious matters, and thence stiled Hieromon; the other was called Pylagoras, or the orator sent to Pylæ or Thermopylae. Sometimes each nation sent three, and even four deputies; but whatever their number was, they had only two votes in the assembly. The Phocians were formerly excluded from the assembly for having plundered the temple of Delphos; but afterwards wiped off this dishonour by saving the same temple from being plundered by the Gauls, who invaded Greece under the conduct of the second Brennus. This supreme council was held twice a year, in autumn at Thermopylae, in a temple dedicated to Ceres; and situate in a large plain watered by the Asopus; in the spring at Delphos in the temple of Apollô (37.)

(37) Polyb. l. 8. Pausan. in Archaic.

enemy. Pursuant to this decree, Damocritus was dispatched to Lacedæmon, Nican-^a der to Macedon, and Dicæarchus to Syria. The first was ordered to make Nabis sensible of the contemptible condition into which he had been brought by the Romans. His state was reduced to a small territory, and Acbaia was sole mistress of Pelopon-^a nesus. By yielding up his ports, he was deprived of the riches he formerly got by trading with the neighbouring nations, and being shut up within the walls of La-^a cedæmon he had only the empty title of king. The second was instructed to tell Philip, that he would never have a fairer opportunity of redeeming himself from the Roman tyranny. The conquests of Alexander the great, and his glorious exploits were also deemed proper topics to awake his jealousy. Nicaner was likewise ordered to assure him, that the proposals of the Ætolians were not chimerical, that Antiochus^b was ready to cross into Europe with a mighty fleet, and a numerous army, that the great Hannibal, whose very name struck the Romans with terror, assisted him with his advice, that the Ætolians would join him with all their forces, and that Rome could not possibly resist so many enemies at once. The third ambassador was directed to persuade Antiochus to pass over into Greece, and magnify to him the forces of Ætolia: he was to let him know that the conquests of the Romans in Greece were chiefly owing to the Ætolians, and assure him that their troops were numerous and well disciplined, and that their country would furnish his army with provisions, as it afforded safe harbours for his fleets. Nay, Dicæarchus was charged to deceive the king of Syria with a lie, and tell him, that Philip and Nabis had already signed the confederacy^c.

Philip and Antiochus were not hasty in coming to a determination; but Nabis immediately took up arms, and besieged Gytium, a maritime city, which the Romans had obliged him to give up to the Acbaeans. Upon this beginning of a general commotion, the Roman senate thought it advisable to send ambassadors into Greece to defeat the measures of the Ætolians, and maintain those cities steady in their alliance with Rome. At their arrival they found that Ætolia had already declared openly for Antiochus. The ambassador (L) who had been sent to Antiochus, was returned, and had brought with him an ambassador from the king of Syria to the Ætolian diet. Before the general diet was convened, these two endeavoured to d prepossess the minds of the people in favour of Antiochus. Nothing was talked of but the prodigious army he was to bring over with him. They exaggerated beyond measure the number of foot, horse, and elephants, that were to come into Ætolia; and above all the immense treasures, which the king would distribute among his friends, sufficient to purchase all the lands belonging to the Roman republic. The minds of the Ætolians were blinded with these prejudices, when the diet was assembled to give audience to the king's ambassador. The Roman deputies, among whom was Flaminius, highly respected by all the other states of Greece, had regular notice sent them of whatever was transacting in Ætolia; and they scorned some of their chiefs to thwart as much as possible the designs of the factious Tboas. e Flaminius also engaged the Athenians to send deputies to the assembly of Ætolia, and there to support the interests of his republic. Tboas opened the diet by acquainting his countrymen that an ambassador was come from the mighty monarch of Syria to court their friendship, and propose things greatly to the advantage of both nations. He was immediately ordered to introduce him, that they might hear his proposals from his own mouth. Being introduced, he made an harangue well calculated for the present circumstances. He told them, that it had been happy for Greece, that his master had concerned himself in their affairs before Philip was reduced so low; that if he had joined his forces to those of the Macedonian, Greece would not now groan under the tyrannical oppressions of Rome. "But still your case, said f " he, is not without remedy, the wound is not incurable; if you put in execution " the designs you have formed, I promise you a deliverer in the great Antiochus; " he with your assistance, and that of the gods, will be able to restore Greece to its " ancient splendor"^g.

^a Liv. l. 35. c. 12.^b Liv. l. 35. c. 31—34.(L) Livy had said a little before, that Dicæarchus the brother of Tboas then prætor of Ætolia had been sent ambassador to Antiochus; and here he tellsus that Tboas was sent; wherein he agrees with Appian. Perhaps the prætor went with his brother to give the greater weight to the embassy.

- a THE Ætolians were ready to accept the offer without further deliberation; but the Athenian ambassador prevailed upon the assembly to hear the Romans before they came to any resolution. Accordingly Flaminius being sent for and introduced, put them in mind of their alliance with Rome; and after exhorting them rather to carry their complaints to the senate, than fill all Greece and Asia with them, he concluded thus: " Ætolians, are you then determined out of mere wantonness to light a fire in Greece, which it will not be in your power to extinguish? Will you arm the nations of the east for their mutual destruction? What a dreadful storm are you bringing upon yourselves! you are the first on whom it will fall." The Ætolians, who had already laid their complaints before the senate, and had been by
- b the senate referred to Flaminius, seeing themselves now referred back by Flaminius to the senate, grew outrageous, and in the presence of the Roman passed a decree conceived in the following terms: Let Antiochus be called into Europe to restore Greece oppressed by the Romans to its ancient liberty. Flaminius demanded a copy of the decree; but the prætor refused it him, answering with an haughty air, that he had business of much greater consequence at that time on his hands; but that he would communicate it to him very soon on the banks of the Tyber, with all the forces of Syria. This was an open declaration of war, whereupon Flaminius returned to Corinth there to watch the enemies motions, and acquaint the senate with the steps they should take^a.
- c IN the mean time the privy council of the Ætolians formed a design of seizing on three cities, which were reckoned the bulwarks of Greece; these were Chalcis in Eubœa, Demetrias in Thessaly, and Lacedæmon in the heart of Peloponnesus. Three men of known valour and ability in war were charged with the execution of this extraordinary design. Tboas was appointed to take Chalcis, Alexamenes to surprize Lacedæmon, and Diocles to make the attempt upon Demetrias. They all three set out at the same time on their respective expeditions, but were not attended with the like success. Diocles approaching the city of Demetrias with a small body of chosen troops, sent a messenger to acquaint the inhabitants that he was come with no other design, but to attend Eurylochus to his native country, and conduct him with that honour, which was due to his rank and merit. Eurylochus had been chief magistrate of Demetrias, and in that post disoblighd the Romans, whose partizans had forced him to leave his country, and take sanctuary among the Ætolians. However, the Demetrians touched with the tears of his wife and children had consented to recall him; and his return Diocles made use of for the execution of his design, Eurylochus himself being privy to the whole plot. Both Diocles and Eurylochus arrived at the gates of the city with a small body of horse, the rest of the cavalry being ordered to follow at a distance. To prevent giving umbrage to the inhabitants, Diocles ordered his troop to dismount, and enter on foot, leading their horses by their bridles. At the gate he left a few horse-men to be ready to fall on the citizens, if they should offer to shut it when the rest of the cavalry appeared. Thus Diocles was admitted without the least suspicion; but while he was leading Eurylochus by the hand to his house, news was brought him that the whole body of the Ætolian cavalry was arrived, and had got possession of the gate. Hereupon he ordered the troop that attended him to remount, and in that surprize making himself master of the most important posts in the city, detached several small bodies with orders to put to death all the heads of the Roman party. Thus the Ætolians possessed themselves of one of the most important places of Thessaly^b.
- d BUT Lacedæmon was not to be so easily surprized. Nabis was a cunning and suspicious prince, and, as he had many enemies, always on his guard. The council therefore of the Ætolians in the instructions they gave Alexamenes had recourse to treachery. Nabis had been lately defeated by Philopœmen, and apprehending that the brave Achæan designed to besiege him in his capital, sent messenger after messenger to his friends and allies the Ætolians, acquainting them with the danger that threatned him, and earnestly entreating them to send him without delay such a reinforcement as might extricate him out of the difficulties and straits which his alliance with their republic had reduced him to. The treacherous Ætolians thought this a favourable opportunity for putting in execution their horrid design, which was to assassinate their ally, and seize on the city of Lacedæmon for themselves.

The Ætolians invite Antiochus into Greece. Year of the flood 2812. Before Christ 191.

The Ætolians form a design of seizing Chalcis, Demetrias, and Lacedæmon.

Demetrias taken.

^a Liv. ibid.

^b Liv. ibid. c. 35.

Alexamenes therefore, a man well well qualified for such a work, was ordered to set out with a thousand foot, and thirty horsemen. The latter were all young men, chosen out of the whole body of the cavalry, as the most fit for any desperate attempt. When they were ready to march, the young horsemen were introduced by the prætor Demetrius to the council of the apocleti, and there told that it was not their business to think what expedition they were sent upon, but only to execute blindly whatever Alexamenes should enjoin them; and that how desperate soever the thing he commanded might seem, and repugnant to reason, yet unless they readily performed it, they should not meet with a kind reception on their return home. With these instructions they began their march to Lacedæmon, where they were received by Nabis with the greatest transports of joy. Alexamenes encouraged him not to be under any apprehension of danger either from the Achæans, or the Romans, since Antiochus had already passed the Hellepont, and would soon enter Greece with a prodigious army, and such an immense number of elephants as would be sufficient, without any other help, to tread down the Romans. As for the Ætolians, said he, they would have sent you all their troops, if they had not thought it necessary to keep them at home till the arrival of the king of Syria, before whom they were desirous to make the best appearance they could. He added, that it would be much for the glory and reputation of Lacedæmon; if he could shew the great king his phalanx finely equipped and well disciplined. Nabis was highly pleased with this soothing discourse, and used every day to exercise his soldiers in the plains of the Eurotus near the capital; Alexamenes attended him at the head of his Ætolians, whom he drew up apart from the Lacedæmonians, and then keeping close by the tyrant's side, while he rid through the files of his army to order their motions, watched a proper opportunity to give the blow he designed. He observed that Nabis used to ride from one wing of the phalanx to the other guarded only by three or four horsemen. This made him form a design of assassinating him in sight of his troops when under arms. Accordingly having fixed with himself a day for the execution of so desperate an attempt, he waited on the tyrant to the place of the rendezvous, and there, while Nabis was busy in exercising his phalanx, he stepped aside to his thirty horsemen, and told them that he should soon stand in need both of their courage and address; Keep your eyes, said he, fixed upon me, and whatever you shall see me take in hand, be sure to finish it, if you care to see your country again, and your relations. He said no more, but returned to attend the king as usual. At length as Nabis was riding from one place to another with great speed, guarded only by two or three horsemen, Alexamenes seized on the desired opportunity, and with his lance wounded the king's horse. Then the thirty Ætolians without deliberating on the matter, flew in, and dispatched him before any one could come to his assistance. His guards were so surprised, that instead of seizing the assassins, they stood gazing at the king's dead body, which lay on the ground covered with wounds. But Alexamenes heading the Ætolian infantry, which was posted in the left wing of the Lacedæmonian phalanx, hastened to the capital, and entering it without opposition, began to plunder the tyrant's palace. As Nabis was equally hated by his citizens and soldiers, his death would have been generally approved of, if the Ætolian had convened the assembly, and made a speech suitable to the occasion. But the love of plunder prevailed over all other considerations; and Alexamenes, contrary to all rules of prudence, spent the remainder of the day, and the whole night in searching for the treasures of the murdered king. In the mean time the Lacedæmonians, recovering themselves from their surprise, were highly provoked to see the ancient palace of their kings ransacked by a treacherous assassin, as if their city had been taken by storm. Wherefore the whole city ran to arms, and for want of a better leader putting at their head a young child of the blood royal, they fell upon the Ætolians, who were straggling about the city in quest of booty, and put them all to the sword. Alexamenes was killed in the palace, and those few that made their escape, were seized by the magistrates of Arcadia, and condemned to slavery. Such was the result of the attempt upon Lacedæmon. Philopæmen no sooner heard of the death of the tyrant and his assassin, but he hastened to Lacedæmon, and finding all things there in the utmost confusion, he assembled the people, and exhorted them to recover their ancient liberty. They followed his advice, and readily joined in the Achæan league. Thus the ancient kingdom of Sparta became a member of a commonwealth,

Nabis murdered by the Ætolians.

Lacedæmon joins in the Achæan league.

a wealth, whereof the name was scarce known when the Spartans ruled over all Greece^u.

As for Tboas, he failed in his attempt upon Chalcis, the magistrates of that city, Ætolians ^{fail in their at-} who were strongly attached to the Romans, having received timely notice of the de- ^{tempt upon} sign, and put the city in a condition to sustain a long siege. The inhabitants of Chalcis, hearing that Tboas had hired a great many transports in order to carry over troops to their island, sent a messenger to him, desiring to know for what reason he was going to commit hostilities in their territories; the Ætolian answered, that his only design was to deliver Eubœa from the Romans, who domineered more insolently over it than the Macedonians had ever done. But the inhabitants reply'd, that b they neither found their liberties abridged, nor needed any avenger or deliverer from the Romans, since they feared no danger, nor apprehended any injury from them. This disconcerted the measures of the Ætolian, who had placed all hopes of success in a sudden attack. Wherefore finding that proper preparations were made for his reception, he retired much dissatisfied at his failing in an attempt upon a city, which would have made him master of the whole island, and open'd a way for Antiochus into Attica^w.

Flaminius, who then resided at Corinth, being informed that the Ætolians had made themselves masters of Demetrias in Thessaly, took upon him to recover it to the Roman party. He first wrote to Eunomus, prætor of Thessaly, desiring him to c arm all the young men of the country. Then he charged Villius to go to Demetrias, and inform himself upon the spot of the disposition of the inhabitants. Accordingly Villius embarked on a quinqueremis, and came in sight of Demetrias. The report of his arrival raised a great commotion among the inhabitants, who ran in crouds to the port to see him. But the Roman, without any concern at seeing crouds about him, addressed Euryloebus the chief magistrate in this manner: Can the Romans reckon the people of Demetrias among their allies or no? Am I received here as a friend or not? The magistrate answered, that his fellow citizens were attached to Rome; but at the same time he let him know, that his presence might disturb the repose of a city that was jealous of its liberty; which was in effect, tell-d ing him in a gentle manner, that he would not admit him into Demetrias. And indeed Euryloebus had already declared for Antiochus, and the inhabitants, seduced by his councils, had just then concluded a league with the Ætolians against Rome. Villius understood by Euryloebus's discourse that he could not, without danger, appear among the people; and the interview ended with severe reproaches on both sides; the Roman upbraided the Demetrians with ingratitude, since they owed their liberty to Rome, and the Demetrians reproached the Romans with injustice, haughtiness and ambition. Villius therefore was obliged to put to sea again; but before he reembarked, turning to the multitude that were pursuing him with great noise and menaces, "I plainly see, said he, the storm that will fall upon your heads;
e "your misfortunes will convince you, when it is too late, that none, who provoke "the Romans, escape with impunity." Flaminius upon the return of Villius, and his report, laid aside all thoughts of bringing the Demetrians back to their old alliance^z.

On the other hand Tboas, having failed in his attempt upon Chalcis, went strait to Antiochus, and pressed him to delay no longer his setting out for Greece. At the same time he dissuaded him from sending Hannibal with an army into Italy, insinuating that the Carthaginian would assume to himself all the glory of such an enterprise. As this fell in with the Syrian's suspicious and jealous temper, he entirely dropped the design, to which he was before well inclined. And now it being f resolved that Greece should be the only seat of war, the king pitched upon Demetrias for the place where he should land. Having therefore got every thing ready for his departure, he embarked with an army consisting only of ten thousand foot, five hundred horse, and six elephants; such a small body of men was no-ways suitable to the majesty of so great a king, nor answered the expectations of his Greek allies: but these were all the troops he had ready; Polyxenidas indeed, one of his generals, was ordered into Asia to draw together the rest of his forces, and lead them into Europe. The king landed at Pteleum in Phthiotis, and from thence Antiochus arrives in Greece. marched to Demetrias. Here the heads of the Ætolian nation waited upon him, and ^u Liv. l. 35. c. 37. PLUT. in Philop.

^w Liv. ibid. c. 33.

^z Idem, ibid. c. 39:

invited

invited him to Lamia, one of their cities, where a general assembly was convened, to receive him. Being introduced to the diet, he made an harangue, wherein he told them, that his eagerness to comply with their request had induced him to leave Asia before he had made the necessary preparations for such an expedition; that his zeal for their deliverance had made him even forgetful of his own dignity; that their expectations should be fully answered next spring; and that as soon as the seas were passable, they should see all Greece covered with armies, and their harbours filled with fleets. He concluded with these words: "I will spare neither fatigues nor expences; I will expose my person to the greatest dangers, to re-establish you in the full enjoyment of your liberties: Rome has enslaved you, but Syria offers you a deliverer; let us then share the trouble between us; do you furnish provisions, I will find men and arms."

THIS speech was received with great applause, and when the king was withdrawn, it was debated in the assembly what title they should give him, and in what character he should act in Ætolia. The most judicious saw plainly, that Antiochus instead of a real and present assistance gave them little more than bare hopes and promises, and therefore were for having him act only as a mediator between Rome and Ætolia. But this being rejected by a great majority, the opinion of Thoas prevailed, which was, that the king should be honoured with the title of generalissimo or commander in chief of all the Greek armies against Rome. Then a council of thirty persons was appointed, to whom the king might have recourse on all occasions. The first step he took by their advice was to enter into a negotiation with Chalcis, a city which was famous for its affection to the Romans. In a conference which was held between the Ætolians and Chalcidians at Salganea, the former used their utmost efforts to draw that important city into an alliance with Antiochus, but without renouncing the friendship of the Romans; they declared that the king of Syria was come into Greece, not to make it the seat of war, but to deliver it from slavery; that nothing could be more advantageous to the cities of Greece than to live in amity both with Antiochus and the Romans, since the one would by that means be a check on the other; that if they withstood the advantageous offers of such a mighty monarch, they might soon repent it, the Romans, on whom they depended, being at a great distance, and the king at their gates^a.

Mistio, one of the chief men of Chalcis, replied; that he could not imagine what people Antiochus was come to deliver, and for whose sake he had left his kingdom, and crossed over into Greece; that as for the inhabitants of Chalcis, they had no occasion for a deliverer, since they were free; nor of a defender, since they enjoyed the sweets of peace under the protection of Rome; that they did not refuse the friendship of Antiochus and the Ætolians; but if they would shew themselves friends, the best proof they could give at present of their friendship was to leave the island, since they were fully determined neither to admit them into their city, nor make any alliance with them, but in conjunction with the Romans^b.

THIS answer being brought to the king on board his ship, where he had continued during the conference, he thought it adviseable to return to Demetrias, not having a sufficient number of troops with him to make an attempt upon the city. He was not at all pleased with his Ætolian counsellors, seeing the first step they had made him take proved so inglorious. But Thoas appeased him with the hopes of gaining over Aminander king of the Atbamanes, with the Boeotians and Acbaeans, who, said he, are all dissatisfied with the proceedings of the Romans. Accordingly negotiations were set on foot, and ambassadors dispatched to these three powers. The Acbaean diet, which was held at Ægium, gave audience to the ambassadors of the Ætolians and Antiochus, in the presence of Flaminius. The Syrian ambassador, who spoke first, expatiated on the irresistible power of his master; he declared with an emphatical tone of voice, that a numberless multitude of horsemen were crossing the Hellepont, consisting partly of cuirassiers in impenetrable armour, and partly of bow-men, who discharged their darts with as much skill and dexterity when they turned their backs, as when they faced their enemy: to the cavalry, which alone was sufficient to overpower all the forces of Europe, he added more numerous bodies of infantry, the Dabæ, the Medes, the Elymaeans, the Cadusii, &c.

^a Idem, ibid. c. 42—44.^b Liv. ibid. c. 46.^c Idem, ibid. c. 47.

a names never before heard in Greece, and therefore, as he thought, more terrible; with regard to the fleet, he assured them that it would over-spread all the coasts, and fill all the ports of Greece: concerning money, it was, he said, needless to mention the immense sums, which Antiochus possessed, since they knew that the kingdom of Asia had always abounded with gold. In the close of his speech he addressed the Achæans, telling them, that though his master was come from the most remote parts of the east, purely to restore Greece to its freedom, yet he did not require that the Achæans should take up arms against Rome, but only desired them to stand neuter, and treat both parties as friends, assuring them that their neutrality should screen them and their country from the many calamities that threatened b Greece^b.

Archidamus, the Ætolian ambassador, spoke to the same effect, advising the Achæans to sit only as spectators of a war, which must bring utter destruction upon Rome; then growing insensibly warmer, he launched out into invectives and reproaches against the Romans in general, and Flaminius in particular; he called them an ungrateful people, who had forgot that they owed to the valour of the Ætolians not only the victory they had gained over Philip, but their general's life, and the safety of the army. "For what great exploits, continued he, has Flaminius per-

Insolent speech of Archidamus the Ætolian, before the Achæan diet.

c "formed during this war? his whole time has been spent in consulting the auspices, "in sacrificing victims, and offering vows, as though he had been an augur or a "priest, while I exposed myself to the enemy's darts for his sake." Flaminius heard all these reproaches with patience, and then reply'd with pleasantry thus: Attempts have now been made, Achæans, to terrify you with an enumeration of those nations of Asia, which are to pour in, like a torrent, upon Greece. This puts me in mind of an entertainment, which was made me by a friend of mine in Chalcis, who is a man of humour, and treats his guests very elegantly. He invited me to a banquet at a time of year when venison was very scarce, and yet there seemed to be great plenty of it served up at his table. I was surpris'd; but my friend smiling told me, that what I took for venison was nothing but hog's flesh disguised several ways, and seasoned with different sauces. The same may be said of this Speech of Flaminius.

d mighty king's troops, which have been so pompously extolled and magnified. The Dabæ, the Medes, the Cadusii, the Elymæans, names indeed that are not heard every day in Greece, are all but one nation, and a nation of slaves. Whatever disguises may be used, they are all but one sort of men; let the sauce be what it will, the meat is the same. And as for the Ætolians, they are brave only in words; they may amuse the king of Syria with their bragging discourses, but both you, Achæans, and I, are better acquainted with their character than to be imposed upon. As for their mighty monarch, what a poor figure is he come to make in these parts? his whole army is not equal to two of our smallest legions. And where are the riches which he promises you? he has been obliged at his first arrival to beg of the Ætolian diet provisions and money. From thence he rambled to Chalcis, which he was obliged to leave with ignominy. "The Ætolians have very injudiciously given "credit to Antiochus, and Antiochus shewed as little judgment in believing the Ætolians. This ought to teach you not to be imposed upon, but to put all your "confidence in the Romans, the effects of whose friendship you have so often experienced. When they demand of you a neutrality, they invite you to become a "prey to both parties, and to suffer all the evils of war without sharing the advantages of victory^e."

f THE Achæans without hesitation declared for the Romans, and resolved to make war upon Antiochus and the Ætolians: They immediately sent five hundred men to reinforce the garrison of Chalcis, and the like number to Albens, which began to waver.

Antiochus and the Ætolians received no greater satisfaction from the Bæotians, who told their ambassadors, that they would come to no resolution till Antiochus's army was on the frontiers of Bæotia^d.

THE king of Syria having thus solicited in vain, either by his ambassadors or in person, most of the Greek states to join in alliance with him, retired at last to Demetrias, where he held a council of war on the operations of the ensuing campaign. Hannibal who was invited to it with all the chief commanders of the army, being asked his opinion first, advised the king before he undertook any thing else to use his utmost endeavours to gain over Philip of Macedon; which, he said, was so important a step, that could they but succeed in it, they might without much ado become masters of all Greece. But if Philip should refuse to take up arms against Rome, in that case he was of opinion, that the king should send his son Seleucus at the head of an army into Macedon, and by that means prevent him from lending any assistance to the Romans. He insisted on a still more important point, and maintained, as he had always done, that the only way to defeat the Romans, was to send an army into *Italy.

^b Idem, ibid. c. 48.

^c Idem, ibid. c. 49.

^d Idem, l. 36. c. 2.

THE council could not but approve of what Hannibal said, but at the same time the Ætolians diverted the king from following his opinion, pretending that if he pursued the Carthaginian's plan, all the glory would be ascribed to him, and that since Antiochus had already taken another course and was in Greece, it would be highly disreputable in him to alter his measures. In the council it was resolved that the king should again attempt the winning over of Chalcis, and accordingly he set out again for that place. On his march he detached Menippus one of his generals with three thousand men to intercept a body of five hundred Romans, which Flaminius had sent under the command of Miltio the Chalcidian to reinforce the garrison of Chalcis. Menippus came upon them unexpectedly, while they were amusing themselves in viewing the rarities of a temple dedicated to Apollo in the neighbourhood of Tanagra (M). Neither the sanctity of the place, which enjoy'd the privileges of an asylum, nor the friendship that still subsisted between Antiochus and the republic, war not being yet declared, protected them from the fury of the Syrians; they were attacked in the very temple and grove of Apollo, most of them put to the sword, and fifty taken prisoners; a few of them escaped with their leader Miltio, who in a small boat got safe to Chalcis. This was the first time Antiochus drew his sword in these parts; but by shedding Roman blood he made himself the aggressor, and gave Rome a new right to declare him an enemy. The Syrian flushed with this small advantage became more bold and enterprising; he advanced at the head of six thousand men to the Euripus, where he had ordered his fleet to attend him, and appeared the second time before Chalcis. This city was rent into factions, and now d the Ætolian party prevailing, Miltio and Xenocides, with such other citizens as persisted in their attachment to the Romans, were commanded to depart, and the city opened her gates to Antiochus. The example of the capital was followed by the whole island, and all Eubœa submitted to the Syrian, who from that time made Chalcis the place of his residence. He spent the winter there, sending deputies to all the free states of Greece to court their friendship. His power began now to be formidable; wherefore the Eleans, the Epirots, the Bœotians, and the Albamanes readily joined him, renouncing their alliance with Rome. The Albamanes were prevailed upon to join him by Philip, the regent of Althamania, who was a pretender to the crown of Macedon (N)†.

Antiochus diverted by the Ætolians from following the advice of Hannibal.

The progress of Antiochus's arms in Greece.

AND now the time drawing near to take the field, Antiochus advanced to Larissa, and from thence summoned his allies to send their troops to the neighbourhood of Pberæ, where they were to rendezvous. While he was waiting here for the arrival of the confederate troops, he made a very impolitic step, which was the taking the regent of Althamania with him to the plains of Cynocéphalæ, where the Macedonians, who had been killed when Philip was overcome, lay still unburied. He thought that the pretended king of Macedon, by procuring their obsequies to be performed, might gain the affections of the Macedonians. But this served only to exasperate the true king of Macedon, who immediately gave the Romans notice of the progress Antiochus was making in Greece‡.

* Idem, ibid. c. 4.

† Liv. ibid. c. 5.

POLYB. legat. 12.

‡ Liv. & POLYB. ibid.

(M) Tanagra, a city of Bœotia on the banks of the Asopbus, five miles distant from the Euripus, is now called Anatoria. The temple dedicated to Apollo, and called Delium, was built on the coast of Bœotia, between the city of Aulis, and the mouth of the Asopbus, about five miles from Tanagra (4).

(N) Amynder, king of the Albamanes, had married at Megalopolis, a woman named Apamia, a native of Macedon, who was said to be descended from Alexander the great. The father of Apamia, who also bore the name of Alexander, gave out among the Megalopolitans that he was the true heir of the kingdom of Macedon. The brother of Apamia, whose name was Philip, governed the kingdom of Althamania under Amynder, who was a weak prince: and Antiochus gained over Philip, by promising to restore him to the throne of his ancestors.

(4) Strabo, l. 9.

- a THE king of Syria being reinforced with the troops of his allies, and having no enemies to resist him, laid siege to Pheræ, which after a vigorous resistance was forced to surrender. From Pheræ he advanced to Larissa, and while he was deliberating whether he should lay siege to it or not, news was brought him that a body of Romans was arrived at Gonni, a city about twenty miles from Larissa. Claudius, who commanded this small detachment, in order to deceive Antiochus encamped in a much larger camp than was necessary for so small a number of troops, and kindled so many fires, that Antiochus believing a numerous army of Romans was ready to fall upon him, decamped with great precipitation, and returned to Chalcis, which city proved as fatal to him as Capua had been to Hannibal. For, there, though he was
- b advanced in years, being above fifty, he suffered himself to be shamefully captivated by the charms of a fair Chalcidian. She was the daughter of one of the chief citizens of Chalcis, named Cleoptolemus, in whose house the king lodged, and a young woman of great virtue. The king therefore was obliged to disclose his passion, not to her only, but likewise to her father, and desire his consent to marry her. The disproportion of her age and condition to those of the king's made Cleoptolemus fear that his daughter would soon repent her advancement to so high a station, and therefore was very unwilling to grant the king his request. But Antiochus to the passion of a lover joined the authority of a sovereign, and then the father was obliged to acquiesce; and the nuptials were celebrated with regal magnificence, and all the security of the most peaceable times. The king was now so taken up with his young queen, that he seemed to forget Rome, Greece, and Syria. Neither the important war he was engaged in, nor the defence of his allies, nor the preservation of the glory he had already acquired, affected him in the least. His unseasonable love was become a standing topic of rally in all conversations, his allies made loud complaints, the soldiery, being kept in a state of inaction, began to mutiny, and the Ætolians themselves to express great uneasiness. But the king insensible to every thing but his passion, which engrossed the whole man, spent the rest of the winter in feasting and rejoicings; and the ill example of the court infected the officers, and even the common soldiers of the Syrian army: discipline was neglected, their bodies were weakened, and the whole army abandoned themselves to idleness and debauchery^h.
- c
- d

Chalcis proves fatal to Antiochus.

- WHILE Antiochus was thus lost in pleasures at Chalis, Rome kept a watchful eye over him. A hundred quinqueremes were fitted out to scour the eastern seas, and after the elections were over, and a regulation made of the troops that were to serve this year, war was formally declared against Antiochus. Then the new consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and A. Acilius Glabrio drew lots for their provinces, and Greece fell to the latter, who set out in the beginning of May for Brundisium, whence he set sail for Greece, and crossing the Ionian sea, landed his forces, without the least opposition, to the number of twenty thousand foot, two thousand
- e
- f
- horse, and fifteen elephants. He immediately sent his infantry to Babius, who was encamped near Pellinæa in Thessaly, and with his cavalry he marched to Limnæa, another city of Thessaly, which the king of Macedon was besieging. Both these places surrendered to the consul at discretion, and in Pellinæa was taken Philip the pretender to the crown of Macedon. The king in derision called him brother, ordered him to be saluted king, and conducted him to the consul, who put him in irons and sent him to Rome. Then the Romans and Macedonians parted, to spread the terror of their arms in different places. The king made himself master of all Atbamania, Amynder having retired with his wife and children into Epyrus; and the consul soon reduced all Thessaly. This surprising progress of the Romans roused
- at last Antiochus out of his lethargy. He loved his new wife Eubia to adoration; but his reason, pointing out to him the shameful figure a man of his years and character must make in being thus taken up with youthful pleasures, at last got the better of his passion; and he determined to leave Chalcis, and draw nearer to Ætolia. This obliged him to assemble all the troops he had dispersed over Greece, and join them in one army. All the Syrian troops amounted to no more than ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse. With these he advanced to the confines of Ætolia, in hopes of powerful succours from thence: but he was disappointed; for the Ætolian chiefs could not raise above four thousand men, who were for the most part their own clients and vassals. Antiochus was then sensible that he had been imposed

The progress of the Romans roused Antiochus.

^h Liv. ibid. Appian. c. 96.

Antiochus
seizes Ther-mopylæ.

upon by Tboas; but notwithstanding this disappointment, he pursued his measures. a He knew that the Roman army had passed the Sperchius, and was ravaging Phibiatis. To prevent therefore their entering Achaia by way of Loeris, and at the same time to secure himself against the attacks of the enemy, he seized a pass already famous in history, called Thermopylæ. This pass was not above twenty-five foot broad, and bounded on one side by the sea, and on the other by mount Oeta. The king strengthened the natural fortifications of the place with trenches and ramparts. And as he was not ignorant that Xerxes would not have been able to force the Lacedæmonians, if he had not ordered some of his troops to climb up the mountains, and from thence rush down upon the enemy, he detached two thousand Ætolians to seize the summits of mount Oeta, which were nearest his camp¹.

But is disabli-ged and defeated.

THE Roman general was informed of the prudent precautions which Antiochus had taken, and was under no small concern. To endeavour to drive the enemy from passes, where scarce ten armed men could march abreast was a dangerous attempt: to follow the example of Xerxes, and climb over the mountains, was impracticable, the tops of the mountain being guarded by two thousand Ætolians. In this perplexity he had recourse to the famous Cato, who being tired with the wranglings of the bar, had roused up his martial spirit, and now served in the troops in no higher a station than that of a legionary tribune. This brave and prudent warrior extricated the consul out of his difficulties, by offering to dislodge the Ætolians from their advantageous post. As this enterprize was of no less difficulty than importance, the consul thought proper to join L. Valerius, one of his lieutenants, with Cato in the execution of it. The former was ordered to march against that body of Ætolians, which was encamped on the summit called Ticbius, and the latter against those who were on the other, named Callidromus. Valerius was repulsed by the Ætolians, and forced to retire; but Cato, after undergoing inexpressible fatigues and dangers, got at last to the top of the mountain, and charged the Ætolians with such resolution, that he obliged them to abandon their post, and fly for refuge to the valley. In the mean time the main body of the army was warmly engaged with Antiochus, but could not with all their valour force the Syrian's entrenchment. Acilius did wonders, but great numbers of his men being either killed or wounded, the rest began to be disheartened, when the consul all on a sudden spied Cato half way down the hill, and the Ætolians flying before him. This sight inspired the Romans with new vigor, and struck no small terror into the Syrians, who had behaved during the action with incredible valour, and still maintained their ground till Cato attacking the camp in its weakest part, put an end to the dispute. The king having received a blow on the mouth with a stone, turned his horse about and fled. His example was followed by the whole army, every one shifting for himself, and leaving the passes open for the Romans, who did not pursue them, being taken up with plundering the camp, where they found a rich booty².

Antiochus
leaves Chalcis.

THE next day early in the morning the consul marched to Elatia, whither Antiochus had first retired. But before the arrival of the Romans the king was fled from thence, and had got safe to Chalcis, with five hundred horse. All the infantry, being too much tired to follow the king in his flight, were surprised by the Roman horse, and cut in pieces; so that Antiochus may be said to have lost his whole army in the action of Thermopylæ, and in the pursuit (O). The consul continued his march through Bæotia to the Euripus, with a design to drive Antiochus from Chalcis, and recover the island of Eubæa. The Bæotians had declared for Antiochus, and therefore being seized with terror at the sight of the consular army, they appeared before Acilius in the attire of supplicants, and the consul spared both their lives and lands, not suffering his soldiers to commit any hostilities, except at Coromæna, where by a public edict of the Bæotian diet, a statue had been erected to Antiochus. At this sight the legionaries were so provoked that Acilius could not refrain them; the city was plundered, and the territory laid waste. When the consular army appeared before Chalcis, Antiochus, embarked with his new queen, set

¹ Liv. ibid. c. 15. Appian. in Syriacis. c. 96.

² Liv. ibid. c. 19.

(O) Valerius of Antium, according to Livy, forty thousand Syrians were killed upon the spot, greatly magnified the king's loss; for he wrote that and five thousand taken prisoners (5).

(5) Liv. l. 36. c. 19.

a sail for Asia, and retired to Ephesus. Upon his departure Chalcis opened her gates to the Romans, and all Eubœa followed the example of the capital. Acilius then returned to Thermopylæ, and from thence continued his march to Heraclea (P), which two thousand Ætolians still kept for Antiochus ¹.

BEFORE the consul besieged the city in form, he summoned the garrison and the inhabitants to surrender; representing that they could expect no relief from a fugitive king; that all Greece had anew declared for Rome; that it was not too late to have recourse to the clemency of the Romans; and that he would look upon their delivering up of the city as an unquestionable proof of a sincere repentance. Damocritus, who had told Flaminius, that he would give him on the banks of the Tyber a copy of the decree inviting Antiochus into Greece, was governor of the place; and by his means the Ætolians, as well as the inhabitants, resolved to hold out to the last. The consul therefore was obliged to have recourse to force, and it was not without the utmost difficulty that he made himself master of it. Heraclea was fortified by nature and art, and in a condition to make a long and vigorous defence. The consul having invested the city on all sides, began to batter it night and day with a great number of warlike machines, which discharged showers of darts and stones on the besieged. The Ætolians on the other hand maintained their posts with inexpressible courage, harassed the Romans with frequent sallies, set fire to their engines, and by letting down iron hooks from the wall, rendered their battering rams quite useless. The aggressors no sooner opened a breach by undermining the wall, but the besieged made vigorous sallies, keeping the Romans employed till their companions within repaired the breach. Thus they held out forty days against the incessant attacks of the whole consular army. The great number of the besiegers lessened their fatigues; but the besieged were employed night and day, the whole garrison being scarce sufficient for the constant defence of the place. The consul being sensible that the Ætolians could hardly be overcome with fatigues and watchings, resolved to give some relaxation, but with a view the more effectually to deceive them. He commanded a stop to be put to the attacks at twelve every night, and did not renew them till nine in the morning. The Ætolians being persuaded, that the Romans were as much exhausted as themselves, retired at the same time, and did not return to the walls till they had refreshed themselves with some hours rest. They continued this practice for some time; but the consul all on a sudden ordered Sempronius to attack the citadel at three in the morning, not doubting but the noise would draw all the garrison thither. Accordingly the Ætolians being waked, hastened to the castle, and the Romans at the same time assaulted with great vigour the town, but were repulsed by the Ætolians in three successive attacks. Acilius had ordered his legionaries to attack the town on all sides, except that which joined the suburbs. There he had placed a strong detachment among the ruins of the demolished houses, with orders not to stir till they heard the signal. He imagined that the besieged would draw off their men from that place, which was not attacked, to defend the others. And so it happened, the besiegers left this place quite undefended, which the consul perceiving, gave the signal agreed on, and the legionaries mounted the wall without any opposition. The besieged hearing a shout on the rampart, believed the city was taken, and fled with great precipitation to the citadel. Acilius suffered the city to be plundered, not so much out of a spirit of revenge, as to reward the soldiers, who had not as yet been allowed to plunder any of the cities they had taken. The pillaging of the city took them up from break of day till noon, when the consul marched against the citadel, which, as it was not sufficiently stocked with provisions to maintain such a number of men, women, and children, as had fled thither for refuge, soon surrendered at discretion. The Ætolians threw themselves upon the clemency of the Romans, and by way of preliminary delivered up into the consul's hands their leader Damocritus, who probably was sent to Rome, with the other captives of the conquered nations ^m.

FROM Heraclea the consul marched to Lamia, a strong place situated on a rock about seven miles distant. The troops of king Philip had begun

¹ Liv. ibid. c. 20.

^m Liv. ibid. c. 25.

(P) This city, called Heraclea Trachynia, stood of Zeiton, and about forty furlongs distance from between the Sperchius and the Asopus, near the gulf Thermopylæ (6).

(6) Strabo l. 9. Thucyd. l. 3.

the siege at the same time that the Romans set down before Heraclea. As the two cities were near each other, and Lamia stood on an eminence, the Macedonians and Romans could discover each from their own camp, what progress was made in the other. Hence arose an emulation between the two armies, which should reduce their city first. The works were carried on by both with the utmost vigour; but as the Macedonians could not, according to their custom, undermine the walls, the city being placed on a rock, the Romans took Heraclea before the Macedonians had made any considerable progress in the siege of Lamia. Philip indeed did not at first assist in person, being prevented by an indisposition; but he no sooner recovered than he went to pay a visit to Acilius, who was then encamped at Thermopylae, and congratulated him on his victory. From the consul's camp Philip hastened to Lamia to pursue the siege; but he had not the satisfaction of taking the place, the Lamians chusing rather to submit to the Romans, in hopes of recovering their liberty, than to receive the Macedonian yoke^a.

BEFORE Heraclea and Lamia were besieged, the Ætolians had sent an embassy to Antiochus, then at Ephesus. Thoas, who was at the head of it, endeavoured, pursuant to his instructions, to engage the king to draw together his troops, and return into Europe. He represented, that if the war was not carried on with vigour in Greece, he would soon see the Romans in the heart of his dominions. What he said was not improbable, and therefore determined Antiochus to send immediately into Ætolia considerable sums, and give orders for the assembling of his forces. Thoas he kept with him, who was very glad to continue at court, and there have an opportunity of pressing the king to fulfil his promises. Thus the Ætolians were wholly bent upon renewing the war before the taking of the two above-mentioned cities; but the reduction of these abated their ardour, and now nothing was talked of in their assemblies, but of concluding a peace. They sent ambassadors to the consul to make proposals, but he received them with the air of a conqueror. "I have other business on my hands, said he, than to hear you; go back to your diet at Hypata, whither I will send Valerius Flaccus to treat with you; make your proposals to him, and in the mean time I grant you a ten days truce^c."

Valerius and the ambassadors set out together for Hypata, where the general assembly was held. The diet shewed him extraordinary honour; held their sessions at his house, and to shew that they reposed an entire confidence in him, they desired him to instruct them in what manner they should treat with the senate. Our alliance, said they, with the republic is very ancient. By how many good offices have we shewn our attachment to Rome? Here Valerius stopped them, and desired they would not mention an alliance, which they had so often broken. An humble submission, said he, will have more effect on the consul and senate, than a vain ostentation of your services. The diet seemed to pay a great regard to the wholesome advice of Valerius, and their deputies putting on an air of humiliation, presented themselves before the consul. Phœneas, who was their speaker, addressing the consul in a mournful tone, began his speech by telling him, that all Ætolia, repenting her late conduct, threw herself on the honour and clemency of the Romans. The consul, without suffering him to pursue his harangue, immediately replied; you say, Ætolia surrenders herself to the Romans; if so, deliver up the head of your nation, who was the author of your revolt; put into my hands Menetas the Epirot, Antyander king of Albanania, and such of the Albanians, as have revolted from us, and taken sanctuary in Ætolia. While he was yet speaking, Phœneas interrupting him, answered with a quite different air and tone of voice; you demand more than we promised; we threw ourselves upon your honour, but we did not deliver ourselves up to slavery. What you require is neither consistent with the honour of the Ætolian nation, nor with the laws and customs of Greece. What is that to me, replied Acilius haughtily, whether my demands are agreeable to your customs and laws, or not? They are agreeable to the will of the Romans, and that is enough. Phœneas was offering to speak, when the consul rising up, What, said he, do you refuse to obey my orders, and plead your customs and laws with me? Then turning to the lictors, he ordered them to bring in iron chains and collars, and threatened to put the ambassadors in irons that instant, and treat them like rebels and traitors, unless they promised to perform what he required. The sight of the d chains, and the threats of the angry consul so terrified them, that neither Phœneas nor his colleagues durst utter one word. Valerius taking their part, desired the consul to remember, that they were ambassadors, and consequently ought not to be treated with all the severity which their insincerity might perhaps deserve. This encouraged Phœneas to represent to the consul in terms of great submission; That neither he nor the council of the apoclesi who had sent him, could obey his orders, without the consent and approbation of the general assembly of the whole nation; he therefore entreated him to grant them a further truce for ten days, during which time he promised to bring him a positive answer. Acilius heard him now with patience, and granted the suspension of arms he required.

^a Idem, ibid. c. 36.^c Idem, ibid. c. 27.

b Upon the return of the ambassadors, and the report which they made of the severe treatment they had met with, a general assembly was convened, to which all the cities of Ætolia sent their deputies. These were fired with indignation at the bare recital of the preliminaries proposed by the Romans, and all cried out; We are then reduced to slavery: Is the king of Albanania our subject? can we dispose of him as we please, and deliver him up to the Romans? Warm debates arose, and the members of the council could neither agree with the prætor, nor among themselves. On one side the Romans were a formidable enemy; but they had yet taken only two cities; on the other, Antiochus was a wealthy prince, powerful by sea and land, and a declared enemy to the Romans. While they were in this uncertainty, a thing happened which determined them to choose the worst part. One e Nicander an active and bustling man had gone from Ætolia to Ephesus, where Antiochus resided, and returned home in twelve days. He brought large sums of money with him from the king of Syria, and assured the diet, that early in the spring all the forces of Syria would be sent to their assistance. He added, that the king of Macedon was highly dissatisfied with the conduct of the Romans, and would not fail to join them, when a fair opportunity offered of revolting from his new allies. What he said with relation to Philip had great appearance of truth, and therefore was of great weight with the assembly. Nicander, on his return to Greece, had been obliged to pass between the Roman and Macedonian camps, and keeping as far as d he could from the Romans fell upon an advanced guard of the Macedonians, by whom he was taken and carried to the king. The prisoner expected no good treatment from Philip, and was under no small apprehension of being delivered up to the Romans. But contrary to his expectation he was received by the Macedonian in a very friendly manner, and even invited to sup with him. After the repast, the king ordered the rest of the company to withdraw, and then addressed Nicander thus: "You are not in the power of an enemy, but of a friend, and therefore e "divest yourself of all fear. Are you not at last sensible, that the Ætolians, your "countrymen are the authors of all our misfortunes? They first brought the Romans into Greece, and assisted them in the reduction of my dominions. Then c "they grew weary of their new masters, and drew Antiochus into these parts. How- "ever, I forget all that is past, and will not insult you in your misery. Only let "the diet at Hypata know, that it is high time for them to lay aside their hatred "to me. As for you, Nicander, remember, that I now give you your life, and be "grateful." Accordingly Nicander acquainted the diet with the kind reception he had met with in Philip's camp, and the Ætolians inferred from thence that the king might be easily drawn off from the Romans. This persuasion, with the money which Nicander brought from Asia, and the reports which he spread, that Antiochus was ready to pass into Europe, at the head of a powerful army, made such impressions on the assembly, that all thoughts of peace vanished, and nothing was now talked f of but war. They resolved to draw all their forces to Naupactus, and preserve at all events that important city against the return of Antiochus.

Acilius, on the other hand, looked on the taking of Naupactus as the most fatal blow he could give the Ætolian nation, and therefore resolved to attempt it. In the first place he sent four thousand men under the command of Appius Claudius, to guard the roads through which the army was to pass. The consul did not begin his march, till he had implored the assistance of the gods by offering a solemn sacrifice to Her- p Liv. ibid. c. 28.q Liv. ibid. c. 28. POLYB. legat. 13.r Liv. ibid. c. 30.

cules, on the top of the mount Oeta (Q). Having thus consecrated his departure by an act of religion, he set out at the head of his army, and met with no difficulties in his march, till he came to Corax (R), the highest mountain of Ætolia, which he was obliged to climb over, with all the warlike machines and baggage of a numerous army. There great numbers of beasts of burden, and many of the soldiers were lost in the precipices. Not one single Ætolian appeared to dispute this dangerous passage with the consul, which might have been defended by an handful of men against an army how numerous soever. At length the Romans got over it, and arrived greatly fatigued before Naupactus, which the consul immediately invested. But as the Ætolians defended themselves with incredible vigour and courage, the whole consular army was employed here most part of the summer, while Philip and the Acheans reduced entire provinces. The former not only made himself master of Demetrias, but extended his conquests to Dolopia, Aperantia, and Perræbia (S); and thus by degrees recovered all the places that had been taken from him¹.

BUT Flaminius, who resided at Chalcis (T), not being at all pleased with the progress, which the consul suffered Philip to make contrary to the interest of Rome, hastened to Naupactus, which had already held out two months, but was reduced to great straits. On his arrival in the camp he was received by the consul, whom he abruptly addressed thus: Are you aware what prodigious pains you take to ruin the affairs of the republic? Acilius surprized at these words, desired him to explain his meaning; and then Flaminius told him, that ever since his victory at Thermopylae he had spent his whole time in taking two cities, while Philip had not contented himself with the taking of cities, but had reduced whole nations. "You are endeavouring, continued Flaminius, to lessen the power of Ætolia, and at the same time suffer a far more dangerous enemy to increase his beyond measure; consider better the true interest of Rome; raise this troublesome siege, leave Naupactus, and deliver Greece from impending slavery²."

As the authority of Flaminius was great at Rome, and his reasonings very just, Acilius was unwilling to disoblige him; but on the other hand he considered that the raising the siege of a town, which had already held out two months, might reflect no small dishonour on his conduct, and therefore was sometime in suspense, whether he should follow the advice of Flaminius, or contrary to his opinion pursue the siege. But at length he yielded, Flaminius taking upon him to justify his conduct to the senate, and to persuade the Ætolians to make some kind of submission. Accordingly he immediately shewed himself to the besieged, who running in crowds to the ramparts implored his assistance with mournful cries. Flaminius seemed at first not to give ear to their intreaties, but as they redoubled their cries, beseeching him, with tears in their eyes, to have compassion of an unfortunate people, who fled to him for protection, he gave them to understand, that they might send deputies to confer with him. Hereupon Phœneas and the chief men of the nation came out and threw themselves prostrate at his feet. Flaminius seeing them in this humble posture, I will not insult you, said he, in this condition, nor aggra-

¹ Idem ibid. APPIAN. in Syriac. 99. ² Liv. l. 36. c. 32. ³ Liv. ibid. & PLUT. in Flamin.

(Q) Mount Oeta was dedicated to Hercules, there being an old tradition in the country, that this hero ended his life and labours there. One of the summits of this mountain was called Pyra, that is a funeral pile, because Hercules had there burnt himself, and was ever after reckoned among the gods. The fame of the place drew the consul to it, and before his departure he offered sacrifices to the deity there worshipped.

(R) According to Ptolemy this mountain lay between mount Callidromus and mount Parnassus, Livy places it between Naupactus and Callipolis.

(S) Dolopia was part of Epirus and bordered upon Thessaly, near mount Pindus. Aperantia was another province of Epirus, lying near the springs of the Achelous. Perræbia was properly the mountainous country about Olympus and Thessaly, extending from the city Atrax as far as Tempe (7).

(T) Flaminius after having conquered Philip, and settled the affairs of Greece, was long kept in that country by his republic on account of his great skill and address in negotiations. He had no title, but nevertheless was more respected than the consuls themselves. When any differences arose, the contending parties generally had recourse to Flaminius, referring the whole to his arbitration. He had chose Chalcis for the usual place of his residence. That city owed its safety to him; for Acilius, when it surrendered to him after the departure of Antiochus, was resolved to give it up to be plundered; but Flaminius had interest enough with the consul to appease his wrath, and save both the lives and estates of the inhabitants. From that time the Chalcidians carried their gratitude to excess; they built a temple, and instituted a festival in his honour, putting him upon the same level with Jupiter, Apollo, and Hercules (8).

(7) Strabo l. 9. Herodot. l. 7.

(8) Plut. in Flamin.

- a "vate your sorrow with unseasonable reproaches. Your misfortunes are indeed affecting; but I forewarned you of them; and you have the further mortification to know that you have by your imprudent conduct brought them upon yourselves. But as I am appointed by the gods to preserve Greece, your ingratitude shall not get the better of my propension to mercy. Go, throw yourselves at the consul's feet, and beg a suspension of arms in order to send ambassadors to Rome to negotiate a peace; I will intercede with the consul in your behalf".

Acilius prevailed upon by Flaminius to raise the siege of Naupactus.

- b They followed the advice of Flaminius, ambassadors were sent to the Roman senate, and Acilius breaking up the siege, marched his army back into Phocis. The city of Naupactus must have been reduced to great straits, since the besieged sued so earnestly for the protection of Flaminius. But on the other hand, if Acilius had believed he should carry it in a short time, he would not have let it slip out of his hands; the whole flower of the Ætolian nation was shut up in the city, and the reducing of it would have made their submission more hearty and sincere.

- c Acilius being disengaged from this troublesome siege, made the best use he could of the short time he was to stay in Greece. He gave audience to the ambassadors of the Epirots, who came to excuse the steps they had taken with regard to Antiochus. They had not indeed sent any troops to his assistance, but were suspected to have supplied him with money and provisions. The consul told them, that he was in doubt, whether he should call them friends or enemies, but that the senate of Rome knew how to explain their mysterious and artful conduct. However, he granted them a truce for three months, enjoining them to clear themselves before the senate. At Rome they were received very coldly, but as it did not appear that they had committed any hostilities, the senators chose rather to shew them mercy, than to draw new enemies upon the republic.

- d As for the Ætolian ambassadors, the truce which had been granted them was near expiring, before they could obtain an audience of the senate. They were however admitted at last, and endeavoured to raise the compassion of the senate; they gave a long, but modest account of the services they had rendered the republic, during their alliance with her, and begged that in consideration of them the conscript fathers would forgive them their late conduct. Many questions were put to them, but the senators observed that instead of giving any positive and direct answer, they had recourse to supplications and entreaties. This made them suspect their sincerity. Wherefore they were ordered to withdraw; and warm debates arose among the fathers, some being for granting them a peace, and others for pursuing the war. Some days were spent in these disputes, and as the ambassadors artfully declined giving satisfactory answers, the senate long continued in suspense between peace and war. At last the ambassadors were told that they must choose one of these two conditions, viz. either to submit to the will of the senate; or to pay the republic a thousand talents, and neither make war nor peace with any other power without the consent and approbation of Rome. The Ætolians had not so much money; and on the other hand, if they implicitly submitted to the will of the senate, they were persuaded that Rome would not be contented with that which they were willing to grant. Wherefore they desired to know in what points, and how far they were to submit to the will of the senate. But they could have no certain answer, and therefore openly declared that they would not consent to either of the conditions. So that the project of a peace was dropp'd, and the ambassadors order'd to leave Rome that very day, and Italy in a fortnight.

Hard conditions offered by the senate to the Ætolians.

- f THE Ætolians upon the return of their ambassadors finding that there were no hopes left of concluding a peace, thought it necessary to guard Naupactus against a new attack. They were afraid that Acilius, who continued in Greece, would again sit down before the place, and carry it. To prevent this, they posted themselves in the narrow passes of mount Corax, in order to stop his march. But this precaution only served to make the consul turn his arms against another city of no less importance than Naupactus. Lamia after having been the last year very near reduced by Philip, had submitted to Acilius upon very honourable terms, and was allowed its liberty. But while the consul was employed in the siege of Naupactus, that city declared anew against the Romans. Acilius finding it impracticable to make any new attempts upon Naupactus, set out for Lamia, and appearing unexpectedly

* Idem ibid. c. 35.

† Idem ibid. c. 36.

‡ Liv. l. 37. c. 1. Polyb. Legat. 16.

Lamia taken by the Romans.

before the place, at break of day, ordered the walls to be scaled on all sides; but the inhabitants made a more vigorous defence than had been expected; all ranks of people, even women and children, ran to the walls, and joined in defence of their country. Whereupon Acilius despairing to take the city by assault, founded a retreat. The Romans returned to their camp; but the general told them, that he design'd to renew the assault the next morning; don't expect, said he to his troops, to return to the camp till the city is taken. Accordingly they renewed the attack with such vigour, that the besieged, being tired out with the fatigues of the preceding day, were in a few hours overpowered, and the place taken. After the reduction of Lamia the consul was for returning to Naupactus, but in a council of war, which was held on that occasion, not one of the officers approved of so hazardous an attempt. A steep mountain covered the place, and the passes were all guarded by numerous bodies of Ætolians. The consul, therefore march'd his troops with all possible expedition, his consulship being ready to expire, to Amphissa a city of Locris, which had joined the Ætolians (U). He did not attempt to take it by storm, but besieged it in form; the besieged made a vigorous resistance, and held out till news was brought to Acilius, that L. Cornelius Scipio, the brother of Scipio Africanus, was landed at Apollonia, and marching through Epirus and Thessaly to take upon him the command of the army. The new consul brought with him an army of thirteen thousand men, and the great Africanus served under him in quality of his lieutenant (W). Cornelius visited all the coasts of Epirus quite to the Malaic gulf. From thence he sent to summon Hypata, which was one of the most considerable cities of Thessaly. But the inhabitants answering that they were not their own masters, and that they could not surrender without the consent of the Ætolian diet, he turned towards Amphissa, the citadel of which Acilius was besieging, having already taken the town. The consul encamped eight miles from the town, and was soon visited by deputies from Aibens, who came to pay their respects to him, and intercede for the Ætolians. They first imparted the chief business, which they were come upon, to Scipio Africanus, remembering that none of the nations conquered by him had ever repented putting their interests into his hands. Scipio told them that he would intercede for the Ætolians with a great deal of pleasure, and procure them the best terms he could. This raised the expectations of that unhappy nation; they immediately assembled a diet at Hypata, and sent deputies to the consul, not doubting but Africanus would obtain favourable terms for them. But Cornelius having conceived some sort of jealousy in seeing that they all paid a greater deference to his brother than to himself, though vested with the consular dignity, gave the ambassadors the same answer which the senate had given before. He again insisted that the Ætolians should either pay a thousand talents, or implicitly submit to the will of the Romans. This unexpected answer threw the whole nation into the utmost consternation. However, they sent new deputies to the two brothers jointly, begging that they would either abate of the sum demanded, or at least, if they submitted to the will of the consul, their lives in general should be saved. But Cornelius was inexorable, and would grant neither. Hereupon Echedemus, the chief of the Aibensian embassy, advised them to demand a six months truce, and once more apply to the senate. They followed his advice, and being backed in their request, both by Echedemus, and Scipio Africanus, they obtained at length the truce they desired. The same ambassadors who had been driven from Rome were sent back thither, and the siege of the citadel of Amphissa was raised. Then Acilius resigning up the command of the army to the new consul left Greece, and returned to Rome. The Ætolians themselves

The Ætolians
obtain a five months truce.

(U) Amphissa was a city of the Locrians called Ozala, situated near the territories of Crisa, distant a hundred and twenty furlongs from Delphos. It was so called according to Pausanias, because it was surrounded by mountains on all sides. Some modern geographers tell us, that it still retains the same name; but Le Noir calls it Lambina (9).

(W) The consuls chosen for this year were L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lælius, the first the brother, the second the friend of the great Scipio Africanus. Lælius being reckoned the best general, artfully proposed to his colleague, that instead of drawing lots, as was usual, they should leave the matter to the determination of the conscript fathers. L. Scipio knew not how to decline this offer; but he desired time to consider of it, and then consulted his brother. Scipio Africanus desired him without any hesitation to accept the proposal; and when the senate seemed unwilling to determine the affair, he, to the great surprize of all, offered to serve under his brother, in quality of his lieutenant. There needed no other argument; the senate immediately assigned Asia to the two Scipio's as their common province.

(9) Hærod. l. 8. Strabo l. 9. Pausan. in Phocis.

a were not more overjoyed at this truce than Scipio Africanus, who was impatient to pass over into Asia, and once more enter the lists with Hannibal *.

The consular army was scarce withdrawn from Greece, when the Ætolians, forgetting the danger they had been in, took the field with a design to restore king Amynder, their friend and ally, to his kingdom. This prince had sided with the Ætolians, and on that account had been driven out of his kingdom by Philip, whom the Romans had put in possession of all the banished king's dominions. They soon drove all the Macedonian garison out of Abmania, and placed Amynder again on the throne of his ancestors. But this did not content the restless Ætolians, instead of humbling themselves to Rome, as Amynder did, for dispossessing Philip of the dominions which had been allotted to him by the republic, they pursued their conquests, and entering Amphibolia a province of Epirus, formerly subject to them, but now under the protection of Rome, reconquered almost the whole country. From thence they advanced to Aparantia, which had likewise belonged to them, and recovered it. Having now retaken what they had lost during the war, they fell upon Dolopia, a country which had always belonged to the kings of Macedon, and to which they could lay no claim. The Dolopians were easily prevailed upon to shake off the Macedonian yoke, and submit to the Ætolians. All these conquests were so many insults offered to the republic in the person of a king, who was joined in alliance with Rome, and had rendered her eminent services during the late war. Thus the Ætolians employed the time which they had been allowed to negotiate a peace, and to appease by their submission the wrath of the sovereign republic.

However, when they heard that the senate, upon an embassy from Amynder, had confirmed him in the possession of his dominions, they resolved at last to apply to the senate not only for a peace, but for their consent to hold the provinces which they had lately reduced, hoping the republic would be no less favourable to them than she had been to their ally Amynder. Their ambassadors arrived at Rome soon after the election of the new consuls, M. Fulvius Nobilior, and Cn. Manlius Vulso, and before the news of the famous victory at Magnesia had reached Italy. Wherefore the better to succeed in their negotiations, they spread a report, that the two Scipio's had been made prisoners by Antiochus at a conference, and that the Roman army was entirely defeated. Being questioned about their intelligence, they pretended to have received the account from some persons of their nation in the consul's camp, and putting on an air of confidence, they seemed rather to demand than beg a peace. But these bad appearances did not abate the pride of the senate, or bring them to shew any indulgence to Ætolia: the ambassadors were dismissed, and ordered not to return without the express consent of the generals, whom the republic should send to carry on the war in their country *.

The consuls having drawn lots for their provinces, Greece fell to M. Fulvius Nobilior, who immediately set out, and landing at Apollonia, a city of Macedon, near the borders of Epirus, assembled there a council of the Epirots, to deliberate on the operations of the campaign. These advised him to begin with the siege of Ambracia (X), which would open him a way into the very heart of Ætolia. Herein they consulted their own interest; for Ambracia belonged formerly to the Epirots, and was now to be restored to them. However, Fulvius followed their advice, and crossing Epirus, sat down before Ambracia. He no sooner saw the town, and observed its situation, but he concluded that it would be no easy matter to reduce it. It was defended on one side by a great river (Y), and on the other by steep and craggy hills, and surrounded with a high and thick wall above three miles in compass. The consul began the siege by forming two camps separated by the river, but with a communication between them; the Epirots were posted in one, and

* Liv. ibid. POLYB. Legat. 17.

* Val. Antias apud Liv. 37.

(X) Ambracia was formerly one of the most considerable cities of Epirus. It stood at the bottom of the Ambracian bay, upon the river Araabus, at a small distance from the sea. The situation of Arba in upper Albania, agrees with that of this ancient city (10).

(Y) The city of Ambracia stood on the Araabus, which Livy here calls Arcthon. Le Noir tells us, that the natives call this river Spagmagmurist.

(10) Strabo. l. 7. Polyb. l. 8.

the Romans in the other. Then he threw up two lines, one of circumvallation, and the other of contravallation, and built over-against the citadel, which stood on a hill, a wooden tower in the form of a castle. When the *Ætoli*ans understood, that Fulvius had begun the siege of Ambracia, they assembled all their troops, and marched to the relief of a place, which was a key to their dominions. They appointed Stratos, a city of Acarnania, on the banks of the Acbelous, for the place of the general rendezvous. In a council of war, which was held there, Nicander, the prætor, and most of the officers were at first for attacking the Romans. But being afterwards informed, that though the camp was fortified, the works round the place were not finished, it was thought more advisable to throw troops into the city, and strengthen the garison. Eupolemus, a man of great resolution, took upon him to perform this, and succeeded in the attempt, entering Ambracia at the head of a thousand *Ætoli*ans, where the lines were not finished. As for Nicander he marched against the Epirots, with a design to attack them in their camp; but finding them strongly entrenched, he thought the attack would prove too dangerous, and therefore led his army into Acarnania, and laid waste the whole country. In the mean time the Romans and Epirots began to batter the place. The consul ordered five attacks to be made at the same time, three on the side of Pyrrbeum, a small fortress without the city, one over-against the temple of Æsculapius, and another on the side of the citadel. The rams shook the walls on all sides, and the Romans, from their moveable towers pulled down the battlements with a kind of sythes, which they fastened to long beams. This did not at all dishearten the *Ætoli*ans, who were night and day on the walls, and indefatigable in preventing the ill effects of the rams and sythes. As to the former, they invented a kind of pullies, by which they let down beams, large stones, and lumps of lead upon the rams, as they were in motion, and thereby deadened their strokes. They guarded themselves against the sythes by pulling the beams, to which they were fastened, into the city with large hooks contrived for that purpose ^b.

WHILE Fulvius was thus carrying on the siege, Nicander, after having pillaged Acarnania, returned to Stratos, and from thence detached five hundred men to reinforce the garison of the besieged city. These got safe in under the conduct of one Nicodamus, with whom Nicander agreed to attack the Roman camp at a time appointed, not doubting but if the garison within, and the army without fell upon them at the same time, and in the night, the Romans might be obliged to abandon their camp, and retire from before the city. Nicodamus narrowly watched the time in which he was order'd to sally, and at the Hour appointed, though Nicander did not appear, marched out at the Head of the garison, armed with fire-brands and torches. The Roman centries were not a little surprized at this sight, and running to wake their companions spread the alarm over the whole camp. The legionaries marched in small bodies, as they happened to meet, to repulse the enemy, whom they engaged in the three different places, where the attacks were made on the side of Pyrrbeum. Two of the enemy's bodies were driven back, but the third commanded by two Ætolian generals maintained their ground, made a great slaughter of the Romans, set fire to their tents, and then not finding themselves seconded by Nicander, retired in good order into the city. If Nicander had at the same time attacked the Romans, as he agreed to do, the siege would have been probably raised; but he did not lend the besieged the least assistance, which some ascribe to timorousness, while others tell us that he was obliged to march his army that very night against Perfes, who had invaded Dolopia ^c.

Nicander had so much to do elsewhere, that he could not bring any relief to the besieged. On one hand Perfes was to be driven out of Dolopia; and on the other, the coasts of Ætolia were to be defended from the ravages of Pleuratus, king of Illyricum, who assisted the Romans with a numerous fleet, and committed great devastations in the Ætolian territories. The besieged being thus abandoned, and without any hopes of succours, did not however despond, but defended themselves with incredible vigour and resolution. The Romans had no sooner made a breach in the wall but it was repaired, and a new wall built up behind it. The consul therefore altered his measures, and instead of making breaches with the ram, began to undermine the wall, in hopes of throwing down great part of it at once,

^b Liv. l. 38. c. 4.^c Idem ibid. c. 5.

- a. and entering the city before the besieged could have time to build a new wall. The miners began the work, and being covered were not observed by the garrison till the heaps of earth that were brought out of the mine gave them the alarm. They began then to countermine, and having dug a trench of the depth they supposed the mine to be, they carried it along the wall where they heard the strokes of the pick-axes of the Romans. In a few Hours they came to that part of the wall which the Romans had sapped, and supported with wooden props. When the two mines met, a battle ensued under-ground, first with pick-axes and spades, and then with swords and spears. But this attack did not last long, each party making themselves a kind of rampart with the loose earth. But the Ætolians, in order to
 b. drive the enemy quite out of the mine, invented a machine, which they brought to the place where the two mines met. This was an hollow vessel with an iron bottom bored through in many places, and armed with spikes at proper distances to prevent the enemy from approaching it. This vessel they filled with feathers, which they set on fire, and with bellows driving the smoke on the besiegers, obliged them to leave the mine, through fear of being suffocated, and interrupt the work; which interruption they made use of to repair the foundations of the walls ^d.

- This vigorous resistance did not raise the courage of the Ætolians in general; they knew that by the gallant behaviour of their countrymen the taking of Ambracia was only delayed; on the other hand, their dominions were attacked by the Macedonians, Illyrians, and Acæans, and to resist so many enemies at once seemed impossible. The prætor therefore thought it necessary to assemble the diet, that the heads of the nation might consult together about the measures that were most proper in the present posture of affairs. The members of the assembly were all unanimous, that a peace ought to be procured upon any tolerable terms. Our dependence, said they, was on Antiochus; but now that he is confined to the other side of mount Taurus, we can expect no assistance from him; let us then in time avert the evils which threaten, after his ruin, to overwhelm us. Accordingly a resolution was taken to send Phæneas and Damoteles to the consul with full power to conclude a peace. Fulvius received them with haughtiness, but did not reject their request. The pre-
 d. liminaries he insisted upon were, 1st, that they should lay down their arms; 2^{dly}, that they should deliver up to him all the horses of their army; 3^{dly}, that they should pay to the republic a thousand talents, one half upon the spot, and the other at different payments. These conditions seemed so hard, that the ambassadors begged leave to return and consult the diet before they accepted them. Upon their return they were checked by the assembly for leaving the consul without signing the articles. We must have a peace, they all cried out, good or bad, conclude it therefore without giving Fulvius time to reflect. They therefore immediately set out again for the Roman camp, but on the road were surrounded and taken prisoners by a party of Acarnanians, who carried them to Tyrrbæum a city of Acarnania. Fulvius
 c. being informed of what had happened, ordered the Acarnanians to set them at liberty; and in the mean time, as he was desirous to settle Ætolia in peace before his authority was expired, he gave ear to the intercessions of the Athenians, Rhodians, and of king Amynder, in behalf of the Ambracians. As Amynder had great interest in Ambracia, having long resided there, the consul made use of him to persuade the inhabitants to capitulate, which he did very dexterously, prevailing upon them to surrender on the following terms; that the Ætolian garrison should have leave to march out of the city; that the inhabitants should pay five hundred Talents, two hundred down, and the rest at six equal payments; that they should deliver up to the consul all the prisoners and deserters that were in the city. These articles were
 f. agreed to by the Ambracians, and approved of by the Ætolian diet. Ambracia opened her gates to the consul, and presented him with a crown of gold, and many fine statues and pictures, whereof there were great numbers in that city, which Pyrrhus had made his capital, and enriched with many valuable monuments ^e.

Ambracia capitulates.

AFTER the surrender of Ambracia, Fulvius entering Ætolia, encamped at Argi, the capital of Amphilochia, then subject to the Ætolians, who had reduced all that province. There Phæneas and Damoteles, being set at liberty, acquainted him, that the Ætolian diet accepted the conditions which he had offered them. Nothing now remained but to get them ratified by the senate, and for this purpose Phæneas and Nicander set out attended by the ambassadors of Athens and Rhodes, who went a to intercede for them with the senate. In the mean time the consul granted the Ætolians a truce, and retired to the island of Cephalenia. When the ambassadors arrived at Rome, they found both the senate and the people highly exasperated against the Ætolian nation. Philip of Macedon had represented to the senate, and magnified the ravages they had committed in his territories while he was in alliance with Rome, and bitterly complained of them for unjustly detaining from him Dolopia, Aibamania, and Amphilocia. His complaints were of such weight with the senate, that the ambassadors were even refused an audience. But the Athenian deputies were received very favourably, and the speech which Damis, who was at the head of them, made in favour of that unhappy nation, greatly abated the anger of the b conscript fathers. The good offices of Valerius likewise, who accompanied the Ætolian ambassadors, did not a little contribute towards appeasing the clamours which were every-where heard against this restless people, and artfully fomented by the Macedonian deputies. Caius Valerius was brother to the consul Fulvius, and the son of Levinus, who concluded the first treaty of alliance between Rome and Ætolia. This Valerius remembered, and used his utmost endeavours to procure them a favourable reception. But nevertheless Phaneas and Nicander were kept a long time in a painful uncertainty, whether they should obtain a peace or not.

^d Idem. ibid. c. 8. POLYB. legat. 28.

^e LIV. & POLYB. ibid.

A peace concluded between the Ætolians and Romans.

At length by the assiduous and joint application of the Rhodians, Athenians, and Valerius, a peace was concluded. The only terms they could obtain were the following; 1st, The majesty of the Roman people shall be revered in all Ætolia. 2^{dly}, Ætolia shall not suffer the armies of such as are at war with Rome to pass thro' her territories, and the enemies of Rome shall be likewise enemies of Ætolia. 3^{dly}, She shall in the space of an hundred days put into the hands of the magistrates of Coryra all the prisoners and deserters she has, whether of the Romans or their allies, except such as have been taken twice, or during her alliance with Rome. 4^{thly}, The Ætolians shall pay down in ready money to the Roman general in Ætolia two hundred Euboic talents of the same value as the Athenian talents, and engage to pay fifty talents more within the six years following. 5^{thly}, They shall put into the hands of the consul forty such hostages as he shall chuse, none of which shall be under twelve, or above forty years of age; the prætor, the general of the horse, and such as have been already hostages at Rome, are excepted out of this number. 6^{thly}, Ætolia shall renounce all pretensions to the cities and territories which the Romans have conquered since the consulate of Flaminius, though those cities and territories had formerly belonged to the Ætolians. 7^{thly}, the city of Oenias and its district shall continue subject to the Acarnanians. 8^{thly}, Cephalenia shall not be included in this treaty c.

How treated by the Romans after the conquest of Macedon.

FROM these articles we may judge how far the Ætolian republic was abridged of her ancient liberties by this peace. However after the conquest of Macedon by e Paulus Æmilius they were reduced to a much worse condition. For not only those among them, who had openly declared for Perfes, but such as were only suspected to have favoured him in their hearts, were sent to Rome in order to clear themselves before the senate. There they were detained, and never afterwards suffered to return into their native country. Five hundred and fifty of the chief men of the nation were barbarously assassinated by the partisans of Rome for no other crime but that of being suspected to wish well to Perfes. The Ætolians appeared before Paulus Æmilius in mourning habits, and made loud complaints of such inhuman treatment, but could obtain no redress; nay, the ten commissioners, who had been sent by the senate to settle the affairs of Greece, enacted a decree, declaring that those f who were killed had suffered justly, since it appeared to them that they had favoured the Macedonian party. From this time those only were raised to the chief honours and employments in the Ætolian republic, who were known to prefer the interest of Rome to that of their country. And as these alone were countenanced by the sovereign republic, all the magistrates of Ætolia were her creatures, and mere tools of the Roman senate. In this state of servile subjection they continued till the destruction of Corinth, and dissolution of the Achean league, when Ætolia with the other free states of Greece was reduced to a Roman province, commonly called the province of Asiana. Nevertheless each state and city was governed by its own laws under the superinten-a dency of the prætor, whom Rome sent annually to Achaia. The whole nation paid a certain tribute, and the rich were forbidden to possess lands any-where but in their own country &c.

In this state, with little alteration, Ætolia continued under the emperors till the reign of Constantine the Great, who in his new partition of the provinces of the empire divided the western parts of Greece from the rest, calling them New Epirus, and subjecting the whole country to the Præfatus Prætorio for Illyricum. Under the successors of Constantine, Greece was parcelled out into several principalities, especially after the taking of Constantinople by the western princes. At that time Theodorus Angelus, a noble Grecian of the imperial family, seized on Ætolia and Epirus; the former he left to Michael his son, who maintained it against Michael Paleologus, the first emperor of the Greeks, after the expulsion of the Latines. Charles, the last prince of this family, dying in 1430, without lawful issue, bequeathed Ætolia to his brother's son named also Charles, and Acarnania to his natural sons Memnon, Turnus, and Hercules. But great disputes arising about this division, Amuratb II. after the reduction of Theffalonica, laid hold of so favourable an opportunity, and drove them all out in 1432. The Mohammedans were afterwards dispossessed of this country by the famous prince of Epirus, George Castriot, commonly called Scanderbeg, who with a small army opposed the whole power of the Ottoman empire, having defeated those barbarians in twenty-two pitched battles, as we shall relate at length in a more proper place. This hero at his death left great part of Ætolia to the Venetians; but they not being able to make head against such a mighty power, the whole country soon was reduced by Mohammed II. whose successors hold it to this day.

8 Idem, l. xxxix. c. 6. PAUSAN. in Achaic.

SECT. III.

The history of Athens from the Achæan league to the present time.

a THE Athenians, having recovered their ancient liberty by means of the brave Aratus, in the manner we have related elsewhere ^a, were soon obliged to implore the assistance of a more powerful protector to maintain their freedom against Philip of Macedon, a prince, who seemed to have inherited the ambition of the first Philip, and the bravery of Alexander. This warlike monarch had formed a design of subjecting all Greece, and afterwards extending his conquests into Italy. In prosecution of this scheme, he made use of the following pretence to carry the war into Attica. Two young Acarnanians, who happened to be at Athens while the inhabitants were celebrating the mysteries of Ceres, (Z), had entered the temple of ^a p. 557.

(Z) The festival of Ceres was the most celebrated and mysterious solemnity of any in Greece, whence it is often called by way of eminence the mysteries. The Sicilians claimed the glory of having first instituted this solemn worship, pretending that they had been instructed by Ceres herself in the secret ceremonies, which were performed on this occasion. This goddess, according to the tradition of the country, taught them the art of cultivating the earth, and united them in societies to live under the influence of the wise laws, which she had given them. Whence twice a year they renewed the remembrance of these signal benefits, worshipping alternately the mother and her daughter Proserpine; the former in the first seed time, and the latter in the harvest. After the example of the Sicilians the inhabitants of Attica, who had been likewise enriched with the gifts of Ceres, signalized their gratitude to this goddess by instituting three festivals in her honour.

Of these the first was called Proerosia, because it preceded the ploughing time, and the seed time. On this occasion the Athenians, who celebrated this festival in the name of all the Greeks, offered a great many victims in hopes of obtaining a plentiful harvest.

The second festival was called Theismophoria, this word alluding to the worship which was paid Ceres as a law-giver Plutarch, Diadorus Siculus, and after them Theodoret, tells us, that the same ceremonies were performed on this occasion in honour of Ceres, as were practised by the Egyptians in the mysteries of Isis. The celebration of this festival lasted five days, and each day the women of the ten tribes, of which the republic of Athens consisted, chose one from among themselves to preside over the ceremonies of the goddess with the croud. As it was not lawful for any person to assist at those mysteries without being initiated, the Acarnanians, who had not been admitted with the usual ceremonies, being discovered by their language to be strangers, were carried before the chief priest, and by him sentenced to die, though it was well known that they had offended purely out of ignorance. The Acarnanian nation resented this inhuman sentence, and made bitter complaints of it to the king of Macedon, with whom they were then joined in alliance. Philip, without demanding any satisfaction, proclaimed war against Athens, and sent a body of troops to join the Acarnanians, and lay waste Attica. Acbaia, Lacedemon and Corinth had entered into an alliance with Philip; and Athens was no ways in a condition to make head against so many enemies at once. She resolved therefore to have recourse to Rome, and by a solemn embassy implore the protection of that powerful republic. The Romans were already well known at Athens, and had been honoured there many years before with particular marks of distinction. In the consulship of Sp. Carvilius, and Q. Fabius Verrucosus, thirty-two years before the æra we are now speaking of, Rome had sent ambassadors to Athens, and several other free states of Greece, to make them sensible of the happiness which she had procured them by humbling the Illyrians, who with frequent piracies infested their coasts. The year before Cn. Fulvius Centumalus had forced the Illyrians to submit to a peace upon very hard conditions; one of which was, that they should not suffer above three of their ships of war at a time to sail beyond the city of Lyssus, which stood on the confines of Illyricum and Macedon near the mouth of the river Drilon. This article was so agreeable to the Athenians, that they not only received the ambassadors with great demonstrations of kindness, but from that time admitted the Romans in general to partake of the mysteries of Eleusis, remonies that were practised at this solemnity. The victims were offered by a priest, who officiated with a crown on his head; whence he was called Stegphanophoros. Such women, as had had three talents to their portion, were entitled to demand of their husbands the necessary sums for the expences of the sacrifices; every one being obliged to contribute to them according to their ability.

All the women that were to assist at the ceremonies being assembled in one place, they went in procession from Athens to Eleusis, a small city in that neighbourhood, singing hymns in honour of the goddess, and carrying the books, which contained the secret mysteries of the solemnity, and the laws, for which Attica was indebted to Ceres. But this depositum was intrusted with such only as were of an unblemished character, and famous for their virtue. A certain number of young women were brought up at the expence of the public, and with all imaginable care, in order to be employed in this office, and in the other ceremonies performed at Eleusis. These were always kept confined in the Theismophorion, a public building in Athens appropriated for that use, and narrowly watched by persons set over them to guard their virtue. However, when they arrived at Eleusis, they prepared themselves for the offices of their priesthood by passing a whole day at the feet of the statue of Ceres in fasting and prayer. This severity ended in a kind of comedy; for as Ceres had laughed at the sight of an old woman, who insulted her, so the young virgins endeavoured by innocent jokes to stir up one another to laughter. The following days were spent in lustrations and sacrifices, from which the men were not excluded; even the prisoners, who were initiated in the mysteries of Ceres, and not yet convicted of any crime, were indulged their liberty during the five days of the solemnity, that they might join in those religious practices.

The third festival instituted in honour of Ceres was deemed the most holy and solemn, being called the mysteries. It is said by some to have been instituted by Ceres herself after having supplied the Athenians with corn in a time of famine; others ascribe the institution of it to king Erechtheus, and some to Museus the father of Eumolpus, or to Eumolpus himself. The temple of Eleusis was the place where all those met who were admitted to these mysterious ceremonies; and thither the Greeks flocked from all parts about the month of August, the temple, as Strabo informs us, being capable of holding an immense multitude. None were admitted to celebrate the great mysteries till they had been purified at the lesser, which was used as a preparative for the greater. The manner of the purification was as follows: After having kept themselves chaste and unpolluted nine days, they offered sacrifices and prayers with crowns and garlands on their heads, and the skin of a victim sacrificed to Jupiter under their feet. About a year after, having sacrificed a fow to Ceres, they were admitted to the greater mysteries, but not suffered to enter the sanctuary till five years after, assisting in the meantime at the sacred ceremonies only in the porch of the temple. When the years of probation were expired, the secret rites, some few excepted which were reserved for the priests alone, were frankly revealed to them; whence they changed the name of Mystai, that is persons initiated, for that of Epeptai, or eye-witnesses. The manner of the initiation was thus: the candidates were admitted by night into the temple, wearing crowns of myrtle on their heads. At their entering the sacred place, they purified themselves by washing their hands in holy water; and at the same time were told that the external cleanness of the body would not be accepted by the deity of the place, unless attended by the internal cleanness of an undefiled mind. After this the holy mysteries were read to them, the priest, who initiated them, having first asked them whether they had performed all the conditions religion required. To these questions they returned answers in a set form, and then were led by the priest into the most holy part of the temple, a place of darkness and horror. Then all on a sudden a strong light darted in upon them, and discovered a statue of Ceres richly adorned, and a very indecent figure called Myllis. The light soon disappeared, and then a terrible noise was heard like thunder; fire fell down like lightning, and dreadful monsters appeared, a Eleusis (A), and of all the privileges which the citizens of Athens enjoyed. They did not therefore doubt in the least but their ambassadors would meet with a favourable reception, and obtain speedy succours against an enemy, whose views could not be unknown at Rome. Neither were they disappointed in their expectation; their ambassadors were treated with great distinction, and assured that a consular army should be sent without delay to their assistance.

In the mean time the Macedonians and Acarnanians after having ravaged great part of Attica were drawing near to the capital. Their approach struck the citizens with no small terror; but their fears were soon dispelled by the unexpected arrival of the fleets of king Attalus and the Rhodians. These two powers were already at war with the king of Macedon, and therefore no sooner heard that hostilities were begun between the Macedonians and Athenians, but they hastened to Athens with a delight appeared, which by the glimmering light of continual flashes of fire struck the trembling spectators with great terror. Neither could they recover themselves from their fright, till they were shewn an agreeable meadow, which was walled in behind the temple. Lastly, the priest, who attended at the initiation, and was therefore called Hierophantes, or revealer of holy things, took his leave of the initiated, with exhorting them to the practice of virtue. The Hierophantes was by birth an Athenian, and of the family of the Eumolpidae. As he was the chief priest, and held his office for life, he was obliged to perpetual chastity, and forbidden even lawful desires. His name was so venerable, that it was not even mentioned in the presence of the profane, that is, of such as were not initiated. He had three assistants, the first of which was called from his office Dadouches, or torch-bearer; the second was styled the sacred herald; and it was his province to forbid on pain of death such as were not initiated, or were conscious of any crime, to enter the temple; the third ministered at the altar, imploring the protection of the gods. The superintendent over these mysteries was styled king; and it was his duty to offer prayers and sacrifices, to see that no indecency or irregularity was committed, and after the celebration of the mysteries to assemble the senate, he being one of the archons, and to take cognizance of all offenders in this kind. The king had four assistants under him called Epimelætes, who were elected by the people, one out of the family of the Eumolpidae, another out of the Cryces, and the remaining two out of the families of other citizens.

The Athenians enter into an alliance with Attalus and the Rhodians against Philip.

1 Liv. l. xxxi. c. 4.

This festival began on the fifteenth, and ended on the twenty-third day of the month Bædromion; during which time it was unlawful to arrest any person, or present any petition, and those who were found guilty of such practices, were according to some fined a thousand drachmas, and according to others, put to death. If any woman rode to Eleusis in a chariot, she was obliged to pay six thousand drachmas. The end of this law, which was enacted by Lycurgus, was to prevent all odious distinctions between the rich and the poor.

The different shows, with which the spectators were entertained each day of the feast, were symbolical representations of the travels of Ceres, and the chief incidents of her life. In this consisted the external pomp of the festival. The rest was an impenetrable mystery, which the Hierophantes discovered only to the initiated, after having bound them to inviolable secrecy by the most dreadful oaths. Whoever was convicted of divulging these mysteries, or any part of them, became the public curse of the people, was excluded all civil society, and avoided even by his nearest relations, who were afraid to live with him under the same roof. But the ordinary punishment for such a crime was immediate death. If any person, not lawfully initiated, did but through ignorance or mistake chance to be present at the mysterious rites, he was put to death. Persons of both sexes and all ages were initiated, the neglect of this ceremony being looked upon as a crime of a very heinous nature; inasmuch that it was one of the chief articles of impeachment against Sacrates. However such as were convicted of any crime, or had even involuntarily committed murder, were debarred from these mysteries.

If the testimony of profane authors may be admitted, these assemblies were schools of virtue and purity. Tully gives a very favourable account of them, saying, that men were there taught the art of living well, and confirmed in the hopes of a better life (11). Other writers call those initiations a more strict engagement than ordinary to live according to the laws of equity, as they were dictated by the goddesses. On the other hand, the fathers of the church tell us, that the Pagans under the venerable names of mysteries consecrated prostitutions, and other more heinous crimes, and call the assemblies of Ceres schools of abominations and debaucheries. Perhaps these ceremonies were at first such as the profane writers represent them to have been, but afterwards came by degrees to degenerate into libertinism and licentiousness, which gave the fathers occasion to exclaim against them. They were celebrated by the Athenians, every fifth year at Eleusis, and from thence translated to Rome by the emperor Adrian, and never totally abolished till the reign of Theodosius the elder.

This is the general account which the ancients have given us of the mysteries of Ceres. The respect with which they were prepossessed in favour of these mysteries, did not permit them to be more particular.

The Ceres of the Greeks was, according to Sir Isaac Newton, (12) a woman of Sicily who came into Attica, and taught Triptolemus the son of Cæleus king of Eleusis, to sow corn, about the thirtieth year of king David's reign, or the year before Christ 1030, she died, and was deified for this benefaction about the year before Christ 1007, by Cæleus and Eumolpus, who instituted the Eleusina sacra with Egyptian ceremonies, and erected a sepulchre or temple to her in Eleusis.

(A) In the primitive times, the Athenians excluded from the mysteries of Ceres all strangers, that is, all that were not members of their own commonwealth. Hence, when Hercules, Castor and Pollux desired to be initiated, they were first made citizens of Athens (13). In process of time they admitted all persons, barbarians excepted, and at length these also, the Romans having been the first among the barbarians, as the Greeks called all other nations who enjoyed this honour.

(11) Cic. de leg. l. ii.

(12) Chronol. p. 15, 17, 18, 134—136.

(13) Plut. in Theb.

to engage that republic in their alliance, and protect their territories from the insults of Philip. All the city went out to meet them, and among the rest, the priests in their religious habits, as if the gods themselves had come to the relief of the city. The people assembled in the market-place to conclude the alliance, and expected that Attalus would come thither in person. But the king thought it more suitable to his dignity to treat with them by messengers than by word of mouth; and was also willing to decline the acclamations and flatteries of a people, who were too lavish of their praises. In a letter which he wrote to the magistrates, he gave them a particular account of his exploits against Philip, and the good offices he had done the republic, expressly mentioning four ships, which he had very lately taken from the Macedonians, and restored to Athens. He concluded with exhorting them to take advantage of the succours which both he and the Rhodians now offered them. The league was concluded, and the Athenians in their transports of joy paid extravagant compliments to the king and the Rhodians. To their ten Tribes, each of which bore the name of one of their heroes, they added an eleventh, calling it Attalis in honour of king Attalus (B). As to the Rhodians, they presented them with a crown of gold, and made all the inhabitants of Rhodes free of Athens ^a. The king of Pergamus and the Rhodians better pleased with the treaty than the shouts of the people, returned on board their ships and set sail, the king for Ægina, where his fleet waited for him, and the Rhodians for their own island.

Philip no sooner heard that Attalus and the Rhodians were retired, but he sent Philocrates one of his generals at the head of a strong detachment to ravage the territory of Athens, while he himself with the rest of his army over-ran all the southern parts of Thrace, and the Thracian Chersonesus. From thence he passed over the Hellepont into Asia, and laid siege to Abydos, which city he took by storm, but reaped no advantage by his conquest; the Abydenians having massacred their wives and children, set fire to the town, burnt their effects, and killed one another; so that the conqueror made not one slave ^l.

THE news of the reduction of Abydos, and the repeated complaints of the Athenians, made the consul Sulpicius at last leave Rome; he embarked with his army at Brundisium, and landed at the mouth of the Apfus between Dyrrhacium and Apollonia. As he came too late in the year to attempt any thing on that side, he immediately detached Claudius Centho to Athens with twenty galleys, and some legionaries to cover the Athenian territory from the ravages of Philocrates. As soon as he appeared at Piræus, Athens got some respite; a stop was put to the devastations in the inland countries, and the coasts were delivered from the ravages of the Chalcidian pirates. But this was not enough for Centho; he resolved to punish the Chalcidians for their piracies; and accordingly set sail with the best part of his squadron, surprized Chalcis, pillaged it, massacred all the Macedonians and inhabitants that fell into his hands, broke all the statues of king Philip, burnt his magazines, arsenals, and engines of war, and then returned with the spoil to Athens ^e.

As for Philip, early in the spring he assembled his sea and land-forces at Demetrias, a maritime city of Thessaly, which he had made the capital of his dominions. He had attempted in the close of the late campaign to revenge himself on the Romans for the surprize of Chalcis, and to surprize them in their turn. But he came too late; the Romans had retired from Chalcis, and left nothing there but dead bodies, ashes, and ruins. Now therefore he turned all his rage against Athens, and having crossed the Euripus over a bridge, marched through Boeotia towards Attica, hoping to find Athens as ill-guarded as the Romans had found Chalcis. But the Athenians had received notice of his approach, and were prepared. They kept constantly

Athens attacked, and Attica ravaged by Philip.

^a Idem, ibid. c. 14.

^l Idem, ibid. c. 17.

^m Liv. ibid.

(B) The number of the tribes, of which the republic of Athens consisted, was not always the same, but varied as the number of the citizens increased. At first they were but four in all; soon after they were six; in the times of Æschines and Demosthenes they were increased to ten. In afterwards the Athenians erected three more, viz. the tribes Ptolemais, Attalis, and Adrianis, in honour of Ptolemy the son of Lagus, of king Attalus, and of the emperor Adrian. The ten first tribes took their names from ten Attic heroes; these were Acamas the son of Theseus, Ajax the son of Telamon, Cecrops the founder and first king of Athens, Ægeus the ninth king of Athens, and the father of Theseus, Erechtheus the sixth king of Athens, Hippothoon the son of Neptune, Leo, who sacrificed his daughters for the welfare of his country, Oeneus the son of Pandion, Pandion the fifth king of Athens, and Anticlus the son of Hercules.

- a a certain number of men in pay, whose whole business was to fly continually from place to place in the neighbourhood of their dominions, and make what discoveries they could. One of these couriers, having discovered the Macedonian army, returned in haste to Athens, and reaching the city at midnight, brought thither the news of the approach of the enemy. The negligence of the Athenians was not less than that of the Chalcidians; they were all asleep, and both the gates and walls unguarded. But the trumpets soon roused them; both citizens and soldiers ran to arms, took their posts, and put themselves in a posture of defence. Philip, finding he could not surprize the city, resolved to attack it. He therefore ordered his troops to advance to the largest gate, called Dipylon. The street which led to it from the market-place, and continued through the suburbs, was of an extraordinary breadth; so that the besieged and the besiegers had room enough to draw up their troops in battalia. The Athenians did not wait till the king came to the gate; the best part of the garrison consisting of auxiliaries sent by king Attalus, and a body of Athenians, commanded by one Dioxippus, marched out to meet the enemy. Philip, overjoyed at an opportunity of joining battle, encouraged his men with this short exhortation; Fix your Eyes on me, and do as I do. He then fell upon the Athenians with incredible fury, forced them to retire, and pursued them to the very gate. But he soon found that he had ventured too far, such showers of darts were discharged upon him from the ramparts, that he was obliged to sound a retreat.
- c If the Athenians had not been afraid of wounding their men, who were mixed with the Macedonians, few of the latter would have escaped unhurt. The next day the besieged being reinforced with some Roman companies, and the troops of Attalus which guarded Piræus made another sally with much greater advantage; so that Philip was obliged to decamp, and post himself about three miles from Athens. But before he retired, he vented his rage in a most barbarous manner in that neighbourhood. He spared neither temples nor tombs, nor the Lyceum, nor sacred groves, nor houses of pleasure; all were, without distinction, pillaged, and reduced to heaps of rubbish. Nay, he commanded his Macedonians to break in pieces the very stones, that they might not be serviceable in the reparation of the demolished edifices. All these devastations, with a great many aggravations, were afterwards set forth before the Ætolian diet by the Athenian ambassadors, in order to draw that nation into an alliance with Rome. And indeed the king's behaviour on this occasion prejudiced many of the Greeks so strongly against him, that they were afterwards easily gained over to the Roman interest, not knowing that they were bringing into their country more haughty lords, or rather arbitrary tyrants, than Macedon had ever produced, or Greece ever seen^a.

- THE irruption of the Romans into Macedon, which soon after happened, obliged Philip to leave Attica, and all Greece, and hasten to the defence of his own country. About the same time Apustius, to whom the proconsul Sulpicius had given the command of the Roman fleet, having joined the naval forces of king Attalus off the coast of Argolis, sailed from thence to the port of Athens. Their succours so elevated the Athenians, that they expressed their Resentment against Philip in a most ridiculous manner. They had formerly erected statues to Philip and his ancestors of both sexes, and even instituted sacrifices and festivals, and appointed priests How the Athenians expressed their resentment against Philip. in their honour. But now, out of a childish revenge, they destroyed the idols which they had worshipped, and passed a decree in their assembly, which lessened their esteem even in the opinion of their friends. The purport of this decree was, that all the statues of Philip and his ancestors should be broke in pieces; that the inscriptions in their commendation should be every-where crazed; that their altars should be overturned, their festivals abolished, and their priests degraded; that even the places, where any monuments had been erected to them, should be deemed accursed, and no monuments ever after raised there; that the priests for the future should in their religious assemblies pronounce curses against Philip and the Macedonian armies; that if any citizen should have the impudence to excuse Philip, or speak in his favour, he should instantly be put to death; and lastly, that Philip and his posterity should be treated in the same manner as Pisistratus and his family had formerly been^a. These were the only acts of hostility which the degenerate Athenians committed against Philip, the only revenge which they took of the dreadful havock he had lately made in their territory. The officers of the Roman fleet, and king Attalus, who had put in at Pyræus, were witnesses of these shameful proceedings, and at the same time surfeited with the fulsome praises of which the Athenians were no less lavish on them, than on their curses on the king of Macedon. Athens, heretofore so renowned in arms, was now become one of the most insignificant cities of Greece; for during the whole course of this war with Philip, and of that which was afterwards carried on by the Romans and their allies against his son Perseus, to the utter destruction of the kingdom of Macedon, the Athenians performed nothing, which the ancient writers have thought worth transmitting to posterity. They continued indeed inviolably attached to the Roman interest, not having been even suspected to favour the Macedonian party, while in the other states of Greece the friends of Macedon were far more numerous than those of Rome. This steadiness gained them the affection of the Romans, who left them in the full possession of their ancient liberties even after the Destruction of Corinth, and dissolution of the Acbean league.
- f

^a Idem, ibid. c. 25.

^a Idem, ibid. c. 24.

Athens sided with Mithridates against the Romans. Year of the flood, 2913. Before Christ 87.

In this state Athens continued without any remarkable alteration till the Mithridatic war, when that city openly declared against the Romans her patrons and allies, being induced thereunto by one Aristion an Athenian philosopher of the sect of Epicurus. Aristion was of a mean extraction, but greatly esteemed among the followers of Epicurus for his pretended contempt of power and riches. But these the hypocrites had only affected to despise, as afterwards appeared, in hopes of obtaining them more easily that way. For Archelaus, whom Mithridates had sent with a numerous army into Greece to stir up the inhabitants against the Romans, found it no difficult task to gain over this despiser of riches and honours, by promising to raise him to the chief employments of his republics. Archelaus having thus engaged him in the interests of his master, sent him over to Asia to confer there with the king himself, and concert measures about drawing Athens off from the Roman party, to which many of the citizens were greatly addicted. The scheme, which they formed, succeeded to their wish, but proved fatal to that unhappy city. Archelaus had some time before reduced the island of Delos, and plundered the rich temple of Apollo Delius. As this island had been formerly subject to the Athenians, Aristion advised the king to send the spoils to Athens, and with the present a strong body of men under pretence of guarding it. The Athenians were taken with this bait, and admitted the troops to the number of two thousand into the city. By the help of these, Aristion, who accompanied them, took upon him to dispose of all the employments at Athens, and reigned there with great authority. All those who favoured the Romans were either cruelly murdered, or sent prisoners to Mithridates. Nor did the friends of Rome fare better in the other countries of Greece; the Acbeans, Lacedemonians, Beotians, &c. openly declared for Mithridates, and drove out such of their countrymen as refused to come into their measures. Thebes was the only city of Greece that continued faithful to the Romans (C).

UPON the news of this general revolt, C. Sextius, prætor of Macedon, detached Bruttius Sura his lieutenant-general at the head of a thousand men to put a stop to the progress of Archelaus. The prætor could spare him no more, being in apprehension that Macedon might follow the example of Greece. With this small body Bruttius penetrated into Beotia, fought several battles with the joint forces of Aristion and Archelaus, and continued to harass them till the Lacedemonians and Acbeans taking the field, joined the Asiatics. Then Bruttius, not being able with a handful of men to make head against so many enemies at once, imbarqued his troops, and with his small squadron blocked up the port of Athens. While he continued here, the fleet of Mithridates commanded by Metrophanes drew near to Eubœa with a design to seize that island. Whereupon Bruttius put to sea, and with one p Idem, ibid. c. 44.

q APPIAN. in Mithridat.

(C) Thebes stood at the foot of mount Helicon in Beotia, whence the poets give the surname of Thebpiades to the nine muses, who were supposed by the poets to have lived on this mountain. When Thebes was sacked by the Thebans under the command of Epaminondas, many of the inhabitants fled to Athens, where they were kindly entertained. Whence the Thebpians had ever after such a regard for the Athenians, that they never failed to come into their measures till Athens declared against Rome (14).

(14.) Paus. in Beot. Strab. l. ix.

single

- a single squadron forced Metrophanes to sail back into Asia, sunk some of his ships, and on his return to the port of Aibens made a descent on the island of Sciatbos, which the Asiatics had seized. He recovered the island, crucified all the slaves he found there, and cut off the right arms of all the islanders that fell into his hands, both slaves and inhabitants having joined in the revolt, and treated the friends of the republic in a very barbarous manner. The brave Bruttius, having thus preserved the island of Eubæa, and recovered that of Sciatbos, returned to the Piræus or port of Aibens, in order to prevent the Athenians from receiving any succours by sea from the king of Pontus ^e.
- b SUCH was the state of affairs in Greece, when Sylla, who had been appointed to carry on the war against Mitbridates, landed in Thessaly with five legions, some Italian cohorts, and a small body of cavalry. With these he was to make head against the joint forces of Archelaus, and the states of Greece, amounting in all to an hundred and fifty thousand men. Upon Sylla's arrival, the Greek cities returned to their duty, and opened their gates to the Roman general. Aibens alone, which was held by the tyrant Aristion, persisted in the revolt, and would not hearken to any terms. Whereupon Sylla resolved to reduce it by force, thinking it necessary to settle the affairs of the republic in Greece before he passed over into Asia against Mitbridates. This capital of Attica, or rather of all Greece, consisted at that time of two cities, the upper called Cecropia from Cecrops its first founder, and the lower named Aibens from Aibene or Minerva its tutelary goddess. Both these cities were surrounded by one common wall, but parted by another which lay across between them, both walls being defended by strong towers raised at small distances from each other. The two ports of Pyræus and Munychia were no less fortified than the city itself, being encompassed with walls of an uncommon thickness, and forty cubits high. Both these ports were joined to the city, though forty furlongs distant from it, by a wall which Themistocles had caused to be built, in order to secure the removal of such effects as were brought by sea from the port to the city. Besides these two ports or citadels, Aibens was defended on the east by the Cepheisus, and by the Ilissus on the west, which two rivers winding about the plain, rendered the access to the city very difficult ^f. However Sylla undertook to reduce it with a far smaller army than that which had been brought from Asia to defend it. Upon his entering Attica he was met by Aristion and Archelaus, but he obliged them both to retire with a considerable loss, and shut themselves up in the two cities and citadels of Aibens. Archelaus took upon him to defend Piræus, and Aristion to sustain the siege of Aibens and Cecropia. On the other hand the Roman general divided his troops into two bodies; one he sent to invest the city; with the other he marched in person to attack Piræus, hoping to take it by storm. But the besieged made such a vigorous defence, that he was obliged, after many unsuccessful attacks, to retire and take up his winter quarters at Eleusis and Megara. However he did not drop the enterprise, having left a sufficient number of troops to keep the city and castle blocked up against his return in the beginning of the spring. The whole winter he spent in making preparations for besieging the place in form as soon as the season of the year would allow him to take the field. Entire woods were cut down, and the timber employed in making the warlike engines which were then used in sieges. Nay, he did not spare the sacred groves, nor the trees in the walks of the academy and lyceum, which were the finest in Attica. He caused the high walls that joined the port to the city to be demolished, making use of the ruins to raise the works, and carry on the approaches, and as the enemy had laid waste the whole country, which was barren of its own nature, twenty thousand mules were continually employed in bringing provisions from Beotia and other countries of Greece. These extraordinary expences soon drained his military chest, which was but very indifferently furnished at his first setting out from Rome. Neither had he any hopes of receiving supplies either of men or money from thence, the contrary faction, headed by Marius and Cinna prevailing in Italy, and watching all opportunities of thwarting his attempts in the east. In this distress he had recourse to the sacred and inviolable treasures of the temples, and wrote a letter to the amphictyones (D) assembled sized by S.

Athens b.

^e Idem, ibid.

^f PAUSAN. in Attica.

(D) The amphictyones were, as we have observed enjoyed the amphictyonic right. These, before they elsewhere, the deputies of the cities in Greece that were admitted into the assembly, bound themselves by bled at Delphos, desiring them to send him the treasures of Apollo, and promising in the most solemn manner that he would return to the god whom he himself revered, the value of whatever should be sent him. One Capbis, a native of Phocis, in whom Sylla confided, was charged to deliver this letter to the amphyctiones, and excuse to the assembly a step, which the Roman general was forced to take against his will. When Capbis arrived at Delphos, he wept in the presence of the amphyctiones, and told them that nothing but the utmost distress could have obliged Sylla to make such a demand, or himself to be the messenger of it, and desired that the god might be consulted. The oracle indeed returned no answer, but the sound of Apollo's lyre was heard from the inside of the sanctuary, and Capbis, whether he was really terrified with the pretended prodigy, or willing to save the treasure by filling Sylla with a religious fear, would not meddle with the gifts consecrated to the god, till he had acquainted the general with what had happened. But Sylla, deriding his simplicity, replied, that he was surprised he should not comprehend that music was a mark of joy, and by no means a sign of anger and resentment; he therefore desired him to take the treasures, and be assured that in so doing he acted agreeable to the will of the god. Pursuant to this order, all the gold, silver, and brass, all the vases, presents and offerings, which the superstition of the neighbouring and most distant nations had brought thither, were loaded on carts, and amidst the lamentations and outcries of the amphyctiones and Delphians sent to the Roman camp, where the gold, silver and brass was coined by Sylla's orders. The person he employed to take care of the coinage was Lucullus one of his quaestors, who made so beautiful a coin that it was ever after highly valued, and known by the name of the Lucullian money. The treasures of the god Aesculapius at Epidauros, not much inferior in value to those of Apollo at Delphos, were at the same time by Sylla's orders brought to the camp, and by his quaestor turned into money.

Sylla being thus furnished with money to pay his troops and engines to carry on the siege, took the field early in the spring, and shut up both the city and port more closely than before. As he could not possibly reduce the city by famine so long as it received supplies of provisions by sea from the Pyraeus, he began by making a breach in the wall, which secured the passage from the port to the city, and lodging in the breach a strong body of legionaries, so that nothing could be conveyed from one place to the other. Having thus cut off the communication between the city and the sea, he drew a line of circumvallation which prevented the inhabitants from abandoning their native country, or receiving any supplies from the neighbouring villages. The city being thus closely shut up, Sylla applied himself entirely to the reducing of Pyraeus, hoping that in the mean time the Athenians would be obliged by famine to shake off the tyrannical yoke of Aristion, and return to their duty. It is not easy to say, whether the attack of Pyraeus or the defence was conducted with most vigour, both the besiegers and besieged behaving with incredible courage and resolution. The sallies were frequent, and attended with almost formal battles, in which the slaughter was great, and the loss generally equal. In one of these Archelaus put the Romans to flight, set fire to their machines, and obliged them to retire at a greater distance from the place. They no sooner returned than he attacked them anew, and would have obtained the like advantage, had not Murena, a legionary tribune, encouraged the Romans, and brought them back to the charge with such fury, that the besieged in their turn were forced to give ground, and save themselves within their walls, after having lost two thousand men in the engagement. The Romans pursued them so close, that they would have entered pell-mell with the Asiatics, had not the gate been timely shut, and a considerable part of the garrison left without the walls at the discretion of the enemy. Among these was Archelaus himself, who would have been taken prisoner with the others, had not the soldiers on the ramparts observing his danger thrown him down a rope, and by that means drawn him up the wall.

THE disadvantage of this action did not dishearten the besieged, who were still numerous enough to defend the place. The treachery of two slaves that were in

† PLUT. in Sylla. APPIAN. in Mithridat. * Idem, ibid. & Aul. Gell. l. xv. c. 1.

by a most solemn oath, to preserve the public peace, maintain the interests of religion, and to the utmost of their power secure the riches of the temple at Delphos. But they durst not refuse a demand, which was made at the head of a formidable army.

the

- a the Pyreus, proved far more prejudicial to them than the attacks of the enemy. These, either out of affection to the Roman party, or in hopes of recovering their liberty, if the place should be taken, wrote upon leaden balls all that passed within, and threw them with slings into the Roman camp. By this means all the wise measures which Archelaus took were immediately communicated to the enemy, and none of his attempts attended with the usual success. He resolved one night to sally out against the enemy's works, and at the same time to send all his cavalry to fall upon their camp. But he no sooner took this resolution, than Sylla, who caused all the balls of lead to be carefully gathered, found one with this intelligence; To-night at such an hour the foot will attack your works, and the cavalry your camp.
- b He made use of this advice, and posted his troops so that the besieged were soon forced to retire with considerable loss. As the city began to be in great want, Archelaus designed to send a great quantity of provisions to relieve the garison, and to convey it into the city by a strong detachment, which might have easily broke through the body of Romans that guarded the passage. But Sylla, who was timely acquainted with this design by the two slaves, doubled the guard, placed his men in ambushes, intercepted the convoy, and cut in pieces most of the Asiatics who escorted it.

NOTWITHSTANDING all these disadvantages, Archelaus still held out in hopes of being soon relieved by Tasiles one of Mithridates's generals, who was marching through Epirus to his assistance at the head of a hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, with ninety chariots armed with scythes. As the approach of this formidable army, which had already reduced Thrace and Macedon, gave new courage to the besieged, so it disheartened the Romans. Whereupon Sylla exerted his utmost endeavours to take the place by storm before the arrival of so numerous an army. One night, while the centinels on the walls were asleep, he ordered some of the boldest among his legionaries to scale the ramparts, which they did accordingly, and drove off the enemies that were posted to guard them. But the rest of the garison taking the alarm, the Romans were obliged to save themselves by leaping down into the ditch, and retiring in great disorder. Archelaus took advantage of the confusion the Romans were in, and made a vigorous sally with a design to burn a tower which had been lately raised by Sylla, and from whence the Romans greatly galled the besieged on the walls. Sylla hastened to the defence of a work, which had cost him much time and labour; the engagement lasted from morning to night, many falling on both sides; but the tower was preserved entirely by the valour of Sylla, who on that occasion distinguished himself in a very eminent manner.

IN the mean time the two cities of Athens and Cecropia began to be greatly distressed for want of provisions; Archelaus had several times attempted to throw in convoys, but had always found on that occasion the Romans on their guard, and the detachment, which was posted between the port and the city, reinforced with new troops from the camp. He therefore began to suspect that he had traitors about him, but nevertheless resolved to attempt once more the relief of the city. He did not doubt but Sylla would be soon acquainted with his design, and in consequence of that intelligence send a considerable detachment from his camp to reinforce the legionaries that guarded the road. As the army would be greatly weakened by this detachment, he thought that would be a proper time to make a sally against the camp, and demolish the works. This design he imparted to none, and therefore the sally proved very successful, several of the enemy's machines being reduced to ashes; but the convoy was intercepted, and most of the Asiatics that guarded it cut in pieces.

Sylla had raised many castles round the walls, from the several floors of which such showers of arrows were discharged against the besieged, that they could not, without great danger, appear on the ramparts. To obviate this inconvenience, Archelaus ordered his men to undermine the castles, which were raised on large foundations of stone, and by this means several of them were thrown down, and the Romans, who were lodged in them, either killed, or dangerously wounded. While the besieged were thus busy under-ground, the Romans beat down with their rams great part of the wall, and thought themselves at last masters of the place. But in a general assault, Archelaus repulsed the besiegers with such resolution, that they were forced to abandon the enterprize, and apply all their thoughts to the widening of the breach before they could entertain any hopes of taking the place by storm. The Asiatics had, in imitation of the Romans, raised wooden towers without the walls, which rendered the approach to them very difficult and dangerous. Sylla therefore altered his measures, and instead of using the ram, ordered his men to dig a way to the bottom of the walls, and sap their foundations, supporting them with large beams, lest they should be buried themselves in the ruins. The wall being thus undermined, fire was set to the props, which being burnt, great part of the wall fell down with a dreadful noise, which struck the besieged, who did not expect it, with great terror. Sylla laid hold of this opportunity to mount the breach at the head of his best troops; but Archelaus opposed him with such resolution, that he was obliged to give ground. The Roman general returned thrice to the assault, but was as often repulsed; nay in the last attack his men suffered so much, that he himself thought it advisable to give over the attempt, and lead his weary legions back to the camp. There they continued inactive for several days, and in the mean time Archelaus built another wall within that which the besiegers had with so much pains and labour beat down. This new wall Sylla began to batter before it was dry; but the prodigious quantity of arrows, and burning materials, which were from thence discharged upon the aggressors, obliged him not only to desist from the attempt, but to retire with some precipitation^a.

* PLUT. in Sylla. x APPIAN. in Mithridat. y Idem, ibid.

Athens in great distress for want of provisions.

AND now Sylla gave over all thoughts of taking the place by assault, and therefore turned the siege into a blockade, in hopes of reducing it by famine. All the avenues both to the city and the port were guarded by strong detachments, so that neither provisions of any sort could be carried in, nor any of the inhabitants find a way out. By this means the city, which was then one of the most populous of the world, was reduced to such straits, that a bushel of barley was sold for a thousand drachms. Many of the citizens had nothing else to maintain themselves with but the roots and grass, which they found growing about the walls. In this distress the senators and priests went to throw themselves at the tyrant Aristion's feet, conjuring him to have pity on the city, and to submit to the Romans upon any tolerable terms. But the tyrant was so far from being touched with their complaints, that he ordered his guards to discharge their arrows against them, and in that manner drove them from his presence. In the midst of the public misery, Aristion, and his accomplices in the tyranny were plentifully provided with all sorts of provisions. Their tables were served with the most exquisite meats, while the common people, and many of the nobility, after having consumed their horses, dogs, and all other animals, were forced to live upon leather, which they softened by steeping it in water, and even upon human flesh^a. The tyrant was at last prevailed upon by the importunities of the people to send ambassadors to the Roman camp; but as these made no proposals, but only descants on the exploits of Theseus, Eumolpus, and their ancestors against the Medes and Persians, Sylla interrupted them, desiring the haranguers to keep their rhetorical flourishes for themselves, since he was not come to Athens to be informed of the prowess of their ancestors, but to punish their present rebellion. Aristion had sent these declaimers with no other view but to quiet the people, and make them believe that he was willing to save the city by capitulating with the Romans; but he still depended on the succours which were on full march to the relief of the city under the command of Taxiles; these he daily expected, and therefore, though in compliance with the importunities of the people, he sent out ambassadors to Sylla, yet he had no mind to come to any agreement, nor even proposed any terms, which he imagined the Roman general might accept^b.

Sylla had spies in Athens, as well as in Piræus, who were continually running about and intruding into all companies. One of these having one day over-heard some old men that were walking in a place called Ceramicos (E), blaming the tyrant

^a Idem, ibid.

^b PLUT. in Sylla.

^c APPIAN. ibid.

(E) There were two places at Athens bearing this name, the one in the city, and the other in the suburbs; the former was a place of resort for prostitutes, and much frequented by reason of its walks. The other was appointed for the burying-place of great men, such especially as had died fighting for their country.

- a for not fortifying and guarding a certain part of the wall, where the enemy might easily surprize the city, upon his return to the camp acquainted Sylla with what he had heard. Upon this advice, the Roman went at midnight to take a view of the place, and finding that it might be easily scaled, ordered his legionaries without delay to apply their ladders, which they did accordingly with great chearfulness, being tired out with so long a siege, and entered the city sword in hand. While the legionaries were engaged within the city, Sylla battered the walls so violently with his rams, that he opened a large breach, and at the head of his whole army came to the relief of those who were fighting on the ramparts. The Athenians were struck with terror when they saw the Romans advancing in good order within their walls, and throwing away their arms, implored the clemency of the conqueror. But Sylla had been too much provoked by the satyrical reflections of the Greeks from their ramparts on himself and his wife (F), to grant them any quarter. He allowed his soldiers to plunder the city, and inhumanly to murder even the women and children. The slaughter was so merciless, that the very channels in the streets flowed with blood. The next day all the slaves were sold by auction, and liberty granted to the few citizens who had escaped the swords of the soldiers. A few days after the reduction of Athens, Cecropia, whether Aristion had retired, was likewise forced to surrender. The tyrant, his guards, and all who had been in any employment under him, were put to death; but the others by Sylla's orders spared.
- c He would not suffer the city to be set on fire, saying that he pardoned the children for the sake of their fathers. The only punishment he inflicted upon the few citizens, who had the good luck to outlive that fatal day, was, that they should not for the future have the power of choosing their own magistrates, nor ever repair the breach which he had made in the wall. The first part of this punishment he soon remitted, and restored the city to the full enjoyment of its ancient liberties. Some time after the reduction of Athens and Cecropia, Archelaus having held out till his new wall was beat down, thought it adviseable to abandon the place, and accordingly after a long and most glorious defence embarked his troops, and retired first to Munychia, and from thence advanced to join Taxiles. Sylla having d possessed himself of the Pyreus, to leave behind him some marks of his resentment, destroyed most of the stately buildings, and amongst others the magazines, and the arsenal which had been built by the celebrated architect Philo, and was reckoned a master-piece of art.

This storm being blown over, the Athenians enjoyed a profound tranquility, till the civil war broke out between Cæsar and Pompey, when they sided with the latter, and were therefore closely besieged by Q. Fufius Calenus, Cæsar's lieutenant, who committed great devastations in Attica, destroyed several edifices which had been spared by Sylla, and reduced the city of Athens to great straits. However they held out so long as they had any hopes of being relieved by Pompey; but when news e was brought them that he was entirely defeated, they surrendered at discretion, and met with a more kind treatment than they expected; for Cæsar not only pardoned them, but received their city under his protection, saying that he spared the living for the sake of the dead. But this kindness was not sufficient to keep a people in obedience that had an utter aversion to any thing that favoured of servitude; for they no sooner heard of Cæsar's death, but they openly declared for his murderers, received Brutus and Cassius into their city, and even erected statues to them, which they placed next to those of Harmodius and Aristogiton, who had asserted the liberty of their country against the tyrannical usurpations of the sons of Pisistratus. After the defeat of Brutus and Cassius they sided with Antony, who not only restored them f to the full possession of all the privileges they had enjoyed in the most flourishing times of their republic, but enlarged their dominions by subjecting to Athens the islands of Cea, Sciasbus, Peparethus, and Ægina. After the defeat of Antony, Augustus punished their ingratitude to Julius Cæsar, by taking from them the island of Ægina, and forbidding them to sell the freedom of their city. Towards the • PLUT. in Sylla. APPIAN. in Mithridat. • PLUT. in Antonio.

(F) They reproached Sylla with the lewd life of his wife Metella, whence we may conclude that her infamy was become very public, since it had already reached Greece. Metella was the daughter of Quintus Cæcilius Metellus, and by Sylla's mother to the famous Fausa, whose excessive licentiousness made Rome forget the lewdness of Metella.

latter end of Augustus's reign they began to revolt, but were without much trouble reduced to their former obedience. Germanicus, the adopted son of Tiberius, honoured them with the privilege of having a lictor, which was deemed a mark of sovereign power; this grant was confirmed to them by Tiberius and his successors, under whose protection they maintained their ancient form of government till the reign of Vespasian, who reduced Attica, with the rest of Greece, to a Roman province, saying, that the Greeks knew not how to enjoy their liberty. But the emperor Adrian, who had been archon of Athens before his accession to the imperial throne, restored them to the full enjoyment of all their ancient privileges, and bestowed upon them a large sum of money with an annual provision of corn. In his reign and at his charge the two ports of Pyraeus and Munychia were repaired, and a whole region of new buildings added to the old city. This quarter was called Adrianopolis from Adrian, whom the Athenians, as appears from some ancient inscriptions, not undeservedly used to stile the second founder of their city. All the privileges granted them by Adrian were not only confirmed, but extended by his successors M. Antoninus Pius, and M. Antoninus the philosopher; the latter of which allowed them handsome salaries for the maintenance of their public professors. But Severus abridged them of a great many privileges, to revenge, as is supposed, an affront which he received at Athens while he studied there^e. Valerian was more favourable to them, and gave them leave to repair that part of the wall which had been thrown down by Sylla. In the reign of Gallienus, as Zosimus informs us, or of Claudian, as Cedrenus will have it, the city was taken and plundered by the Goths, who were soon obliged by Cloidemus, who had escaped their fury, to abandon their new conquest, and save themselves by a timely flight. Constantine the Great was a peculiar patron and benefactor of the Athenians, honouring their chief magistrate with the title of grand duke, and granting them many other privileges of greater consequence, which were confirmed and enlarged by Constantius, who moreover put them in possession of several islands in the Archipelago. In the time of Arcadius and Honorius they were cruelly harassed and pillaged by the Goths, who turned all the stately and magnificent structures, that were still standing, into heaps of ruins. From this time there is scarce any mention made of Athens till the thirteenth century, when it was in the hands of Baldwin, as Nicetas inform us^f, and besieged by one of the generals of the Greek emperor Theodorus Lascaris, who was forced to raise the siege after having suffered a considerable loss. The same author tells us that it was not long after besieged and taken by the marquis Bonifacius. It fell afterwards into the hands of one Delves of the house of Aragon, upon whose death it was seized by Bajazet^g, who did not hold it long, being driven out by the Catalanians under the command of Andronicus Paleologus the elder. The Catalanians were in their turn dispossessed of it by Reinerius Acciaïoli, a Florentine, who having no lawful issue, left the state or dukedom of Athens, as it was then called, to the Venetians, and Thebes with Bootia to his natural son Anthony. Anthony made war on the Venetians, and in one campaign recovered the whole state of Athens, which continued for some years under the government of the Acciaïoli, but was at last reduced by the Turks in 1455. Francus Acciaïoli, the last duke of Athens, and prince of Achaïe, seeing his country threatened with an invasion by the Mohammedans under the conduct of Omares, and not being in a condition to make head against so numerous an army, had recourse to the western princes, called then the Latins; but these refused to assist him, unless he engaged his subjects to renounce all the articles wherein the Greek church differed from the Latin, which he not being able to perform, was forced to deliver up both himself and the city to the Barbarians, who first treated their captive with great humanity, but afterwards put him to death^h. Athens remained subject to the Turks till the year 1687, when it was after a short siege taken by the Venetians, and not many years after retaken by the Turks, who continue masters of it to this day.

To what we have said of the greater republics of Greece, we shall add something relating to the smaller states, namely those of Bootia, Acarnania, and Epirus. The Bootians, after having driven out their kings, as we have related above, formed themselves into a republic, whereof the chief magistrates were the Prætor or ^e Gruter. p. 177, 178. ^f Spartianus. ^g Nicetas in vita Baldwini. ^h Laonicus Chalcocondyles. l. iii. ⁱ Idem, ibid. ^k Idem, l. vi. & ix. ^l Hist. Univer. p. 375.

- a Strategos, the Baotarchi, and the Polemarchi. The prætor was always chosen from among the Baotarchi, and his authority lasted only a year, it being death for the prætor, according to the laws of the republic, not to resign his office before the first month, called Boucatios, of the new year was expired. His authority was much the same with that which was vested in the prætors of Acboia and Ætolia. The province of the Baotarchi was to assist the prætor with their advice, chiefly in war, and to command under him; they were the supreme court of the nation in what related to military affairs, the prætor himself, who was one of their body, not daring to act contrary to their determinations. As to their number we are in the dark, some authors mentioning seven, some nine, and some even eleven, all vested with some command in the army. But their authority was not confined to military affairs only, they bore a great sway in the civil administration, and were from thence stiled Baotarchi, or governors of Baotia. They were chosen yearly, and obliged by law, as well as the prætor, to lay down their employment on pain of death before the first month of the new year was expired. The Polemarchi were entirely civil magistrates, it being their province to maintain peace and concord at home, while the Baotarchi were employed abroad in the wars of the republic. Besides these magistrates there were four councils, in which the whole authority of the state, as Thucydides informs us ^a, consisted. These were made up of the deputies that were sent by all the cities of the Baotian republic, and without their approbation the
- Baotarchi could not declare war, make peace, conclude alliances, or transact any other business of importance, as appears from Thucydides ^a, who tells us, that an alliance with some of the neighbouring states, which had been approved by all the Baotarchi, was rejected by a plurality of voices in the four great councils of the nation. At Thebes, the chief city of Baotia, merchants, and even artificers, were admitted into the number of citizens, an honour which they enjoyed in no other city of Greece. However they were excluded there, as in all the other Greek states, from public employments, pursuant to a law which obtained all over Greece, and declared those only qualified for the administration of public affairs, who had abstained for the space of ten years from all manner of trade and traffic ^c. We find
- ¶ another of the Baotian laws mentioned by the antients ^d, which forbids on pain of death any parent to expose his child; if he had not wherewithal to maintain the infant, he was by the same law directed to put it into the hands of a magistrate, and the magistrate to dispose of it to any one that was willing to bring it up; but the child thus brought up was condemned to perpetual slavery, being entirely at the disposal of the person who had taken care of it during its childhood.

THE Baotians, and especially the Thebans, were continually harassed by the princes of Macedon, as we shall relate in the history of Alexander and his successors. Nevertheless they sided with Philip against the Romans, and could not be prevailed upon by the Athenians and Acboians to desert him and join the other states of Greece, till he was intirely defeated in the famous battle of Cynoccephale. As they were then sensible that the Romans would at last prevail, they thought it adviseable to provide in time for their own safety, and accordingly sent deputies to Flaminius, imploring his protection. The proconsul received them with great humanity, and put them upon the same foot with the other allies of the republic in Greece. Not long after they offered a petition to Flaminius, which seemed reasonable. A great many Baotians had served in the Macedonian army, and these the proconsul was desired to demand of Philip, who had then made a truce with the Romans. Flaminius complied with their request, and obtained what he desired of Philip, who immediately sent back the Baotian troops, and with them one Brachyllas, who had been banished f for appearing too zealous in the cause of the Macedonians against the Romans. The Baotians, though indebted to Flaminius alone for the return of their troops, thanked the king of Macedon only, and to shew their gratitude, in the first election they made of a prætor, they preferred Brachyllas, famous for his attachment to Philip, and hatred to the Romans, to Zeuxippus and Pisistratus, who were both zealous partizans of Rome; nay, they had the confidence to make this impolitic election in the sight of the Roman camp. In like manner all the other employments were filled with such only as were enemies to Rome, and friends to Macedon. These steps greatly exasperated Flaminius, and Zeuxippus and Pisistratus joined their resentment to that ^a THUCYD. l. v.

■ Idem, ibid.

• ARISTOT. Polit.

¶ PAUSAN. in Baot.

of the proconsul. These two Bæotians foresaw that Brachyllas would not fail to vent ^a his rage upon them as soon as the Roman troops were withdrawn from Greece, and therefore resolved to be before-hand with him while Flaminius continued there. All the friends of Rome concurred in this design, persuading the proconsul that neither their lives nor fortunes could be safe so long as Brachyllas was alive. Flaminius approved of their design, but refused to contribute to it himself. His approbation was sufficient encouragement. Zeuxippus and Pisistratus, having hired three Ætolians and three Italians, fell upon Brachyllas as he was one night returning home from an entertainment, and dispatched him. Some of his companions, who were conducting him to his house from the banquet when the assassins attacked him, were at first the only persons suspected of the murder. But Zeuxippus appeared with an air of confidence ^b in the assembly of the people, undertook the defence of the accused, and shewed that it was not at all probable that debauchees should have courage enough to make any attempts on the life of the prætor. This assurance made some of the Bæotians believe that Zeuxippus was no ways privy to the murder; but others took umbrage at seeing him so mighty solicitous in having those cleared who were apprehended, and began to suspect that the prætor had been murdered by them, and the plot laid by Zeuxippus. On this suspicion, those who were in his company, being put to the rack, though innocent, accused Zeuxippus and Pisistratus purely upon the public suspicions, without being able to bring any proofs of their accusation. Hereupon Zeuxippus, who was conscious to himself of the crime laid to his charge, ^c changing his presumption into fear, privately withdrew from Thebes, where the murder was committed, to Tanagra another city of Bæotia. Pisistratus continued in Thebes, not fearing the deposition of men who had not been any ways privy to the crime; he was only under apprehension of being discovered by a slave who had been employed in the assassination by Zeuxippus his master; he therefore wrote to Zeuxippus at Tanagra, desiring him to dispatch the slave, as one more fit to be employed in a bad action than to keep it a secret. The messenger was ordered to deliver the letter into Zeuxippus's own hands; but he, thinking the slave faithful and affectionate to his master, trusted it with him. The slave read it, and finding it contained sentence of death against himself, left his master that instant, and repaired ^d to Thebes, where he discovered the whole affair. Pisistratus was apprehended and put to death, but the odium of the murder fell entirely on the Romans. Zeuxippus retired to Athens, and lived there without any apprehension, being recommended to the magistrates of that city by his protectors the Romans.

THE Bæotians were inclined to take up arms, but having no officer of experience to head them, and Philip refusing to lend them any assistance, they contented themselves with a private revenge, murdering all the Romans they found straggling about the fields; insomuch that they could no longer cross the country but in large bodies. At last Flaminius being informed that many of his men were missing, and that there were just grounds to suspect they had been murdered by the Bæotians, ^e sent officers with troops to enquire into the matter, and apprehend the authors of such treacherous proceedings. The officers upon their return acquainted him that great numbers of Romans had been murdered, and their bodies, to prevent discovery, thrown into the lake of Copias (G). He was at the same time assured ^f that the cities of Coronea and Acræphia (H) had on that occasion signalized their hatred to the Romans. Upon this information the proconsul ordered the murderers to be delivered up to him, and as he had lost five hundred men, the Bæotians were condemned to pay five hundred talents; troops were likewise sent to ravage the fields of Acræphia, and lay siege to Coronea. The Bæotians, who were conscious to themselves that they deserved severe punishment, seeing the proconsul drawing together his troops with a design to treat them as they deserved, had recourse to

(G) This lake, which is the same with the lake called by Pausanias (15) the lake of Cephisus, took its name from the city of Copæ. It was in former times, as Strabo tells us (16), three hundred and seventy-one furlongs in compass; but is now much less. It is fed by the river Cephisus, and the poets tell us, that Hercules made it by turning the Cephisus into the plain of Orchomenus. The people of this neighbourhood are said to have been the first inventors of oars, whence the city next to the lake was called Copæ from the Greek word κάρη.

(H) Coronea, a city of Bæotia, stood on the river Cephisus, where it discharges itself into the lake Copias, not far from mount Helicon (17). It is famous on account of the victory which Agessilaus gained there over the Thebans and Athenians. The city of Acræphia stood between the springs of the Ilmenus and the Asopus.

(15) Pausan. in Bæot.

(16) Strabo l. xiii.

(17) Strabo l. ix.

the Albenians and Achaëans, whose mediation was of such weight with Flaminius, that he immediately ordered the siege of Coronea to be raised, and remitted four hundred and seventy talents of the fine he had laid upon the treacherous cities of Beotia. He insisted only on their delivering up to him the murderers, who were accordingly apprehended and carried to the Roman camp, where they were brought to condign punishment. This mixture of mildness and severity was highly extolled and applauded by the Beotians, who ever afterwards continued faithful to the Romans. But as some of their leading men joined Perfes king of Macedon in his wars against the Romans, the whole country was on that score treated with great severity.

- b Rome being at that time under no apprehension of an invasion from Antiochus, as she was when Flaminius suffered himself to be so easily appeased. At the dissolution of the Achaean league Beotia with the rest of Greece was reduced to a Roman province.

Acarnania lay between Ætolia and Epirus, was a free state, and governed by a Acarnania.

prætor, a general assembly, and other subordinate magistrates of the same nature and authority as those of the Achaëans and Ætolians. The Acarnanians were above all the other Greeks addicted to the kings of Macedon, and chiefly to Philip, the father of Perfes. They alone adhered to him after the famous battle of Cynocephale, valuing themselves upon an inviolable fidelity in the observation of treaties. However Lucius Flaminius, brother to Titus Flaminius, took upon him to bring them

- c over to the Romans, and deprive Philip of this his only support. With this view he engaged the chief men of the nation to meet him in the island of Corcyra, whither they resorted according to their appointment; but the result of this conference was to appoint another in the city of Leucas, the capital of Acarnania (1). In this second interview the leading men of the nation, after warm disputes, drew up the plan of a confederacy with the Romans, and were inclined to desert Philip. But some, who had been bribed by the king, leaving the assembly with indignation, filled all the city with their complaints; the people joined them, and as they were generally inclined to the princes of Macedon, who had often protected them against the Ætolians, the whole city was in an uproar. During this general commotion,

- d Philip sent Echedemus and Androcles two Acarnanians, greatly esteemed in their own country, and steady friends to Macedon. These declaimed with great virulency against their slavish countrymen, who without any regard to the faith of treaties were betraying the interest of their country, in order to deliver up the whole nation to the mercy of an imperious republic. The people, already prepossessed against the Romans, backed the remonstrances of the two deputies, and openly protested that they would not enter into any engagements prejudicial to the interest of Philip. Thus the decree, which had been drawn up in favour of the Romans, was unanimously rejected in the assembly, and Archelaus and Bianor, who were the authors of it, declared enemies to their country, and guilty of the blackest treachery.

- e Zeuxidas, their prætor, was deposed, for no other reason, but because he had proposed the affair in the assembly. However, upon more mature deliberation, the sentence passed against these three was disannulled, and they restored to their former honours. But at the same time their alliance with the king of Macedon was renewed, and the treaty, made by some private men with the Romans, rejected with indignation. Lucius, who had in the beginning of the tumult retired from Leucas, resolved to reduce the Acarnanians by force; and accordingly having made the necessary preparations, he sailed from Corcyra with a design to lay siege to Leucas. He thought that the very sight of the Roman troops would frighten the citizens into a compliance with his request; but he was disappointed; the Leucadians appeared on the walls, and prepared to make a vigorous resistance. Whereupon the Roman general began

1 Liv. l. xxxii. c. 7.

(1) Leucas was the capital of Acarnania, where the general assembly of the Acarnanians used to meet. The city gave its name to the whole island, which was called Leucadia, but is now known by the name of Santa Maura. It lies in the Ionian sea, and is now divided from the continent by a strait, which is not above fifty paces over. The Carthaginians are said to have settled a colony here, and to have formed this strait or canal; for Leucadia was formerly a peninsula, being joined to Acarnania by a neck of land. Near this city stood in ancient times a stately temple consecrated to Apollo, and the famous rock, whence despairing lovers leaped into the sea. During the feast of Apollo the Leucadians yearly threw down from the top of this rock a criminal, who had been sentenced to die, imagining that the gods would load the criminal with all the evils that threatened the city. They fastened a great many birds and feathers to his body, believing they would make his fall less violent. If he happened not to be killed by the fall, his life was spared, but he was banished for ever, his approaches, being resolved to take the place by storm. Leucadia, or the territory of Leucas, was at that time a peninsula, being joined to the western part of Acarnania by a neck of land, about five hundred paces in length, and a hundred and twenty in breadth; in after ages this isthmus being dug through, Leucadia became an island. Lucius having viewed the situation of the place, resolved to attack it on that side which was washed by the sea, and on that account the least fortified; the water being very low near the walls, the earth was easily removed, and the wall without much trouble undermined, and thrown down. But the besieged made such a vigorous resistance, that the Romans were repulsed in three successive attacks, which obliged the general to allow them some rest; and in the mean time the Leucadians raised a new wall stronger than the former. The siege would have been protracted to a great length, had not some Italian exiles, who were well acquainted with the place, brought a great many Romans privately into the city. These, uniting themselves into one body, marched straight to the market-place, and while the inhabitants were engaged with them there, the rest of the army scaled the walls, and marched in good order to the relief of their companions. The Acarnanians were surrounded, and those, who refused to submit, put to the sword. The reduction of the capital struck such terror into the whole nation, that they deserted Philip, and submitted to the Romans, under whose protection they lived according to their own laws, till the destruction of Corinth, when Acarnania became part of the province of Achaia.

Epirus.

Epirus was bounded on the east by Ætolia, on the west by the Adriatic, on the north by Thessaly and Macedon, and on the south by the Ionian sea. This country was anciently governed by its own princes, in which state it made no small figure, as we shall see in a more proper place. Deidamia, great grand-daughter to the famous Pyrrhus, having no issue, gave the Epirots their liberty, who formed themselves into a republic, which was governed by magistrates annually elected in a general assembly of the whole nation. Their neighbourhood to Macedon obliged them to be continually on their guard against those princes, who made frequent incursions into their country, took and pillaged their cities, and forced them to contribute, as if they had been their subjects, to all the charges of the wars they carried on with the other states of Greece. The Romans, after having conquered Philip, restored them to their ancient liberty; but they, forgetful of this favour, took up arms against their friends and benefactors and joined Perseus, which so provoked the Roman senate, that they dispatched peremptory orders to Paulus Æmilius, after the reduction of Macedon, commanding him to plunder the cities of this ungrateful people, and level them with the ground. This decree drew tears from the eyes of Æmilius, but he could not decline the execution of it. He therefore set out at the head of his victorious army, and arriving on the confines of Epirus, sent small bodies of troops into all the cities, under pretence of withdrawing the garisons that the Epirots might enjoy the same liberty which Rome had granted to Macedon. The Romans were received in all the cities of Epirus with great demonstrations of joy; for Æmilius had not communicated his orders to any one for fear of terrifying the Epirots, who would not have failed to defend themselves and their country, with their usual bravery. In the mean time Paulus Æmilius sent orders to the ten chiefs who were dispersed in the different provinces, and governed all Epirus, enjoining them to bring to his camp all the gold and silver they had in their respective districts. The chiefs with great reluctance complied with his order, and by this means what was most valuable in Epirus was saved out of the hands of the greedy soldiers, and delivered to the quaestors to be laid up in the publick treasury. All the rest was given up as a prey to the soldiery. Though the consular troops were cantoned in different places, the execution was made the same day and hour, the Roman soldiers falling every where with incredible fury on the houses, which were abandoned to their mercy. The whole booty was sold, and of the money raised by the sale each foot soldier had two hundred denarii, that is 6 l. 9 s. 2 d. and each of the horse the double of this sum. An hundred and fifty thousand men were made slaves, and sold to the best bidder for the benefit of the republic. Nor did the vengeance of Rome stop here; all the cities of Epirus to the number of seventy, were dismantled, and the chief men of the country carried to Rome, where

- a they were tried, and most of them condemned to perpetual imprisonment *. After this fatal blow, Epirus never afterwards recovered its ancient splendor. Upon the dissolution of the Achaean league, it was made part of the province of Macedon; but when Macedon became a diocese, Epirus was made a province of itself, called the province of Old Epirus, to distinguish it from New Epirus, another province lying to the east of it. On the division of the empire, it fell to the emperors of the east, and continued under them till the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, when Michael Angelus, a prince nearly related to the Greek emperor, seized on Ætolia and Epirus, of which he declared himself despote or prince, and was succeeded by his brother Theodorus, who took several towns from the Latins, and so far enlarged his dominions, that disdaining the title of despote, he assumed that of emperor, and was crowned by Demetrius archbishop of Bulgaria. Charles, the last prince of this family, dying without lawful issue, bequeathed Epirus and Acarnania to his natural sons, who were driven out, as we have related above, by Amurath the second. Great part of Epirus was afterwards held by the noble family of the Castriots, who, though they were masters of all Albania, yet stiled themselves princes of Epirus. Upon the death of the famous George Castriot, Epirus fell to the Venetians, who were soon dispossessed of it by the Turks, in whose hands it still continues, being now known by the name of Albania, which comprehends the Albania of the ancients, all Epirus, and that part of Dalmatia which is subject to the
- c Turks.

- Thus we have seen, through a series of many ages, the rise, progress, declension, and lastly the final ruin of the several states of Greece. The first form of government introduced among them was monarchichal, which, as Plato observes, is formed upon the model of paternal authority, and of that gentle and moderate dominion, which fathers exercise over their families. But as power, when lodged in one person, becomes often haughty, unjust and oppressive, especially if it is hereditary, the several states of Greece, in process of time, began to be weary of a kingly government, and to put the administration of public affairs into many hands; so that monarchy every-where, except in Macedon, gave way to a republican government, which was diversified into as many various forms as there had been different kingdoms, according to the different genius and peculiar character of each people. However they had all liberty for their fundamental principal, but this liberty was prevented from degenerating into licentiousness by wise laws, which awed the people, and kept them to their duty. As every individual, at least in the early times of Greece, was capable of attaining the chief honours of his republic, he considered his country as his inheritance. The children were taught from their infancy to look upon their country as their common mother, to whom they more strictly appertained than to their parents, and not as private persons, who regard nothing but their own interest, and have no sense of the misfortunes of the state, but as they affect themselves. They studied above all things to maintain among the citizens and members of the state a great equality without pride, luxury, or ostentation. Magistrates, who had bore a great sway during their office, became afterwards private men, and had no authority but what their experience gave them. Those who had commanded armies one year, served perhaps the very next as subalterns, and were not ashamed to perform the most common functions either in the armies or fleets. The principles, which prevailed in all the states of Greece, were the love of poverty, contempt of riches, disregard of self-interest, concern for the public good, desire of glory, love for their country, and above all such a zeal for liberty as no danger could intimidate. So long as they adhered to these principles, they
- d
- e
- f
- were invincible; we have seen them not only making head with a handful of men, against the innumerable armies of the Persians, but putting them to flight, and obliging the most powerful monarch then upon earth to submit to conditions of peace, as shameful to the conquered as they were glorious to the conquerors. But as soon as luxury and the love of riches prevailed among them, they began to degenerate, and in a short time became a quite different people. The Persians soon perceived this alteration, and by bribing those, who had the greatest share in the government, found means to make them turn their arms against themselves. These intestine divisions carefully fomented by the Persians so weakened them, that Philip

* Liv. l. xlv. c. 33, 34.

* PLATO, l. iii. de Legibus, p. 680.

of Macedon and his son Alexander met with no great opposition in reducing a people ^a that had for so many ages maintained their liberty against the whole power of the Persian monarchy. They made several attempts to reinstate themselves in their antient condition; but these efforts were ill concerted, and only served to increase their slavery. They were therefore at last obliged to have recourse to the Roman, who after having gained them by the attractive charms of liberty, which was their darling passion, and made use of them to destroy the Macedonian power, at last turned their arms against those they were come to assist, and reduced to slavery the nations which they pretended to deliver. Greece, thus deprived of its antient power, still retained another sovereignty, to which the Romans themselves could not help paying homage. Athens continued to be the school of polite arts, and the center of ^b refined taste in all the productions of the mind. Rome, haughty as she was, acknowledged this glorious empire, and sent her most illustrious citizens to be finished and refined in Greece. Cicero, already the admiration of the bar, did not think it below him to become the disciple of the great masters Greece then produced. The emperors themselves, who were by more weighty affairs prevented from going into Greece, brought Greece in a manner home to themselves by receiving into their palaces the most celebrated philosophers for the education of their children, and their own improvement. Thus by a new kind of victory Greece triumphed over Rome, and made the conquerors of the world submit to her laws.

S E C T. IV.

The History of the GRECIAN States in ASIA MINOR.The History of IONIA.

Name and division of Ionia. IONIA, so called from the Ionians, who inhabited this part of Asia Minor, was bounded on the north by Æolia, on the west by the Ægean and Icarian seas; ^a on the south by Caria; on the east by Lydia and part of Caria. It lies between the 37th and 40th degrees of north latitude, and was but of a very small extent in longitude, which we shall not pretend to determine, there being a great disagreement among others, as to the boundaries of the inland country.

Cities of Ionia. THE most remarkable cities of Ionia were, Phocæa, now Foggia, built according to Vellerius ^a, by the Ionians, according to Pausanias ^b, by the Phocæans of Greece, and according to Strabo ^c, by the Albenians. Some writers tell us, that while the foundations of this city were laying there appeared near the shore a great shole of sea-calves, whence it was called Phocæa, the word Phoca signifying in Greek a sea-calf. Ptolemy, who makes the river Hermus the boundary between ^b Æolia and Ionia, places Phocæa in Æolis, but all other geographers ^a reckon it among the cities of Ionia. It stood on the sea-coast between Cuma to the north, and Smyrna to the south, not far from the Hermus, and was in former times one of the most wealthy and powerful cities of all Asia, but is now a poor beggarly village, though the see of a bishop. The Phocæans were, as Herodotus ^c informs us, expert mariners, and the first among the Greeks that undertook long voyages, which they performed in gallies of fifty oars. As they applied themselves to trade and navigation they became acquainted pretty early with the coasts and islands of Europe, where they are said to have founded several cities, namely Velia in Italy, Alalia or rather Aleria in Corfica, Marseilles in Gaul, &c. Neither were they ^c unacquainted with Spain; for Herodotus tells us ^e, that in the time of Cyrus the Great, the Phocæans arriving at Sartessus a city in the bay of Cadix, were treated with extraordinary kindness by Arganibonius king of that country, who hearing that they were under no small apprehension of the growing power of Cyrus, invited them to leave Ionia, and settle in what part of his kingdom they pleased. The

^a VELLERIUS. l. 1. ^b PAUSAN. l. 7. ^c STRAB. l. 14. ^d POMP. MELA. l. 1. c. 17. PLIN. l. 5. c. 29. STRAB. l. 14. HERODOT. l. 1. c. 142. ^e HERODOT. l. 1. ^f Idem, ibid. MARCELLIN. l. 15. JUSTIN. l. 43. ^g Idem, ibid.

- a Phocæans could not be prevailed upon to forsake their country; but accepted of a large sum of money, which that prince generously presented them with to defray the expence of building a strong wall round their city. The wall they built on their return, but it stood them in no stead against the mighty power of Cyrus, whose general Harpagus investing the city with a numerous army, soon reduced it to the utmost extremities. The Phocæans having no hopes of any succour began to capitulate, but the conditions offered by Harpagus, seeming somewhat hard, they begged he would allow them three days to deliberate, and in the mean time withdraw his forces. Harpagus, though not ignorant of their design, complied with their request, and the Phocæans taking advantage of this condescension put their wives, b children and all their most valuable effects on board several vessels which they had ready equipt, and conveyed them safe to the island of Cbios, leaving the Persians in possession of empty walls. Their design was to purchase the Æneſſian islands, which belonged to the Cbians, and settle there: but the Cbians not caring to have them so near, lest they should engross all the trade to themselves as they were a sea-faring people, they put to sea again, and having taken Phocæa their native country by surprize, put all the Persians they found in it to the sword. As they were well apprised that the Persians would resent such inhuman proceedings, they re-imbarked with all expedition, steering their course towards Cyrus now Corfica, where twenty years before they had built the city of Alaria or Calaris. Before they left Phocæa c the second time they uttered most dreadful imprecations against such as should stay behind, binding themselves by a solemn oath never to return till a red-hot ball of iron, which on that occasion they threw into the sea, should appear again unextinguished. However, above half the fleet broke through all these engagements, and returned soon to Phocæa, the Persians, who were desirous the city should be re-peopled, offering a general pardon to such as had been concerned in the massacre. The remaining part arrived safe at Alaria, where they continued five years, infesting the neighbouring seas with piracies, and ravaging the coasts of Italy, Gaul, and Carthage. Hereupon the Tyrrhenians and Carthaginians entering into an alliance against them, fitted out a fleet of 120 sail, with a design to drive them from d Cyrus. The Phocæans not at all dismayed at the sight of so powerful a fleet, engaged them in the sea of Sardinia with half their number, and after a bloody engagement put them to flight. But the victory cost them dear, forty of their ships being sunk, and most of the rest quite disabled (A). Whereupon not finding themselves in a condition to stand a second shock, (and the enemies were preparing to attack them anew) they resolved to abandon the island, and retire with their wives and children to Rhegium; which they did accordingly, but soon left that place, and settled in Ænotria, now Penza, a small island in the Tyrrhenian sea over-against Velia in Lucania, which their ancestors had founded. Those who returned home, lived in subjection either to the Persians or tyrants of their own. Among e the latter we find mention made^a of Laodamas, who attended Darius Hystaspis in his expedition against the Scythians, and of Diomysus, who joining Aristagoras, tyrant of Miletus, and chief author of the Ionian rebellion, retired after the defeat of his country-men first to Phænicea, where he made an immense booty, seizing on all the ships he met with trading to that country. From Phænicea he sailed with immense riches to Sicily, where he committed great depredations on the Carthaginians and Tuscans; but is said never to have molested the *Greeks*¹. In the Roman times the city of Phocæa sided with Antiochus the Great; whereupon it was besieged, taken and plundered by the Roman general, but allowed to live according to its own laws.

^a HERODOT. I. 4. & 6.

¹ Idem. ibid.

(A) Herodotus tells us, that such of the Phocæans as had lost their ships in the engagement fell into the hands of the Carthaginians and Tyrrhenians, who attacked them as they came ashore in their small boats, and put them all to death. As this happened in the territory of Argilla in Tuscia, both the inhabitants and cattle of that district were seized with a dreadful distemper, which obliged the Argyllians to have recourse to the oracle of Delphos, being desirous to atone for the crime they had committed in what manner the god of that place should direct. The oracle enjoined them to commemorate yearly the death of the Phocæans, with great magnificence and gymnastic combats; which they did accordingly, beginning as soon as their deputies returned from Delphos, and were immediately delivered from the raging distemper. Our author adds, that they continued even in his time the same combats, and performed all the other rites which the oracle had prescribed on that occasion (1).

(1) Herodot. I. 1.

In the war, which Aristonicus, brother to Attalus king of Pergamus, stirred up against the Romans, they assisted the former to the utmost of their power, which so displeased the senate, that they commanded the town to be demolished, and the whole race of the Phocæans utterly rooted out. This severe sentence had been put in execution had not the Massilienses, a Phocæan colony interposed, and with much ado asswaged the anger of the senate^k. Pompey declared Phocæa a free city, and restored the inhabitants to all the privileges they had ever enjoyed; whence under the first emperors it was reckoned one of the most flourishing cities of all Asia Minor. This is all we have been able to gather from the antients, touching the particular history of Phocæa.

Smyrna.

Smyrna, called by the Turks Ismyr, is situated on the isthmus of the Ionian peninsula, at the bottom of a bay, to which it gives name, and is reckoned one of the largest and richest cities of the Levant. Smyrna was not at first one of the twelve cities of the Ionian league, so often mentioned by the antients, but was in process of time admitted into that confederacy by means of the Ephesians, who lived, as Strabo^l informs us, for many years in the same district with the Smyrneans. And hence it is that Ephesus is sometimes called Smyrna. Velleius Paterculus^m reckons it among the cities of Æolus, wherein he agrees with *Herodotus*ⁿ, who tells us that Smyrna was built by the Æolians, but afterwards destroyed by the Ionians, who claimed the ground on which the city stood, and all the neighbouring country. Be that as it will, it must have been soon after rebuilt; for the same Herodotus, or whoever else is the author of Homer's life, describes it as a famous emporium in that poet's time, whither merchants resorted from all parts. Pliny^o is of opinion that it was founded by an Amazon named Smyrna; and adds, that it was many ages after rebuilt and embellished by Alexander. What he says of the Amazon is commonly looked upon as quite fabulous, though the present inhabitants pretend that it borrowed its name of an Amazon, who coming into Asia at the head of a female army, possessed herself of this city. Neither was it rebuilt by Alexander, for Strabo, a writer far more exact, informs us^p, that Smyrna four hundred years after it had been destroyed by the Lydians, during which time the Smyrneans lived in villages was begun to be rebuilt by Antigonus, but that Lyfmacchus put the last hand to the work. This new city was built, according to the same writer, twenty furlongs distance from the place where the old city stood; between the castle on the shore, and the present city, as our best modern travellers conjecture^q from the many ruins of edifices, that are still to be seen in that place (B). This new city, as it was most conveniently situated for trade, became in a short time one of the most populous and wealthy of all Asia, as is plain from several inscriptions, in which it is stiled The metropolis, The first and chief city of Asia, The ornament of Ionia, &c.^r But nothing can give us a greater idea of the magnificence of ancient Smyrna, than the description of it we read in Strabo^s. "It is at present, says he, the finest city in Asia. One part of it is built on a hill, but the finest edifices stand on a plain not far from the sea, over-against the temple of Cybele. The streets are the most beautiful that can be, strait, wide, and paved with fine stone. It has many stately buildings, magnificent portico's, majestic temples, a public library, and a convenient harbour, which may be shut up at pleasure". There are still to be seen many vestiges of the ancient grandeur of Smyrna, namely of a marble theatre, which was reckoned the finest in Asia, of a circus, of baths, temples, &c. for the description of which we refer our readers to Le Bruyn, Tournefort, Spon, and other modern travellers. Neither the circus, nor the theatre were built, it seems, in Strabo's time, else he would have mentioned them among the other edifices that

^k Liv. Decad. 4. l. 7. & seq. JUSTIN. l. 37. ^l STRABO l. 14. sub. init. ^m VELL. PATERCUL. l. i. c. 4. ⁿ HERODOT. l. i. c. 194. ^o PLIN. l. 5. c. 29. ^p STRABO l. 14. p. 444. ^q SPON. LE BRUYN. TOURNEFORT. Voyage au Levant; &c. ^r Vide Marmor. Oxon. apud. Pridaux. ^s STRABO. l. 14.

(B) A modern traveller (2) tells us, that many valuable pieces of antiquity have been found there, and mentions four ancient statues that were dug up in that place, while he was at Constantinople, and are still to be seen at Persepolis. Our author adds, that in 1671. an urn was discovered in the same place with this inscription Marcus Fabius, the son of Marcus Fabius, of the Galerian family, deceased Junius, one and twenty years old. Upon opening the urn they discovered the bodies, both of the father and son, lying together in their armour which was still entire.

(2) Le Bruyn voyage au Levant, &c.

a embellished the city. The walls of Smyrna were washed by the Meles, a river of great note in the republic of letters, for Homer is said to have been born near its banks; whence, as the name of his father was unknown, he was called Melesigena. Some writers add ¹, that he composed his inimitable poem in a cave near the spring of this river (C). Under the Roman emperors the city of Smyrna was at the height of its grandeur, and ever courted by them, as it was the finest harbour in Asia, and distinguished with titles, exemptions and privileges above all the cities of Asia, Ephesus alone excepted. Tiberius shewed on all occasions a great esteem for the Smyrneans, and Marcus Aurelius rebuilt their city after it had been almost quite ruined by an earth-quake, and the succeeding emperors heaped such favours on them as raised no small jealousy among the other Greeks of Asia. The Smyrneans on the other hand continued ever faithful to the Romans, and are said to have been the first in Asia that honoured Rome, under the title of Rome the Goddess, with a temple, priests and sacrifices; which they did while Carthage was at the highest pitch of its glory, and Asia in great part possessed by powerful princes, who had not yet experienced the Roman valour.

As to the present city, it is situated on the shore at the foot of a hill which commands the port, and may be justly stiled the centre of trade to the Levant. Its convenient harbour and situation have saved it from undergoing the same fate which most cities in Asia, though formerly of great note, have suffered. The great cities of Sardis so famous in the Greek history, of Pergamus, the capital of a rich kingdom of Ephesus, the metropolis of all Asia are at present but small villages: Thyatira, Philadelphia, Laodicea, &c. are known only by some antient inscriptions; whereas Smyrna, tho' often destroyed by earth-quakes (D), is still one of the richest and most populous cities in the east, being resorted to by all the trading nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa. They reckon in the city fifteen thousand Turks, ten thousand Greeks, eighteen hundred Jews, two hundred Armenians, and as many Franks. Its territory is very fertile and pleasant, abounding chiefly in vines and olive-trees; but the air is not reckoned very wholesome. Smyrna was one of the seven churches mentioned in the revelations, and is the only one that still remains in any reputation.

As for the particular history of the Smyrneans; their city at first belonged to the Æolians, as we have hinted above, but was taken from them by the Ionians in the following manner. A great many of the inhabitants of Colophon, an Ionian city, being driven out on account of a sedition they had raised at home, fled to the Smyrneans, who received them with great kindness, which they requited with the utmost ingratitude. For not long after, while the inhabitants were performing certain religious ceremonies in honour of Bacchus without the walls, they shut the gates, and seized on the city. This alarmed all the Æolians, who hastened to the assistance of their countrymen with what forces they could raise; but the Colophonians being supported by the other cities of Ionia, both parties came to an agreement, whereby it was stipulated, that the Ionians should restore to the Smyrneans all their effects, and the Æolians on their part should quit their claim to the city. The Smyrneans consenting to these conditions were distributed among the other eleven Ionian cities, and allowed to enjoy the same privileges. The Colophonians continued in possessing of Smyrna, which was thenceforth reckoned among the twelve Ionian cities ². It was afterwards taken by Alyattes king of Lydia, and continued subject to the Lydians till the time of Cyrus, by whose general Harpagus it was brought under the Persian yoke, with the other cities of Ionia. The Smyrneans, according to the character Aristides gives them ³, followed their pleasures and lived in great luxury, but, what seldom happens, were at

¹ PAUSAN. Achæic. c. 5.

² HERODOT. l. 1.

³ ARISTID. in Smyrnæ Encomio.

(C) To this alluded Statius (3) when he said in commending Lucan born near the Batis, that the Batis would be one day more famous than the Meles itself, Grato nobilior Meles Batis; and Tibullus (4), when he stiled Homer's poem Meletræ Chærias.

(D) The Greeks of the country count six dreadful Earthquakes, which destroyed the greatest part of the town; and they have a tradition, that it is to be utterly ruined by the seventh, and never after rebuilt (5).

(3) Stat. 2. Syl. carm. 7. vers. 34. supra.

(4) Tibull. l. 4. Eleg. 1. vers. 200.

(5) Le Bruyn, ubi

the same time ready to exert themselves, when called upon, and behaved with a great gallantry (E).

Clazomenæ.

Clazomenæ, now Vourla as is commonly believed, was one of the twelve Ionian cities, and of great note in the flourishing times of Greece. The antient city, as Pausanias * informs us, stood on the continent, and was by the Ionians fortified at a vast expence in order to put a stop to the Persian conquests. But the inhabitants were so terrified after the defeat of Cræsus, and surrender of Sardis, that they abandoned the city on the continent, and withdrew with all their effects to one of the neighbouring islands, where they built the city of Clazomenæ, so often mentioned in the Roman history. Alexander joined it to the continent by a causeway two hundred and fifty paces long †; whence Ptolemy, Strabo, Pliny and most of the antient geographers count it among the cities on the continent. The Romans always treated the inhabitants with great kindness, knowing of what importance their city was for carrying on of their conquests in Asia; for they not only declared them a free people, but moreover put them in possession of the island of Drymusa, and often quarrelled with the princes of Asia on their account ‡. Augustus repaired and embellished their city with many stately buildings, whence on some medals he is stiled the founder of Clazomenæ (E), though this city was without all doubt founded by the Ionians, and from the very beginning one of the Ionian confederacy. Some antiquaries take Clazomenæ for the antient city of Grynium, which gave the epithet of Gryneus to Apollo; for there was in antient times a famous temple of Apollo in the neighbourhood of Clazomenæ; Cybele likewise was one of their chief deities, and also Diana, as we gather from several antient medals and inscriptions. The Clazomenians held out against the Lydians, after most of the other cities of Ionia were reduced by Alyattes, who besieged but could not master Clazomenæ. The Persians got possession of it in the time of Cyrus, who carried all before him, and thought it of such consequence, that they could not be induced to part with it at the famous peace of Antalcidas. Alexander reinstated them in their antient liberty and privileges; which were rather enlarged than diminished by the Romans, whom they assisted on all occasions with great fidelity.

Erithræ.

Erithræ, one of the twelve Ionian cities, is placed by some on the shore over-against the island of Chios, but by Strabo † on the peninsula at the foot of mount Mimas, over-against the islands called by the antients Hippi. Erithræ was the seat of Herophila, one of the *Sybil*s, thence called the Eretbrean ‡. It had a spacious harbour called Cyffus, and a temple of Hercules, which was reckoned one of the most stately edifices of all Asia. Erithræ sided on all occasions with the Romans, who rewarded their fidelity with ample privileges, and considerably enlarged their territory §.

Teos.

Teos, situated on the south side of the Ionian peninsula, was likewise one of the twelve cities. Anacreon was born here, and also Hecateus the historian. The inhabitants abandoning in Anacreon's time their native country, where they were grievously oppressed by the Persians, retired to Thrace, and settled in the city of Abdera ¶, which Timeſus of Clazomenæ had founded (F). They were the only among the Ionians, as Herodotus observes , who preferred banishment to slavery, and are therefore greatly commended by that writer. Some of them returned afterwards to their antient habitation, for in the Roman times the city of Teos was of some note, and well peopled ††. Augustus in several medals is called the founder, which title he may have deserved by repairing and embellishing that as he did most

* PAUSAN. Achaic. c. 3.

† Idem, ibid.

‡ Liv. l. 38. c. 39.

§ STRABO l. 14. p. 443.

¶ PAUSAN. in Phoc. c. 12.

 Liv. l. 35. c. 39.

† STRABO l. 14. p. 443.

• HERODOT.

l. 3. c. 168.

† Liv. l. 37. c. 27.

(E) This gave rise to the proverb Σμυρνᾶν ὡς Τεῖον mentioned by Aristides, and apply'd to such as live luxuriously, but at the same time are brave and courageous.

(F) Mr. Tournefort makes mention of a medal in the king of Prussia's cabinet, with the head of Augustus, and the inscription, Founder of Clazomenæ. Another is to be seen in the French king's cabinet, with the head of Augustus, and on the reverse

ΘΕΑ ΛΙΒΙΑ the Goddess Libia, round the head of Augustus is wrote ΚΑΛΑΖΟΜ.

(F) And hence the saying, Ἀβδῆρας καὶ Τεῖον ἀποικία, Abdera a fine colony of the Teians, signifying that brave men will chuse to live any where rather than suffer oppression and servitude (6). To this saying some think Tully alludes in his epistles to Atticus (7).

(6) Vide Eraf. Chiliad.

(7) Cic. ad Attic. l. 7. & 4.

- a other cities of Asia. Pliny^a counts Teos among the islands, wherein he is contradicted by all the ancient geographers. The small towns of Ere and Myonnesus between Teos and Lebedus were formerly subject to the Teians, who enjoyed a large territory extending from their city to the neighbourhood of Lebedus.

Lebedus, counted by Mela, Strabo and Herodotus among the twelve Ionian cities, Lebedus stood on the isthmus of the Ionian peninsula over-against Smyrna, and was famous in ancient times for the sports that were there yearly performed in honour of Bacchus. Lyfimachus utterly ruined the city, and transferred the inhabitants to Ephesus^b. Upon his death they left Ephesus and rebuilt Lebedus, which however never afterwards made any figure, being a village rather than a city^c.

- b Colophon, now Altobosco, or as others will have it Belvedere, was one of the chief Colophon cities of the Ionian League, seated on the coast, and not an inland city, as Pliny^k calls it. It was destroyed by Lyfimachus, and the inhabitants sent to people Ephesus; but after his death rebuilt in a more convenient situation. The Colophonians were so skilled in horsemanship, that those they sided with were always sure of the victory, which gave rise to the trite proverb^l (G). Colophon was the birth-place of Nicanor, and one of the seven cities that claimed Homer, who lived there some time as Herodotus informs in the life of that great poet^m. The ancients mention a famous grove and temple of Apollo Clarius in the neighbourhood of this cityⁿ. Whence that fabulous deity borrowed the epithet of Clarius is uncertain, some pretending that his temple stood in a small town near Colophon called Claros, and others maintaining that he was so called from a mountain bearing that name. The small town of Notium on the same coast often mentioned by Livy, belonged to the Colophonians, and was by the Romans allowed to enjoy the same privileges as Colophon itself^o.

Ephesus, called by the present inhabitants Aiasaloue, was in former times the me- Ephesus tropolis of all Asia. Stephanus gives it the title of Epiphanestate, or most illustrious, Pliny styles it the ornament of Asia, and Strabo the greatest and most frequented emporium of that continent. How different was the ancient Ephesus from the modern, which is but a sorry village inhabited by thirty or forty Greek families, who are not capable, as Spon observes, to understand the epistle St. Paul wrote to them!

- d The ancient city stood about fifty miles south of Smyrna near the mouth of the river Cayster, and the shore of the Icarian sea, which is a bay of the Ægean; but as it has been so often destroyed and rebuilt, 'tis no easy matter to determine the precise place; most of our modern travellers are of opinion that the ancient city stood more to the south than the present, which they argue from the ruins that still remain. Ephesus was in ancient times known by the names of Alopes, Ortygia, Morges, Smyrna, Trachæa, Samornion and Ptela^p; it was called Ephesus, according to Heracides^q from the Greek word Ephesus, signifying permission, because Hercules, says he, permitted the Amazons to live and build a city in that place; others tell us that Ephesus was the name of the Amazon that founded the city, for Pliny^r, Justin^s, and Orosius^t unanimously affirm that it was built by an Amazon, while others bestow this honour upon Androclus, son of Colrus, king of Aibens, who was the chief of the Ionians that settled in Asia. But in matters of so early a date, it is impossible to come at the truth, and therefore not worth our while to dwell on such fruitless enquiries. What we know for certain is, that the city, which in the Roman times was the metropolis of all Asia, acknowledged Lyfimachus for its founder; for that prince having caused the ancient city to be entirely demolished, rebuilt at a vast expence a new one in a place more convenient and nearer the temple. Strabo tells us, that as the inhabitants shewed a great reluctance to quit their ancient habitations, Lyfimachus caused all the drains that conveyed the water into the neighbouring fens and the Cayster, to be privately stoppt up; whereby the city being on the first violent rains in great part laid under water, and many of the inhabitants drowned, they were glad to abandon the ancient, and retire to the new city. This new Ephesus was greatly damaged by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, but by that emperor repaired and embellished with several
- e
- f

^a PLIN. l. v. c. 31. ^b PAUSAN. Attic. c. 9. ^c Vide HORATIUM, l. i. epist. 11. ^d PLIN. l. v. c. 29. ^e STRABO l. xiv. p. 442. ^f HERODOT. vita Homeri, c. 8. ^g PLIN. l. v. c. 29 STRAB. l. xiv. c. 442. ^h Liv. l. xxxviii. c. 39. ⁱ PLIN. l. v. c. 29. ^j HERACLID. de Polit. ^k PLIN. ubi supra. ^l JUSTIN. l. ii. ^m OROSIUS, l. i. c. 15.

(G) Τὸν κολοφῶνα ἐπέθηκεν, Colophonem addere, that is to put the last hand to a work, to end it with success.

stately buildings, of which there are now but few ruins to be seen, and scarce any a thing worthy of ancient Ephesus. The aqueduct, part of which is still standing, is generally believed to have been the work of the Greek emperors; the pillars, which support the arches, are of fine marble, and higher or lower as the level of the water required. This aqueduct served to convey water into the city from the spring of Haltee mentioned by Pausanias. The gate, now called by the inhabitants, for what reason we know not, the gate of persecution, is remarkable for three bas-reliefs on the mould of an exquisite taste. The port, of which so many medals have been struck, is at present but an open road, and not much frequented. The Cayster was formerly navigable, and afforded a safe place for ships to ride in, but is now almost choked up with sand.

The temple of Diana.

BUT the chief ornament of Ephesus was the so much celebrated temple of Diana, built at the common charge of all the states in Asia, and for its structure, size and furniture, accounted among the wonders of the world. This great edifice was situate at the foot of a mountain, and at the head of a marsh, which place they chose, if we believe Pliny, as less subject to earthquakes. This doubled the charges, for they were obliged to be at a vast expence in making drains to convey the water that came down the hill, into the morass and the Cayster. Philo Byzantius tells us, that in this work they used such a quantity of stone, as almost emptied all the quarries in the country; and these drains or vaults are what the present inhabitants take for a labyrinth. To secure the foundation of the conduits or sewers, which were to bear a building of such a prodigious weight, they laid beds of charcoal, says Pliny, well rammed, and upon them others of wool. Two hundred and twenty years, Pliny says four hundred ^p, were spent in building this wonderful temple by all Asia. It was four hundred and twenty-five feet in length, and two hundred in breadth, supported by a hundred and twenty-seven marble pillars seventy feet high, of which twenty-seven were most curiously carved, and the rest polished. These pillars were the works of so many kings, and the bas-reliefs of one were done by Scopas the most famous sculptor of antiquity; the altar was almost wholly the work of Praxiteles. Cheironocrates, who built the city of Alexandria, and offered to form mount Atbos into a statue of Alexander, was the architect employed on this occasion. The temple enjoyed the privilege of an asylum, which at first extended to a furlong, was afterwards enlarged by Mitridates to a bow-shot, and doubled by Marc Anthony, so that it took in part of the city; but Tiberius, to put a stop to the many abuses and disorders that attend privileges of this kind, recalled them all, and declared that no man guilty of any wicked or dishonest action should escape justice, though he fled to the altar itself (H). A great many medals are to be seen with the heads of divers emperors, and on the reverse the temple with a frontispiece of two, four, six, and even of eight pillars.

THE priests, who officiated in this temple, were had in great esteem, and trusted with the care of sacred virgins or priestesses, but not till they were made eunuchs. They were called Estiatores and Essenæ, had a particular diet, and were not allowed by their constitutions to go into any private house. They were maintained with the profits accruing from the lake Selinusius, and another that fell into it, which must have been very considerable, since they erected a golden statue to one Artemidorus, who being sent to Rome recovered them, after they had been seized by the farmers of the public revenues ^q. All the Ionians resorted yearly to Ephesus with their wives and children, where they solemnized the festival of Diana with great pomp and magnificence ^r, making on that occasion rich offerings to the goddess, and not forgetting her priests. The Asarchæ mentioned by St. Luke ^s were, according to Beza ^t, those priests, whose peculiar province it was to regulate the public sports f

^p PLIN. l. xvi. c. 40.
ad Acta.

^q STRAB. ubi supra.

^r THUCYD. l. iii.

^s LUKE Act. 16.

^t Anno.

(H) Pope Pius II. in relating this observes, that the many sanctuaries of Rome open to ruffians, and all offenders without distinction have changed that city, otherwise quiet, into a den of thieves (8). Thus he wrote before he was raised to the papal chair: but that dignity inspired him, it seems, with different sentiments, for he was the whole time of his pontificate a most strenuous asserter of what they call the Ecclesiastical immunity.

(8) Pius secutus in Asia.

- a that were annually performed at Ephesus in honour of Diana; they were maintained with the gatherings that were made during the sports, for all Asia flocked to see them. The great Diana of the Ephesians, as she was stiled by her blind adorers^a, was according to Pliny a small statue of ebony, made by one Canetia, though commonly believed to have been sent down from heaven by Jupiter. This statue was at first placed in a niche, which, as we are told, the Amazons caused to be made in the trunk of an elm. Such was the first rise of the veneration that was paid to Diana in this place. In process of time the veneration for the goddess daily encreasing among the inhabitants of Asia, a most stately and magnificent temple was built near the place where the elm stood, and the statue of the goddess placed
- b in it. This was the first temple, but not quite so sumptuous as that which we have described, though reckoned as well as the second among the wonders of the world. The second was still remaining in Pliny's time, and in Strabo's, and is supposed to have been destroyed in the reign of Constantine, pursuant to the edict by which that emperor commanded all the temples of the heathens to be thrown down and demolished; the former was burnt, the same day that Alexander was born, by one Erostratus, who owned on the rack that the only thing which had prompted him to destroy so excellent a work was the desire of transmitting his name to future ages. Whereupon the common council of Asia made a decree forbidding any one to name him; but this prohibition served only to make his name more memorable, such
- c a remarkable extravagance or rather madness being taken notice of by all the historians who have wrote of those times. Alexander offered to rebuild the temple at his own expence, provided the Ephesians would agree to put his name on the front; but they rejected his offer in such a manner as was no ways taken amiss by that vain prince, telling him, that it was not fit one god should build a temple to another^a. The pillars and other materials that had been saved out of the flames were sold, and also the jewels of the Ephesian women, who on that occasion willingly parted with them, and the sum raised from thence served for the carrying on of the work till other contributions came in, which in a short time amounted to an immense treasure. And this is the temple which Pliny, Strabo, and other Roman writers speak of. It stood between the city and the port, and was built, or rather finished, as Livy^b tells us, in the reign of king Servius. Of this wonderful structure there is nothing at present remaining but some ruins, and a few broken pillars.

- THE Ionians first settled at Ephesus under the conduct of Androclus, who drove out the Carians and Leleges, by whom those places were possessed at his arrival. The city, whether built by him, as Strabo affirms, or by one Cresus or Ephesus long before the Ionic migration, as others maintain, became soon the metropolis of Ionia. It was at first governed by Androclus, and his descendants, who assumed the royal title, and exercised regal authority over the new colony; whence even in Strabo's
- c time the posterity of Androclus were stiled kings, and allowed to wear a scarlet robe, a sceptre, and all the ensigns of the royal dignity. In process of time a new form of government was introduced, and a senate established, but when or on what occasion this change happened we know not. This kind of government continued till the time of Pythagoras, who lived before Cyrus the Great, and was one of the most cruel and inhuman tyrants we read of in history; for having driven out the senate, and taken all the power into his own hands, he filled the city with blood and rapines, not sparing even those who fled to the temple of Diana for shelter^a. Pythagoras was succeeded by Pindarus, who bore the same sway in the city, but treated the citizens with more humanity. In his time Ephesus being besieged
- f by Cresus king of Lydia, he advised the inhabitants to devote their city to Diana, and fasten the wall by a rope to the pillars of her temple. They followed his advice, and were in regard of the goddess not only treated with great kindness by Cresus, but restored to their former liberty^a. Pindarus being obliged to resign his power, retired to Peloponnesus. He was, according to Ælian^b, grandson to Ayattes king of Lydia, and Cresus's nephew. The other tyrants of Ephesus mentioned in history are Athenagoras, Comas, Aristarchus, and Hegeſias, of which the last was driven out by Alexander, who coming to Ephesus after having defeated the Persians on the banks of the Granicus, bestowed upon Diana all the tributes which the Ephesians had paid to the Persians, and established a democracy in the city: In the war between Milbrides and the Romans they sided with the former, and by his direction massacred all the Romans that resided in their city; for which they were severely fined and reduced almost to beggary by Sylla, but afterwards treated kindly, and suffered to live according to their own laws, as is plain from several ancient inscriptions and medals (I). The Ephesians were mightily given to superstition, sorcery, and curious arts, as the scripture styles them^e, whence came the proverb Ephesian letters, signifying all sorts of spells or charms (K).

^a AR. 19. 17. 18. ^b PLIN. l. xix. c. 4. ^c STRAB. ubi supra. ^d LIV. l. i. c. 45. ^e SUIDAS.
^f HERODOT. l. i. POLYÆN. l. vii. ÆLIAN. V. H. l. iii. c. 26. ^g ÆLIAN. ubi supra.

Priene.

Priene was one of the ancient cities of Ionia, and the birth-place of Bias one of the seven wise men. Ptolemy places it at a great distance from the sea, but all other geographers count it among the maritime towns of Ionia.

Miletus.

Miletus, now Palatschia, was formerly a city of great note, being styled by Pliny^d and Pomponius Mela^e, the first city and metropolis of all Ionia. The same Pliny^f mentions the ancient and new Miletus, the former he calls Lelegeis, Pilbyssa, and Anastoria, and Strabo tells us that it was built by the inhabitants of Crete^g. The latter was founded according to Strabo^h, by Nelus the son of Codrus king of Athens, when he first settled on that part of Asia. This great city stood on the south side of the river Meander near the sea-coast. The inhabitants applied themselves very early to navigation, having founded according to *Pliny*ⁱ eighty, according to Seneca^k three hundred and eighty colonies in different parts of the world. The city itself was no less famous for a temple and oracle of Apollo surnamed Didymus,^c than for the wealth and number of its citizens. This temple was burnt by Xerxes, but rebuilt by the Milesians to such an immense size, that it was accounted the greatest in the world, being equal in compass, as Strabo attests^l, to a village; whence it remained uncovered, but was surrounded with a thick grove, in which the priests dwelt who served the temple. Pliny places this temple and grove at a hundred and fifty-eight furlongs distance from the city, but Strabo says that it stood near the walls^m. Our modern travellers tell us, that there are still large ruins of the temple to be seen, but that the town is reduced to a few shepherds cottages. Near Miletus stood mount Latmus, where the moon, as the poets feigned, made her private visits to Endymion. Thales, one of the seven wise men of Greece, and the first that foretold an eclipse of the sun, was born in this city, and thence surnamed the Milesian, to distinguish him from a famous Lyric poet bearing the same name.^d

Miletus was in a most flourishing condition in the time of Darius Hystaspis, and accounted the ornament of Ionia, as Herodotus informs usⁿ, though it had been strangely afflicted with domestic troubles for two generations before, and almost reduced to the last extremities. Their differences were at last composed, as the same writer informs us^o, by the Parians, whom they had chosen from among all the Greeks for that purpose. These arriving at Miletus, and observing that the fields round the city lay in great part uncultivated, told the Milesians that they designed to survey their whole country; which they did accordingly, writing down the name of the owner where-ever they saw in that desolate country any portion of land well cultivated. After they had thus viewed the whole territory, and found but a very small part of it well kept, they returned to the city, and having called an assembly, put the government into the hands of those whose lands they had found in good condition; not doubting but they would administer the public affairs with the same care which they had taken of their own. They strictly enjoined the

^c ACT xix. 19. ^d PLIN. l. v. 29. ^e MELA, l. i. c. 17. ^f PLIN. ibid. ^g STRAB. l. xii. & xiv. ^h STRAB. ubi supra. ⁱ PLIN. ibid. ^k SENECA de Consul. ad Albinam. ^l STRAB. ubi supra. ^m PLIN. & STRAB. ubi supra. ⁿ HERODOT. l. v. ^o Idem, ibid.

(I) Among others we find one of Vespasian with this remarkable inscription: ΕΦΕΣΙΩΝ ΠΡΩΤΩΝ ΑΣΙΑΣ ΤΗΣ ΙΕΡΑΣ ΚΑΙ ΑΥΤΟΝΟΜΟΥ.

(K) By the Ephesian letters were meant certain obscure words, and incoherent sentences, which superstitious bigots used to write on their girdles, and even imprint on their feet, and other parts of their bodies. To this purpose Suidas tells us, that a famous wrestler of Miletus having for a long time struggled with an Ephesian without being able to conquer him, observed at last that his adversary, who had already got the better of thirty robust and expert wrestlers, was armed with the Ephesian letters, which he was no sooner deprived of than he fell to the ground owning himself conquered (9).

(9) Vide Erasmi Chil.

- a rest of the Milesians, who till that time had been rent into parties and factions, to obey the magistrates they had appointed, and in this manner reformed the state of the city ^r, which thenceforth daily increased in wealth and power. In the time of Psammiticus, king of Egypt, a colony of Milesians settled in that country, and built a wall, as Strabo tells us, called by the Egyptians the Milesian wall ^t. We may judge of the wealth, power, and flourishing condition of Miletus in those days, from the long and expensive war which they maintained against Gyges, Archys, Sadyattes, and Halyattes, kings of Lydia, without being assisted by any of the Ionians, except the Chians, whom they had supported against the Erythraeans. In what manner this war was carried on, and how Halyattes was at last obliged to sue for peace, we have already related in the history of Lydia ^u. After the defeat of Croesus, and taking of Sardis, all the Ionians sent ambassadors to Cyrus, offering to submit to him on the same terms which had been granted them by Croesus; but that prince rejecting the proposals of the others, admitted the Milesians alone on the foot of their former agreement with the Lydians. By this indulgence of Cyrus, Miletus flourished above all the cities of Ionia, till it fell into the hands of Hystieus, and Aristagoras, who brought ruin not only on their own country, but on all Ionia; for Miletus was besieged, taken, and laid in ashes by the Persians, whom they had provoked, and the inhabitants transferred first to Susa, and thence to Ampe, a city on the red sea, not far from the mouth of the Tigris. The Athenians were so grieved at their
- c misfortune, that they mourned and shed tears when they first heard it, no otherwise than if the like calamity had happened to Athens itself; and some time after, one Phrynichus, a dramatic poet, having wrote a tragedy on the destruction of Miletus, the whole theatre burst out into tears when it was exhibited, and the magistrate fined the author in a thousand drachmas for renewing the memory of a misfortune, which they looked upon as their own, ordering at the same time that the piece should never more be acted ^v. The Persians having thus utterly ruined Miletus, and transplanted the inhabitants, the lands about the town and level country they reserved for themselves, but bestowed the hilly and less fruitful parts on the Carians of Pedaeis. This misfortune befel Miletus six years after the revolt of Aristagoras,
- d in the reign of Darius Hystaspis, and had been long before foretold, if we believe Herodotus, by the oracle of Apollo Didymus (L). However, the Milesians were suffered afterwards to return and rebuild their city, which they did in a different place from that of the former, as we conjecture from the prediction of Thales, related by Plutarch ^w; for that philosopher desired his body might be buried in an abandoned and solitary place at some distance from the city, saying that it would one day become the market-place of the Milesians. The inhabitants never afterwards recovered their former power; for we find them eight years before the Peloponnesian war contending with the Samians for the sovereignty of Priene, and obliged to call in the Athenians to their assistance, for which piece of service they sided with them in the
- e Peloponnesian war, till they were persuaded by Alcibiades, then in banishment, to join the Lacedaemonians ^x. In the time of Cyrus the younger, they attempted to shake off the Persian yoke, and join that prince against his brother Artaxerxes; but Tissaphernes, governor of that province, having timely notice of their design, put some of the chief conspirators to death, banished others, and reduced the city to a miserable state of slavery. At the famous peace of Antalcidas, it was given up to the Persians, and remained subject to them till the time of Alexander, who restored them to their ancient liberty, notwithstanding they had shut their gates against him, and did not submit till reduced to the last extremities ^y. By the Romans they were treated very kindly, and suffered to enjoy their liberty, especially under the emperors.

^r Idem ibid.
in Solon.

^s STRABO l. xvii.
^t TRUCYD. l. i. iv. viii.

^u Vol. II.

^v HERODOT. l. vi.

^w PLUTARCH.

^x STRAB. l. xiv. & PLUT. in Alexandro.

(L) That author tells us (10), that the Argians having consulted the oracle touching the fate of their city, received a double answer partly concerning themselves, and partly the Milesians; the answer relating to the Milesians was uttered in the following terms: " Miletus, source of evils, thy stores " and wealth shall serve to feast and enrich a mul" titude; men with long hair shall sit and have " their feet washed by thy virgins; Didyma shall " see her altars transferred to another place." What the oracle is said to have foretold was fulfilled; for the greater part of the men were put to the sword by the Persians, who wore long hair; the women and children were made slaves, and the temple in Didyma with the grove and oracle reduced to ashes.

(10) Herodot. l. vi.

THE Milesians, like the other states of Ionia, when free from a foreign yoke, were often reduced to a miserable state of slavery by tyrants of their own, who governed them with an arbitrary sway, and made them feel all the evils of a foreign subjection. The first, who usurped this power over their fellow-citizens, were Thoas and Damascenor, who, as Plutarch informs us^a, filled the city with blood and slaughter, and spared none but such as submitted to their usurped authority. These being destroyed or driven out, Thraſybulus usurped the sovereignty, which he maintained to his death. In his time and by his means an end was put to the war, which had been for many years carried on between the Lydians and Milesians, as we have related at length in the history of *Lydia*¹. He was so famous for his prudence in the administration of public affairs, that most of the petty tyrants of Greece courted his friendship, and governed themselves in their unjust usurpations by his advice. Among these, Periander, tyrant of Corinth, is said to have dispatched a messenger to him, to inquire what methods he had pursued in so settling his authority among the Milesians, that none of the citizens entertained any thoughts of shaking off the yoke which he had imposed upon them. Thraſybulus, unwilling to send an answer either in writing or by word of mouth, took the slave into a corn-field, and there, as it were by way of amusement, struck off all the ears of corn that overtopped the rest. Then he sent back the messenger without any answer. Periander understood the hint, put all those to death whose overgrown power gave him any umbrage, and thereby enjoyed without disturbance, the authority he had usurped^c. Upon the death of Thraſybulus, several other tyrants rose up, mentioned by Herodotus^a, Plutarch^b, and other writers^c. Among these the most famous in history, are Hyſtæus and Aristagoras, who in attempting to shake off the yoke of the Persian kings, by whom they were supported, brought utter destruction upon all the Greek colonies in Asia, as we have related at length in the history of Persia^d. In the time of Antiochus II. king of Syria, we read of one Timarchus, reigning in Miletus, and practising great cruelties on the citizens, till he was driven out by that prince, who was on that account honoured by the Milesians with the surname of Theos or God^e. Miletus gave birth to the celebrated philosophers, Anaximander, Anaximenes, and Thales. The islands of Cbios and Samos were likewise inhabited by the Ionians, and belonged to their confederacy; but we shall have occasion to speak of them in the following chapter, containing the history of the Greek islands.

Description of Æolis.

Æolis, so called from the Æolians, who settled in this part of Asia, extended, according to Strabo^f, from the promontory Leſtus to the river Hermus, and contained the following cities, Cyme, Lariſſa, Neontichus, Tenus, Cylla, Notion, Ægiroſſa, Pitane, Ægea, Myrina, and in more ancient times Smyrna, which, as we have related above, was taken from the Æolians by the Ionians. These are the eleven ancient cities of Æolis, mentioned by Herodotus^g. Cyme stood on the sea-coast, and was the last of the maritime cities of Æolis towards Ionia. Lariſſa belongs properly to Troas, and is placed by Strabo^h between Acbeum and Colone. In former times Æolis comprehended all Troas, and extended along the coast from Ionia to the Propontis. Neontichus, or Neon-Tichos, is mentioned by *Thucydides*ⁱ as situate in the country of the Apodoti, who were a peculiar tribe of Æolians, inhabiting the sea-coast^k. Tenus, called also Temnos, is placed by Pliny at the mouth of the Hermus, but by all other geographers in the inland parts of Æolis. Cylla was a colony of the Æolians on the sea-coast of Mysia. Notium stood on the sea-side about two miles from Cilophon^l, and was in after-ages subject to the Colophonians. Authors do not agree about the precise situation of Ægiroſſa, some placing it on the coast, and others at a great distance from the sea. Pitane was a considerable town not far from the mouth of the Caicus^m. The inhabitants of this city are said to have had the art of making bricks that floated, like wood, upon the water. Ægea or Æga, bordered on the territory of Cyme, and is counted by *Strabo*ⁿ among the mediterranean cities of Æolis. Myrina, the most ancient city of all Æolis, stood on the coast, and had a very safe and capacious harbour. It was in after-ages called Sebastopolis in honour of Augustus. To these Pliny, Strabo,

^a PLUT. in Prolem. ^y Hist. Univer. p. 334. ^z ARISTOT. Politic. l. iii. c. 10. POLYÆN. l. vi. ZONAR. tom. 2. FRONTINUS, l. ii. c. 15. ^a HERODOT. l. iv, v, vi. ^b PLUT. in Sympoſ. ^c POLYÆN. l. i. TZETZES Chiliad. 3 & 9. PROBUS in Militiad. ^d Vide, p. 107, 108, 109. ^e APPIAN. in Syriac. Prolog. in Trogum, l. xxvi. ^f STRAB. l. xiii. ^g HERODOT. l. i. c. 149. ^h STRAB. l. xiii. HERODOT. l. i. ⁱ THUCYD. l. viii. ^k Idem, l. iii. ^l LIV. l. xxxvii. ^m STRAB. l. xiii. ⁿ Idem, ibid.

^a and Pomponius Mela, add Grynium and Elea; the former was about forty furlongs distant from Myrina, and famous for a temple and grove consecrated to Apollo, whence the surname of Gryneus is often given by the poets to that deity^{*}; the latter which was the port of Pergamus, and the birth-place of Zeno the philosopher, stood near the mouth of the Caicus[†]. Cyme, or as others write it, Cuma, was the metropolis of all Æolis.

Doris, properly so called, was that large promontory of Caria, which runs into Doris. the sea over-against the island of Telos. The chief cities of Doris were; Halicarnassus formerly the capital of Caria, and famous for the Mausoleum or tomb built by queen Artemisia, in honour of her husband Mausolus, which was of so noble a structure, that the ancients looked upon it as one of the wonders of the world.

^b This city gave birth to the two celebrated historians, Herodotus and Diomysius, and to the poets Heracitus and Callimachus. It stood between the Cemarc and Jasian bays, and was reckoned one of the strongest cities of Asia[‡]. It is now a heap of ruins, and known by the name of Nesi. Cnidus stood on the sea called Triopium[§], having on the north the Ceramic, or as others call it, the Ceraunian bay, and on the south the Rhodian sea. This city was formerly famous for the Venus of Praxiteles; and as Venus was the tutelar goddess of the place, she is thence often stiled by the poets, the Cnidian goddess[¶]. Lindus, Jalissus, and Camirus, were likewise cities of the Dorians, as Herodotus informs us, but we find nothing relating to them worth mentioning^{||}.

^c THAT the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians, who settled in Asia Minor, were Origin of the Greek nations, is not to be doubted. Profane writers give us the following account Ionians, Do- of their origin, and first settling on the coast of Asia. Deucalion, say they, who tians, and reigned in Thessaly, and is famous for the flood that happened in his Time, had by Æolians. his wife Pyrrha two sons, Helenus and Amphictyon. Helenus, who is supposed to have given the name of Helenes to the Greeks, had three sons, Æolus, Dorus, and Xuthus. Æolus, who was the eldest, succeeded his father, and besides Thessaly had for his share Locris and Bæotia. Many of his descendants went into Peloponnesus, with Pelops the son of Tantalus, king of Phrygia, and settled in Laconia. The country ^d in the neighbourhood of mount Parnassus fell to Dorus, and was from him called Doris. Xuthus being obliged by his brothers to quit his native country for appropriating part of his father's effects to himself without their knowledge, retired to Attica, where he married the daughter of Erectheus, king of Athens, by whom he had two sons, Achæus and Ion.

AN involuntary murder committed by Achæus, obliged him to retire to Peloponnesus, which was then called Ægialea, or Ægialos; but the country, where he settled, ever after bore the name of Achaia. Some writers tell us, that he afterwards left Achaia, and recovered his grandfather's kingdom in Thessaly. Ion commanded the Athenian forces against Eumolpus the Thracian, who had invaded Attica, and so distinguished himself on that occasion, that the Athenians intrusted him with the government of their city, and were from that time called also Ionians. Though in process of time they thought fit to lay aside this name, yet it was not altogether out of use in the time of Theseus, as appears from the pillar erected by him in the Isthmus, to shew the bounds of the Athenians on one side, and the Peloponnesians on the other; on the east side of the pillar was this inscription; This is not Peloponnesus, but Ionia, and on the south side; This is not Ionia, but Peloponnesus^{*}. In the time that Ion governed Athens, the citizens increased to such a degree, that their country, being not only unfruitful, but confined within narrow bounds, was no longer able to furnish them with necessary provisions. This forced them to contrive some means to disburden it, and ^f therefore they sent colonies to settle in Peloponnesus, and these gave the name of Ionia to that part which they possessed. Thus all the inhabitants of Peloponnesus, though composed of different nations, were blended under the general names of Achæans and Ionians[†].

ABOUT fourscore years after the taking of Troy, the Heraclide, or descendants of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, with a design to recover that country, which of right belonged to them. They were conducted in this enterprize by three chief leaders, the sons of Aristomachus, namely Timenes, Cressbontes, and Aristodemus; the last dying before the reduction of the country, his two sons Eurythbenes and Procles, succeeded him. The expedition proved successful, and the Heracleidae, having recovered the possession of their ancient dominions, divided them among themselves; in which division Argos fell to Timenes, Messenia to Cressbontes, and Laconia to the two sons of Aristodemus.

^{*} Vide Virgil eclog. 6. & l. 4. Æneid. vers. 345. [†] STRABO, l. 13. [‡] ARRIAN. l. 1. exped. Alexandr. [§] HORAT. l. 3. ode 28. [¶] HERODOT. l. 1. ^{||} PLUT. in These. ^{||} PAUSAN. in Lacon. & Eliac. 1. ERATOST. apud CLEM. ALEX. Strom. Apoll. l. 2.

SUCH of the Acheans as were descended from Æolus, and had inhabited Laconia, being driven from thence by the Dorians, who attended the Heracleidae into Peloponnesus, settled in that part of Asia Minor, which from them took the name of Æolis, and built there Smyrna, with eleven other cities; but Smyrna, as we have related above, was afterwards seized by the Ionians. From Æolis they sent colonies to the island of Lesbos, and there founded several cities. The Acheans of Mycene and Argos being expelled by the Heracleidae, seized upon that part of Peloponnesus, which was held by the Ionians. The latter at first returned to Athens, their original country, and soon after departed from thence under the conduct of Nileus and Androcles, the two sons of Codrus, and possessed themselves of the western coast of Asia Minor, lying between Caria and Lydia, which from them was named Ionia. There they built the cities, which we have described above.

THE power of the Athenians, who were then governed by Codrus, increasing daily, the Heracleidae thought proper to oppose their progress, but were defeated in a general engagement. Notwithstanding this overthrow they maintained themselves in possession of Megaris, where they built the city of Megara, placing there the Dorians, who had assisted them, in the room of the Ionians, whom they had driven out. Of these Dorians some continued in Megara, after the death of Codrus, others passed over into Crete; but the greatest part, being perpetually harassed by the Athenians, abandoning their country, settled in that part of Asia Minor, which was from them called Doris, and built there Halicarnassus, Cnidus, and the other cities mentioned above. The Ionic migration is said by all chronologers, except Eusebius and his followers, to have happened an hundred and forty years after the taking of Troy, and sixty after the return of the Heracleidae into Peloponnesus, that is, about seven hundred and ninety four before the Christian era. The Æolic migration proceeded the Ionic about fifty-two years, and that of the Dorians was posterior to the Ionic near seventy.

THIS is the account, which profane writers give us of these migrations; but their authority in matter of so remote a date, is not much to be depended on. There were scarce any records in those rude and illiterate ages, even among the Greeks; whence they have obscured their origin with idle tales, and poetical fictions, there being scarce any thing related by their historians, concerning their origin that deserves credit, or carries in it the least appearance of truth. Others, perhaps, upon better grounds, take the Ionians to be descended from Javan, the fourth son of Japhet; and indeed the Greek translators of the holy scripture instead of Javan, read Jevan, and those who are by other writers called Iones, are by Homer named Jaones. Now Javan and Jaon sound so like each other, that one may conclude they were the same. This opinion receives no small confirmation from holy writ, where the name of Javan is used for Greece (M). Javan is said to have come into Greece after the confusion of Babel, and to have settled in Attica, whence the Attica were named Jaones and Iones. This name the inhabitants of Attica, as we have observed above, laid aside, but these who passed into Asia retained the same appellation. According to this opinion the Ionians were a colony from Attica; but Hecataeus, as quoted by Strabo, tells us, that the Athenians or Iones of Greece were a colony

W STRABO l. 8. 383. &c. PAUSAN. l. 7. p. 396. &c.
SAN. in Achaic. Y STRABO ubi supra, p. 393.
206. ÆLIAN. l. 8. Var. c. 5. A STRABO l. 13.

* ÆLIAN. Var. Hist. l. 1. c. 5. PAU-
* Idem ibid. p. 653. PAUSAN. Achaic. p.

(M) Two instances we have in Daniel: And when I am gone forth, behold the prince of Grecia shall come (11). And again, He shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia (12). Where though the vulgar translators do not render it Javan, yet that is the word in the original. And in Ishaiab: And I will send those that escape of them to the nations in the sea, in Italy, and in Greece. Where the Septuagint version and that of Geneva retain the Hebrew words, using the names of Tubal and Javan, instead of Italy and Greece.

(11) Daniel c. x. ver. 20.

(12) Idem c. xi. v. 2.

a of those in Asia. As the parts of Asia possessed by the Greeks lie directly in the way from the valley of Shinaar into Greece, it is not without foundation that some have believed Javan to have first settled in Asia, and from thence, not having room enough on the coast, to have sent colonies into Greece, at that time uninhabited, under the conduct of his eldest son Elisba, who founded, according to them, the city of Elis, in Peloponnesus. From Elisba Josephus supposes the Æolians to be descended, and therefore calls them Elisæi b.

THE Ionians, Æolians and Dorians were at first governed by kings, and divided Their Govern- into many petty kingdoms, the monarchical form of government prevailing, at the ment. time of their migration, all over Greece. Besides, Herodotus tells us in express terms, that some of the Ionians chose only Lycian kings of the race of Glaucus, b others such only as were sprung from Codrus, and that some indifferently raised to the throne princes of either of these families c. But the actions and very names of their kings are buried in oblivion. Monarchy gave way to a republican government, which was settled in almost all the Greek cities of Asia Minor, each of them being governed by their own laws, and no ways dependent on one another. However in most of these states some private citizens, without any right to the throne, either by birth or election, endeavoured to advance themselves to it by cabal, treachery and violence, sacrificing to their own security all those, whom merit, rank and zeal for their liberty or love of their country rendered obnoxious to them. It was this c cruel and inhuman treatment that rendered these usurpers so odious to the people, and furnished such ample matter for the declamation of orators, and the tragical representations of the theatre.

THE Ionians on their arrival in Asia, divided themselves into twelve small states or cantons, having been thus divided, while they inhabited Peloponnesus, as were afterwards the Acheans who drove them out. Of these twelve states consisted the Ionian confederacy so often mentioned by the ancients. The chief and most powerful city of the whole confederacy was Miletus. To those we have already described, Thucydides adds the cities of the islands of Lemnos and Imbros d, and Velleius e, those of Delos, Paros, Andros, Tenos, which were all, according to that writer, peopled by the Ionians. Some of the cities we have mentioned were built by the Ionians, others they possessed themselves of after driving out the ancient proprietors. As they brought no women with them out of Greece, they forced those of Caria away from their parents, putting to death such of their relations as opposed them; in revenge of which violence and cruelty the Carian women bound themselves by an oath, which they transmitted as sacred to their daughters, never to take any repast with their husbands, or call them by their names f. The Ionians being thus established in the most fruitful and pleasant part of all Asia, their number soon increased, new adventurers joining them from other countries of Greece; the Abantes from Eubœa, who had nothing in common with the Ionians, were no inconsiderable c part of this colony; the Mymian Orchomenians, the Cadmeans, Dryopians, and Molossians, with the Pelasgians of Arcadia, the Dorians, Epidaurians, and many others of the several states of Greece were, as Herodotus informs us g, intermixed with the Athenians, who were sent by the Prytanæan council. The latter who were true and genuine Ionians, as deriving their original from Athens, built a temple, which from themselves they called the Pan-Ionium (N). The privileges of this place they communicated to no other Ionians; neither did others, as we read in Herodotus h, ever desire to be admitted, except the Smyrneans, most of them being of the name of Ionians, that people having soon degenerated from the virtue of their ancestors, and given themselves up to all manner of vice. The Pan-Ionium was a sacred place f on the promontory of Mycale, dedicated by the Ionian confederacy to Neptune, surnamed Heliconius. Here the Ionians met to perform solemn exercises in honour of that deity, and to hold their general assemblies. This festival was peculiar to b JOSEPH. Antiquit. l. 1.

c HERODOT. l. 1.

d THUCYD. l. 7.

e VELLEI. l. 2.

f HERODOT. l. 1.

g Idem, ibid.

(N) The temple was called Pan Ionium, from the concourse of people that flocked thither, from all the cities of Ionia. A festival was kept here by all the Ionians in honour of Neptune, surnamed Heliconius from Helice a city of Achaia, which afterwards perished by an earthquake. One thing was remarkable in this sacrifice, viz. that if the bull offered, happened to bellow, it was accounted a good omen, because that sound was thought to be acceptable to Neptune.

the Athenian Ionians; but the Apaturian solemnity (O) was common to all those of the Ionian name, except the Ephesians and Colophonians, who were excluded under pretence of a murder committed in their cities^b.

THE Dorians on their arrival in Asia, formed themselves into six independent states or small republics, which were confined within the narrow bounds of so many cities; these were Lindus, Jalissus, Camirus, Cos, Cnidus, and Halicarnassus. Other cities in that tract, which was from them called Doris, belonged to their confederacy; but the inhabitants of these alone, as true and genuine Dorians, were admitted into their temple at Triope, where they exhibited solemn games in honour of Apollo Triopius. The prizes were tripods of brass, which the victors were obliged to consecrate to Apollo, and leave in the temple on an altar of gold. When Agasicles of Halicarnassus won the prize, he transgressed this custom, and carried the tripods to his own house: Wherefore the city of Halicarnassus was ever afterwards excluded from the Dorian confederacy; so that the Dorians were from that time known by the name of the five cities^c.

THE Æolians were divided, like the Ionians and Dorians, into several small states or cantons, independent of each other, but united in one common confederacy or league. They possessed at first twelve cities; but Smyrna, as we have related above, was taken from them by the Ionians of Colophon. Their country was of greater extent than that of the Ionians, but far inferior to it in all other respects, Ionia being, in the opinion of Herodotus^k, the most fruitful and agreeable region of all Asia. The Dorians, besides the cities, which belonged to them on the continent, possessed five in the island of Lesbos, one in Tenedos, and another in the hundred islands, which we shall have occasion to speak of in a more proper place. Thus the Greek states in Asia were governed much after the same manner as those in Europe, forming three different confederacies of which the cities were governed by their own laws, and the three different confederacies by their respective general assemblies or diets.

Their Reli-
on, Laws, &c.

THE religion and laws of the Greek colonies in Asia were much the same with those of Greece. Their principal deities were Ceres, Apollo, Diana and Neptune. The Ionians, who came from Athens, celebrated every fifth year, the mysteries of Ceres Eleusina, which we have already described^l. The Milesians worshipped Apollo Didymæus as their tutelary god, whence he was likewise called Apollo Milesius. Near the city of Miletus was a famous oracle of Apollo, called the oracle of Apollo Didymæus, and also the oracle of the Branchide; the former denomination it had from Apollo or the sun, who was surnamed Didymæus, as Macrobius informs us^m, from the double light imparted by him to mankind; the one directly from his own body, and the other by reflection from the moon; the latter appellation was given both to the oracle and to Apollo himself, who was called Branchides, from one Branchus the reputed son of Macareus, but begotten, as was believed, by Apollo (P). This Oracle was, as we are assured by Herodotus, very ancient, and the best^e.

^b HERODOT. ibid.

^c Idem, ibid.

^k Idem, ibid.

^l p. 731.

^m ANTON. l. 1.

(O) This festival was first instituted at Athens, and from thence derived to the Asiatic Ionians. It was so called from the Greek word ἀπαύρις signifying deceit, having been first instituted in memory of a stratagem by which Melanthius, king of Athens, overcame Xanthus king of Beotia. For a controversy arising between the Athenians and Beotians about a piece of ground lying on the confines of Attica and Beotia, Xanthus, proposed that an end should be put to the dispute by a single combat between himself and the Athenian king. Thymætes, at that time king of Athens, declined the fight, and was deposed. In his room was chosen one Melanthius a Messenian, who having accepted the challenge, met his enemy at the appointed place. But before they began the fight, Melanthius pretending to see one behind Xanthus, habited in a black goat's skin, cried out that the articles were violated. Upon this, Xanthus looking back, was treacherously slain by his adversary. In memory of this success, Jupiter was surnamed Απαύριος, that is deceiver. Others tell us, that the Apaturian festival was so called from the Greek word ἀπαύρις, because upon that solemnity children accompanied their fathers, to have their names entered into the public register. Some are of opinion, that the Apaturian festival had its name from the Greek word ἀνδρῶπις, that is, without fathers, in a civil sense, it not being till that solemnity publicly recorded, to whom they belonged. The Apaturia was celebrated in the month Pyanepsian, and lasted three days (14).

(P) Varro tells us, that the mother of Branchus being with child, dreamed that the sun entering into her mouth penetrated to her womb; and that from thence the child was called Branchus from βρῆχας, the throat, through which the god passed. Branchus received, when he grew up, a crown and sceptre from Apollo, and began to prophesy, but soon disappeared. Whereupon a magnificent temple was dedicated to him and Apollo Phileus, so called from a best of all the Grecian oracles except that of Delphos ^m. In the time of the Persian war the temple was burnt down to the ground, being betrayed to the Barbarians by the Branchide or priests who had care of it. Xerxes in requital of their service allowed them to settle and build a city in a remote part of Asia, where they thought themselves out of the reach of their angry countrymen. But for all this, their treachery did not escape condign punishment; for Alexander having conquered Darius, and possessed himself of all Asia, utterly demolished their city, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, revenging on the children the treachery of their forefathers ⁿ.

(14) Athenæus l. 4.

An annual feast was celebrated by the Ionians in honour of Diana Triclaria, to appease whose wrath for an incest committed in her temple, men and women used to walk bare-footed to it. This solemnity was instituted by the Athenians, who till after the Trojan war used annually to sacrifice to the angry goddess a male and a female child.

THEIR trade we can only guess at from their situation, which very likely drew Trade. merchants from all the neighbouring parts to traffic in their country, as well for their own growth as for foreign productions. Their country was stocked with many useful commodities, and abounded in all things necessary for life. They had a safe coast, convenient harbours, and whatever may incline us to think that they carried on a considerable trade. Besides, we know that they were very powerful by sea, maintained great fleets, and planted colonies not only in the neighbouring islands, but even in Gaul, and beyond the pillars of Hercules.

THEY soon degenerated from the valour of their ancestors, and became a most Cherashv. superstitious, effeminate, and voluptuous people; insomuch that the Ionians, in the time of Herodotus, were looked upon as quite unfit for any military service ^o. They are said to have been the first who introduced the use of perfumes and garlands at banquets, and also of sweet-meats or desserts ^p. Maximus Tyrius, speaking of the different affections and inclinations of the various Greek nations and colonies, tells us, that the Crotanians loved the Olympic sports, the Spartiates fine armour, the Cretans hunting, the Sybarites pompous dress, and the Ionians lascivious dances ^q. The Aeolians and Dorians, being planted in a less fruitful country, were not so soon debauched by the soft climate of Asia; they were accounted no ways inferior to the European Greeks, till they were subdued by the Persians. But having lost their liberty, they gave themselves up to idleness, and in a short time became quite unfit for action, and no less effeminate than the other Asiatics.

THE Greek colonies settled in Asia enjoyed their liberties, and lived according to Their history. their own laws from the time of their migration to the reign of Cresus king of Lydia, Year of the flood, 2441. to whose superior power they were forced to submit after having baffled all the Before Christ attempts of his predecessors. They paid him a yearly tribute, furnished him with ^{562.} ships and mariners in time of war, and sent their respective quotas of land-forces ^c when required; but at the same time were free from all oppression, and suffered to enjoy a profound tranquillity under his mild government ^r. This made them oppose Cyrus when he first invaded Lydia, and reject the advantageous proposals of that prince. But after the defeat of Cresus, and taking of Sardis, they sent ambassadors to the conqueror, offering to submit to him upon the same terms which had been formerly granted to them by Cresus. Cyrus having heard them with attention, returned an answer in the following apologue: A piper seeing numerous shoals of fish in the sea, and imagining he might entice them ashore by his music, began to play; but finding his hopes disappointed, he threw a net into the water, and drew ^f a great many of them to the land. When he saw the fish leaping on the ground, since you would not dance, said he, to my pipe before, you may now forbear dance-from παῖς to kiss, because he was supposed to have imparted the spirit of prophecy to Branchus by a kiss. This temple was burnt by the Persians, but afterwards rebuilt with such magnificence, that it surpassed all the other Greek temples in bigness, being raised to such a bulk, that they were forced to let it remain uncovered, for it was no less than five furlongs in compass (15).

^m HERODOT. l. i. ⁿ STRAB. l. xiv. ^o HERODOT. l. i. ^p VALER. MAX. l. ii. REC. memorabil. ^q MAXIM. TYRIUS in Dissert. Quis sit philosophiae finis. ^r HERODOT. l. i.

(15) Strab. l. xiv.

ing at all. With this answer the Greek ambassadors returned home, and having communicated it to their countrymen, they resolved in a general assembly to fortify their cities against any sudden attack, and send ambassadors to solicit succours from the Lacedæmonians. Pythermus, a Phocæan, was sent in the name of all the Greeks in Asia; but the Spartans could by no means be prevailed upon to lend them any assistance. However they dispatched by sea some of their chief men to observe the motions of Cyrus, and interpose their good offices with him in behalf of their countrymen. These putting in at Phocæa, sent Lacrinus, the most considerable person among them, to Sardis, with instructions to acquaint Cyrus, that if he committed any hostilities against the Grecian cities, the republic of Lacedæmon would resent them as offered to herself. Cyrus hearing them speak in this stile, inquired of the Greeks about him, who the Lacedæmonians were, and what number of men they could bring into the field? Being informed of these particulars, he answered the deputy, that he was no ways afraid of a people, who in the midst of their cities had a place of public resort, where they met to impose on each other by mutual oaths; and that if the gods preserved his life, they should have sufficient cause to be concerned for their own calamities instead of troubling themselves about those of the Asiatics. These words were levelled at the Greeks in general, who had in their cities large squares, where they met to trade, a custom unknown to the Persians ^a.

Year of the
flood 2455.
Before Christ
544.

Cyrus having dismissed the Lacedæmonian ambassador with this answer, left Sardis, and setting out for Ecbatan, charged Mazares one of his lieutenants, with the reduction of Æolis, Doris, and Ionia. Mazares pursuant to his commission entering Ionia, took and destroyed the city of Priene, laid waste the fertile plains that were watered by the Mæander, and advancing to Magnesia, laid that city likewise in ashes. From Magnesia he marched to Phocæa, but before he made any attempts upon that important place, he fell sick and died. Upon his death Harpagus, being appointed to command the army in Ionia, laid close siege to Phocæa. The Phocæans, detesting slavery, chose rather to abandon their native country, than submit to the Persian yoke; and accordingly having put their wives, children, and all their most valuable effects on board their vessels, they set sail for the island of Chios, leaving the Persians in possession of an empty city. The example of the Phocæans was followed by the Teians, who after Harpagus had made himself master of their walls, went on board their ships, and conveyed themselves and their families to Thrace, where they settled in the city of Abdera, which had been founded by the Greeks of the Ionian confederacy under the conduct of Timæsius, a native of Clazomene. The other cities of Ionia were all reduced by Harpagus, and likewise the Dorians, Æolians, and all the inhabitants of the upper Asia, except the Milesians, who distrusting their own strength, and that of the Ionians, had made a separate peace with Cyrus, and by a timely submission obtained the same terms, which had been formerly granted them by Crasus. The rapidity of these conquests struck the islanders with such terror, that they all submitted of their own accord. Thus all the Greek states both in the islands and on the continent of Asia were a second time conquered, and forced to live, under the Persian monarchs, in a state of greater subjection and dependency than they had ever proved before ^c. In the reign of Darius Hystaspis they made an attempt towards the recovery of their ancient liberty, and maintained a war against the whole power of the Persian monarchy for the space of six years; but were again in spite of their utmost efforts brought under subjection, and punished with great severity by the haughty conqueror, for endeavouring to ascertain the rights which they had been unjustly deprived of. But of this war, and the many calamities which it drew upon the Greek states in Asia Minor, we have already given a particular and distinct account in the history of Persia ^e, to which we refer the reader.

THE Ionians assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Athens with an hundred ships; but as the king had undertaken this for no other end but to be revenged on the Athenians for having sent some ships to the assistance of the Ionians when they attempted to shake off the Persian yoke, Themistocles, who commanded the Athenian fleet, imagined that the Ionians served in this expedition against their will, and might

^a Idem, ibid. ^c Idem, ibid. ^e p. 107, 108, 109, 110.

there-

- a therefore be easily prevailed upon to desert the Persians, and join their ancient allies and countrymen. But as no opportunity offered of conferring with them, or sending messengers, he sailed in person to the place where they used to take in fresh water, and there engraved on the rocks the following words: "Men of Ionia, "you are guilty of a heinous crime in fighting against your fathers, and helping to "enslave Greece. Resolve therefore to come over to us; or if you cannot do that, "withdraw your forces from the enemy, and persuade the Carians to imitate your "example. But if both these ways are impracticable, and you find yourselves, "under an absolute necessity of continuing in the Persian fleet, favour us at least "when we come to an engagement; and remember that you are not only descended
- b "from us, but are the original cause of the Barbarians enmity against us". Themistocles had in so doing a double view; he believed that this invitation, if not discovered to the king, would induce the Ionians to come over to the Greeks; and on the other hand, if it should come to the king's ears, he hoped it would make him distrust the Ionians, and dismiss them. The Ionians coming ashore the next day, as usual, read on the rocks the invitation of Themistocles, and resolved to comply with it; pursuant to which resolution when the two fleets engaged, the Ionians instead of falling upon the Athenians tacked about and made to sea. Their flight, which was soon followed by that of the Phœnicians, contributed not a little to the famous victory gained by the Athenians at Salamis *. Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the Ionians by means of a certain Samian gave private notice to the Athenians of all that passed in
- c the enemy's fleet, assuring them that as soon as the battle was joined they would desert the Barbarians *. This, according to our author, so encouraged the Greeks, before disheartened, that they attacked the Persian fleet contrary to their former determinations, and gained that victory which is so famous in history †.

- THE same stratagem was used by Leutychides, commander of the Greek fleet, before the battle of Mycale. The Ionians, Dorians, Æolians, and the inhabitants of the islands made no small part of the Persian army, which was drawn up along the shore in order to prevent the Greeks from making a descent into the country. Leutychides therefore standing in to the shore as near as he could, ordered a herald to
- d speak thus to the Ionians in his name: "Men of Ionia, hearken with attention to "my words, for the Persians will not understand the advice I give you; when the "battle begins, every one of you ought in the first place to remember liberty; "and the next, that the word agreed upon is Hebe, if any of you hear me not, "let those who hear inform him". These words had such an effect on the Greeks, that in the heat of the engagement they deserted the Persians, and joined their countrymen, which occasioned the total overthrow of the Persian army. Before the engagement, the Persian generals had appointed the Milesians to guard the passes leading to the eminences of Mycale, that they might have a safe retreat in case they were put to flight, and guides to conduct them over the mountains, the Milesians
- e being well acquainted with the country. But they acting quite contrary to their orders, brought back by other ways to the enemy such as fled; by which means few Persians escaped the general slaughter of that day *. Thus the Asiatic Greeks revolted a second time from the Persians, and their behaviour on this occasion was so pleasing to the Lacedæmonians, that they were for transplanting them out of Asia into Greece. For they were well apprised, that if the Ionians continued in Asia, they would be in perpetual alarms from an enemy that far excelled them in strength, and was near to them; whereas their friends, who were at a great distance, could not be assistant to them so opportunely and at such seasons as their necessity might require. The Peloponnesians proposed to drive those nations out of Greece, which
- f had sided with the Persians, and to bestow their territories and states on the Ionians. Upon these promises the Ionians and Æolians were preparing to convey themselves and their effects over into Europe. But the Athenians persuading them to remain in Asia, faithfully promising to assist them on all occasions to the utmost of their power. The Athenians were afraid that if the Ionians should settle in Europe by the common concurrence of the Greeks, they would not for the future own Athens as their metropolis, and place of their original. The Peloponnesians readily yielded to the Athenians, and the Ionians upon second thoughts determined not to remove out of Asia †, but upon the conclusion of the peace between the Greeks and Persians, which happened in the reign of Artaxerxes, one of the articles, sworn to by both parties, was, that all the Greek states of Asia should be made free, and allowed to live according to their own laws^b.

* HERODOT. l. viii. † DIODOR. SICUL. l. xi. c. 1. p. 251. ‡ idem, ibid. JUSTIN. l. ii. * HERODOT. l. ix. † HERODOT. ibid. DIODOR. SICUL. l. xi. c. 4. p. 261.

THE Ionians being thus delivered from the Persian yoke, entered into an alliance with the Athenians, who came by degrees to treat them as subjects rather than allies; obliging them to contribute to all the charges of the Peloponnesian war no otherwise than if they had been their vassals. Nay, Euphemus, who was sent in the time of the Peloponnesian war to draw the Camarineans into an alliance with Athens, owned that the Athenians had subjected both the Ionians and islanders, for having joined, said he, the Persians against their mother city^c. This was but a poor pretence, ^b since the victory which the Athenians gained at Salamis, was in great measure owing to the Ionians and other Greeks, who served on board the Persian fleet, as we have seen above. In the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon, we find them again subject to the Persians, and governed by Tissaphernes, from whom they revolted to Cyrus the younger. Upon the death of Cyrus they sent ambassadors to the Lacedemonians, imploring their assistance and protection against Tissaphernes, who was returning to his government at the head of a numerous army, with a design to punish them for their revolt. The Lacedemonians, having now ended the long war which they had waged with the Athenians, laid hold of this opportunity of breaking again with the Persians, and sent first Thimbro, after him Dercyllidas, and lastly Agésilas ^c their king to invade the Persian provinces in Asia, where they made great conquests, and would have endangered the whole empire, had not Darius, by distributing large sums among the leading men in Greece, found means to rekindle the war there, which obliged the Lacedemonians to recall their king, and conclude a peace with the Persians equally disadvantageous and dishonourable to the Grecian name. For one of the articles was, that all the Greek cities in Asia should be subject to the king of Persia, and besides the islands of Cyprus and Clazomene. Thus were all the Greeks settled in Asia with the utmost injustice and baseness given up to the Persians ^d, whose yoke they bore till they were delivered by Alexander, who restored all the Greeks in Asia to the enjoyment of their ancient rights and privileges^e. After the death of Alexander, as they had neither strength nor courage to defend themselves, they fell under the power of the kings of Syria, and continued subject to them till the Romans, after having delivered Greece from the oppressions of Philip king of Macedon, obliged Antiochus III. surnamed the great, to grant the same liberty to the Greek colonies in Asia, which they had procured for the Greek states in Europe^f. Being thus again reinstated in their ancient rights, most of the free cities entered into an alliance with Rome, and enjoyed such liberty as the Romans used to grant, till they were again brought under subjection by the famous Mitridates king of Pontus, whom they joined against the Romans, partly out of fear, and partly out of hatred to Rome. ^e By his order they massacred, without distinction, all the Romans and Italians, whom either trade or the sweetness of the climate had drawn into Asia. On this occasion the Ephesians distinguished themselves above the rest, not suffering even their famous temple of Diana to be an asylum to such Romans as fled to it. However their ready compliance with the cruel and inhuman orders of Mitridates did not exempt them from the most tyrannical oppression. No wonder then that upon Sylla's arrival in Asia they abandoned Mitridates, and declared for the Romans, as they had formerly deserted the Romans to side with Mitridates. Ephesus was the first that revolted, and the example of that metropolis was soon followed by Smyrna, Colophon, Sardis, Trallis, Hypene and Mesopolis. ^f The revolt of these cities made the king change his conduct. In hopes of keeping the Greek cities steady in his interest, and supporting his faction on the coasts of Asia, he restored all the Greeks to the full enjoyment of their liberties, declaring that even the slaves should have their share of this universal freedom^g. But they did not long enjoy the liberty, which the king out of a selfish policy bestowed upon them. Sylla having routed the several armies of Mitridates, and reduced all the Lesser Asia, revenged on the Asiatics the death of so many thousand Romans,

^b DIODOR. ibid. p. 74. THUCYD. I. i. ^c THUCYD. I. vi. ^d XENOPH. anaCes. I. i. DIODOR. I. xiv. PLUT. in Agésilas. ^e HERODOT. I. xvii. c. 2. ARRIAN. I. iii. ^f Liv. I. xxxv. c. 16. ^g APPIAN. in Mithridat.

- a whom they had inhumanly murdered, by depriving them of their liberty, and laying such heavy taxes and fines on their cities as reduced them to beggary. The city of Ephesus was treated with most severity, Sylla having suffered his soldiers to live there at discretion, and obliged the inhabitants to pay every officer fifty drachmas, and every soldier sixteen denarii a day. The whole sum, which the revolted cities of Asia paid Sylla, amounted to twenty thousand talents, that is, 3875000 l. sterling, for the raising of which they were forced to sell not only their moveables, but even a great part of their lands ^b. This was the most fatal blow Asia ever received, nor did the inhabitants ever after recover their ancient splendor, notwithstanding the favour shewn them by many of the emperors, under whose protection they enjoyed for many years, at least, some shew of liberty.
- b

^a Idem, ibid. & PLUT. in Sylla.

The End of the Second Volume.

A N

I N D E X

T O T H E

S E C O N D V O L U M E.

The Numbers direct to the Page, the small Letters to the Line of the Page, and the great Letters to the Notes.

A.

A B A, a city in Phocis, by whom founded, 389, d.
Abas, king of Argos, 353, f.
Abouillana, the lake of, described, 325, b.
Abraham, the Perfes had their religion from him, 74, a. Whether he lived among them, ibid. b.
Abretana, part of the kingdom of Mysia, 323.
Abriman, the Perfic name for the devil, 76, a. Was written inverted, ibid. b. Believed to have been created out of darkness, ibid. d. His war with God, 77, b. and note (B).
Abydos in Lesser Phrygia, by whom built, 304, d. 333, e. A mine of gold discovered in it, 317, e. Taken by Philip of Macedon, 734, c.
Abydenians, their horrid despair, ibid.
Academia, by whom so called, 436, f.
Acalide, the wife of Tros, her progeny, 314, b.
Acamas, the son of Antenor, 315, b.
Acarnania described, 412, note (D). 745, b.
Acarnanians, why called anciently Curetes, ibid. Join in the Achaean league, 652, e. Their character and bravery, ibid. & 704, a. War with Athens, 731, & seq. Greatly addicted to the Macedonians, 745, c. Reject the alliance of the Romans, ibid. e. Subdued, and become a proverb of Achaia, 446, b.
Acastus drives Jason out of Thessaly, 385, a.
Aceffis, the son of Jupiter, by the rock Agdur, 267, b. Tamed by Bacchus, ibid. c.
Achaia, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. Whence so called, 414, a, b. Described, ibid. c. Conquered by the Achaean ibid. & seq. Divided into twelve districts, 416, c. One of the chief great states after the Achaean league, 641, a. Its extent, provinces, &c. ibid. b. Laws and government, ibid. & seq. Duration, 642, b. Made a Roman province, 700, a. Its various fates since, ibid. & seq.
Achaean, ancient Grecians, 344, c. & not (c). Join with Aratus to restore the liberty of Greece, 557, b. The league called by their name, 642, a.

Where formed, 416, e. The states who acceded to it, 644. Laws, &c. ibid. & seq. Opposed by the Lacedaemonians, 629, & seq. Supported by Antigonus, 634, & seq. 645, & seq. Defeat the Spartans at Mantineia, 636. At Salifia, 649. War against the Aetolians, 650, & seq. Beaten, 651. Invite Philip to their assistance, 652, a. Join in a confederate war, ibid. & seq. Invade Ebi, 654, e. Betrayed by Apelles, 657. Invade Aetolia, 658. Lacedaemon, 659, e. Make peace, 664, a. Forsake Philip and go over to the Romans, 669, & seq. Their gratitude to them, 673. Fall into new broils, 677, a, d. Send deputies to Rome, 678, c, d. Courtied by several princes, 679, c, d. Forced to restore the Lacedaemonians, 681, & seq. Routed by the Messenians, ibid. & seq. Betrayed to the Romans by their deputy, 684, d. Forced afresh to restore the Lacedaemonians, 685, e. Courtied by Perfes, 686. Declare for the Romans, ibid. & seq. Assist them against Perfes, 687, d. Ungratefully used by them, 688, f. Protest against their injustice and cruelty, 689. Obtain some few exiles to be restored, 690. Declare war against Rome, 691. Quarrel with the Lacedaemonians, 691, & seq. Make war against them, 695, b. Defeated by Metellus, ibid. e. By the Roman consul, 697. Made tributary to Rome, 698, e, f.
Achamenes, king of Perfia, 82, a.
Achelous river, the fable of, 409, e. and note (O).
Acheus, the son of Xuthus, founder of Achaia Propria, 414, a.
Achilles king of Phthya, 385. Where born, 382, a. His parents, 385, b. Made invulnerable by his Mother, 385. His exploits before Troy, 321, 385, & seq. Cruelty to Hector, 386, d. Requested by Paris, ibid. His tomb, 305, b.
Acilius, Roman general sent against Antiochus, 719. Defeats him at Thermopylae, 720, c. Pursues him to Chalcis, ibid. Takes Heraclea, 721. His haughty treatment of the Aetolian deputies, 722, & seq. Raises the siege of Naupactus, 724, & seq. Takes

I N D E X.

- Takes Lamia*, 726, a. Succeeded by Scipio, 726, f.
- Armon*, father of Uranus, prince of the Colchis, 257, b. 258, c.
- Actia*, a sea-port in Lacedæmon, 396, c.
- Acro-Corinth*, the citadel of, vid. Corinth. Taken by Aratus, 631, a.
- Acropolis*, the citadel of Athens, 125, and 435. Stormed by the Persians, 471, c.
- Acrotalus*, prince of Sparta, his valiant defence of that city, 623. Succeeds his father Aratus, 624, f. Slain, 625, c.
- Adia* at Athens, whence so called, 478, a.
- Adrastia*, whether the same with Parium, 324, c.
- Adrastus*, king of Argos, 357. His kindness to Polynices and Tydemus, 358. Wars against Estacles, ibid.
- the last king of Phrygia, 303, & seq.
- Adrian's* kindness to the Athenians, 742, a.
- Adrianopolis*, a quarter of Athens so called, ibid. b.
- Adrymetes*, king of Lydia, 332, d.
- Adultery*, strangely punished by Hippomenes, 369, note. How punished by the Athenians, 432, b.
- Æacus*, king of Ægina, made one of the three judges of hell, 387, note.
- Æetes*, king of Colchis, possessor of the golden fleece, 383, & seq. and note (G). His treatment of the Argonauts, 384, a. His fatal end, ibid. and note (I).
- Ægeus*, king of Athens, the father of Theseus, 364, a. Released by him from Minos's tribute, ibid. & seq. Flings himself into the Ægean sea, 365, f.
- Ægialeus* gives his name to Peloponnesus, 349, a.
- Ægina* island described, 705, note (S).
- Ægeus's* war against Attica, 458, b. Intercept their Delphic ship, 459, c. Beaten and subdued by the Athenians, 487, c. Expelled the island, 501. Infest the Athenians, 538, e, f. Infested by the Spartans, 383, & seq.
- Ægisthus*, the murderer of Agamemnon, killed by Orestes, 357, c.
- Ægium*, the Greeks rendezvous against Troy, 319, a. The assembly of the Achaean states, 677. Made the metropolis of Achaia, 416, c.
- Ægypt* conquered by Cambyses, 96. Revolts against Darius, 114, a. Against the Persians, 131, b. Reduced, 132, d. Revolts against Darius Nothus, and reduced, 136, a. Reduced again by Ochus, 153, c, d. By Alexander, 163, a.
- Ægyptian* skulls, why harder than those of the Persians, 96, note.
- Ægyptus*, king of Mycena, vid. Ægyptus.—— Wars with his brother Danaus, 353, d.
- Ægyra*, metropolis of Achaia Proper, founded by Ægyrus king of Sicyon, 350, b.
- Æmilius*, Paulus, defeats the Perses, 687, d.
- Æmonia*, the daughter of Democalion, 381, a.
- the antient name of Thessaly, ibid.
- Æneis* said to have betrayed Troy, 321. Whether he retired into Italy, 322, c, and note.
- Ænesidemus*, the brave governor of Argos, slain, 671, d.
- Æolians*, their original, 759. Government, 761. Religion, 762, d. Trade, &c. 763, d.
- Æolis*, part of Asia Proper, 288, d. In Asia Minor described, 758, d. Its twelve cities, ibid.
- Æpyra*, so called from Æpyrus king of Mycena, 360, d.
- Æscapus*, the son of Priam, 317, f.
- Æsculapius* practised physic at Pergamos, 325, & seq.
- Æson*, king of Thessaly, the father of Jason, 383, b. His death, 384, d.
- Æthiopians* tribute to the Persians, 69, a. Their king's brave answer to Cambyses's ambassadors, 97, b.
- Æthlius*, the supposed founder of the Elean kingdom, 407, b.
- Ætolia*, from whom so called, 409, c. Described, ibid. & seq. Part of Græcia Proper, 344, b. One of the three chief Greek states after the Achaean league, 641. The republic of, 703. Confederacy, laws, and government, ibid. & seq.
- Ætolians*, great robbers, 409, d. 410, a. and 650, c, d. Warlike and brutish, 702. Outwit and defeat the Spartan tyrant, 638, & seq. Massacred by the Lacedæmonians, 639. Infest the Messinians, &c. by sea and land, 650. Oppose the Achaean, 702. Courted by the Romans, ibid. & seq. Make alliance with them, 703. Invade Locris, 704, c. Defeated by Philip of Macedon, ibid. & seq. Reject his offers of peace, 706, a. Gain several cities, 707, a. Forced to make peace, ibid. c. Courted by three nations, ibid. Declare for the Romans, 708, a. Invade Macedonia and Thessaly, ibid. Defeated by Philip, ibid. e. Burn several cities of Thessaly, ibid. & seq. Oppose the confederate peace, 711, & seq. Declare for Antiochus, 712. Take Demetrius by stratagem, 713, c. And Sparta by treachery, ibid. & seq. Driven out by Philopamen, 714. Meet Antiochus, 715, f. Challenge him their generalissimo, 716. Routed from Ossa by the Romans, 720. Sue them for peace, 722. Threatened by the Roman consul, ibid. & seq. Oppressed by the Roman senate, 725, c. Obtain a truce, 726, d. Invade Philip's territories, 727, b. Their gallant defence of Ambracia, 728, & seq. Invaded by the Macedonians, &c. 729, b. Sue the Romans for peace, ibid. Obtain a disadvantageous one, 730, b, c. Greatly oppressed by them, ibid. & seq. Their various taxes since, 731.
- Ætolus*, the son of Endymion, king of Elis, 407. Founds the Ætolian kingdom, ibid.
- the son of Oxylus, where buried, 408, f.
- Agamemnon*, king of Mycena, 357. Chosen chief of the Trojan expedition, 319, &c. Murdered in his return from Troy, 357, c.
- Agapenor*, king of Acadia, one of the Trojan chiefs, 379, d.
- Agasicles*, king of Sparta, vid. Archidamus, 582.
- Agasthenes*, king of Elis, routed by Oxylus, 408, c.
- Agathyrsian Scythians* described, 278.
- Agæus*, a famous rock, 297, b.
- Age*, old, highly honoured by the Lacedæmonians, 565, c.
- Agelas's* speech to king Philip at Naupactus, 663, c.
- Agentor*, a great warrior, 315, d.
- Agésilæus*, king of Sparta, his character, 605, d. Declared the successor of Agis, 606, b. Sent general against the Persians, 607, c. His sudden expedition against them, ibid. and 141, d. Defeats them and the Phrygians, ibid. & seq. Made commander by sea and land, 142, e. and 609. Affronts the Boeotians by sacrificing in their country, 608. Recalled by the ephori, 143, 611. Sent against the confederates, 612. Forces them to a general peace, 613, & seq. Invades Boeotia, 615, e. Chosen dictator, 617, a. Invades Aradia, ibid. Quells a conspiracy in Sparta, ibid. c. Defeats Epaminondas, 619. His expedition into Egypt, 149. Despised by Tachus, and helps to dethrone him, ibid. and 620. and note. His death and character, ibid.
- Agésilæus*, the uncle of Agis, helps him to reform the Spartan luxury, 626, b. Made one of the ephori, 627. Outwits his nephew, ibid.
- Agésilæus*, king of Sparta, succeeds his father Pausanias, 612. Sent against the Argives, 613, a. Against the Mantineans, 614. Invades the Olynthians, ibid. f. His death, 615.
- the son of Cleombrotus, chosen king of Sparta, 634, e.
- Agessivata*, mother of Agis, betrayed and murdered by Amphares, 628, & seq.
- Agida*, kings of Lacedæmon. from whom so called, 398, b. 404, b. A list of them, 358.
- Agis*, king of Lacedæmon, his severe reign, 403.
- invades Attica, 507, & seq. 596, & seq. Offers peace to the Athenians, 512, a. Defeats

I N D E X.

- the confederates near Mantineæ, 515, c. 599, c. His resentment against Alcibiades, 521, d. Repulsed from the gates of Athens, 527, c. 601, c. In a second attempt, 528, a. Successful in his third, 529, & seq. Invades Argos, and makes a truce with them, 598, & seq. Invades Elis, 599, f. Concludes a peace, 600, a. His death, 605, c.
- Agis*, the son of Agefilans, sent ambassador to Philip, 621, c. Succeeds his father, ibid. Beaten by the Macedonians, ibid. e. His glorious death, 622, a.
- the son of Endamidas, reforms the Spartan luxury, 626, & seq. Forced into a sanctuary, 627, a. Betrayed and murdered, 628, b.
- Aglauros*, the daughter of Cecrops, her fatal curiosity punished, 363, note (F)
- Agonidas*, Phocion's enemy, put to death, 553, f.
- Agriculture*, unknown to the ancient Greeks, 346, c.
- Agrippa*, a city in Apulia, vid. Argos Hip. 359, c.
- Ahabswernus*, al. Aflyages, king of Media, 20, c.
- the same with Ariaxerxes, 130, a. vid. Ariaxerxes.
- Ajax* shipwrecked, 321, f. His tomb, 305, b.
- Aladin*, his sham paradise in the valley of Mulebet, 29, b. and note.
- Alba*, the kingdom of, whether founded by Aeneas, 222, c.
- Albion*, whence so called, 249, note.
- Alcemenus*, king of Sparta, wars against the Messeniens, 570, & seq. His character and death, 571.
- Alceus*, king of Lydia, 333, a.
- Alcibiades*, the rival of Nicias, his character, 513, c. Makes a league with the Argives, 514, c, and note. Makes a descent into Melas, 516, b. Accused of sacrilege, 517, b. Retires to Sparta, ibid. In great esteem there, 518, 600, c. Sent to invade Ionis, 521. Forced to retire into Persia, ibid. Cabals against the Athenians, 522, a. Recalled thither, 524, a. Beats the confederates, 526. Takes Byzantium, 527, e. His triumph, ibid. & seq. Script of his command, 528. His retirement and death, 532, note (N).
- Alcmon*, archon of Athens, 369, d.
- Alcymus*, king of Lydia, 333.
- Altes* invades Corinth, 394, c.
- Alens*, king of Arcadia, 379, b. His cruelty to his daughter, ibid.
- Alexamenus* treacherously sent against Nabis, 638, 713, & seq. Assassinate him, 639, c. 714. Murdered by the Spartans, ibid. c.
- Alexander* the son of Priam, vid. Paris, 318, a.
- the son of Amyntas, king of Macedon, his noble revenge against the Persians, 106, f.
- the great, king of Macedon, his offers to the Athenians rejected, 125, a. His attachment to the Greeks, ibid. f. Chosen their generalissimo, 154, & seq. 549, d. Takes and sacks the city of Thebes, 549. His friendship to Phocion, ibid. & seq. Invades Persia, 155, & seq. Gains the first victory against them, ibid. & seq. Received by several Persian cities, 156, d. Gains the streights of Cilicia, 157, & seq. Defeats the Persians near Issus, 159. His generosity to the family of Darius, 160, c. Gains an immense booty from him, ibid. His answer to that prince's haughty letter, 162, b. Cruelty to Betis and Gaza, ibid. c. Conquers Egypt, 163, a. Answer to Darius's ambassadors, 164. Defeats the Persians near Arbela, 165, & seq. Takes Babylon and Susa, 166, & seq. His behaviour to Syngambis and Madates, 167, a. Gains the streights of Persia, ibid. c, f. Takes and burns Persepolis, 168. Marches in pursuit of the traitor Bessus, 169. His grief for the death of Darius, 170, d. Kindness to his relations, ibid. c. Subdues the remainder of the Persian empire, ibid. & seq. Some account of him out of the oriental writers, 229, & seq. Visits the tomb of Achille, 305, b. Outwitted by the Lampfacians, 324, & seq.
- Alexander* prætor of Ætolia's speech to the Roman consul, 709, & seq.
- Alexandra*, the temple of, at Amycia, 397.
- Alexandria*, vid. Troas, 306.
- in Cilicia, by whom built, 341, c.
- Aliacmon*, river in Thessaly, 382, a.
- Aliphera* described, 655, note (G).
- Alpes* and Apennine hills, whence so called, 249, b.
- Alpheus*, the famed river, described, 406, note (F).
- Altars*, their structures among the Scythians, 272.
- Althea*, the mother of Meleager, the tale of, 411, note (C).
- Alzathes*, king of Lydia, his wars with Cyzares, the Scythians, &c. 334. Outwitted by Thraebulus, ibid. c. His tomb, 328, c.
- Alynothoe*, Priam's wife, vid. Ariuba, 317, f.
- Amasis*, king of Egypt, his body dug up and abused by Cambyses, 96, d.
- Amazons*, mothers of the Sarmatians, 266, c. Their Scythian name, 277. An account of those female warriors, 278, note. Overcome by Hercules and Theseus, 366, note.
- Ambracia*, taken by Philip of Macedon, 653, b. Besieged by the Romans, 727, f. Taken, 729, c.
- Ambraciots* drive out the Macedonian garrisons, 549, c.
- Aminander*, king of Acarmania, joins with the Ætolians, 708, a. Dispossessed of his kingdom, 727, a. Restored by the Ætolians, ibid. b. Intercedes for them, 729, d.
- Amisodarus*, king of Lycia, 339, c.
- Amomphareus* breaks Pausanias's measures, 590, b.
- Amphares*, the betrayer and murderer of king Agis, his mother, &c. 628, & seq.
- Amphen* surprised by the Lacedæmonians, 511, a.
- Amphiaraus*, a famous soothsayer, betrayed into the Theban war, 358, b.
- Amphiclyon*, the son of Deucalion, king of Athens, 363, c.
- Amphiclyons*, the general court of Greece, held at Delphos, 383. Some instances of their power, ibid. & seq. Declare Alexander general of Greece, 549.
- Amphilytus's* prophecy to Pisistratus, 450, c.
- Amphion*, the usurper of the Theban throne, 373, c.
- Amphipolis* taken from the Athenians, 511, f. Refuses to return after the Nicean peace, 512. Taken by Philip of Macedon, 542, c.
- Amphitryon's* wife deflowered by Jupiter, 355, c. His fatal end, ibid. c. His temple at Rhamnus, 361, d.
- Amplissa*, metropolis of Ozolis Locri, by whom built, 322, and note (E). Destroyed and rebuilt, 402, b. Besieged by the Romans, 726, b.
- Amur*, river in Scythia, 267, d.
- Amycia*, the city of, described, 397, a. Taken by the Messenians, 579, d.
- Amyclas*, king of Lacedæmon, 400, c.
- Amyclean* security, a proverb, whence, 400, c.
- Amycus*, king of the Berbraces, overcome by Polix, 383, note (H).
- Amyntas* invades Egypt, 163, b. Cut off by the Persians, ibid. and note.
- Anacharsis* put to death for introducing the Grecian worship into Scythia, 272, and note (B). 285, b.
- Anaxagoras*, Pericles's preceptor, accused of impiety, 498, c. His philosophy and banishment, ibid. note (G).
- Anaxander*, king of Sparta, 577, c.
- Anaxidamas*, king of Sparta, 577.
- Anaximander*, king of Sparta, his character, 583, a.
- Anazarbum*, a city in Cilicia Propria, 341, b.
- Ancaus*, one of the pilots of the Arctonauis, 384, note.

I N D E X.

- Ancharus's* great love to his country, 302, & seq.
Anchiale in Cilicia Propria, by whom built, 341, b.
Anchises, king of Troy, saved from the flames, 314, c.
Ancyræ, by whom built, 302, b.
Androcles, king of Mycenæ, killed in a fray, 570, c.
Androclus leads the Ionians to Ephesus, 755, d. Assumes the royal authority, ibid. c.
Androgeus, the son of Minos, killed at Athens, 364.
Andronidas and his colleagues unjustly condemned, 696, f.
*Androsthene*s defeated by Nicostratus, 672, c.
Antalcidas, the peace of, 539, b. 144. Dishonourable to the Greeks, 613, b. His character, ibid. and note.
Antenor, grandson of Cleomestra, his embassy into Greece, 314, d. Suspected of treachery, ibid. f. & seq. Comes with the Heneti to the Adriatic shore, 315, b. His progeny, ibid.
Anticyra surrendered to the Ætolians, 704, b. c.
Antigone buried alive for burying her brother, 374, d.
Antigone, daughter of Laomedon, a proud princess, 317, b.
Antigonia, vid. Trons, Alexander, 306.
Antigonus sends his son Demetrius against the Athenians, 554, b. Detested by them, ibid. e. Invited into Greece by the Achaans, 631, & seq. Invades Peloponnesus, 647, a. Chosen generalissimo of the Achaans, ibid. d. Suffers the Argives to be ravaged, 648, a. Defeats the Lacedæmonians at Selasia, 632, 649. Becomes master of Sparta, 634, 650. Defeated and killed in Asia, 555, f. and 634, 650.
Antiochus, king of Messenia, his embassy against the Lacedæmonians, 570, & seq.
—— king of Syria, invited into Greece, 713, & seq. Lands at Pteleum, 715, f. His speech to the Ætolians, 716, a. His ambassadors' speech to the Achaan assembly, ibid. Advises with Hannibal, 717, f. Takes Eubœa, 718, b. Gives himself up to the pleasures of marriage, 719. Roused by the Romans, ibid. & seq. Seizes the heights of Thermopyla, 720. Defeated thereby the Romans, ibid. d. Retires into Ephesus, ibid. & seq.
—— the pilot of Alcibiades beaten by the Peloponnesians, 528, b.
Antipater forsaken by the Thessalians, 550, f. Defeated by the confederate Greeks, 551, a. Retreats to Lamia, ibid. b. Defeats the confederates, ibid. d. And makes peace with Athens, ibid. Defeats Antiphatrus, 551, b. Agis, 621, b. c.
Antiphatrus succeeds his brother Leosthenes, 551, b. Defeated, ibid. c.
Anytus's treachery to Socrates, 533, b.
Aon, the son of Neptune, settles in Bœotia, 370, c.
Aones, whether ancient Grecians, 345, b. Almit Cadmus in Bœotia, 372, a. What people they were, ibid. note (C).
Apamea, metropolis of Phrygia Major, 292, c. When surnamed Cibotos, ibid. sub not.
Apaturian festival, whence, 762, a, and note.
Apelles's design of enslaving the Achaans, 654, & seq. Obtrudes Antigonus's measures, 657, a. Condemned and forgiven by him, 659, b. Tyrannizes over the Greeks, 660, and note (H). Put to death, 661, d.
Aphersia, king of the Turcs, according to the oriental writers, 183. His wars with the Persians, ibid. & seq. Subdues them, 186. Driven out of Persia by Zalzer, 187, 190, & seq. Defeated by the Persian general Rustan, 196, c. Driven from his dominions by the Persian king, 197, b. Taken prisoner, and put to death, ibid.
Aphydas, king of Athens, 368, d.
—— prince of Arcadia, his portion, 579, a.
Aphrodisias, in Cilicia Aspera, why so called, 340, d.
Apis, the Egyptian god, killed by Cambyses, 98, b.
Apis, king of Sicyon, 350, b. Split into two by chronologers, 352, d.
—— king of Argos, a great tyrant, 352.
Apollo, worshipped by the Scythians, 272, b. The Trojans, 309, d.—Why surnamed Smynthian, 310, b. Gryneus, 755, a. Didymus, 762, d. Branchides, ibid.
Apollonia, where situate, 325, b.
Apologues, among the Persian writers, a specimen of them, 199, and note.
Arabians tribute to the kings of Persia, 69, a.
Arachosia, a province of Persia, described, 29, b.
Aratus, the noble deliverer of Greece, his character 556, 642, a. Restores the Athenians to the ancient liberty, 557. The Sicyonians, 642. Joins with the Achaans, ibid. and note. Takes Acro-Corinth, 643, a, and note (C). Opposes the king of Sparta, 629, c. Invites the Macedonians, 631. Betrays Acro-Corinth to them, ibid. e. 646, & seq. Beaten by the Ætolians, 651, d. Accused and oppressed by Apelles, 655, & seq. Cleared by Philip, 656, a. Chosen prætor of the Achaans, 662. Displeases Philip by an honest answer, 665. Retires from his court, ibid. Poisoned by Philip's orders, ibid. His funeral, honours, and character, ibid. & seq.
—— his son also poisoned by Philip, 666, a.
Araxes, river in Persia, described, 29, b.
Arbaces, first king of Media, his reign and conquests, 12, d.
Arbela, the city and battle of, 165, & seq.
Arbicanes, king of Media, 13, b.
Arcadia, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. From whom so named, 375, a. Its situation, soil, &c. ibid. d. Origin and antiquity, 378, b. Invaded by the Spartans, 616, & seq.
Arcadians, ancient Greeks, 344, c. Famous for pastorals, 375, b. From rude shepherds become brave warriors, 376, b. Their religion, ibid. d. How and by whom civilized, ibid. & seq. Their government, 377. Kings, 378, & seq. Their resentment against their monarch's pelf, 380, a. 581, a. Beaten by the Spartans, 618, c. By the Romans, 696, a.
—— women great warriors, 376, c.
Arcas, the supposed founder of the Arcadian kingdom, 375, 2.
—— 4th king of Arcadia, 376, a.
Arces raised to the Persian throne by Bagoas, 154, a. Murdered by him, ibid. b.
Archelaus, king of Lacedæmon, 559, & seq.
Archelaus, general of Mithridates, expedition into Greece, 736, b. c. Defends the city of Athens, 737, & seq. Betrayed by two slaves, 739, a.
Archias betrays Thebes to the Lacedæmonians, 644, f.
Archidamia's noble speech to the Spartans, 623, a. Barely murdered by Amphares, 628.
Archidamus, king of Sparta, made general of the Peloponnesians, 502, & seq. Attempts Plataea, 504. Wins Attica, 506. His lucky stratagem to save his citizens, 594, c. Invades Attica, 596, c. Takes Plataea, ibid. His death, ibid. & seq.
—— the son of Agessilaus, invades Arcadia, 618, d. Gains a noble victory, ibid. & seq. Succeeds his father, 621. Dies in Italy, ibid. c.
—— the son of Endamidas, king of Sparta, 622.
—— IV. his character and reign, 625, a.
Archilochus commands the Dardanian forces, 315, c.
Archon, prætor of Achaia, a friend to the Macedonians, 685, c. Declares for the Romans, ibid. c.
Archons, the first magistrates of Athens, 417. When begun, 362. 369. Made decennial, ibid. e. Annual, ibid. f. and 418. Solon's laws concerning them, 433, b. By whom chosen, 420, c. How, 442, b. Their oath, ibid. c. Office, ibid. d. When abolished, 413. A list of annual archons, 418, & seq.

I N D E X.

- Artabazus*, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 223, a. The same with the Greek Artaxerxes Longiman, ibid. b. Recovers the provinces of Sygyian, &c. from the son of Ruslan, ibid. d, e. Relinquishes his crown to his queen Homai, 225.
- Ardes*, king of Lydia, 333.
- Arctopagus*, the great court of, at Athens, 421, c. 430, c. 432, b. By whom instituted, 441, c. Their power, ibid. & seq.
- Arcthusa*, the table of, 406, note (F).
- Arcus*, king of Sparta, opposed by his uncle, 622, c. Invaded by Pyrrhus, ibid. & seq. Drives him out of Sparta, 624, d. His death, ibid. f. Letter to the Maccabees, ibid. sub not.
- the Spartan deputy condemned by the Achaeans, 680, f. Acquitted by the Romans, 681.
- Argalus*, king of Lacedaemon, 400, d.
- Argia*, prince of Touran, according to oriental writers, 219, a. Wars against Persia, ibid. Takes the city of Balch, ibid. Killed by the prince of Persia, 220.
- Argiveans*, their character, 269, a.
- Argives*, ancient Grecians, 344. From whom descended, ibid. 350, 352. War against Thebes, 350, & seq. 374, & seq. The only ones who came not to the Peloponnesian war, 501. League with Athens, 514, c, and note. Defeated by the Spartans, 515. Renew their league with Athens, ibid. & seq. Break it, and are defeated by them, 541, e, f. By the Spartans, 572, d. 583, d. 585, note. Invaded by them, 598. Beaten at Mantineae, 599, b. The rest, vid. sub Argos.
- Argive women, their valour against the Spartans, 585, sub note.
- Argo* ship, where built, 382.
- Argon*, king of Lydia, 333, b.
- Argonautic* expedition, 383, and notes.
- Argonauts*, their exploits before they arrived at Colchis, 383, and notes. Their adventures at Colchis, ibid. & seq. In their return, 384, and note.
- Argos*, king of Argos, by whom begot, 352, f.
- kingdom, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. By whom founded, 250. Its situation, soil, government, &c. 351. When founded, ibid. e. Translated to Mycena, ibid. Kings of Argos, 352, & seq. Kingdom divided, 354. Reunited, ibid. & seq. Invaded by the Heraclidae, 359, c. Conquered, 360, a. Reduced into a democracy, ibid. d. Changed into an aristocracy, ibid. & seq.
- city taken by the Lacedaemonians, 631, d. By Philip, 636, 671. Given to Nabis, ibid.
- Argos Hippium*, a city in Apulia, 359. By whom built, ibid. c.
- Aria*, a province of Persia, described, 31, a. Whether the same with Ariana, ibid. and note (K).
- Ariadne*, the daughter of Minos, married to Theseus, 365, d. Carried off by Bacchus, ibid. e.
- Arianthes*, king of Scythia, his large copper, 274, e. 286. Arimasphen Scythia described, 268.
- Ariobarzanes* beaten out of the Persian freights, 167, e. Killed, ibid. f.
- Aripethes*, king of Scythia, 285.
- Arisba*, a city of Phrygia Minor, 305, a.
- Priam's wife, 317.
- Aristagoras's* attempt to corrupt the Lacedaemonians, 587, note.
- his rebellion against Darius, 108. His death, 110.
- Aristides*, general of the Persians, 460, & seq. His character, 466. Banished, 467, & seq. His piety, 468, a. Moderation on his recall, 470. Reconciled with Themistocles, 472, c. His bravery against the Persians, 475, f. Chosen commander, 478. Regulator of the general tax, 479. His character and death, 485, note.
- Ariston*, tyrant of Athens, 736, b, & seq.
- Aristo*, king of Sparta, 582, c. His character, 683, c.
- Aristocrates* I. king of Arcadia, stoned for his sacrilege, 380, d.
- II. stoned for his perfidy to the Messenians, ibid. & seq. 578. Monument erected to his infamy, 381.
- Aristodemus* chosen general of Sparta, 612, a. Beats the confederates at Corinth, ibid. b.
- Aristodemus* rips open his own daughter, 573, b. Chosen king of Messenia, ibid. e. Defeats the Spartans, 575, b. Kills himself, ibid. e. — Enemy to the Lacedaemonians, 625, c.
- Aristogiton's* revenge against Hippias, 454, d.
- Aristomachus*, grandson of Hercules, defeated at the isthmus of Corinth, 359, d.
- Aristomenes* chosen king of Messenia, 577, d. Defeats the Lacedaemonians, 578, b. Betrayed by the Arcadians, ibid. & seq. Harasses the Spartans, 579. Taken prisoner, ibid. His wonderful escape, ibid. & seq. His death, 581, and note.
- Aristonica*, priests of Delphos, prophecy against the Athenians, 469.
- Aristotle*, his character, 230, and note. According to the oriental writers, 235.
- Arius*, the last king of Myisia, killed by Amphiarus, 327, d.
- Arne*, the daughter of Aeolus, gives her name to the metropolitan of Baotia, 370, a. Baotians driven out of it by the Thessulians, 386, a, & note (M).
- Artabanes*, general of Darius's expedition against Greece, 111, & seq. Shamefully beaten by the Athenians, 112. Dissuades Xerxes from a second attempt, ibid. & seq. Consents to his own disgrace, 115, & seq.
- Artabanus*, his treasons, 129, d. Death, ibid. f. Whether he reigned seven months, ibid. note.
- Artabazus*, governor of Cilicia, 131, d. Sails towards the Nile, ibid. f. Defeats the Egyptians, 132, a.
- Artaphernes*, Persian general against the Athenians, 460, a.
- Artaxerxes*, the son of Xerxes, raised to the throne, 129, d. The Abasbnerus of scripture, 130, a, & note. Defeated by the Egyptians, 131. Makes peace with the Greeks, 132. His injustice to the Athenian prisoners, 133, b. Ingratitude to Megabyus, ibid. d. Answer to the Greek ambassadors, ibid. e. His death and character, 134, b.
- II. surnamed Memnon. Succeeds Darius Nothus, 136, & seq. Marches against his revolted brother, 139, b. Kills him in a set battle, ibid. c. Defeats the Lacedaemonians, 140. Makes peace with them, 144. Invades Cyprus, 145. Conquers it, 146. Goes in person against the Cadusians, ibid. His prodigious army, ibid. Ready to perish with famine, ibid. Saved by a stratagem of Tiribazus, 147, a. Invades Egypt, 147, & seq. His great army and fleet, 148. Their broils and ill success, ibid. d. Invades it afresh twelve years after, 149. Discovers a conspiracy made against him, ibid. & seq. His death and character, 150, c.
- III. Vide Ochus, 150.
- Artayctes*, impaled for sacrilege, 476, e.
- Artomisia*, queen, diverts Xerxes from engaging the Greeks at sea, 123, d. Her bravery, ibid. & seq.
- Artemus*, or Artani,
Artias,
Artiburnus,
Artynes,
 Arts and sciences unknown to the ancient Greeks, 346, c.
- Arta* discouraged by the Spartans, 564, a.
- Aryeans*, where situate, 706, note (X).
- Ascalon*, by whom founded, 329, f.
- Ascania*, a city in Lesser Phrygia, 308, b.
- Ascanian* lake, so called from Ascanus, 308, b.
- Asios*, a dreadful Persian punishment, 134, d, & note.
- Asia*, the daughter of Tenax, 311, d.

I N D E X.

- Asia*, whence so called, 290, c. Described, ibid. d. How divided at present, ibid. e. Conquered by the Sythians, ibid. 281, & seq.
- Asia Proconsular* described, 289, & seq.
- Asia Proper* described, 288, & seq. Part of Asia Minor, 289, a.
- Asia Minor*, the states of, described, 748, & seq.
- Asiarcha* of Ephesus, their office, 754, c.
- Asiatic diocese* described, 290.
- Asius*, the son of Coisus, named from him, 330, b.
- Asia scitida*, of Persia described, 39, c.
- Asiuracus*, one of the three sons of Tras, 314, b.
- Asses* of Arabia, very docile and useful, 42, f.
- Asopus*, a river in Attica, 361, d.
- Aspasia*, Pericles's wife, her character, 493, note (F). Of impiety, 498, and note. Acquitted, 499, a.
- Assos*, king of Eolis, and Mysia, the same, 288, d.
- Assyrian* government, when begun, 7, a.
- Astrologers*, and astrology, a remarkable account of both, 222, note.
- Assyages*. Vide Ahasuerus. Whether succeeded by Cyaxares II. or by Cyrus, 25, note.
- his two dreams concerning his daughter, 82, b. Interpreted by the Magi, ibid. c. Marries her to Cambyses, an obscure Persian, ibid. e. Orders her child to be murdered, ibid. f. His cruelty to Harpagus for not obeying, 84, c. Revenge on the Magi for their wrong advice, 86, d. Defeated by Cyrus, and kept prisoner to his death, ibid.
- Astiochus*'s treachery of the Athenian general, 522, a.
- Asalanus*'s bravery in hunting the Calydonian boar, 400, note (B).
- Atheas*, king of Sythia, 28, & seq. Outwits the Macedonians, ibid.
- Athene*, the Greek name of Minerva, 361, c.
- Athens*, whence so called, 361, c, and note (C). Well famed above other Greek cities, ibid. f. Described, 125, c. 435, & seq. Its various fates, 437, note (K). Government after Solon, 438. Destroyed by Mardonius, 125, c. 475, d. Rebuilt by Conon, 143, 447. Fortified, 483, b. Twice attempted by the Peloponnesians, 527, & seq. Taken by the Lacedemonians, 529, & seq. Garrisoned by the Macedonians, 551. By Cassander, 554, a. Becomes one of the chief states, after the Achaean league, 629. The history of it from that time, 731, & seq. Attempted by Philip, 734, & seq. By Bruttius, 736, f. Belieged by Sylla, 737, & seq. Blockaded and famished, 740, c. Taken and plundered, 741, b.
- Athenians*, their government, kings, &c. 362, &c. seq. Cutlet by Theseus, and punished, 367, c, and note. Change their government into archonships, 369, b. Into a democracy, ibid. f. Their state under their archons, 416, & seq. Cylon's insurrection punished, 422, & seq. Driven out of Salamis, 423, b. Expiated by Epimenides, ibid. d. Recover Salamis, 425. Divided into three parties, 437, f. Settled into orders by Solon, 438, & seq. Altered, 439. Sparing of their freedom, ibid. note. Their magistrates, 439. Inferior courts, 443, & seq. Enslaved by Pisistratus, 447, & seq. Vainly try to dethrone him, 449, & seq. Their great veneration to his memory, 454, b. Turned into the greatest detestation, 456, c. Their tribes increased from six to ten, 456, d. Invaded by the Lacedemonians, ibid. & seq. 595, c. Defeat the Boeotians and Chalcidians, 457. War against the Aegineans, 458, & seq. Assist the Ionians against the Persians, 109, a. Their treatment of Darius's heralds, 111. Invaded and distressed by him, 112, and 460, & seq. Gain a complete victory over him by sea and land, 112, 462. Prepare against Xerxes, 119, 468. Defeat the Persian fleet, 122, & seq. 124, 472, & seq. Forsake their city and country, 125, c. 470. Courtied by Xerxes, 474, & seq. Assist the revolted Egyptians and Lacedemonians, 131, 484. Defeat the Aegineans, Corinthians, &c. 447. Defeated by the Persians in
- Egypt*, 132, b. At Tanagra, 487, & seq. Totally debar the Thebans, &c. 488, & seq. Restored to their former state, 143, & seq. Make an advantageous peace with Persia, 144, 490, a. Break it by assisting the king of Cyprus, 145. Defeated in Boeotia, 491, & seq. Make a truce with the Lacedemonians, 492, a. A true pole of the Athenian citizens, ibid. c. Send a colony into Sybaris, ibid. d. The causes of the Samian war, 493, a. Assist the Coreyrians, 496, & seq. Gain a doubtful victory over the Corinthians, 497, a. Their fleet against the Greeks, 501. Visited with a grievous plague, 502, 507, d. Assist Leontidas in Sicily, ibid. Defeated in Boeotia, 511, d. Make a truce with the Lacedemonians, 512, a. Peace with them, ibid. f. & seq. A league with the Argives, 414, & note. Beaten by the Lacedemonians, 515. War against Perdiccas, 516, a. Send a fleet into Sicily, 517. Which is totally destroyed, 519, & seq. New war with Sparta, 521. Establish an oligarchy, 522, & seq. Opposed by the army, 523, & seq. Beaten at sea, 525. Defeat the Peloponnesians at Samos, ibid. Gain a double victory, 526. A third at Samos, 528. Their ingratitude to their victorious generals, ibid. & seq. Beaten by Lysander, 529. Reduced, ibid. & seq. Fall under the government of 30 tyrants, 530. Rescued by Thrasybulus, 531. Make peace with the Lacedemonians, ibid. f. & seq. A new peace with them and Persia, 539. Declare war against the former, ibid. & seq. Defeat them at sea, 540, c. Make a new peace with them, 541, d. Succour them against the Thebans, ibid. & seq. League with the Arcadians, ibid. The Macedonian war, 542, & seq. Make peace with the revolted confederates, 543, c. Assist the Phocians against the hoyleague, ibid. & seq. Defeated and subdued by king Philip, 548, & seq. Make great rejoicings at his death, 549. Renew the war against the Macedonians after Alexander's death, 550, & seq. Make a submissive peace with Antipater, 551, d. Their base ingratitude to Phocion, 553, c. Decree him a brass statue, ibid. f. Reduced by Cassander, 554, a. Their abominable flattery to Antigonius, &c. ibid. & seq. Ingratitude to Demetrius Phalerus, ibid. And to the son of Antigonius, 555, & seq. To Aratus, 556. Restored to their liberty by him, 657, c. Obtain a consular army against Philip, 733, a. Their tribes how, and from whom named, 734, note. Subdued by Sylla, 741, b. By Caesar, ibid. c. Honoured by Germanicus, 742, a. By Adrian, ibid. b. Their various fates since, ibid.
- Athenian* citizens, how admitted, 488, a.
- Athos*, the mountain of, a passage cut through it by Xerxes, 116, & seq.
- Atima*, infamy, a punishment at Athens, 432, a.
- Atintanes*, what people they were, 706, & note (W).
- Atlas* the nephew of Jupiter, whence so named, 263, & note (W). Rigned in A Mauritania, 312, a, & note.
- Atropatene*, part of Media, described, 1, b.
- Attalus*, king of Pergamus, joins with the Aetolians and Romans against the Achaens, 666, d. 703, & seq. Takes Opus, 667. Forced to quit it, ibid. Invaded by king Philip, 669. Assist the Athenians against him, 733, & seq. The tribe Attalis instituted in honour of him, 735, f.
- the inventor of tapistry, 325, f.
- Attica*, whence so called, 361, c. Part of Graecia Propr. 344. Its extent, situation, and soil, 361. Cities and ports, ibid. Government, ibid. Opulence, origin, kings, &c. 362, & seq. Religion, 363. Change of government, 369, b. Invaded and sacked by the Persians, 475. Its pre-eminence at sea, 479, b. Invaded by Xerxes, 121, & seq. Forsaken and ravaged by the Persians, 125, c. 470. Invaded by the Peloponnesians, 501, & seq. Ravaged by Philip, 733, 735. Betrayed into the interest of Asithridates, 736, c. Enslaved by Aristion, ibid. & seq. 740, d. Becomes one of the three chief states of Greece after the Achaean league. The rest vide sub Athens and Athenians.

Attica fides, a proverb, 361, c.
Attic coin described, 362, a.
Atis, how conceived and preserved, 197, c. His fatal wedding, ibid. e.
 — the daughter of Cranaus king of Athens, 363, c.
Atreus, king of Mycenia, his cruel revenge, 356, b, & not. Killed by Ægyptus, ibid. e.
Atyada, a race of Lydian kings, 330, b.
Alys, the son of Cois king of Lydia, 330, a. 332, b. Killed by a wild boar, 335, c.
Auge, princess of Arcadia, put to death, 379, c, & not.
Augeas, king of Elis, his famous stable cleansed by Hercules, 406, a. That fable explained, 407. Ousted his kingdom by Hercules, ibid. & seq. His end, 408, b.
Aulea, a famous kind of tapestry at Pergamos, 325, f.
Aulis, in Boeotia, the Greek chiefs sworn there, 371, a.
Aurelius Orestes, Roman deputy, his haughty speech to the Achaans, 692, & seq. Enrages them against the Romans, 693, b.
Autorion, king of Thebes, runs mad, 375, b.
Autochthon, what, 375. The second order of the Athenian citizens, 438, a.
Axius, river, in Thessaly, 381, a.
Axones, who they were, 435, a.
Azan, king of Arcadia, the son of Arcas, 379.
Azania, the portion of Azao, ibid.

B.

B Babylon, when, and by whom taken, 21, & seq. 93, & seq. 166, d.
Babylonians revolt from the Persians, 104, & seq. Scarcely besieged by Darius, ibid. Their bloody method of stopping a useless mouth, 105. Surrender, 106. To Alexander, 166, d.
Bacchidae, kings of Corinth whence so called, 392, d. Seize on the Corinthian government, ibid. & seq.
Bacchus, worshipped by the Phrygians, 300, a. Why supposed the grandson of Cadmus, 372, not. (D). How worshipped at Elis, 406, a, and not.
Bactria, a province of Persia, described, 30, b.
Bagoas, general of Ochus, 153, b. Strives in vain to save the Ægyptian temples, ibid. & seq. Redeems their records, 154. Poisons Ochus, ibid. Sets up his youngest son, ibid. Kills him, and sets up Darius Codoman, ibid. His new treason discovered and punished, ibid. e.
Bahaman, king of Persia, according to oriental writer, 223, a, & seq. Vide Ardshir, 223, a.
Baleb, made the seat of the Persian empire, 197, d. 201, b. Taken by the king of Touran, 219, c.
Basileus, the second magistrate of Athens, 417, c. His office, 452, e.
Basilepotamo, or royal river. Vide Eurotas, 395, b, and 396, c.
Basiliſſa, wd o. 442, e.
Batta, the daughter of Tenzer. Vide Asia, 311, d.
Battus, cured of his summer ng, 383, not. (F).
Bazab, king of Persia. Vide Zab, 187, d.
Beans, how used in voting, 440, b.
Bec or Bek, wild interence about that word, 296, f.
Bellerophon, why so called, 393, c. Falsly accused to Proetus, 354. Subdues the Solyms, 394, a. And Amazonis, ibid. b. Succeeds Iohanes in Lycia, ibid. His fatal end, ibid. Why said to kill the Chimera, 337, b. 394, not. (N).
Belshazzar, or Daniel, sentiments of the learned about him, not. 23, (C).
Belus, king of Lydia, 333, a.
Bessus, his treachery to Darius, 168, e, & seq. Invades Bactria, 169. His punishment, 171.
Beth-shean, taken by the Scythians, 17, 181.
Betis, governor of Caza, murdered by Alexander, 162, e.
Bezoar (Persic) described, 45, b.
Bias obtains part of the kingdom of Argos, 354, e. Fetches Iphiclus's oxen out of Thessaly, 382, not. (D).
Biblos surrendered to Alexander, 161, c.
Bium, a city of Doris, 413, d.
Boar, Erymanthian, brought alive by Hercules, 356, not.
 — Calydonian, hunted, 410.
Boat, a dreadful punishment among the Persians, 61, d.
Boeotarche, chief magistrates of Boeotia, 743, a.
Boeotia, part of Gracia Propr. 344, b. Two countries of that name, 370, a. By whom founded and named, ibid. b, c. Described, ibid. d. Famed for dunces, ibid. e. Since called Thebes, 171. Its government, kings, &c. Vide sub Thebes, 372, & seq. Made the seat of war by the Persians, 125, c. Invaded and plundered by the Athenians, 488, & seq. By the Lacedemonians, 540, not. (H).
Boeotian war, 615, & seq.
Boeotians expelled by the Thessalians, 370, b. Signalize themselves at Troy, ibid. Make a vain effort to establish a democracy, 511, c. Refuse the Nicean peace, 512, f. Invite Philip of Macedon into Greece, 546, f. Join the Athenians against him, 548, b. Spared by the Romans, 720, f. Form themselves into a republic, 742. Their government, ibid. & seq. Exasperate the Romans, 743, & seq. Subdued by Flamininus, 744, & seq.
Boeotus, founder of the Thessalian Boeotia, 370, a.
Bog, river in Scythia, 268, c.
Borysthenes, al. Nieper, river in Scythia, 268, and not. (D).
Bos in lingua, a proverb, 362, b.
Bous, Bous, Enclitus's mistake about that word, 363, a.
Brachyllas, Boeotian praetor, assassinated by the Romans, 744, a.
Brachida, the oracle of, 762, and not. (P).
 — the priests of, punished by Alexander, 763, a.
Bresidas, general of Sparta, sent to assist Megara, 511, b. Sent into Macedon, ibid. f. His success in Thrace, ibid. & seq. In Asia, 597, a. Mortally wounded, 512, d. His character, 597, c.
Brasi, the invention of, ascribed to Cadmus, 372.
 — Corinthian, 699, b, and not.
Brides, Solon's laws concerning them, 431, c.
Brigians, whether the same with Phrygians, 295, b.
Britain, the etymon of that word, 248, not. (H).
 — the isles of, first inhabited by the Gomerians, 246, b. 248, not. (H).
Britani, different from the Celts or Gomerians, ibid.
Brutius's expedition against Archelans, 736, & seq.
Brutus, not the first who peopled Britain, 248, sub fin. not. (H).
Bryges, a people of Thrace, destroy part of Darius's army, 111, d.
Budian Scythians, men-eaters, 278.
Bulls blood, a sure poison, 303, e.
Bures burns the city Ejeu, and himself in it, 482, e.
Byzantines beaten and fined by the Athenians, 525, e. Enter into a confederacy against them, 542, e. Besieged by Philip, 547. Relieved by Phocion, ibid.
Byzantium betrayed to the Athenians, 527, d.

C.

C Abiri, who, 300, b.
Caboul, a famous city of Persia, described, 29, not. (F).
Cadmea, the cradel of Thebes, 372, a.
Cadmea victoria, a proverb, ibid. not. (E).
Cadmeis, one of the ancient names of Boeotia, 372, c.
Cadmus,

I N D E X.

- Cadmus*, founder and king of Boeotia, 370, a, and not. His original, 371, b. The fable of him, ibid. Introduces learning into Greece, ibid. Retires into Illyria, ibid.
- Cadusians*, a barbarous people, 2, a. Revolt from the Medes, 13, c. Invaded by the Persians, 146, f. Betrayed by a stratagem, 147, a.
- Caicob* king of Persia. Vide Keykabad, 190.
- Caionon*, the Athenian court, its office, 444, c.
- Calaxais* king of one of the Scythian tribes, 386, not.
- Calisto*, daughter of Lycaon, disflowered by Jupiter, 378, & seq. The fable of her, ibid. not. (F).
- Calixenus* starved to death at Athens, 529, a.
- Callias* branded for his cowardice, 464.
- general of Athens, killed at the siege of Potidea, 497.
- Callicrates*, Spartan general, his success against the Athenians, 601, & seq. Slain, 602, c.
- Achaean deputy's treachery to his country, 684, c. Chosen praetor, 685, b. A slave to the Romans, ibid. Informers against all his rivals, 688, c. Detested by his countrymen, 689, e.
- Callimachus*, Athenian Polemarchus, killed at Marathon, 461, f.
- Callirrhoe*, the wife of Tros, her progeny, 314.
- Callistratus*, Athenian general, his character, 540.
- Calysna*, one of the ancient names of Boeotia, 370, c.
- Calydon*, a city of Aetolia, 410, c.
- the forest of, ibid.
- Cambletes* king of Lydia, 332, d.
- Camels* of Persia described, 43.
- Cambyfes*, an obscure Persian, married to Mandane, 82, c.
- the son of Cyrus, succeeds him, 92, c. Called in scripture Abasuerus, ibid. Conquers Egypt, 96. Puts the Egyptian king to death, ibid. His expedition against the Ethiopians, 97, a. His army forced to eat one another, ibid. d. Kills the Egyptian Apis at Memphis, 98. Some instances of his madness and cruelty, ibid. & seq. Dies at Ecbatan according to the oracle, 100, c.
- Candaules*, king of Lydia, dethroned for his folly, 333, b.
- Cappi*, from whom so named, 314.
- Caramania*. Vide Cilicia, 340, & f. q.
- Caramislan*, a province of Persia, described, 35, b.
- Caria*, part of Asia Propria. 28d. Where situate, 289, not. (C).
- Carmania*, a province of Persia, described, 28, b.
- Carnus*, a soothsayer, killed by the Heracleids, 359, e.
- Cars*, why worshipped by the Phrygians, 301, d.
- Caspian* sea described, 4, & seq. and not.
- straits, where situate, 3, c.
- Cassander*, son of Antipater, obstructed by Polyperchon, 553. Subdues the Athenians, ibid. & seq. Defeated by Demetrius, 555, c.
- Cassian* mountains divide Scythia from Seres, 267, a.
- Cassio* and Polux, their fabulous original, 401, not. (L). Arm for the recovery of their sister, 367, b. Bring her away out of Aphidne, 402, b. Their other exploits and death, ibid. not. (O).
- Cato's* pleasant speech to the senate in favour of the Achaens, 690, c. Drives the Aetolians from Oeta, 720, c.
- Cavalry* not used in Persia till after Cyrus, 88, not. (G).
- Caucasus*, mountain in Scythia, 267, d.
- Caulonites* join in the Achaean league, 642, a.
- Cayster*, river in Phrygia, 294, not. (O). 329, c.
- Cecropia*, Athens anciently so called, 361, c. 737, & seq. Taken by the Romans, 741, c.
- Cecrops*, the first order of citizens at Athens, 438, a.
- Cecrops* an Egyptian fugitive, introduces religion into Greece, 348, b. 362, & seq. The fable of his giving name to Athens, 361, not. (C). The founder of the Athenian monarchy, 362, b. His reign, ibid. & seq. Civilizes the people, ibid.
- Cedrus*, river in Cilicia, 341, c.
- Celene*, where situate, 292, c.
- Celibacy*, how punished by the Spartans, 561, e.
- Celtes*. Vide Gomerians, 241, & seq.
- Celtiberia*, Spain anciently so called, 243, sub fin. not. (B). 244, not. 246, c.
- Cenchrea*, one of the two sea-ports of Corinth, 391, a, and not.
- Centaurs*, whence the fable of them, 382, c, and not. Their lustful attempt, ibid. Killed by Hercules, 356, not.
- Centho*, Claudius, takes the city of Chalcis, 734, d.
- Cephalonia* taken by the Athenians, 501, e. By the Romans, 677, e.
- Cephissus*, river in Phocis, 387, f.
- Ceramicus* at Athens, 436, e. 740, not.
- Cerberus* fetched out of hell by Hercules, 356, not. 396, not.
- Ceres* civilizes the Athenians, 419, not. 731, not.
- the festivals and mysteries of, 731, not.
- Reasons of their institution and manner of performing, ibid. & seq.
- her statue in Arcadia burnt, 380, b.
- Chabrias*, Athenian general, his character, 540, b. Opposes the Spartans in Boeotia, ibid. c. Defeats them at Nausus, ibid. Slain in Thrace, ibid. f.
- Chalcaspides*, whence so called, 653, d.
- Chalcis* taken by Antigonus, 718. Ruined by Centho, 734.
- Chares*, Athenian general, expedition at Chios, 542. Repulsed by the Byzantines, 547, c. His brave death and character, 542, & seq.
- Chariots* of war, by whom invented, 64, note (I).
- those of Cyrus described, 93, e.
- Charilaus*, king of Sparta, his birth, 558. Discomfited by the Tegean women, 380. 560, a. His reign and character, 559, & seq.
- Cheimomecrates*, architect of the temple at Ephesus, 754, d.
- Chelonis*, her filial piety, 627, b. Conjugal, ibid. b.
- Children*, Solon's laws concerning them, 334, a.
- Chilminar* in Persia, by whom adorned, 224, e, and note.
- Chimara*, mountain in Lycia, 338, a.
- the fable of, explained, 337, b. 394, note (N).
- Chios*, by whom founded, 369. Revolts from the Athenians, 521, a. Makes a treaty confederacy against them, 542, e.
- Chlorinus*, outwitted by Soux, king of Sparta, 404, a.
- Chonaspes* river, whether the same with the Eulens, 59, note (E).
- Chomer*, capital of Basiria, 246, note.
- Chonos* in Phrygia. Vid. Coleff. 293, c.
- Chreocopida*, what, 429, c.
- Chryse*, the wife of Dardanus, her dowry, 312, a.
- Chrysorrhoas* river in Lydia. Vid. Pactolus, 329, c.
- Cinxares*, king of Media, his character and exploits, 16, c. Defeated and driven out by the Scythians, ibid. & seq. His treachery to them, 17. War with the Lydians, 18. Resumes the siege of Nineveh, ibid. & seq. His other conquests jointly with the king of Babylon, 19. 20.
- II. his reign and war with Neriglissar, 21. The Darius of Daniel, ibid. f. Destroys Babylon, ibid. & seq. Divides the empire into 120 provinces, 22, c. Promotes Daniel, ibid. d.
- Cidaris*, or Persian diadem, described, 58, c.
- Cilicia*, whence so called, 339. Described, 340. Its cities, rivers, &c. ibid. & seq. Government, and various fates, 341, & seq. Kings, 342, & seq. Invaded by Alexander, 157, & seq.
- Cilicians*, their treachery and cruelty past into a proverb, 342, and note. By whom conquered, ibid. & seq.
- Cimmerians* invade Asia-Minor, 303, d. Take Sardis from the Lydians, 334, a.
- Cimon* chosen admiral of Athens, 481, e. His character, ibid. & seq. Conquests in Cyprus, 132, d. 482, & seq. Reduces Chersonesus, and the Thasians,

I N D E X.

- fiatus*, 483, & seq. Beats the Persians by sea and land, 133. Assists the Lacedæmonians, 484. 594. Tried for treason, 486, & seq. Banished into Cyprus, 140, f. 487, b. His service repulled by the Athenian general, 488, a. Made admiral of the Persian fleet, 141, a. Recalled, 489, d. Makes a descent into Cyprus, ibid. f. His death and character, 490, b, and note.
- Cinadæ's* conspiracy discovered, 607, & seq.
- Circassian* Tartary, part of Scythia, 267, c.
- Cissidas*, general of the Gauls, assists the Spartans, 118.
- Cithæraan* mount described, 358, d.
- Citizens*, Solon's laws concerning them, 433, c. and f. Very few in Athens, 427, d. How admitted, 488, a.
- of Sparta, their number, &c. 561, c.
- Clazomenæ*, by whom founded, 369, d. The state of it, 752.
- Cleo*, a famous robber, 293, c. and note (M).
- Cleombrotus*, king of Sparta, 615. Invades Bœotia, 616. Slain at Leuctra, ibid.
- II. deposes and succeeds Leonidas, 637, a. Banished, ibid. c.
- Cleomenes*, king of Lacedæmon, invades Athens, 446, c.
- his character, 583, d. War with the Argives, ibid. & seq. His interview with Aristagoras, 587, note. Runs mad, 584. Kills himself, 459, b. 584, &c.
- the son of Leonidas, 619, a. Opposeth the Achaans, ibid. c. Restoreth the Spartan glory, ibid. & seq. Kills the ephori, 630, a. Invades Achaia, 631. Takes Argos, ibid. Megalopolis, ibid. b. Harasseth Antigonus, ibid. c. Defeated by him, ibid. d. His sad end, ibid. f. Vindicated against Phylbus, &c. 633, note.
- general of the Peloponnesian descent into Asia, 506, b.
- Cleomeic* war, the cause of it, 630, & seq. 645, and note. The success of it, ibid. & seq.
- Cleomeira*, daughter of Tros, 314, b.
- Cleon*, an Athenian orator, sent to take Sphacteria, 509. Makes a descent into Thrace, 512. Deceived and killed by Brasidas, ibid. and 597, c.
- Cleondrides's* treachery punished with death, 595, d.
- Glennyms* cabals against his nephew Areus, 622, d.
- Cleophon* assassinated at Athens, 529, a.
- Cleinas*, king of Sicyon, killed, 643, note (B).
- Clinor*, king of Arcadia, 379.
- Clisthenes*, head of the Acmeonian faction, 456, d. Banished, ibid.
- Clytemnestra*, her fabulous birth, 401, note. Agamemnon's faithless wife, 357, c. Killed by Orestes, ibid.
- Cnidus*, a city in Doris, 759, b.
- Codrus*, the noble king of Athens, sacrifices his life for his country, 368, & seq.
- Coir*, first invented by the Lydians, 331, f.
- of iron, invented by the Lacedæmonians, 565, c.
- Colchian's* tribute to the kings of Peſia, 69, a.
- Colchis*, part of Scythia, 267, c.
- Colophon*, by whom founded, 369, d. The state of it, 753, b.
- Colosse*, a city in Phrygia, 293, c.
- Comœis*, single, the Grecian way of determining disputes, 560, b.
- Coron* succeeds Alcibiades, 528, b. Is victorious, ibid. c. Beats the Lacedæmonians at sea, 143, d. 528, d. Engages the Persians on the side of the Athenians, 536, b. 559, b. His success in it, ibid. & seq. Returns to and rebuilds Athens, ibid. f. and 537, a. Defeated by Lyander, 602, d. Accused before Artaxerxes, 144. Condemned, ibid. c.
- Contracts*, how made among the Scythians, 273.
- Coom*, the son of Antenor, killed by Agamemnon, 315, b.
- Coors* confederates against Athens, 542, c.
- Copais*, the spring head of the Asopus, 361, d. Described, 370, d. 344, note (G).
- Coreyrea* invaded by the Corinthians, 496, c. The dreadful sedition of, 506, & seq. 509, & seq.
- Coreyreans*, a colony of Corinth, 495. Their war with the Epidamnians, ibid. & seq. Treachery to the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, ibid. e.
- Corinth*, the kingdom of, part of ancient Greece, 344 h. Described, 390, a. When and by whom founded, 391. Subdued by the Heracleids, ibid. d. The whole duration of its government, 393.
- the city of, by whom built, 390, c. Why so called, ibid. Why called Heliopolis, ibid. d. Described, 391, a, b. Its situation, opulence, &c. ibid. c. Buildings, ibid. & seq. Besieged by Agésilas, 612, f. Surprised by Aratus, 643, and note. Accedes to the Achaan league, ibid. & seq. Taken and burnt by the Romans, 698, & seq.
- Corinthian* order, whence so called, 361, c. metal, 699, b, and note.
- Corinthians* given to traffick, 391, a. 392, b. Their character, antiquity, government, and kings, ibid. & seq. Subdued by the Dores, 394, d. Invade Coreyrea, 496, c. Engage them at sea, 497. Their politic treatment of their prisoners, 506, & seq. Refuse the Nicæan peace, 512, f. Join with the Achaans, 643, & seq. and note. Affront the Roman deputies, 695, a. Subdued, and sold for slaves, 698, & seq.
- Corinthus*, whose son he was, 390, d. and note.
- Coritus*, king of Samothrace, 319, a. and note (I).
- Coromæa* plundered by the Romans, 720, f. 744, f. and note (H).
- Corybantes*, whence descended, 297, d. and note (W).
- Corybas*, the son of Cybele, by Jafus, ibid.
- Cotys*, second king of Lydia, 332, b.
- Cowardice*, how punished by the Athenians, 433, c.
- Cranæus*, king of Athens, 363, c. Dethroned, ibid.
- Crateſiclea*, queen of Sparta, her love to her country, 629, f. 631, f. &c.
- Creon*, prince of Thebes, his cruelty to his niece, 374, d. The same with Glaucus, 398, b, and note (L).
- the first annual archon at Athens, 418.
- Cresphontes*, chief of the Heracleids, made king of Mycenia, 360, b. Murdered by his nobles, ibid.
- Cret*, the son of Jupiter, gives name to the island of Crete, 263, b.
- Cretan* historians account of Jupiter, ibid.
- laws and polity, 559, b.
- Criasus*, king of Argos, 353, a.
- Critias*, one of the thirty tyrants of Athens, 530, c. His treachery to Themistocles, ibid. To Alcibiades, 532, note (N).
- Critolaus*, Achaan prætor, inflames the people against Rome, 693, & seq. Declares war against them, &c. 695, b. Defeated and killed by Metellus, ibid.
- Cræſus* king of Lydia's conquests and wealth, 335. Interview with Solon, ibid. d. and notes. Allied with the king of Babylon, 90, 335. Commands his army against Cyrus, ibid. Taken prisoner at Sardis, 91, & seq. Restored to his kingdom, 92, b. 336, & seq.
- Crotoniates* embrace the Achaan league, 642, a.
- Crotopus*, king of Argos, 353, a.
- Cryptia*, a barbarous Spartan custom, 567, and note.
- Ctesias*, an account of him and his writings, 238, note.
- Cubele*, vid. Cybele, 297.
- Cunaxa*, the famous battle of, 139, a.
- Cupid*, a famed statue of him at Parium, 324, c.
- Curetes*, their office among the Cætes, 251, c, and note. Pluronians called Curetes, 410, d.
- Cybele*, the chief deity of the Phrygians, 297, a. The ceremonies of her worship, 299. Her priests, ibid. & seq. Her different genealogies, ibid. & seq.

seq. Worshipped by the Trojans, 309, c. Her temple burnt at Smerdis, 109, d.
Cybernisfens, king of Lycia, 338, & seq.
Cycnus, king of Colone in Troas, his character, 307, e.
Cyllene mount in Arcadia, 379, a, and note.
Cylon's insurrection at Athens, 422, & seq.
Cyme, al. Cuma, metropolis of Æolis, 759, a.
Cynegyras, the Athenian, his signal bravery, 462, f.
Cynics, whence so called, 437, b.
Cynarta, king of Lacedæmon, 400, d.
Cynofarges at Athens, what, 437, a.
Cynofureans, a colony of the Argives, 404, c.
Cypsus revolts from the Persians, 110, a. Reduced again, ibid. Invaded by the Athenians, 131.
 Recovered by Evagoras, 145, a. Invaded by the Persians, ibid. b, &c. Taken, 146, b.
Cypsellus, king of Arcadia, kills the tyrant of Mycenia, 388, b.
 — a Lapithæ, becomes king of Corinth, 392, & seq. and not.
Cythes, what, 435.
Cyrene ravished by Jupiter, 383, note (F).
 — the fountain of, ibid.
Cyrra, the sea-port of Dalchos, 389, d. Its arsenal, 427, c. Its territories invaded by the Phocians, 388, & seq.
Cyrræans attempt against Dalchos punished, 426, & seq.
Cyrus, his first exploit under his grandfather, 21, & seq. Fabulous birth and exploits according to Herodotus, 82. Brought up by the king's herdsman, 83. Discovered, and sent to his parents, 85, & seq. His stratagem to subdue the Persians, ibid. Conquers the Medes, 86. Keeps his grandfather prisoner, ibid. Killed by the queen of Scythia, 87, b. A more authentic account of him out of Xenophon, 87, & seq. Called out of Persia by Ciaces, ibid. & seq. Assists him against the king of Babylon, 88, d. Kills him, ibid. c. Wars against Croesus, 91. Takes him in Sardis, 92. His behaviour towards him, ibid. note (K). Takes Babylon by stratagem, 93. Ascends the throne, 94. His favour to the Jews, ibid. b, c. Death, 95.
 — the son of Darius Nebus made governor of Asia Minor, 136, b. His pride and cruelty, ibid. c. Conspires against his brother, 137. Is sentenced to death, ibid. Causes a revolt, ibid. & seq. His fleet and army, 138, c. Killed in battle, 139, c. Prophecies concerning him, 208, note.
Cytherea, island, taken by the Athenians, 510, d.
 Filled with Messenians, 596, f.
Cytheræon mount in Phocis, 387.
Cyzicum, a famed city of Mysia, described, 323, b, & seq.
Cyzicus, king of Mysia, killed by the Argonauts, ibid.

D.

D Acians. Vide Geta, 268, a.
Dalhyli, why so called, 297, d.
Dandachim, their dignity, 464, note.
Dahac. Vid. Dehoc, 179, d.
Damarratus, king of Sparta, 583. Deposed by his colleague, ibid. f. Retires into Persia, 584.
Damascus betrayed to Farmenio, 160, & seq.
Damajichon, king of Thebes, 375, c.
Damastrius, Ætolian prætor, suspends the assembly's resolutions, 707, & seq. Sent to engage Nabis against the Romans, 712. Besieged and taken at Heraclea, 721.
Damocles's surprising chastity, 555, d.
Danae debauched by Jupiter, 354, c.
Danaus, king of Argos, his severity against his daughter, ibid. c.
Dances used by the Phrygians in their worship, 300.
Daniel promoted under Ciaces, 22, d. Delivered from the lions, ibid. c, f.

Danube separates the Celts from Scythia, 226, 228.
Darab I. prince of Persia, according to oriental writers, exposed in a wooden ark, 225. Acknowledged by his mother, 226. Succeeds her, ibid. & seq. Wars with the king of Macedon, 227.
 — II. his war with Alexander king of Macedon, 228, & seq. Defeated by him twice, ibid. & seq. Murdered by his own subjects, 229, & seq.
Darab-gerd, a city built by Darab, 227, f.
Dardana, built by Dardanus, 312.
Dardanelis, why so called, 305, b. note (B).
Dardania. Vid. Troas, 288, & seq.
Dardanius invade Macedon, 667, b.
Dardanus in Phrygia Minor, 305, b. Marries the daughter of Teucer, 311, c. His descent and reign, 312, a.
Daris, an ancient gold coin, 62, c.
Darius the Mede. Vid. Ciaces II. Various sentiments about him, 23, note (C). 93, e.
 — one of the Persian nobles, chosen king by the neighing of his horse, 103, c. Revenue, 104, a. Long siege of Babylon, ibid. & seq. Takes it by stratagem, 105, c. His unsuccessful expedition against Scythia, ibid. & seq. Fleet and conquest of India, 107, b. War with the Ionians, ibid. & seq. First attempt against Greece unfortunate, 111, c. Second attempt, ibid. e, & seq. Numerous army, 112. Defeated by the Athenians, ibid. f. His loss at sea and land, 113, and note. His design against Greece and Egypt, 114. His death and character, ibid. & seq.
 — the son of Xerxes unjustly murdered, 129.
 — Nebus, natural son of Artaxerxes, mounts the Persian throne, 134, d. His severe and uneasy reign, ibid. & seq. Loses Egypt, ibid. Too much influenced by his queen, 135, a. His death and last words to his son, 136, f.
 — Colomannus raised to the Persian throne, 154, c. His pedigree and character, ibid. c. Invaded by the Greeks, 155. Defeated at Granicus, ibid. & seq. Loses several cities and provinces, 156, & seq. — His best general, Memoon, ibid. Goes to succour Cilicia, 158. The order of his march, ibid. c. Defeated near Issus, 159, & seq. His haughty letter to Alexander, 161, d. Offers of a ransom for his family, 162, b. Raises a new army, 163, d. Makes new offers of peace, ibid. & seq. Rejected by Alexander, 164. Defeated near Arbela, 165, & seq. Flies into Armenia, 166, c. Into Media, 168. Treacherously imprisoned by his own generals, ibid. & seq. His dying message to Alexander, 170, c. Death, character, and burial, ibid. d, e.
Dares, Persian, their syrup preferable to honey, 40, d.
Datis, general of Darius, his expedition against Greece, 111, & seq. Shameful defeat, 112, c.
Daulian women unnatural repast, 389, note.
Daulis, a city in Phocis, ibid. d.
Dannus, king of Apulia, relieved by Diomedes, king of Argos, 369, b.
Dead sea, its various names, 266, a.
Deceleæ, the castle of, seized by the Lacedæmonians, 518, & seq. Fortified, ibid. & seq. 599, b.
Delalus polishes the ancient Greeks, 343, b.
Dehoc, sixth king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 179, d. His cruel reign and banishment, ibid. & seq.
Deianira, princess of Scyrus, debauched by Achilles, 585, c.
 — the daughter of Oeneus, married to Heracles, 410, c. Her fatal jealousy and death, 401, note (K).
Dejoces, king of Media, founder of Ecbatan, 2, a. 14, and note. His reign, 10. Policy to obtain the kingdom, 14. Turns tyrant, ibid. Forbids his subjects to approach him, 15, b.

- Deiphontes* made king of Argos, 360, c.
Delium, the battle of, 511.
Delos island taken } by Archelaus, 736.
 — temple plundered }
 — treasure plundered by Pericles, 505, sub not.
Delphi, or Delphos, the city of, described, 388, a.
 Its immense riches, 389, c.
 — the oracle of, how discovered, ibid. b. And temple of, described, ibid. c.
 — besieged by the Cyrræans, 426. Defended by all the Greeks, ibid. Plundered by Xerxes, 123, a. His dreadful punishment, ibid. b. Plundered by Sylla, 738, a.
Delphinium, a criminal court at Athens, 444, a.
Demaratus the banished king of Sparta's gallant behaviour, 120, c, and note, vid. & page 459, b.
Demades and his son put to death by Antipater, 552, & seq.
Demarchi of Athens, their office, 443.
Demetrius, a city in Thessaly, 382, b. Taken by Diocles, 715.
Demetrius Phalereus made governor of Athens 554, a. His great kindness to the Athenians, ibid. b. Ungratefully put to death, ibid. & seq.
 — Polioretes invades Athens, 554, c. Deified by the Athenians, ibid. & seq. Initiated in the mysteries of Ceres, 555, d. Forced out of Greece, ibid. f. Repulsed by the Athenians, ibid. & seq. His generosity to them, 556, c. His attempt against Sparta, 625, a.
 — prætor of Achaia, invades Sparta, 692, b.
Demoi at Athens, 437, b.
Demophon, king of Athens, 368. Erects the court of the Epheta, ibid. Tried by it, ibid. b.
 — king of Corinth, 394, c.
Demosthenes made admiral of Athens, 507, f. Fortifies the promontory of Pylus, 508, b. Defeated at Delium, 511, c. Sent into Sicily, 518. Taken prisoner by the Syracians, 519. Put to death, 520. His character, &c. 544. Philippics, 545. — Cowardly flight at the battle of Cheronea, 548, d. Delivered up to Alexander, 549, e, f. Fined and imprisoned for bribery, 590, c. Flies to Ægina, ibid. d. Poisons himself, 551, e. His character and writings, ibid.
Deryllidas, general of Lacedæmon, his success against the Persians, 140, & seq. 607, c, d. Noble speech to Pyrhus, 622, d.
Deucalion, king of Phthia, 381. Saved from the flood on Parnassus, 387, c.
Diærii, one of the three contending parties at Athens, 427, c.
Dians, Achaan prætor, raises new troubles in Achaia, 691, & seq. Inflames the Achaans against Rome, 693, & seq. His edict to the Achaan cities, 696, a. Cruelties, ibid. & seq. Rash confidence, 697. Defeated by Mummius, ibid. & seq. His desperate end, 698, b.
Diana worshipped by the Lydians, 336, f.
 — Hymnia, by the Arcadians. Her temple at Ephesus described, 754. Statue, 755, a.
 — Trielaria, the feast of, 763, b.
 — inhuman sacrifice of, ibid.
Diaphanes, Achaan prætor, invades Messene, 677, a. Elis, ibid. Recalled by Flaminius, ibid.
Diasia, a feast of the Athenians, 423, b.
Diclys, prince of Seripus, brings up Perseus as his own, 354. Raised to the throne by him, 355, a.
Dimas, the son of Dardanius, his colonies in Asia, 313, a.
Dindymus mount, whence so called, 297, a, and note (T).
Dinocrates, head of the Messenian rebels, 681, d. Beats the Achaans, ibid. f. Kills himself, 683, b.
Diomedon unjustly put to death, 528, & seq. His speech to the Athenians, ibid.
Diopithes's oracle against Sparta, 606, a, and note.
Diocorides, where born, 341, c.
Dis, or Pluto, a prince of Celtic race, 257, c, 263, a, and note.
Divination, used among the Celts, 251, c.
Dodona, the temple of, plundered and burnt, 653, c.
Dorus, brother of Atreus, a Celtic prince, 257, b.
 Places that bear his name, ibid.
Dolopes, where situate, 281, d.
Don river, vid. Tanais, 266, c.
Donades, an Athenian prisoner's old speech to Philip, 548, e.
Donax, or Little Tanais river, 268, c.
Dorians, where situate, 413, b. Invade Peloponnesus, ibid. & sup. pass. Their origin, 759, c. Government, 761. Settlements and cantons in Asia, ibid. & seq. Religion, 762, d.
Doric dialect and order, ibid. d, 1 and note (G).
 — faction in Sicily, 507, c.
Deridas, king of Corinth, invaded by the Dorians, 394, c.
Dorimachus, an infamous Ætolian robber, 650, c. Invades Epirus, 693, c. Thessaly, 657, c.
Doris, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. Its situation, names, &c. 413, b. Chief cities, 759, a. Invaded by the Phocians, 595, a.
 — the metropolis of the Dorians, by whom built, 413.
Doryssus, king of Lacedæmon, 404, d.
Draco, archon of Athens, gives them a body of laws, 419. His character and death, ibid. His laws abrogated by Solon, 429, f.
Drangiana, a province of Persia, described, 19, a.
Dreps, how regulated by Lycurgus, 562, f.
Drunkennes abhorred by the Syrthians, 277. By the Lacedæmonians, 562, d.
Dryopes, where situate, &c. 412, and note (F).
Dulichium, island of, 408, note (M).
Dunhavand, al. Damavand, a remarkable mountain in Persia, 221.
Dwina river in Scythia, 268.
Dyme, the city of, declares for the Ætolians, 706, c.

E.

- Earth and water demanded in token of subjection, 65, a, and note.
Earthquakes in Greece, suspend the Peloponnesian war, 507, f.
Eating how regulated by Lycurgus, 562, a.
Ecbatan, metropolis of Persia described, 2, a. Said to have been built by Semiramis, ibid. Not razed by Nabuchodonosor, 16, c.
Echemus, king of Arcadia, assists Athens against the Heracids, 379, a.
Echmis, king of Arcadia, 380.
Eclipse of the sun foretold by Thales, 18, c. — Of the moon scares the Macedonians, 163, c. How interpreted by the Egyptian soothsayers, 164, a.
Ecclesia, the grand court of Athens, 439, a. Its power, ibid. &c.
Eetion, king of Thebes, killed by Achilles, 342, & seq.
Egestines of Sicily, succoured by the Athenians, 516, & seq.
Elam, the son of Shem, the father of the Persians, 26, & seq. and note (A).
 — the kingdom of, 20, note (A). 57, a. 81, c.
Elatea, taken by king Philip, 548, a.
Eleans league with the Athenians, 514, and note.
 Quarrel with the Lacedæmonians, 598. Invaded by them, 599, f. Make peace with them, 600, a. Join with Antiochus, 718, d.
Eleasus, prince of Arcadia, settles Phocis, 379, a. Founder of Elatea, 389, c.
Elestra, daughter of Atlas, and mother of Dardanius, 312, & seq. and note (I).
Elements, all revered by the Persians, 74, c. Way and laws for preserving them from pollution, ibid.
Elens, king of Elis, 407, d.

Elusis,

- Eleusis, a sea-port of Attica, 361, b, and note (A).
The temple of Ceres's rites performed in, 732, sub not.
- Eleusians murdered by the 30 tyrants, 531, b.
- Elis, kingdom, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. So named from Elisba, 405, b. Its situation and extent, ibid. c, d. By whom founded, 407, b. Kings, &c. ibid. & seq. Ruined by war and pestilence, 409, a.
— the metropolis of that kingdom, 405, c.
- Elymais, whence so called, 314, d.
- Emathia, so called from Emathion, king of Troas, 316, f.
- Empiramus takes Era by treachery, 580.
- Enchela chuse Cadmus their general, 372, b.
- Endius, Lacedam. propolal for peace rejected by the Athenians, 526.
- Endymion, king of Elis, 407, b. The fable of him, ibid. note (H).
- Epaminondas opposes the Spartans in Boeotia, 616, b. Defeats them, ibid. c. Invades Laconia, 617, d. Rebuilds Messene, ibid. f. Breaks into Peloponnesus, 618. Frustrated in his attempt against Sparta, 619, c. Against Mantineæ, ibid. e. Slain, ibid. f.
- Epew, king of Elis, the supposed contriver of the Trojan horse, 407, c.
- Ephesus, a city of Lydia, 289, c. Metropolis of Ionis. By whom founded, 369. Opens its gates to Alexander, 156. Greatly enriched by Alexander, ibid. d. The ancient and modern state of it, 753, & seq. Tyrants of it, 755, e. How devoted to Diana, ibid. f. Ruined by Sylla, 66, & seq.
— the temple of, the only one that escapes the Persian fury, 127, c.
- Ephesian letters, a proverb, 756, a, and note.
- Epheta, the court of, why instituted, 368. Their power, &c. 421, c. 430, c.
- Ephialtes head of an Athenian party, 485. His character, ibid. & seq. Assassinated, 487, b.
- Ephira, al. Ephyræ, by whom built, 321, f. — the ancient name of Cornith, 390, c.
- Ephori of Sparta, by whom instituted, 574, a. and note. Their office, &c. ibid. Become tyrants, 626, d. 650, note (U). Murdered, ibid. & 634, d.
- Epicene, sister and concubine of Cimon, 406. 490, note. Her brave speech to Pericles, 495, c.
- Epimenidia, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. Whence so called, 412, a.
- Epistetus, part of Phrygia Minor, 304, e.
- Epidamnians, a colony of Corinth, 495, d. Assisted by them, ibid. & seq.
- Epidauros, a famous sea-port in Lacedamon, 396, d. Invaded by the Athenians, 515, d.
— the temple of, plundered by Sylla, 738, c.
- Epigoni, whence so called, 375. The war of, ibid. & seq.
- Epimenides, a great diviner, expiates the Athenians, &c. 423, c.
- Epiphania, a city in Cilicia Proper, 341, b.
- Epirots join with Antiochus, 718. Subdued by the Romans, 746, & seq. Sold for slaves, ibid.
- Epirus, the kingdom of, described, 746, c. Subdued and plundered by the Romans, ibid. & seq. Its various fates since, 747, a, b.
- Epistates, their office at Athens, 439, c.
- Epistropus, king of Lyrnessus in Cilicia, 343, a.
- Epizelus, a strange story of him, 463, a.
- Eponymos, the first archon of Athens. Why so called, 442, d.
- Epopeus, king of Sicyon, 350. Ravishes Antiope, 372, a. Dies of his wounds, 473, a.
- Epopeus, at Athens, what, 732, note.
- Epirus I. king of Arcadia, bit to death by a viper, 379, b.
— II. struck blind for his presumption, 380, a.
- Er, the name of the Pamphylian Zoroaster, 205, b.
- Era fortified by the Messenians, 579. Belieged by the Lacedamonians, ibid. Betrayed to them, 580.
- Erato, a nymph, mother of Azæus king of Arcadia, 379, a.
- Erechtheus, king of Athens, 363, d. Founder of the rites of Ceres, 731, sub not.
- Eretria taken and destroyed by the Persians, 112, a, 460, c.
- Eretræan prisoners sent to people Cissia, 113, c.
— betray the Athenians, 525, b.
- Ergatai, Athenian Craftsmen so called, 438, a.
- Erichonius, king of Troas, 313, b.
— king of Athens, 363, c. The fable of his birth, ibid. note (F).
- Erigon, river in Thessaly, 382, a.
- Eriskra, by whom founded, 369, d. Described, 752, d.
- Erineus, a city of the Dorians, 413, d.
- Erycibron, the only son of Cecrops, his death, 363, b.
- Eryxias, last archon of Athens, 369, f.
- Estibiffar. Vide Laodicea, 292, d.
- Estates, laws against dissipating them, 432, e.
- Estiotis, part of ancient Greece, 344, b.
- Escacles, king of Thebes, his injustice to his brother, 358. The cause of a bloody war, ibid. & seq. and 373, & seq. Kills, and is killed by him, 374, d.
- Evagoras, king of Cyprus, invaded by the Persians, 145. Assisted by the Athenians, ibid. Forced to yield, 146.
- Eubæa invaded by the Athenians, 457, c. Persians, 460, c. Athenians, 492, a. Revolts from them, 525, b. Joined to Boeotia by an isthmus, 526, c. Taken by the Spartans, 601, d. By Antiochus, 718.
- Eubia, a Colchite beauty, married to Antiochus, 719, b.
- Euclidas defeated at Selasia, 649, b.
- Eudamidas prince of Sparta's ill success in Thrace, 614, c. Succeeds Agis, 622, a.
- Evenus, king of Lyrnessus in Cilicia, 343, a.
— river of Ætolia, 409, & seq.
- Evephnus's treachery causes the Messenian war, 570, c.
- Evil-Merodach invades Media, 21, a. Beaten, ibid. Sentiments of the learned about him, 24, & seq. Vide note (C).
- Eumenes's alliance rejected by the Achaans, 679, d.
- Eumolpus, the supposed institutor of Ceres's rites, 732, sub not.
- Eumolpida, Ceres's priesthood in their family, 733, sub not.
- Eunonus, king of Lacedamon, 404, d. Killed, ibid. e.
- Eunuchs, by whom first made, 7, and note (I). 62, b.
- Euphaes, king of Messenia, invaded by the Spartans, 571, & seq. His death, 573, d.
- Eupolemus succours Ambracia, 728, b.
- Euratus Achaan deputy's speech to the Roman senate, 689, c.
- Euripus. Vide Negropont, 370, d.
- Eurotas founder of Lacedamon, 395, b.
— a famous river of Sparta, 39, b, c.
- Eurybiades, Spartan admiral, surprises the Persian fleet, 123, c. 589, b.
- Eurycrates I. king of Sparta, 576, e.
— II. 582, b.
- Eurylochus betrays Demetrias to the Ætolians, 715, d.
- Eurymedon, Athenian general, sent into Sicily, 510, & seq. Slain at Syracuse, 519, d.
- Euripylus, the son of Telephus king of Mysia, 327, c.
- Eurytheneus and Procles, joint kings of Lacedamon, 398, a.
- Eurytheneus king of Mycenia's hatred to Hercules, 355, & seq.
- Eurythus, king of Oechalia, robbed by Hercules, 400, c.
— a blind Spartan, his brave death, 589, not.
- Euryponside, } whence so called, 404.
Eurytionide, }
- Euthria, taken by the Greeks, burns herself, 317, d.
- Euxine sea, whence so named, 309, a.
- Exercises in Sparta, how regulated, 564, & seq.
- Expiations, to whom ascribed, 424, note. How performed, ibid.

P.

Fables, why mixed with antient history, 343, note.
Fabulous and heroic times, a general account of them, ibid. and note.
Faëstis of Asia kept at Philadelphus, 328.
 ——— and public meals appointed by Solon, 442.
 By whom regulated, ibid.
Faramors, the son of the great Russian, killed by Ardschir king of Persia, 223, c.
Peridos, king of Persia. Vide Phridon, 181.
Flamininus Quintus, Roman general, sent against the Spartan tyrant, 636, seq. Treats with him, 637, d. Brings the Achaans over to the Romans, 669. Makes a vain attempt on Corinth, 671, a. A shameful alliance with Nabis, 672. Peace with the Macedon, 673. Causes the universal freedom of Greece to be proclaimed, ibid. Withdraws his Roman garisons, 674. Returns to Rome, ibid. His speech to the Achaans about Zacynthus, 677. Affronted at the pride of the Ætolians, 709, c. Makes peace with Philip, 710, & seq. His speech to the Ætolian assembly, 713. Rejected, ibid. Inveighed against by the Ætolian deputy, 717. His pleasant speech to the grand assembly, ibid. c, d. Rebukes the Roman consul at Naupactus, 724. Raises the siege of it, 725, b. Subdues the Bæotians, 743, & seq.
Fire, in what sense worshipped by the antient Persians, 71, d. How preserved and fed, 73, a. Ceremony of praying to it, 78, c.
Fleece, golden, what, 383, note (G). 385, note (K).
Flutes, a martial instrument of the Greeks, 403, c.
Fortune, the temple of, at Elis, 405, d.
Fountain of the horie. Vide Pegasus, 390, b.
Fourtissar river mistaken for the Granicus, 325, note.
Fulvius, M. Nobilior, besieges Ambracia, 727, & seq. Takes it, 729, c.
Funerals among the Scythians, how performed, 272, 277.—Solon's laws concerning them, 433. How performed to the slain at Athens, 501, & seq. How regulated by Lycurgus, 560, & seq.

G.

Galatians, antient Gomerians, 245, & seq. 295, d.
Galen born at Pergamos, 325, f.
Gallus, river, 297, 299.
Gameroon, in Persia, its deadly heats, 36, note.
Ganymedes, the son of Tros, abused by Tantalus, 313, & seq.
Garsjavesch, prince of the Turks, assassinates the prince of Persia, 193, c. Put to death for it by Russian, ibid. f.
Gaugamela, the battle of, 165, & seq.
Gauls. Vide Gomerians, 241, & seq. Sent to aid the Lacedæmonians, 618, c.
Gauri, or Gabres. Vide Perses.
Gaza, metropolis of Media, described, 1.
 ——— taken by Alexander, and put to the sword, ibid. e.
Gedrosia, a province of Persia described, 28, a.
Gelonian Scythians described, 238, 278.
Geta, al. Dacians, where seated, 268, a.
Geneva lake described, 249, a.
George, the Arian bishop, where born, 341, b.
Georgia, a province of Scythia, 267, c.
Georgioi, Athenian farmers so called, 438, a.
Geryon's oxen fetched by Hercules, 356, note.
Gerjchat, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 187, e.
Glamaasp, a famed Persian astrologer, 221, f. Foretels the coming of the Messiah, 222, note.

Glenschild, fifth king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 177, c. His pride and punishment, ibid. & seq.
Glass made at Schiras in Persia, 34, note.
Glauce, the fountain of, why so called, 393, c.
Glauco, king of Corinth, ibid. b.
Gnesios, among the Athenians, what, 437, d.
Gnosius, Jupiter's sepulchre shewn there, 163, b.
Gold first coined by the Lydians, 331, b.
 ——— sand of the river Hermus, 294, d.
 ——— mines seized by the Thasians, 483, & seq.
 ——— fleece. Vide Fleece, 383, note (G). 385, note (K).
Gomer, the eldest son of Japhet, the father of the Gomerians, 243, a. Whether became into Europe, 241. Whether the father of the Phrygians, 295, d.
Gomerang, or Celtic language described, 253. Preserved still by the present Welsh, ibid. & seq. Its affinity to the Hebrew, ibid. sub not.
Gomerians, or Celts, descended from Japhet, 241, & seq. Their various names, 243, note (B), and 245. A different nation from the Scythians, 243, & seq. Their migration into Europe, 244, & seq. 246. Extent of their territories there, 246. Names of their rivers, &c. of Celtic extraction, 249, c. Their government, laws, religion, &c. 250, & seq. Military discipline, language, &c. 253, & seq. Diet, 254, d. Confounded with the Scythians, 256, note. Their kings, 258, & seq. Their kingdom dismembered, 265.
Gordium, a city of Phrygia, described, 295, b. By whom built, 302, c.
Gordius I. ibid. and 296, c. How raised to the Phrygian throne, 301, b. Ties the Gordian knot, ibid. d.
 ——— II. 302, c.
 ——— III. 303. Invaded by the Cimmerians, ibid.
Gorgo, queen of Sparta, her character, 587, note.
Gorgophone, daughter of Persius, married to Oebalus, king of Lacedæmonia, 400, d.
Gorgopus, Spartan general, beaten and killed in Ægina, 538, d.
Graicoi, } antient Grecians, 344, note (B).
Grani, }
Granicus, river in Asia, 325, c.
Greece, antient, described, 344, & seq. Its various names, ibid. & seq. Contended for by the gods, 390, d, and note. The rest vide sub Greeks.
Greece, the states of, engage in the Peloponnesian war, 501, & seq. Visted with dreadful earthquakes, 507, & seq. The Nicean peace, 512. New disorders after it, 513. Divided between aristocracy and oligarchy, 541, b. Its various states after the Achaean league, ibid. & seq. ad fin. Makes a new peace, ibid. Throws off the Macedonian yoke after Philip's death, 549. And after that of Alexander, 550, & seq. Subdued by the Romans, 747, & seq.
Greek historians, their partiality against the Scythians, 273, b.
 ——— tongue affirmed to be the language of the gods, 296, f.
Greeks, the most antient of them. 344, & seq. Their rude beginnings, 345, & seq. Antient government, 346, & seq. Religion, 348, a. Antiquity, ibid. c. Several kingdoms, &c. ibid. & seq. Commonwealths, &c. after the Achaean league, 619, & seq. Their expedition against Troy, 318, & seq. Fleet, 319. Commanders, ibid. & seq. First eight years war, 320, & seq. Infested with pestilence, 321, d. Take and burn Troy, ibid. d. The various fates of their chiefs, ibid. & seq.
 ——— invaded by Xerxes, 118, & seq. Their brave defence, 120, & seq. Defeat at Thermopyla, 121, & seq. Their fleet, 123, c. Victorious over the Persians, 124, d. Force them out of Greece, 126, d. Victorious by sea and land on the same day, ibid. & seq. Make peace with Alexander, 132, & seq. Assist Cyrus against his brother, ther, 138. Advance into Perſia, ibid. Their noble retreat after Cyrus's death, 139. f. Invade Perſia, 155. Chufe Alexander their general, ibid. The battle of Granicus, ibid. & ſeq.

I N D E X.

Greeks of Aſia, their hiſtory, 748, ad fin.
Groves ſacred among the Scythians, 272.
Guardians, Solon's laws concerning them, 432. f.
Gulph, Perſian, deſcribed, 37, note (P).
Guslaſp, prince of Perſia, according to oriental writers, rebels againſt his father, 203. c. Forced to fly to Touran; his odd marriage with that king's daughter, ibid. d. Declared king of Perſia by his father, 203. Made a convert to Zoroaſter, 215, & ſeq. Wars with the king of Touran, 219, a. Eſquires his brave ſon Iſphendyar, ibid. & ſeq. Reſigns the crown to his grandſon, 221, b. Whether the ſame with the Greek Hyſtaſpes, ibid. c, d.
Gyants, their war with Jupiter, 261, & ſeq.
Gyges's treaſon againſt Candaules, 333. His reign, ibid.
Gylippus, general of Sparta, relieves Syracufe, 518. His ſucceſs in Sicily, 600, d. Takes the Athenian generals priſoners, 520. Whether chargeable with their death, ibid. note. Banished for theft, 604. His character, ibid. note.
Gylus ſlain by the Locrians, 612, e.
Gythians ſubdued by the Lacedamonians, 396, b.
Gythium, a ſea port of Lacedamon, 396, d. By whom built, ibid. and note (D). Taken and burnt by the Athenians, 489, c. By Nabis, 637, f.

H.

H Alicarnaffus, metropolis of Caria, 759, a. Why excluded the Dorian confederacy, 762. Taken by Alexander, 156, & ſeq.
Hamadan, an opulent city in Parthia, 31, & ſeq.
Hamilcar, general of Carthage, ſerves under Xerxes, 116, e.
Harmoclus, an Athenian, his bravery againſt the Perſians, 476, a.
Harmonia, princeſs of Samothrace, 312, a. Married to Cadmus, 313.
Harpagus, general of Cyrus, bravely oppoſed by the Xanthians, 338, & ſeq. Takes Phoen, 749, a. ——— commanded to kill young Cyrus, delivers him to Mithridate, 82. Aſtyages's brutal revenge againſt him, 84. And his againſt the king, 85, & ſeq.
Harpalus bribes the Athenians to protect him, 550, b.
Harpyes, a fabulous kind of birds, 383, note (H).
Hecatomphonia, what, 579, f.
Hecatompylus, metropolis of Parthia, 31, c. 32, note (I). The ſame with Hiſpahan, ibid.
Heſtor, the ſon of Priam, killed, 318.
Hecuba, Priam's wife, 317, & ſeq.
Hegesandrides takes Euboea, 601, d.
Heireſſer, Solon's laws concerning them, 431, a.
Helen, the fatal Grecian beauty, her fabulous birth, 401, note (L). Whoſe daughter ſhe was, 366, e. Stolen by Theſeus, ibid. & ſeq. Married to Menelaus, 318, b. Stolen by Paris, ibid. e. Cauſes the Trojan war, ibid. Whether detained in Egypt, 320.
Helenus, the ſon of Priam, 318. Retires into Macedonia, 322, c. ——— the ſon of Dracalion, the ſuppoſed father of the Aeleneſ, 759, c.
Helian court at Athens, 444, d, & ſeq.
Helicam, ſon-in-law to king Priam, 315, c.
Helice, metropolis of Achaia Propria, 416, c.
Helicon, mountain in Phocis, 387, e. In Boeotia, 379.
Heliopolis, a name given to ſeveral Greek cities, 390, & ſeq.
Helotes, al. Helotes, enſlaved by the Lacedamonians, 396, b. Their grievous puniſhment, 397, b, and note (E). Miſerable ſlavery, 567, and note. Rebellion, 594, d. Butchered by Nabſis, 637, a.

Hellas, Ellis, whence ſo called, 405, b.
Helleneſ, ancient Grecians, 344, c.
Helleſpont, what, 305, note (B).
Helleſpontiac, part of Phrygia Minor, 304, c.
Helum river in Scythia, 267.
Hemeſtris, Xerxes's queen, ſeveral inſtances of her cruelty, 128, & ſeq.
Heneſi chuſe Autenor their head, 315, a.
Heptapylus, Thebes ſo called for its ſeven gates, 371, b.
Heraclen, 693, note (B). Beſieged by the Achaens, 695, d. Taken by the Romans, 721.
Heraclida, a race of Lydian kings, 330, a. ——— deſcended from Hercules, ibid. e. Invade Peloponneſus, 359, c. Plagued by Apollo, ibid. e. Subdue the Corinthians, 392. And the whole peninsula, ibid. & alib. paſſ. Vid. & 759, & ſeq.
Hercules, how many of that name, 355, note (H). ——— the ſon of Jupiter by Alcmena, ibid. c. Kills a lion when a child, 355, d. His twelve labours, ibid. & ſeq. and note (I). Loſes his boy Hylas in the Argonautic expedition, 383, note (H). His revenge againſt the king of Oechalia, 400. Againſt Hippocoon, king of Sparta, 401, a. Leaves that kingdom in truſt of Tyndareus, ibid. Kills the ſons of Aſtor, and dethrones Augens, 408. Kills Laomedon, and four of his ſons, 317, c. His laſt exploits and death, 401, note (K). ——— the print of his foot on a ſtone, 269, b.
Herean games deſcribed, 705, note.
Herna of Athens defaced in one night, 517, b.
Hermes, a great philoſopher, counſellor to Saturn, 260, b. Mercury, why called by that name, 265, d.
Hermione, the wife of Cadmus, her original, 371, & ſeq.
Hermodica, the wife queen of Midas, 302, b.
Herſe, the daughter of Cecrops, puniſhed for her curioſity, 363, note (F).
Heſione daughter of Laomedon, taken by Hercules, 317, b. Suppoſed the cauſe of the Trojan war, 318, d.
Heſperian apples fetched away by Hercules, 356, note.
Heſtia in Euboea taken by the Athenians, 492, a.
Hierapolis in Phrygia deſcribed, 293.
Hieromnoma, wife of Aſſaracus, king of Troy, 314, b.
Hierophontes, the prieſts of Ceres ſo called, 733, note.
Hippadaſelontes, ſecond rank of Athenians, 429, & ſeq.
Hipparchus, the ſon of Piſiſtratus, 451, & ſeq. His reign and character, 453. Killed by Harmodius, ibid. & ſeq.
Hippias, the ſon of Piſiſtratus, 451, f. Whether the eldeſt, 452, a. His cruel reign, 454, & ſeq. Expelled, 455, & ſeq. Retires to Sigeum, 458. Cabals with the Perſians, ibid. His dream and death, 463, c, and note.
Hippobolon and Hippim, the ancient names of Argos, 350, f.
Hippocoon, king of Lacedamon, killed by Hercules, 400, & ſeq.
Hippocrates, the father of Piſiſtratus, 452, note (O).
Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons, her conteſt with Theſeus, 279, note. Married to him, 366, note.
Hippolytus, the ſon of Theſeus, his chaſtity fatal, 367, note.
Hippo-kas heires, whence ſo called, 369, note.
Hippomedes, archon of Atrienſ, reduced, 369, e. His cruelty, ibid. note (N).
Hippopodes, why ſo called, 268, note (E).
Hippoſous, king of Arcadia, 379, e.
Homai, al. Chamani, queen of Perſia, according to oriental writers, 125, c. Leaves her crown to her ſon Darab, 226. Her ſtately palace at Iſtaſchr, ibid.

I N D E X.

Homer's writings found by Lycurgus, 559.
Horses esteemed among the Scythians, 272, f.
 — a fine breed of, in Argolis, 350, f.
 — in Thessaly, 382, d.
Hushang, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 176, c.
Hyampolis, the battle of, 386, c.
Hyantes, whether ancient Greeks, 345, b. Expelled Baotia by Cadmus, 372, a.
Hyantides, king of Corinth, invaded by the Dores, 394, c.
Hyantidis, one of the ancient names of Baotia, 370, c.
Hydra killed by Hercules, 356, note.
Hylinus's settlement in Thermopyra, 279, note.
Hyllus, the son of Hercules, killed in single combat, 356, b.
Hypasha, metropolis of Thessaly, 382, b. General assembly of the Ætolians, 722, c. 726, d.
Hyperborean sea. Vid. Dead sea, 266, a.
Hyperboreans were men-eaters, 269, a.
Hypermetestra, daughter of Danaus, saves her husband, 353, d.
Hyrcania, a province of Persia, described, 30, d. Abounds with wild beasts, 43, d.
Hyllian's treachery to the Scythians, 106, c. Rewarded by Darius, 107, note (T). Crucified for joining with the Ionians, 111, a.
Hythaspes introduces learning into Persia, 62, e.

I.

I*acik*. Vid. Iaxartes, 267, d.
Iancyrus king of Scythia's answer and presents to Darius, 283. Defeats him, 284, & seq.
Janus, king of the Aborigines, 261, b.
Jardanes, king of Lydia, 332, e.
Jasius, husband of Cybele, 297, note (W).
 — prince of Samothrace, his deities, 312, b.
Jason sent to fetch the golden fleece, 383, e. Assisted by Medea, 384, a. Gets it from Æetes, ibid. d. Banished Thessaly by Pelias's son, 385, a. Goes to Corinth, 393, a. Marries Glauce, ibid. b. His death, ibid. c.
 — prince of Thessaly, assists the Thebans, 616, e.
Javan's posterity the first peoplers of Greece, 345, and note (E).
Iaxartes, river in Scythia, 267, d.
Iberia. Vid. Spain, 244, note (E).
 — another of that name in Scythia, 266, d.
Ichthyophagi, why so called, 276, e.
Ida, mount, 297, 305, b. 307, c.
Idai, why so called, 297, d, and note (W).
Idcus, the son of Dardanius, 313, a.
Idmon, an Argonaut, killed by a wild boar, 384, note (H).
Jerusalem taken by the Persians according to oriental writers, 202, b.
Jews restored by Cyrus, 94. His decree in their behalf, ibid. note (L). Obstructed by the Samaritans, ibid. and 102, f. Resume the building of the temple under Darius, 104, d. Obtain a fresh decree from him, ibid. e. Conquered by the Persians according to oriental writers, 202, b. Favoured by Alexander, 341, c.
Ilium in Phrygia. Vid. Troy, 305, & seq.
 — in Macedonia, by whom built, 320, c.
Ilus the son of Tros builds Ilium, 310, and note. Subdues Tantalus, 315, d. His reign, ibid. Saves the palladium from the flames, ibid. e.
Illyrians overcome by Cadmus, 372, b.
Imaus mountain parts the two Scythia's, 267, b.
Inachus, founder of the Argolic kingdom, 351, & seq.
 — metropolis of Argos, 351, ibid. b.
 — river of Argos, ibid. a.
Inarus causes a revolt in Egypt, 131, b. Reduced by the Persians, 132, b. Crucified, 133, a.

Indathyrus, king of Scythia. Vid. Madjes and Jancyrus, 283, & seq.
India conquered by Darius, 107, c.
Ingratitude punished by the Persian laws, 66, a.
Ino, one of the daughters of Cadmus, 372. Her cruelty and fate, 391, note (G).
Intaphernes, one of the seven Persian conspirators, 103, & seq. Put to death by Darius, 104, b.
Io, the daughter of Inachus, whether ravished by the Phœnicians, 318, c. Why surnamed Phœnia, 352, c.
Iobates king of Lycia's behaviour to Bellerophon, 339, c. 353, c.
Jocasta, the unhappy mother and wife of Oedipus, 373, & seq.
Iole, princess of Oebalia, stolen by Hercules, 401, note (K). Given to his son Hyllus, ibid.
Ion, the son of Xuthus, the supposed father of the Iones, 345, and note. Succeeds Selinus in Ægialia, 414, d. His death, ibid. f.
Iones, the most ancient name of the Greeks, 345, b.
Ionis, part of Asia Proper, 288, & seq. Described, 748. Its various fates, ibid. ad fin.
 — Panionium, what, 761, e, and note.
Ionian confederacy, 369, d. 761, & seq.
 — faction in Sicily, 507, c.
Ionians, their original, 345. 369. 759, b. Go with Nileus in quest of new settlements, 369, d. Drive the Carians and Leleges from Ephesus, 755, d. Their government, 761. Cantons and cities, ibid. & seq. Seize on all the Carian women, ibid. d. Their religion and trade, 762, & seq. Degeneracy, 703, d. Driven out of Asia, 414, & seq. Retire into Asia, 415, b. Treachery to the Scythians, 285, a. Revolt from the Persians, 107. Succoured by the Athenians, 109, a. Their army destroyed by the Persians, ibid. & 110, f. Invaded by Cyrus, 763. Settle in Abdera, 764, d. Courted by Themistocles, ibid. & seq. By Lewtyches, 765, d. Shake off the Persian yoke, 128, b. 765, & seq. Their various fates since, 766, ad fin.
Iphicrates, Athenian general, his character, 537, b. Succeeds Thrahybulus against Rhodes, 538. Commands the auxiliaries against Egypt, 147, e. Falsely accused by the Persian general, 148, f. 541, a. Acquitted, ibid. Raises the siege of Corinth, 613, a.
Iphidamas, the son of Antenor, killed by Agamemnon, 315, b.
Iphigenia worshipped by the Taurian Scythians, 278, a.
Iphisus, prince of Oechalia, killed by Hercules, 400, e.
 — king of Elis, restorer of the Olympic games, 409, b.
Irege, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 182, c. Murdered by his two brothers, 182, b.
Irens in Sparta, their office, 563, d.
Isagoras, head of an Athenian faction, 466, d. Assisted by the Lacedæmonians against his rival, ibid. & seq.
Ismenus river in Baotia, 370, e.
Isphendyax, prince of Persia, defeats the king of Touvan, 219, b. Takes and kills him by a notable stratagem, 320, c. Killed by Ruslan in single combat, 221, a.
Issus, a city in Cilicia Propr. 351, c.
 — the gulph of, ibid.
Istæck, in Persia. Vid. Chilminar, 226, c.
Ister. Vid. Danube, 266, 268.
Isthmian games, their origin, &c. 391, note (G).
Istiaotis, part of Thessaly, 381, a.
Itome built and fortified, 572. Taken by the Lacedæmonians, 576, a. Seized by the Helotes, 595, e.
Juliopolis. Vid. Tarzus, 341, a.
Julius Sextus Roman deputy's speech to the Athenians, 693, c. Outwitted by Critolaus, 694, b.
Juno, Jupiter's queen, 262, a. How worshipped by the Argives, 705, note.

I N D E X

Jupiter worshipped by the Celts, 251, c. His birth concealed by his mother, 260, and note. His other names, 261, and note. Dethrones his father, ibid. Wars with his uncle Titan, ibid. & seq. Divides his empire, 262, & seq. Deflowers his niece Main, 263. Has Mercury by her, ibid. His death and sepulchre, ibid. & seq. Challenged by the Scythians as their progenitor, 283, e. His statue and temple at Cyzicum, 324, a.

K.

K Medianes, the dynasty of, in Persia, 174.
Kalendar, when rectified in Persia, 178, a.
Kaob, a smith, dethrones the tyrant of Persia, 180, d. Made general by the lawful prince, 181.
Keyhostran, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 194, & seq. Invades Turkestan, 196. Conquers it, 197. Resigns the crown to his son, ibid. e. Retires into a cell, ibid. His character and valour, 198, & seq.
Kyklaus, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 191, f. Twice delivered by his general Rufus, 192. Resigns the crown to his grandson, 194. Whether the Nimrod of Moses, 195.
Kykobad, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 190, & seq. Said to have conversed with Samuel, 191, c.
Keyomaras, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 175.
Kilan, a fruitful province of Persia, 31, note (I).
Kuarejm, the province of, why so called, 197, b.

L.

L Abda, the mother of Cypselus, saves him from the Bacchiads, 393, note (I).
Labdacus, king of Thebes, 372, & seq.
Laborosarchod, whether the Belshazzar of Daniel, 24, sub note (C). His tyranny, 89, e. Murdered, 90, a.
Labotas, king of Lacedamon, wars against the Argives, 404, c.
Lacedamon, the son of Eurotas, 395, a. The supposed son of Jupiter, ibid. b, and note (A). — the metropolis of Lacedamonia. Vid. Sparta, 395, &c.
Lacedamonia, whence so called, 395, a. Why called Hecatompolis, 396, note (B). Described, 396, pass. Its government, duration, &c. 383, & seq. Kings, 400, & seq. Why afterwards called Agida and Proclida, 404, b. The rest, vid. sub Laconia &c.
Lacedamonians engage the states of Greece against the Athenians, 501, a. Make a truce with them, 508. Fresh overtures of peace, 512, a. End in a truce, ibid. Followed by a peace, ibid. f. Break it, 513. Beaten by sea and land, 526. Reduce the Athenians, 529, & seq. Make peace with them, 539, a. Subdue the Thebans and other states, ibid. b, c. Renew the war, ibid. & seq. Defeated at Naxos, 540, d. At Lemnades, ibid. f. Their kings from Lycurgus down to the Achaean league, 558. War with the Messenians, 570, & seq. Argives, 572, d. Defeated by Aristodemus, 575, b. By the Messenians, 578, a. Reduce them to slavery, 582, a. Defeated at Thermopyla, 588, and note. Preparation against the Persians, 589, & seq. 589, & seq. Defeat them by sea, and land, 136, & seq. 590. The Athenians, 602. Their decree against them, 603, a. War with Persia, 607. Discovery a conspiracy, ibid. Make a general peace, 144. Grow haughty by it, 614, & seq. Defeated by the Thebans at Leuctra, 616, d. Defeat the Arcadians, 618, e. Thebans, 619. Suffered to alienate their lands, 625, d. Restored to their ancient government, 629, & seq. Defeated at Selasia, 632, & seq. Subdued by the Macedonians, 634. Chuse two new kings, ibid. e. Defeated by the Achaans, 636, a. Enslaved by Nabis, ibid. & seq. Punished by the Ætolians, 639, d. Join with the Achaans, ibid. f. Go over to the Ætolians, 652, e. Make and break the peace with the Achaans, 664, a. Join with the Romans, ibid. Withdraw from the Achaean league, 678. Reduced by Philopamen, 679. Send deputies to the Roman senate, ibid. & seq. Restored to their laws, 800. 681, c. Complain to the Romans against the Achaans, 691. Reimbursed by order of the senate, 699.
Laconia, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. The ancient name of Lacedamon, 395. Its situation, extent, soil, &c. 397. Government under a monarchy, ibid. & seq. Biarchy, 398. Invaded by the Athenians, 489, a. Divided by Lycurgus, 561. Plundered by Conon and the Persians, 143, & alib. By the Helotes, 594. The rest, vid. sub Lacedamon.
Laconic style, what, 564, b.
Ladoga, the lake of, 268.
Lais, an extravagant Corinthian harlot, 391, c.
Lajus, king of Thebes, the father of Oedipus, 373, & seq.
 — king of Elis, 408, & seq.
Lamachus, Athenian admiral, expedition against Heraclea, 511, e. Made Alcibiades's colleague in Sicily, 516. His character, 518, b. Killed at the siege of Syracuse, ibid.
Lambynus supposed the last king of Scythia, 287.
Lamia besieged by the Macedonians, 721, f. Surrendered to the Romans, 722, b.
Lampeto, queen of the Amazons, 279, note.
Lampfacians outwit Alexander, 324, & seq.
Lampfacum, a city in Mysia, by whom built, 524, d. — taken from the Athenians, 529, c.
Lands, how divided by Lycurgus, 561, b.
Laodamas's (king of Thebes) ill success against the Epigoni, 375, a.
Laodicea, a city in Media, described, 2, d. — in Phrygia, 192. Famous for its wool, ibid. e. Destroyed, 193, and note.
Laomedon, son of Ilus, 315, f. Builds the citadel of Troy, 317. His reign and exploits, ibid. pass.
Lapira, where situate, 381, c.
Larissa, a city in Thessaly, 382, a.
Larissa, a river of Arcadia, 706, note (Y).
Las attempted by the Lacedamonians, 678.
Latians, son of Telephus, king of Mysia, 327, d.
Laws, how enacted at Athens, 440, d.
Law suits, how carried on at Athens, 443, & seq. — discouraged by Lycurgus, 565, e.
Leana Athenian courtesan's great constancy, 454, & seq.
Lebedos, by whom founded, 369, d. The ancient state of it, 753.
Lecheum, one of the sea ports of Corinth, 391, a.
Leda, her fabulous offspring, 401, note (L).
Leleges, whether ancient Greeks, 345, b.
Lelex, founder of Lacedamon, ibid.
Lemnian women murder all their males, and turn Amazons, 358, c.
Lemnos, island in the Ægean sea, inhabited by Amazons, 383, note (H). How taken by the Athenians, 466, sub fin. note (U).
Lena, river in Scythia, 267.
Leo, king of Sparta, 582, c.
Leon, king of Lydia, 333, b.
Leonidas, king of Sparta, expedition against Xerxes, 586, & seq. His brave answer to Xerxes, 120, d. His gallant death, 121. 588. His body abused by that monarch, 122. — II. introduces luxury into Sparta, 615, d. Deposed, 627, a. Restored, ibid. e.
Leontidas, Athenian general, branded by Xerxes, 122, sub fin. not. (G).
 — head of the Ionian faction, 597, c.

Leontius,

I N D E X.

Leonsius, treachery to the Achaans, 657, & seq. To Aratus, 658, & seq. Forgiven, 659. c. Raises a tumult at Corinth, 660.

Leosthenes, general of the Greeks, defeats Antipater, 551, & seq. Killed at the siege of Lamia, ibid.

Leotyclides I. chosen king of Sparta, 459. Puts an end to the Persian war, by a complete victory, 126, and 475, &c.

—— II. raised to the crown of Sparta, 584. a. Triumphs over the deposed king, ibid. b. Victorious at Mylate, 592. Dies in exile, 594. a.

—— the son of Agis, excluded the succession, 605, d.

Lephyrium, the grove of, 340, c.

Lesbos island subject to the Trojans, 309, b. Revolts from the Athenians, 505, a.

Leucada, Peninsula, described, 746, a. Betrayed to the Romans, 746, b.

Leucas, metropolis of Acarnania, 745, and note. Taken by Lucius, 745.

Leucopetra, the battle of, 697, c.

Leucophrys. Vide Tenedos, 307.

Leuctra, a city in Lacedamonia, 397, b. The battle of, 616, d.

Liches, a noble Spartan, discovers and carries off Orestes' bones, 380, note (M).

Lilea, a city in Doris, 413, c.

Lipara, in Tuscany, by whom built, 370, a.

Lityerses, king of Celane, his strange character, 303, a.

Locharis seizes the sovereignty of Athens, 556, a. Deposed by Demetrius, ibid. c.

Locman, a Persian philosopher, his character and writings, 198, & seq. Whether the same with Æsop, 199, and note.

Locri, Epizephyrii in Italy, 412, b.

Locris, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. How divided, 412, a. Plundered by the Athenians, 489, a. Invaded by the Phocians, 610, c.

Loenstis pernicious in Persia, Cyprus, &c. 47, c. Destroyed by an extraordinary bird, ibid. & note.

Lohrasp, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 200. Quells his rebellious son, 201. Resigns the crown to him, 202. Retires from the world, ibid. d. Difference of authors about him, 203, pass. His death, 219, c.

Lucullian coin, 738.

Lucullus, Roman general in Greece, ibid.

Lucus, Roman general, subdues Acarnania, 745, &c.

Lud, whether the father of the Lydians, 328, &c.

Luz, what is meant by that word, 328, b.

Lycæum, at Athens, 436, c.

Lycæus Jupiter, } 738, e.
—— games, }

Lycæon, why so called, 376. The fable of him, ibid. note. Second king of Arcadia, 378. His numerous issue, & seq. Cities built by them, ibid. note.

Lycia described, 337.

Lycians side with the Trojans, 319, e. Their original government, religion, &c. 338, & seq. Bravery, ibid. By whom subdued, 339.

Lycomedes, king of Seyros, his reception of Theseus, 367, c. General of Arcadia, killed, 617, e.

Lycortas, Achaean prætor's speech to the States, 680, a. Revenges Philopæmen's death, 682, & seq.

Lycosura, by whom built, 378.

Lycurgus, the infant prince of Nemea, killed by a serpent, 358, c.

—— king of Arcadia, 379, e.

—— the famed Spartan lawgiver refuses the crown, 399. Retires into exile, ibid. Recalled, ibid. New-models the government, ibid. and 557, & seq. His laws, ibid. Approved by the Dæmonic oracle, 560, b. Why not written, 566, f. His death and honours, 568.

—— a private man chosen king of Sparta, 634, e. Defeats the Macedonians, 635, b. The last king of Sparta, ibid. c.

Lycurgus, Lacedamonian general, invades Messenia, 657, e.

Lycus, the son of Pandion, king of Athens, 338, c.

—— the court of, 444, d.

—— river different from the Marfus, 294, c.

Lydia described, 288, & seq. 328, a. Part of Asia Proper, ibid. Antiently called Mæmia, 328, a. Its original, 329, d. Government, soil, religion, &c. 330, & seq. Revolt against Croesus, ibid. note. Laws and customs, 331, a. Remedy against famine, ibid. Riches, ibid. c, f. Monarchs, 332, & seq. Conquered by the Persians, 337.

Lydius, the son of Arys, king of Lydia, 328, a. 332, c.

Lysersius, father of Anemor, 314, d.

Lyncæus, the son of Ægyptus, saved by his wife, 353, c. Made king of Argos, ibid. e.

—— the son of Aphareus, famed for his keen eyes, 402, c.

—— a mountain in Arcadia, 381. A famous pillar erected upon it, ibid.

Lysander, Spartan admiral, his character, 600, f. Victories, 528, c, & seq. Sets up thirty tyrants over Athens, 530, a. 603. Undermines Tissaphernes, 601. Attempts the sovereignty of Greece, ibid. f. Defeats Conon at sea, 519, 602. Demolishes the walls of Athens, 603, b. Outwitted by Pharnabazus, 604, & seq. Accompanies Agésilæus into Asia, 607, & seq. Endeavours to raise an insurrection, 609, and note. Sent against the Phocians, 611, a. Killed before Haliartus, ibid. c.

—— one of the Spartan ephori, offers a rhetra for a new partition, 612. Rejected, ibid. e.

M.

Macedonia invaded by the Romans, 735, d.

Macedonian war, 542, & seq.

Macedonians invade Persia, 15, & seq. Defeat the Persians, 159, & seq. Gain an immense booty, 160, & seq. Frighted by an eclipse of the moon, 163. Their war with the Athenians, 542, & seq. Divided into two factions after the death of Antipater, 553. The rest, vide sub Philip, &c.

Machanidas seizes on the Spartan crown, 635, d. Defeated and killed by Philopæmen, 636, b.

Maara-Son of Athens, 437, b.

Madai, the son of Japhet, father of the Medes, 1, a, b. Falsely affirmed the father of the Macedonians, ibid. note (G).

Madyes, king of Scythia, conquers great part of Asia, 281, & seq.

Magi of Persia enemies to idolatry, 71, c. Asserters of the one true God, ibid. Their care to preserve the elements pure, 75. Their sect almost destroyed by the Persians, 102, d. Their religion, how old, 206, & seq. and note.

Magnesia, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. Part of Thessaly, 381, b.

—— a city of Lydia, 329, b.

Magog, the father of the Scythians, 241, & seq.

Mahmoud-ker, a famed Persian river, 45, & seq.

Maia, the daughter of Atlas, deflowered by Jupiter, 263.

Malea, a promontory of Lacedamonia, 396, c.

Man, or Maneus, first king of the Cætes, 258, a.

Mandaces king of Media's long reign, 13, a.

Manes, the son of Jupiter by Tellus, 330, b.

—— first king of Lydia, 332.

Manis, king of Phrygia, 301, b.

Manna, Persian, described, 39, b.

Mantinean league with the Athenians, 514, and note. Expelled their city by the Lacedamonians, 614, c. Rebuild it, 617. Besieged by the Lacedamonians, ibid. & seq.

Manugjar, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 183, a.

Marathon, king of Sicyon, 350, c.

—— the famous battle of, described, 462, & seq.

Marble, of Symnada, famed, 293, d.

Marcus

I N D E X.

- Martius*, Roman consul, sent into Thessaly, 686, c.
Mardonius's unsuccessful attempt against Greece, 111, b. Is left by Xerxes with the command of his army, 124, & seq. His message to the Athenians rejected, 474, & seq. Defeated and killed by the Greeks, 126, c. 475.
Mares milk, how forced down by the Scythians, 276, c.
Margiana, a province of Persia, described, 30, c. Its prodigious vines and grapes, ibid. not. (H).
Marriages, how regulated by Lycurgus, 561.
Mars, how worshipped by the Scythians, 272.
Marsyas king of Lydia, 332, c.
 — a famous musician, 294, b, not. (P).
 — a river in Phrygia, ibid.
Marthesia queen of the Amazons, 279, not.
Massises, Xerxes's brother, put to death, 128, & seq.
Masistius general of Persia, 125, d.
Massagets Scythians described, 280, a.
Matheas, Macheas, king of Scythia. Vide Athenas, 268.
Mausoleum of Doris, 759, a.
Meander, a river in Phrygia, 294, a. 328, b.
Medes princess of Colchis, whether carried off by the Greeks, 318, c. — daughter of Aetes, procures Jason the golden fleece, 384. Why supposed an enchantress, ibid. and not. (G). Her cruelty to her brother, ibid. Banished to Corinth, 385, a. The sad effects of her jealousy there, 393, b.
Medes, whence derived, 6, c. Their government, ibid. d. Adore their kings, 7, b. Customs, religion, laws, &c. ibid. & seq. Their chronology, 9, & seq. Subdued by Pul, ibid. Shake off the Assyrian yoke, 9, & seq. Fall into anarchy, 10. Their kings from Dejoces, 11. History, 12, & seq. Revolt from the Persians, 136, b. Reduced, ibid.
Media described, 1, & seq. Invaded by the Scythians, 16, d. The rest, vide sub Medes.
Medon, the son of Codrus, first archon of Athena, 369, b.
Medontida, archons of Athena, so called from him, ibid. Their office, &c. ibid. c.
Medo-Persic empire, conjectures about it out of the oriental writers, 188, & seq.
Medus the supposed founder of Media, 1, not.
Megabyzus revolts from Artaxerxes, 133, b. His bravery ill repaid, ibid.
Megacles's severity against Cylon's confederates, 423, a. His party condemned for it, 427, d. Joins with Pisistratus, 449, & seq. Discomfited, 450.
Megalopolis built by the Arcadians, 617, c. Taken and ruined by Cleomenes, 647, e.
Megalopolitans sent to beg Antigonus's assistance, 646, b.
Megapentes king of Tyrim, 354. Exchanges it for Argos, 355, c.
 — a bastard son of Menelaus king of Sparta, 403.
Megara, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. Joined to Attica by Theseus, 366, c. Revolts, 491. Besieged by the Athenians, 510, & seq. Relieved by the Lacedamonians, 511. Fortified by Phocion, 547. Taken by the Romans, 696.
Megareans outwitted by the Athenians, 425, c. Revolt from them, 491. Join in the Peloponnesian war, 501. Reject the Nicean peace, 512. Defeated by the Athenians, 547, f. Subdued by the Romans, 696.
Megastus the brave Spartan soothsayer, his tomb, 589, fin. not.
Melampus obtains part of the kingdom of Argos, 354, c.
Melanthus, a noble Messenian, chosen king of Athena, 368, f.
Meleager king of Calydon, his hunting the famous boar, 410, b. and not. The fable of his birth and death, 411, not. (C).
Melos, river in Ionis, 751, a.
Melitus, the false accuser of Socrates, 533, c.
Melos, island, taken by the Athenians, 516, b.
Melmas, king of Argos, deposed, 360, c.
Memnon, son of Tithonus, his unsuccessful expedition, 316, b. Brave exploits, ibid. d, e. Vocal statue, ibid. f.
Memnon, Darius's general, his brave exploits, 156, & seq. Dies before Mitylene, 157, e.
Memnonian birds, why so called, ibid. sub not.
Memphis taken by Cambyzes, 96, c. His cruelty to her citizens and priests, 98, a. Taken by Alexander, 163, b.
Mennalcidas, why accused to the Romans, 691. Acquitted by Diana, ibid. c. Breaks the truce with Achaia, 692, d. Kills himself, ibid. e.
Mennalippe, the famed Amazon, her contest with Hercules, 279, not.
Menecius, a Cadmean prince, sacrifices his life to the country, 374, c.
Menelaus marries the fair Helen, 318, f. Sends a vain embassy to recover her, 319, f. Whether forced to leave her in Egypt, 320. Succeeds to the Lacedamonian crown, 402, & seq.
Mentor the Rhodian, one of Ochus's brave auxiliaries, 153. Amply rewarded by him, ibid.
Meon the father of Cybele, 297, a, not. (W). 328, b.
Meonia, the ancient name of Lydia, 289, not. (B). Vide & 328, b.
Mercury, the son of Jupiter by Maia, 263. Where born, 379, not. (H). Why so called, 255, and not. Why worshipped by the Celts, ibid. His other names, ibid. 263, not. Succeeds his father, 264. Polishes the Celts, ibid.
Mermnada, a race of Lydian kings, 330, a.
Meroe, the daughter of Cyrus, married to her brother Cambyzes, 98. Killed by him, ibid. & seq.
Messenia and Messenians. Vide sub Mycenia.
Messenian war, the cause of it, 570. Second war, 577, & seq.
Metellus rescues the Palladium from the flames, 309, f.
 — Roman general, his good offices to the Achaians, 692. To the Lacedamonians, 693. His deputies affronted by the Achaians, 694, d. Defeats them, 695. Takes Thebes and Megara, 696, d. His offers of peace rejected, ibid. & seq. Sent into Macedon, 697, c.
Melchior at Athena, what, 438, b.
Midas king of Phrygia, 301, b. — The son of Gordius, ibid. and not. His riches, &c. 302.
 — II. 303, b. III. ibid. d. IV. ibid. c.
Milesiens, their state and character, 757. How cultivated by the Parians, ibid. e. Transplanted by the Persians, 757.
Miletum, by whom founded, 369. Taken by the Persians, 110, d. By Alexander, 156, e. The state of it described, 756, & seq. The tyrants of it, 758, a.
 — the tragedy of, 757, b, c.
Miletus, chief of the Ionian confederacy, turns pirate, 749.
Milias, part of Lycia so called, 337.
Miltiades, Athenian general, defeats the Persians with a small army, 112, e. 460, & seq. His speech to Callimachus, 461, & seq. Unfortunate expedition against Parus, 464, & seq. His death and descent, 445, and not.
Mina, its value, 429, a.
Mindarus, Peloponnesian admiral, defeated and killed, 526, 601.
Minerva worshipped by the Trojans, 309, c. Her temple burnt at Assesus, 334, e. Her temple at Symphalms, 376, a. At Tegea, 379. That of brass built by Castor and Pollux, 402, c.
Mines, king of Lyrnessus in Cilicia, 343, a.

- Minoas*, island, taken by the Athenians, 506, d.
Minos, king of Crete, his bloody tribute on the Athenians, 364, & seq.
Minotaur described, 364, not. (I).
Misradates, Affyages's herdman, ordered to murder young Cyrus, 83. Brings him up as his own, ibid. Confesses the cheat, 84. Punished for it, ibid. & seq.
Mithridates, king of Pontus, sends an army into Greece, 736, c.
Mithridatic war, ibid. & seq.
Mitylenians invaded by the Athenians, 505. Succoured by the Peloponnesians, 506. Reduced, ibid.
Menestheus, Menestheus, undermines Theseus at Athens, 367, a. Ascends the throne, ibid. c. His death after the Trojan war, 321.
Mogli, the ancient name of Muscovy, 243. 266.
Molossi, ancient inhabitants of Greece, 344, b.
Monarchs, how honoured by the Scythians, 271. By the Medes, 7, b.
Money despised by the Spartans, 565, c.
Mopsueta, a city in Cilicia Propr. 341, b.
Morea, whence so called, 701, b.
Morena, part of Myfia, 323, b.
Mortgages, how made among the Athenians, 429, b, & seq.
Moscovites descend from Magog, 243, & seq.
Mourning, how regulated by Lycurgus, 561, a.
Mummius, Roman consul, sent against the Achaans, 696, & seq. Blockades Corinth, 697. Defeats the Achaans, ibid. & seq. Takes and plunders Corinth, 698, c. His ill taste of architecture, ibid. e, & seq. Triumphs at Rome, 700, e.
Mummy, Perfic, described, 39, f.
Munichia, a sea port in Attica, 437, c. A prophecy concerning it fulfilled, 423, d. Garrisoned by the Macedonians, 551, d. Taken by Demetrius Policertes, 554. Garrisoned by him, 556, f. Sold again to the Athenians, 557, d. Repaired by Adrian, 742, b.
Munichian month, why changed, 554, f.
Murder, by whom cognizable at Athens, 442, a.
Museum taken and garrisoned by Demetrius, 556, f. Refold to the Athenians by Diogenes, 557, c.
Musie introduced into Persia, 177, d. Admired by the Spartans, 564.
Muslai of Athens, what, 732, sub not.
Mycale, the battle of, 475, f.
Myccna, Messenia, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. The kingdom of, founded by Acridus, 354, d. 355, d. The kings of, ibid. & seq. Challenged by the Heracleide, 356, b. Taken by them, 360. Regal dignity abolished, ibid. e. Invaded by the Lacedamonians, 570, & seq. Subdued, 577, & seq. Recovered under Aristomenes, 578. Betrayed by Aristocrates, ibid. & seq. Enslaved by the Lacedamonians, 581, a.
 — a city in Argos, 351, b. Founded by Perseus, 355.
Myccnians, Messenians, expelled Peloponnesus, 595, b. Rebel against the Achaans, 681. Rout them, ibid. & seq. Poison Philopæmen, 683, a. Punished by his successor, ibid.
Myles the son of Eurotas, 395, b.
Myllus, an undecent statue in the temple of Ceres, 732, not.
Myra, a city of Lycia, 337.
Myrmidons, where situate, 381, d. Why so called, ibid. not.
Myronides defeats the Corinthians, 487, d. His bravery against the Thebans, 488, & seq.
Myfia described, 288, & seq. Part of Asia Propr. ibid. & 323, & seq. Its soil, antiquities, &c. 326. Conquered by Craesus, ibid. f.
Myfians side with the Trojans, 319, c. Their character, 326, c. Subdued by Craesus, ibid. f.
Myfia, river in Phrygia, 294, d.
Myrs, by whom founded, 369, d.
- N
- Nabarzanes*, his treachery to Darius, 168, f.
Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, his cruelty to the Lacedamonians, 636, & seq. To the Argives, 671, f. Treachery to Philip, 672, a. Defeated by the Achaans, 675, & seq. Takes Cythium, ibid. e. Harassed by the Achaans, 667, & seq. Defeated, 676. Assassinated by the Ætolians, 638, & seq. 714.
Nabonadius murders Laborefoarchad, 90. Seizes on the crown, ibid. b. Governed by his mother, ibid. His war against Cyrus, ibid. & seq. Killed before Babylon, 93, e.
Nebuchadnezzar's alliance with the king of Media, 18, d. Joint conquests with him, 19, & seq. Particularly of Palestine and Jerusalem, ibid. and 20.
Nebuchodonoxor, al. Chyniladan, invades Media, 15. Builds Nineveh, 16, a.
Nachs-rusten, a mountain near Persepolis, 55. Tombs and other antiquities of it, ibid. and not.
Nagidus in Cilicia Asp. a Samian colony, 340, d.
Nana impregnated by a pomegranate, 197, c.
Nannachus king of Phrygia, 300, & seq.
Napis, king of Scythia, 281.
Naudar king of Persia. Vide Nadar, 185.
Naupactus, why so called, 359, d. Taken by the Athenians, 489, c. Given to the Messenians, 595, b. — the peace of, 664, a.
Nauruz, a Persian festival, by whom instituted, 178, b.
Naxus, the island of, taken and destroyed by the Persians, 111, f.
Nectanebis prince of Egypt, assisted by Agessians, 620, not. Invaded by the Persians, 147. His defence and success, 148.
Nectanebus invaded by Ochus, 158, a. Defeated, ibid. Forced to retire into Ethiopia, ibid. d.
Nemen, a city in Argos, 351, b.
 — a river of Peloponnesus, 673, not.
Nemean games, by whom instituted, 251, c.
 — wood, 356, not.
Nemesis worshipped by the Myfians, 326, e. Her statue at Rhamnus, 361, e, and not. (B).
Nephele, mountain in Thessaly, inhabited by *Centaur*s, 381, c.
Neptune's famous temple at Corinth, 391, & seq. At Sparta in form of a grotto, 396, not. (C). At Athens, 435, b.
Neriglissar, king of Babylon, wars against the Medes, 88. Defeated and killed by Cyrus, 89, c.
Nessus, the famous Centaur, killed by Hercules, 401, not. (K).
Nestorians expelled Myccna, 360. Settle at Athens, ibid.
Neuri, where seated, 268, a. Described, 278.
Nicander, king of Lacedamonia, his reign, 570, e. Wars against the Messenians, ibid. & seq.
 — deputy of Ætolia to Philip, 710, a. Carested by Philip, 723, c. Invades Acarnania, 728, b.
Nicanor, Cassander's general over the Athenians, 553, & seq.
Nicias, Athenian general, his dispute with Cleon, 509, c. Takes the island of Cythera, 510, f. Gives name to the Nicean peace, 512. Opposes the descent into Sicily, 516. Sent general thither against his will, ibid. His ill success at Syracuse, 518, & seq. Forced to surrender to Gylippus, 519. Put to death by the Syracusians, 520.
Nicoles, tyrant of Sicyon, expelled, 648, not. (B).
Nicodromus, Athenian general, invades Egina, 459, e.
Nicomedes, Spartan general, defeated at Tanagra, 595, a.
Nicostratus, bastard of Menelaus king of Lacedamon, 403, a.

I N D E X.

Nicostratus, Athens prætor, defeats the Macedonians at Argos, 672, c.
Nieper river. Vide Borysthenes, 268, and not.
Niepler river. Vide Tyras, ibid. c.
Nileus the son of Codrus withdraws some Athenians and others into new settlements, 369, c. Cities built by them, ibid. d.
Nineveh, by whom built, 16, a. Destroyed, 19, d.
Ninus, king of Lydia, 333, a.
Nisa, the plains of, described, 3, e.
Nisa, taken from the Athenians, 423. Retaken and fortified, 506.
Nomade Scythians described, 278, & seq.
Nomotheta, at Athens, their office, 443, d.
Nomophylaces, their office, ibid. b.
Nothos, among the Athenians, what, 437, d.
Nudus, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 185, & seq. Put to death by Apberesia king of the Turks, 186.
Nyctimus king of Arcadia, 379, e.

O.

Oaths sacred among the Scythians, 272, & seq.
Oaths, how taken by the Athenian magistrates, 442, c. 444, d. Vide 479, e.
Obrima river in Phrygia, 294, d.
Oby river in Scythia, 267, d.
Ochus I. king of Persia, changes his name for that of Darius, 134, d. De eo, vide Darius Nothus.
 — II. son of Artaxerxes Mnemon, gets the crown by the death of his brother, 150, b. His cruelties, 151. To the Sidonians, 161, f. Loses several provinces, 152. Invades Egypt in person, ibid. Returns triumphant, 153. Kills the god Apis, 154. Plunders the Egyptian temples, ibid. e. Murdered by Bagoas, ibid. b.
Othomades king of Scythia, 286.
Oebalia, one of the ancient names of Lacedæmonia, 396, not. (B). and 400, d.
Oebalus, a Spartan tradesman, sets up one hundred tripods at Ithome, 575, d.
Oedipus exposed when born, 374. Kills his father, ibid. Marries his mother, ibid. Runs distracted, ibid.
Oenians, who, and whence so named, 268, a, and not. (E).
Oera, the streights of, described, 371, a.
Ogygia, one of the ancient names of Bæstia, 370, c.
Oiwafus killed by the Athenians, 476, c.
Olbipolitan Scythians, their agriculture, 276, b.
Olenus in Achaia Propr. by whom founded, 414, c.
Olympia, a city of Elis, described, 406, b.
Olympiads, the computation of, 406, b. and not. (E).
Olympian temple at Athens, 436, b.
Olympic games, by whom instituted, 264, c. 598, not. Restored, 406, b. Described, ibid. and not. (E). Forbid to the women, ibid. not. (F).
Olympius, Jupiter, his famous statue and temple at Elis, 406, b.
 — first king of Mysia, 327, a.
Olympus, mountain in Thessaly, 381, c. Where situated, 325, d. The place of Jupiter's residence, 262, b.
 — a city of Lycia, 337.
Olynthians subdued by Philip of Macedon, 546, c.
Olynthus, the republic of, why oppressed by the Spartans, 614, d. Subdued by Polybiades, 615, b.
Omphale, queen of Lydia, 332.
Onega, the lake of, described, 268, e.
Onias, the Maccabee, Arius's letter to him, 624, f. and not.
Ophialtes, head of an Athenian faction, 485, a. His character, ibid.
Ophiogenes, who, 324, c.
Opium made in Persia, 39, c.

Oplisai, Athenian soldiers so called, 438, a.
Opoes, a city in Locris Opuntia, 412, a.
Oracles famed among the ancient Greeks, 347, a. How consulted, ibid. not. (F). Decisful, ibid.
Orchomenes, the city of, described, 693, not. (C).
Orestes king of Mycena, his unhappy reign, 357, d. Comes to the Lacedæmonian crown in right of his mother, 403, b. Accused of parricide, ibid. c. Dies in Arcadia, 380, a. 403, b. His bones wonderfully discovered by a Lacedæmonian, 380, not. (M).
Orestida, who, and where situate, 706, not. (Z).
Oreum, a chief city in Eubæa, betrayed to the Romans, 667, c.
Oriental accounts of Persia, 172, to the end of the section. An apology for them, 334, not.
Orithiya, princess of Athens, stolen by Boreas, 363, d.
Ormus, river in Phrygia, 294, d.
Ornytion, the son of Sisyphus, king of Corinth, 393, b.
Oromasdes, one of the Persia names of God, 76. Whom they believe to be self-existent, ibid. d.
Oropus the Erethrean, his generosity to the Athenians, 460, d.
 — revolts from the Athenians, 522, e.
Orpheus polishes the ancient Greeks, 348, b. Goes to the Argonautic expedition, 384, not. (I).
Ortara queen of the Amazons, 279, not.
Ossa, mountain in Thessaly, inhabited by the Centaurs, 381, c.
Ostracism, how performed at Athens, 467, c. and not.
Otanes discovers the sham Smerdis by the help of his daughter, 101. Declares for a republican government, 103, a.
Othriades the only surviving champion of Sparta, 572, and not.
Othrys, mountain in Thessaly, 381, c.
Otreus king of Phrygia, 303, a.
Ox, why stamped on the Athenian coin, 362, a. 366, c.
Oxen, a famous breed of, in Thessaly, 382, c.
Oxus, river in Scythia, 267, d.
Oxylus, the three-eyed general of the Heraclids, 339. Whence he was, 408. His success, 359, & seq. Made king of Elis, 360, b. 408, & seq.
Oxyntes king of Athens, 368, d.
Ozolea, part of ancient Greece, b. Described, 411, not. (D).
Ozoleans, whence so called, ibid. Blended with the Locrians, 412, a. Send a colony into Italy, ibid. b.

P.

P*aches*, Athenian general, takes Mitylene, 506, c.
Pactolus, river in Lydia, 329, c.
Pactus, by whom built, 315, b.
Palemon, the fable of, 392, not. (G).
Palestine invaded by the Scythians, 17, a. 281. By Nabuchadnezzar, 19, & seq.
Palladium of Troy, 309, c. Brought to Rome by Æneas, ibid. d. Various accounts about it, 310, not. 312, not.
Pan worshipped by the Arcadians, 375, b. His temple at Tegea, ibid. & seq. Why worshipped by the Athenians, 460, f. & seq.
Panatholium, what, 701.
Panathenæa, by whom instituted, 366, b.
Pandion I. king of Athens, 363, c.
 — II. — expelled the kingdom, ibid. c.
Pandrosos, daughter of Cecrops, the fable of her, ibid. not. (F).
Panoti, why so called, 268, not. (E).
Pantheon, at Athens, 436, c.

- Papyrus*, a kind of paper, the exportation of, forbid, 325. e.
- Parabastom*, the court of, its office, 444. c.
- Parali*, one of the three contending factions at Athens, 427. c.
- Parasang*, whence derived, 191. d.
- Parenis*, Solon's laws relating to them, 432. e.
- Parians* quell and cultivate the Milesians, 756. e.
- Parium*, a city of Mysia, described, 324. c.
- Paris*, the son of Priam, 318. a. Intices Helen away, ibid. e.
- Parnassus*, mountain in Phocis, 387. e.
- Paropamisus*, a province in Persia, described, 30. a.
- Paros*, island, why invaded by Miltiades, 464. d.
- Parfis*, a province of Persia, described, 33. a. &c.
- Parfades*, king of the Cadusians, his revolt and barred against the Medes, 13. e.
- Parthenia of Sparta*, whence so called, 577. a. Forced to retire into Italy, ibid. c.
- Parthenion of Athens*, 423. not. 436. a.
- Parthia*, a province of Persia, described, 31. b.
- Parthians*, whether originally Scythians or Celts, 31. b. c. and 256. b. c.
- Parysatis's* great sway with Darius Noth. 135. a. Instances of her cruelty, 137. d. 140. b.
- Patara*, a city in Lycia, 337.
- Pavrocus* killed by Hector, 321. c.
- Patrons of Athens*, their office, 428. c.
- Pausanias*, Spartan general, his untimely haughtiness, 479. a. Makes peace with Athens, 521. Made general of the Greeks against Xerxes, 589. Defeats the Persians, 590. Rewarded with the tenths of the spoil, 126. f. His great moderation, ibid. and 591. Goes against the Phocians, 611. b. Degenerates, 592. Starved to death, 393.
- Pedias*, one of the three Athenian factions, 427. e.
- Pegasa*, a sea-port of Thessaly, 382. b.
- the gulph of, ibid.
- Pegasus* sent by Minerva to Bellerophon, 394. b. and not. (O).
- Pelasgi*, antient Greeks, 344. c.
- Pelasgia*, one of the antient names of Peloponnesus, 345. a.
- of Thessaly, 381. a.
- Pelasgiotis*, part of antient Greece, ibid. b. Part of Thessaly, 381. a.
- Pelagus*, father of the Pelasgians, 344. c. Reforms the Greeks, 345. Why surnamed Autochton, 375. a.
- first king of Arcadia, 378.
- Peleg*, whether the father of the Pelasgians, 345. a. and not.
- Pelias* sends Jason in quest of the golden fleece 383. His treachery, 384. Death, ibid. & seq.
- Pelicans* described, 44. b.
- Pelion*, mountain in Thessaly, 381. c.
- Peloponnesian* war, the causes of, 499. & seq. The nations engaged in it, 501. a. Make early incursions into Attica, ibid. & seq. Defeated before Pylos, 508. d. Make peace, 512. f. Break it, 513. & seq. Disappointed by the Persians, 524. d. Victorious at sea, 525. b. Defeated at Samus, ibid. d. By sea and land, 526. The peace of Antalcidas concluded, 538. & seq.
- Peloponnesians* bring their fleet against Xerxes to Salamis, 123. c. d. 472. a. Their flight stopp'd by the policy of Themistocles, 424. 472. &c.
- Peloponnesus*, part of antient Greece, 344. b. Invaded by the Heraclida, 359. & seq.
- Pelop's* coming into Peloponnesus, 407. King of Pisa, ibid.
- the son of Tantalus, subdued by Ilus, 315. d.
- Pelusium*, one of the keys of Egypt, 96. a. Taken by Cambyses, ibid.
- Pelusiens* killed before Troy, 375. b.
- Peneus*, river in Thessaly, 381. d.
- Pentacosiomedimni* made the first order of Athenians, 429. f.
- Penthesilea* queen of the Amazons, 279. not.
- Pentheus* torn to-pieces by his mother, 372. c.
- Penthius* king of Mycenia, 357. f.
- Pereole*, a city of Phrygia Minor, 304. d.
- Pergamos*, a city in Mysia, described, 289. c. 325. e.
- Pericles* the son of Xanthippus, head of an Athenian faction, 485. a. His character, ibid. &c. Outwits the Lacedaemonians at Megara, 491. b. Reduces Enbom, 492. a. His severe ordinance against the Athenians of half-blood, ibid. b. Punished, c. His great attachment to Aspasia, 453. and not. Reduces the Samians, 494. & seq. His funeral oration for the slain, 495. b. Gets Thucydides to be banished, 497. Accused of divers crimes, 498. & seq. Acquitted, ibid. His conduct at the opening of the Peloponnesian war, 501. c. His family visited with the plague, 503. & seq. Dies himself of it, 504. e. His character, ibid. & seq. and not.
- the son of the former, unjustly put to death, 528. & seq.
- Persepolis*, metropolis of Persia, described, 34. not. The ruins of it described, 48. & seq. Various conjectures concerning it, 52. & seq. D. Siculus's account of that antient city, 52. And of its being destroyed by Alexander, ibid. and not. Other noble antiquities of it, 53. & seq. Why also called Elymais, 55. not. (V). How taken and burnt by Alexander, 168. b. c.
- Perses*, no idolaters, 69. & seq. Unjustly accused by the Mohammedans, 70. not. (B). In what sense they worshipped the sun, moon, &c. ibid. & seq. Their prayers directed to God alone, 73. a. Whence they had their religion, 74. b. 206. & seq. Their veneration for the other three elements, ibid. Temples, 76. Account of the creation, 77. d. Their priests, 78. a. Initiating of children, ibid. Marriages, 79. Funerals, 80.
- Perses* succeeds Philip in Macedonia, 685. c. Courts the Greeks against the Romans, ibid. d. His letter to the Achaans, 686. a. Rejected, d. Defeated by the Romans, 687. d.
- Persia*, the kingdom of, described, 26. & seq. Its climate, 37. Seasons, 36. Rivers, 37. b. Soil and product, 38. & seq. Fruits and grain, 40. Mines, 41. Poisonous plants, 44. & seq. Government, 57. Respect paid to their monarchs, ibid. and 66. & seq. Palaces described, 58. & seq. 59. Education of children, guards, &c. 60.
- divided into twenty Satrapies, 103. Exempt from all taxes, ibid. f. Kings of Persia according to oriental writers, 173. & seq. When add by whom conquered by the Medes, 5. d. and not. (F).
- Persian* religion vindicated from idolatry, 69. & seq.
- Persians*, their manners and customs, 60. d. Punishments, 61. Polygamy and incest, ibid. b. 62. a. Coin, arts, &c. ibid. & seq. Military discipline, 63. Severity, ibid. not. (H). Weapons, chariots, and order of marching, 64. c. Manner of computing their army, ibid. a. & e. Laws and schools, 65. Slavish respect to their monarchs, 66. & seq. Secrecy, 67. a. Presents, ibid. b. Kings sit as judges, ibid. c. Their sentence not to be revoked, ibid. Their concubines, children, revenues, 68. Wars with the Greeks, 120. & seq. Defeated at Salamis, 123. & seq. 472. & seq. By land under Mardonius, 125. & seq. Their camp forced by the Greeks, 126. b. Their army destroyed, ibid. Driven out of Greece, ibid. The catastrophe of the Grecian war, 127.

I N D E X.

- Perseus* the son of Jupiter by Danaë, 354. c. Fetches the famed Gorgon, and saves Andromeda, ibid. & seq. Kills his father-in-law, 355. b. Exchanges Argos for Tyrius, ibid. c.
- Perynthians* besieged by Philip of Macedon, 546. d.
- Pessinus*, whence so called, 315. e. f.
- Phalerum* of Athens, 437. c.
- Phanes* revolts from the king of Egypt, 95. d. His children murdered before his face, 96. b.
- Pharnus*, king of Media, conquered by Ninus, 11. a. Crucified with his wife and children, ibid.
- Pharalitan* plains, where situate, 381. d.
- Phaselis*, a city in Lycia, 337.
- Pheneus*, lake in Arcadia, 376. a.
- Pheneus*, Ætolian deputy, his conference with Acilius, 712. d. With Flaminius, 724. f. With Fulvius, 729. Concludes a peace with the Roman senate, 730.
- Phidias*, the Athenian statuary, condemned, 498. a.
- Phidippides*'s vision of the god Pan, 460. f.
- Philadelphus*, a city in Lydia, 328. f.
- Philip* of Macedon's war with the Athenians, 542. & seq. Corrupts the Greeks with his gold, 544. b. Seizes the straits of Thermopyla, 545. Subdues the Olynthians, 596. b. Puts an end to the Phocian war, 557. a. Besieges Perynthus and Byzantium, ibid. c. d. Driven away by Phorion, ibid. Invades Phocis, 558. Defeats the confederates at Cheronea, ibid. Murdered, 549. a.
- the son of Antigonus, his moderation to the revolted Spartans, 634. b. Beaten out by Lycargus, 635. c. Assists the Achaans, 653. a. Defeats the Eleans, ibid. Takes, and gives Psophis to the Achaans, 654. Ravages Elis, ibid. e. f. His kindness to the Achaans, 655. Besieges Paleis, 657. Invades Ætolia, ibid. & seq. Takes Therma, 658. Invades Lacedæmonia, 659. e. Appeases a sedition at Corinth, 660. Makes a truce with Ætolia, 661. b. Takes Thebes of Phthiotis, 662. d. Makes overtures of peace, ibid. & seq. Concludes it at Naupactus, 664. a. Sets about enslaving of Greece, ibid. & seq. Invades Epirus, 665. a. Defeated by the Romans, ibid. Causes the brave Aratus and his son to be poisoned, ibid. & seq. Defeats the Ætolians in a new war, 666. e. Defeated before Elis, ibid. & seq. Makes a second peace with Ætolia, &c. 669. Breaks it, ibid. d. Forsaken by the Achaans, 670. f. Invades their country, 671. Takes Argos, and gives it to Nabis, ibid. d. Forced to make peace with the Romans, 673. Besieges Lamia, 712. Harasses Ætolia, 723. Recovers several important places, 724. Ravages Attica, 733. & seq. His fury against the Athenians, 735. a. Prejudicial to him, ibid. d. Forced to defend Macedonia, ibid. & seq.
- regent of Athamania, joins with Antiochus, 718. d. His pretensions to the Macedonian crown, ibid. not. (N). Taken by the Romans, 719.
- Philobasilis* at Athens, their office, 443.
- Philocles* sent to ravage Assica, 734. & seq.
- Philomel*, the fable of, 389. not.
- Philopamen*, general of the Achaans, his character, 667. Valour at the battle of Salafia, 649. a. c. Defeats the Lacedæmonians at Maninea, 635. & seq. Kills Mechanidas, 669. a. His noble speech to the Achaan states, 674. f. Defeated at sea by Nabis, 675. b. Beats him at land, ibid. d. Harasses the Lacedæmonians, ibid. & seq. Defeats Nabis, 676. Some signal instances of his generosity, ibid. c. Brings the Lacedæmonians into the Achaan league, 639. 676. Made prætor of Achaia, 677. Wars against the Lacedæmonians, 678. & seq. Subjects them to the Achaan laws, 679. Marches against the rebellious Messenians, 681. Taken prisoner by them, 682. Poisoned, ibid. His murderers sacrificed at his tomb, 683. b. d. Other funeral honours, ibid. and not.
- Philosophers* banished Athens, 555. a. Recalled, ibid.
- Phocas*, Ætolian prætor, falls out with Flaminius, 710. f.
- Phonous*, a blind soothsayer, infected with Harpagus, 383. note (H). Rid of them by Hercules, ibid.
- Phocisians* oppressed by the Lacedæmonians, 614. d. Reduced by Agésilas, 615. b.
- Phoca*, by whom founded, 369. d.
- Phocæa*, metropolis of Ionis, described, 748. Taken by Harpagus, 749. a. By the Romans, ibid. & seq.
- Phocæan* games, why instituted, 749. note.
- Phocæans* great mariners, 748. b. Founded several cities in Europe, ibid. c. Abandon their city to the Persians, 749. b. Turn pirates, ibid. d. a.
- Phocæan* war, 543. & seq.
- despair, a proverb, whence, 386. a.
- Phocians* discomfit the Thessalians in several encounters, 386. & seq. Condemned by the Amphictyonic court for sacrilege, 388. & seq. Invade Locris, 600. c.
- Phocion*, general of Athens, his character, 545. e. f. Relieves Byzantium, 547. d. Carested by Alexander, 549. & seq. By Antipater, 551. & seq. Put to death by the Athenians, 553. e. His burial honour, &c. ibid. & seq.
- Phocis*, part of ancient Greece, 344. b. Described, 387. c.
- Phocus*, the son of Ornytion, father of the Phocians, 387. c.
- the son of Æacus, king of Phocis, ibid.
- Phœbidæ* takes the city of Thebes, 614. e. Killed, 615. e.
- Phœdræ*'s incestuous love to Hippolytus punished, 367. note (M).
- Phænice* invaded by Alexander, 161. e.
- Phorbas*, king of Argos, 353. b.
- Phoroneus*, king of Argos, 352. c.
- Phoronium*, a city of Argos, ibid.
- Phraortes*, king of the Medes, 15. b. Whether he subdued the Persians, ibid. and note (P). His reign and conquests, ibid. & seq. Defeated by Nabuchodonosor, 16. a.
- Phreatum*, an Athenian court, its office, 444. b.
- Phridon*, king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 181. His singular wisdom and goodness, 182. c.
- Phrygia*, part of Asia Proper, 288. & seq. Described, 291. & seq. Whether Æneas reigned in it, 322. note.
- Phrygia Minor*. Vid. Troas, 228. & seq.
- Phrygians*, their origin, antiquity, and character, 295. Government, trade, and language, 296. Religion, 297. Kings, 300. & seq. Invaded by the Cimmerians, 303. c. Subdued by the Lydians, ibid. & seq. Side with the Trojans, 319. e.
- Phryniæus*, Athenian general, betrayed by Alcibiades, 522. A promoter of oligarchy, ibid. & seq. Stabbed, 524. f.
- Phrynon*, Athenian general, basely killed by Pisano, 422. b.
- Phryx*, a river in Phrygia, 294. d.
- Phthia*, part of ancient Greece, 344. b.
- Phthiotis*, part of Thessaly, 381. a. Drowned in Dencalion's flood, ibid.
- Phya*, a base woman, set up to represent Minerva, 450. a.
- Phylarchi*, at Athens, their office, 443. c.
- Phyleus*, the son of Augæus, banished for siding with Hercules, 407. d. Restored by him, ibid. & seq. Retires into Dulichium, 408. b.
- Pieræus*, river in Achaia Proper, 414. c.
- Pindarus*, tyrant of Ephesus, 755. a.
- Pindus*, river, boundary of Phocis, 387.
- Pirithæus*, king of the Lapithæ, 381. e. Delivered

I N D E X.

- from the Centaurs by Hercules, 381.—The constant companion of Theseus, 366, & seq.
- Pisa*, a city in Elis, by whom founded, 406, c. Why destroyed by the Eleans, 407, a.
- Pisander* promotes oligarchy at Athens, 522, & seq. Goes over to the enemy, 525, c.
- Pischedadian*, dynasty of Persia, described, 173, b.
- Pisistratus*, Athenian general, expedition against Salamis, 425, b. Reproved by Solon for his popularity, 446, d. His stratagem to obtain a guard, 447. In vain opposed by Solon, ibid. & seq. His letter to him, 448. Solon's answer, ibid.—Usurps the supreme power, ibid. & seq. His reign, 449, & seq. Death and character, 451, and note (O).
- Pistius*, king of Træsen, gives his daughter to Ægeus, 364.
- Plague at Athens described, 502, note.
- Plataea* betrayed to the Thebans, 500, c. Burnt by the Lacedæmonians, 504. Razed, 506, c. 596.
- Plataeus*, why attached to the Athenians, 461, and note. Their bravery against the Peloponnesians, 404, d. 506. Reduced, ibid. e.
- Plato* hindered from pleading for Socrates, 535. His account of his death, 536, sub fin. not.
- Plautus*, king of Illyrium, leagues with Rome against Ætolia, 728, f.
- Pleuron*, a city of Ætolia, 410, d.
- Pleuronians*, why called Curetes, ibid.
- Plistarchus*, king of Sparsa, his short reign, 594, a.
- Plisioanax* succeeds Phylarchus, ibid. Sent to invade Artica, 595. Betrayed by his tutor, 491. Banished, ibid. e. Recalled by means of the oracle, 597, e. His death, 599, e.
- Pluto*. Vid. Dif. 257, c, & alib.
- Plutonium* of Hierapolis, described, 293, note (L).
- Podarces*, son of Laomedon. Vid. Priam, 377, d.
- Pocon* the son of Endymion, goes into Pæonia, 407, b.
- Poetry, how used among the Celts, 253, b. 254, b. c.
- Polemarchus* at Athens, the third magistrate, 417, c. His office, 442, f.
- in Bæotia, 743, b.
- Polygamy* allowed by the Scythians, 276, c. By the Persians, 61.
- Politai*, citizens of Athens so called, 427, d.
- Pollux*, his fabulous original, 401, note (L). One of the Argonauts, 383, note (H). Kills Ameyus, ibid. Recovers his sister out of Aphidne, 402. His other exploits, ibid. and note.
- Polybius*, the historian, sent deputy to the Roman consul, 686, f. Kept prisoner there, 690, a. Lists under Scipio, ibid. f. Present at the siege of Corinth, 698. Defends the memory of the great Philopæmen, 700, a. In high esteem with the Romans, ibid. d.
- Polydorus*, the son of Cadmus, king of Thebes, 372, c.
- king of Sparsa, invades Messenia, 571, & seq. Defeats the Argives, 572, c. d.—The Messenians, 576, a. His character and death, ibid. c. d.
- Polymestor*, king of Arcadia, defeats the Lacedæmonians, 38, c.
- Polynices*, prince of Thebes, comes to the Argolic court, 378. His war with his brother Eteocles, ibid. & seq. Kills, and is killed by him, 374, d. Buried by his sister, ibid.
- Polyperchon*, head of a Macedonian faction, 553, a. Cabals against Cassander, ibid.
- Pompus*, king of Arcadia, opens a trade into his country, 380.
- Potidea* revolts from the Athenians, 497, c. Reduced by famine, 504, c. Taken by Timotheus, 541, a.
- Praxaspes* sent to kill Cambyse's brother, 98, d. His own son killed by him, 99, c.
- Prætors*, Achaean, their office, 644, c.
- Prætus*, king of Argos, 354. His behaviour towards Bellerophon, ibid.
- Priam*, king of Troas, whence so called, 317, e. His reign, power, ibid. & seq. Progeny, 318.
- Priapus* worshipped at Lampiscus, 324, d.
- Priene*, by whom founded, 369, d. Where situate, 756, a.
- Procles* and Eurythene partners in the Spartan kingdom, 398, a.
- Proclida*, so called from him, ibid. A list of them, 558.
- Procofia*, the first festival of Ceres, 731, note.
- Proedoi* at Athens, their office, 439, c.
- Progne*, the table of 389, note.
- Propheis*, among the Scythians, described, 271, and note.
- Prosecutions*, how regulated by Solon's laws, 433, f.
- Proserpine*, princess of Epirus, guarded by Cerberus, 367, b.
- Proteus* killed by Heclor, 320, e. His tomb, 305, note (C). Riffled by Arctaystes, 476, e.
- Prytanis*, chief magistrates of Corinth, 392, f. At Athens, their office, 437, d. A new set of them, 523, a.
- Prytanem*, the court of, its power, 444, b. Abolished by Theseus, 366, c.
- Prytanis*, king of Lacedæmon, wars against the Argives, 404, c.
- Psammetitus*, king of Egypt, invaded by Cambyse, 96. Killed, ibid. d.
- Psephium* at Athens, what, 498, b.
- Psophis* described, 653. Belieged, ibid. Taken, 654, c.
- Ptolemaeus*, king of Thebes, 375, c.
- of Egypt, leagues with the Atheans, 679, d.
- Pul*, or his son, the founder of the Assyrian empire, 9, b.
- Punishments*, among the Persians, 61, d. 134, note (O).
- regulated by Solon, 433, d.
- Purati*, the last rank of Athenian citizens, 438, a.
- Purple of Elis famed, 405, note (B).
- Pydna*, the battle of, 687, d.
- Pylades*, the faithful friend of Orestes, 357, e.
- Pylæum*, the grand council of Greece, 711.
- Pyla Cilicia* described, 340, b.
- Pylos*, three cities of that name, 706, note (V).
- Pylus*, promontory fortified by the Athenians, 508, c. Taken by the Lacedæmonians, 527, d.
- Pyramus*, river in Cilicia, 341, d.
- Pyraus* swarmed in ancient Greece, 346, b. & alib. pass.
- Pyrene*, the fountain of, at Corinth, 391, c.
- Pyreum*, one of the havens of Athens, 361, b. 476. Improved by Themistocles, 478. Demolished by Lyander, 530. Garrisoned by Demetrius Poliocrates, 556, f. Sold to the Athenians by Diogenes, 557, c. Rebuilt by Adrian, 742.
- Pyrrhea*, ancient name of Thessaly, 387.
- Pyrrhus*, the son of Achilles, 381, c.
- king of Epirus, invades Sparsa in favour of Clonymus, 622. Repulsed by the brave Spartan women, 623, a. Slain before Argos, 624, d.
- general of the Ætolia, defeated by Philip, 666, d.
- Pythagoras*, tyrant of Ephesus, 755, e.
- Pythian* games in honour of Apollo, 382.
- Pythion*, a city of Thessaly, ibid.
- Pythius*, a Lydian immensely rich, 331, e.
- Python*, serpent, killed by Apollo, 382, b, and note.
- Pythones*, the women who delivered the oracle at Delphi, 347, note (F). Their frequent cheats and evasions, 359, d.

Q

Quin^{ti}us, Tit. Flamin. Vide Flaminius, 669, & seq.

Rages,

I N D E X.

R.

R Agæ, a city of Media, 2, d.
Rape, how punished at Athens, 432, b.
 Religious concerns committed to the Areopagi, 441, f.
Ritarii, net-fingers, how they fought, 412, note (D).
Revolting forbid by Solon, 431, c.
Rha, al. Volga, a river in Scythia, 267.
Rhamnus, a city in Attica, 361, e, and note (B).
Rhea, the sister and wife of Saturn, 260, b.
Rhetium in Asia taken by some fugitives, 511.
Rhetra, Lycurgus's laws, why so called, 567, a. Approved by the Delphic oracle, 568, c. How enforced on the Lacedæmonians, ibid. &c.
Rhetum, a city in Phrygia Minor, 305, b.
Rhodiens, their confederacy against the Athenians, 542. Invaded by Philip, 699. Assist the Athenians against him, 723, a.
Riches despised by the Scythians, 272, b.
Riphaean mountains, 266, and note.—Uninhabited, 268, note (B).
Riphas, the son of Gomer, 266, note (B).
 Robbers swarmed in ancient Greece, 346, b.
Romans invited into Greece by the Ætolians, 666, c. Make peace with Philip, and the Achaans, 669, c. Renew the war against the former, ibid. d, e. Make an alliance with the latter, ibid. & seq. Make peace with Philip, and his confederates, 673. Send commissaries into Greece in favour of the Lacedæmonians, 679, & seq. Their insincerity to the Achaans, 683, & seq. Tyrannize over them, 685, b. 687, & seq. Their deputies affronted by them, 693, b. 694, b. Ally with the Ætolians, 703, b. Surprised at Tanagra by the Syrans, 718, c. Send forces against Antiochus, 719, d. Join with the Macedonians, ibid. e. Distress the Ætolians, 726, & seq. Make a truce with them, 726, c. A peace, 730. Oppress them atreth, ibid. & seq. Admitted to the mysteries of Ceres, 732. Subdue the Athenians, 741, & seq. The Bæotians, 743, & seq. The Acar-naniens, 745, & seq. Epirus, 746, & seq.
Roman slaves redeemed by the Achaans, 674, b, f, & seq.
Romus, prince of Troy, one of the founders of Rome, 316, f.
Roxana put to a cruel death by Parvatis, 137, d.
Ruslan and his father restore the Persian throne to the right line, 190, & seq. Made generalissimo of Persia, 191. His noble exploits, ibid. & seq. Defeats the Turks, 196, e. Kills the prince of Persia in single combat, 211, a. Betrayed by his treacherous brother, 223, f. Murdered, 124. Remarks on his romantic history, ibid. note.

S.

S Acca, who they were, 13. From whom descended, 256. Possess Armenia, ibid. & seq. Since called Tirans, 257, and note (A), & seq. Their war with the Medes, 13, f. Their heroic queen, ibid. & seq.
Sacrifices among the Scythians, 272.
Sad-an, or canon of the ancient Persia faith. Still extant, 74. Contains a compendium of the Zendavesta, 216, c.
Sadocus king of Thrace's friendship to the Athenians, 504, b.
Sadyres, king of Lydia, 334, a.
Sagittus, king of Scythia, 261.
Salamis, by whom built, 321.

— island, taken by the Megareans, 423, b. l. Recovered by Solon, 425, & seq. The naval fight of, between the Greeks and Persians, 123, & seq. and 472, & seq.
Samaritans obstruct the building of the temple 94, c. 102, f.

Samian war, the grounds of it, 493, and note.
Samos conquered by the Athenians, 494, a. Revolts, ibid. c. Retaken and destroyed, 495, b.
Sandabad, queen of Persia, her unlawful amour with her son-in-law, 192, & seq.
Sangarius, river in Phrygia, 294, d.
Sardis, a city of Lydia, 318, d. Taken and spared by Cyrus, 92, b. Taken and burnt by the Ionians, 109, c. Surrenders to Alexander, 156, d. Taken by the Cimmerians, 334, a.
Sarmatians, from whom descended, 266. 268. 277, d, and note.
Sarpedon driven from Crete, settles in Lydia, 338, b.
Saturn, first king of the Celts, 259, c. His other names, ibid. and d. Marries his sister Rhea, 260. Taken prisoner, and released by Jupiter, ibid. c. Dethroned by him, 261, b. His death, ibid.
Saulius, king of Scythia, 285.
Sauromatia, al. Sarmatia, described, 268. 268.
Scamander, the father of Tæcer, 311, and note.
 — river of Troas, 306, f.
Scandalaria, a city in Cilicia, 340, d.
Scerdalaides, king of Illyrium, accedes to the Achaan league, 652. Makes reprisals on the Macedonians, 663, note.
Scipio, Cornel. sent consul against the Ætolians, 726, b.
 — Africanus serves in Greece under his brother, 726, note. Intercedes for the Ætolians, ibid. d.
Schirvan, a province of Persia, described, 36, b.
Scholotes, Scythians, described, 286, note.
Sciences discouraged in Sparta, 563, f.
Scione revolts from the Athenians, 512, b.
Sciron, an infamous robber, killed by Theseus, 364, note (H).
Scolopitus settled in Thermosciria, 279, note.
Scopas, Ætolian general, ravages Macedon, 653, b.
Scyras, river in Lacedæmon, whence so named, 397, c.
Scyros, island, taken by Cimon, 482, f.
Scytale, Spartan, what, 604, note.
Scythes, the fabulous father of the Scythians, 281.
 — king of Scythia, killed for introducing Grecian customs, 285, & seq.
Scythia described, 266, & seq. Uninhabited towards the north, 267.—In Europe, described, ibid. f, & seq. The extent of both Scythia's, 268, d.
Scythians, whence so called, 266, a. Described, ibid. & seq. Descended from Magog, the second son of Japhet, 241, & seq. Different from the Celts or Gomerians, 242, & seq. Their migrations towards the north of Asia, 244. And of Europe, ibid. Their territories described, 266, & seq.—Royal Scythians, where situate, 269, a. Their government, ibid. & seq. Laws, character, valour, &c. 270, & seq. Why misrepresented by the Greek historians, 273, b. How populous they were, 274. Their language, manufactures, &c. 275. Discovery of the Amazons, 279, note. Kings, 280, & seq. Conquer great part of Asia, 281, & seq. Dispossessed of it by treachery, 282. Their return home opposed by their slaves, ibid. Overcome them by stratagem, ibid. & seq. Invade Media, 16. Prevented from conquering Egypt, 17, a. Plunder the temple of Venus at Ascalon, 282, a. Their punishment, ibid. Invaded by Darius, 105, & seq. 283. Mess-age to that monarch, 283, e. and note. Their brave defence, ibid. & seq. Force him out of Scythia, 285, a. Betrayed by the Ionians, ibid. Outwit the king of Macedon, 286, c, d, & seq. Overthrown by him, 287, b. Some account of other Scythian tribes, 286, note.
Scythopolis, Beitsham in Judea so called from the Scythians, 282.
Sebasto, a city of Cilicia, 340, d.
Selasia, the passage of, described, 648, d. The battle of, 649.

Selencia,

- Selencia*, in Cilicia, by whom founded, 340, d.
Selaucus's alliance with the Achaans, 679, d.
Selinus, king of Agialen, gives his daughter to Ion, 414, d.
Semiramis, some of her fabulous exploits in Media, 12.
Senate of Athens, 430, c. Increased, 438, b. How chosen, 440. A new one of 400, chosen, 523, & seq. Augmented to five thousand, 525, c.
 — of Sparta, instituted by Lycurgus, 560.
Senators of Athens, their power, 440, & seq. Salary, 441.
Sepulchres, Solon's laws concerning them, 433.
Serbonis, a dangerous lake between Egypt and Phoenice, 153, a.
Servants, their condition at Athens, 438, c.
Servièrè, the lake of, in High Dauphiny, 249, b.
Sestos taken by the Athenians, 476, d.
Shushan. Vid. Susa, 58, note.
Siamek, second king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 175, f.
Sicily divided into two factions, 507, b.—The war of, ibid. Quelled by Hermocrates, 510, f, & seq. Invaded by the Athenians, 517.
Sicyon gives name to the kingdom, and to Peloponnesus, 349, b. 350, c.
 — the kingdom of, part of antient Greece, 344, b. Its antient names, situation, &c. 349. Kings, 350. Afterwards governed by priests, ibid. c. Invaded by the Heracidae, ibid. Accedes to the Achaean league, 641, & seq.
Sidonians revolt from Persia, 151, & seq. Betrayed by Mentor, 152. Die desperate, ibid. c. Surrender to Alexander, 161.
Signet-ring, by whom first used in Persia, 179, a.
Sigeum, a city in Phrygia Minor, 305, b. Disputed by the Athenians and Mizyleneans, 422, a.
Simois, river, described, 306, e, f, & seq.
Simlegades, two dangerous rocks, 384, note (H).
Sipilus, a city in Phrygia, 193, c.
Sisachthia at Athens, what, 429, a, c.
Sisyphus, the supposed founder of Corinth, 390, b. His punishment in hell, ibid. note (A).
Slaves, how used at Athens, 438, d.
 — at Sparta, 567, and note.
Smanus, river in Lacedaemon, 397, c.
Smerdis put to death by his brother Cambyfes, 98, d.
 — the mage substituted to the real one, mounts the Persian throne, 100, & seq. Discovered by the want of his ears, 101. Murdered by the Persian nobles, 102. Called Artaxerxes in scripture, 103, note.
Smyrna, a city of Lydia, 289, c.
 — by whom built, 750, b. Described, ibid. d. The modern one described, 751. Subject to earthquakes, ibid. note (D).
Smyrnaeans faithful to the Romans, 751. Surprised by the Colophonians, ibid. d, e.
Socrates prytanis of Athens's integrity, 528, f. Character and accusation, 552, & seq. His defence, 534. Glorious death, ibid. & seq. and note (O).
Sogdianus murders Xerxes, 134, a. Mounts the Persian throne, ibid. His cruel death, ibid. d, and note (O).
Solcism, whence derived, 340, e.
Soli, a city in Cilicia Propria, ibid.
Solon Athenian lawgiver's character and descent, 424, a. Elegy on the loss of Salamis, 425. Recovers it from the Megareans, ibid. & seq. Gains his cause against them, 426, e, f. His liturgem against the Cyrrheans, 427. Chosen archon, 428, e. Legislator, 429, e, & seq. Builds the city of Soli, 430. His laws, ibid. & seq. Regulates the Athenian months, 434, b, and note. Travels into Egypt, Cyprus, &c. 435. Converses with Thales, ibid. With Craesus, 335, c. 445, note. Quells the Athenian factions at his return, 446, a. His just reproof to Thespis the tragedian, ibid. e. Letter to Epimenides, 447, f. Answer to Pisistratus, 448. Death, ibid. & seq.
Solos in Cyprus, whence so called, 445, c.
Sofernes, king of Media, 13, a.
Sofocrates unjustly tortured to death by the Achaean prator, 697, a.
Soldiers esteemed by the Spartans, 564, a. Lycurgus's laws concerning them, 565, & seq.
Sons, king of Lacedaemon, his valour and conquests, 403, & seq.
Spain first inhabited by the Celts, 247, b, c. Called originally Iberia, 244, note (E).
Sparta, whence so called, 395, a. Described, 396, & seq. Her kings, vid. sub Lacedaemon.—Betrayed to the Heracidae, 403. Damaged by a great earthquake, 594, b. Defended by the valour of her women, 623.
Spartans, whence so called, 395, b, c. Their treatment of Darius's heralds, 111, e. Brave defence against Xerxes, 120, & seq. Defeat, 121, & seq. The rest, vid. sub Lacedaemonians.
Spartus, whose son he was, 395, c.
Spanham, the metropolis of Persia, described, 33, note. By whom built, according to oriental writers, 192, b.
Sphaeteria, island, taken by the Lacedaemonians, 508, d. Retaken by the Athenians, 509, c.
Sphodrias, king of Sparta, attempts the pyreum, 615, d.
Seater, a beautiful Cyzican coin, 324, b.
Seaira, the wife of Artaxerxes, her power and cruelty, 137, d. Poisoned by Parysatis, 140, c.
Stenobea, the wife of Pratus, her uachastity, 354, b.
Stephanophoros, the priest of Ceres so called, 732, sub not.
Sthenelaidès decrees war against Athens, 596, a.
Sthenelus, king of Argos, 353, b.
Strangers, Solon's laws about their naturalization, 437, d.
Stratages, their office, 644, c.
Stratocles's device to alter the months, 555, e.
Symphalian birds killed by Hercules, 356, note. 376, a.
Styx, a famous river in Arcadia, 376, a.
Sulpicius, Roman prator, defeats Philip at Elis, 666. Invades Sicyon, 706, b. Retires to Ægina, 707, a. Assists the Athenians against Philip, 734, d.
Sun, moon, and stars, in what sense worshipped by the Perses, 72, a. Sun, the deity of the Persians, 103, c.
Sunium, promontory, fortified by the Athenians, 521, a.
Susa, al. Shushan, metropolis of Persia, described, 58, note. Taken by Alexander, 166, & seq.
Susiana, a province of Persia, described, 35, a.
Swine, abhorred by the Scythians, 272, f.
Syavek, prince of Persia, according to oriental writers, his great chastity, 192, f. Assassinated at Turkestan, ibid. His death revenged by Ruffan, ibid.
Sybarites, a people of Italy, 492. Defeated by the Crotonians, ibid. note. Restored by the Athenians, ibid. Join in the Achaean league, 642, a.
Sydra, a city in Cilicia Aspera, 340, d.
Syenesus I. II. III. kings of Cilicia, 343, a.
Sylla sent against Mithridates, 737, b. Besieges Athens, ibid. & seq. Plunders the Greek temples, 738. Turns the siege into a blockade, 740, c. Takes it, 741. His severity to the Athenians, ibid. c. The vast tribute exacted by him from the revolted cities, 767.
Synneda, a city in Phrygia Salutaris, 193, d.
Sypilene, the Cybele of the Lydians, 330, f.
Sypilus, mount in Lydia, 329, b.
Syracuse, head of the Doric faction, 507, b. Besieged by the Athenians, 518, a. Relieved by Gylippus, ibid. e, f.
Syria surrenders to Alexander, 161, c. Conquered by the Persians, according to oriental writers, 202, b.

T.

T*Abiri*, the Scythian name for Vesla, 272, a.
Tachos, king of Egypt, invaded by the Persians, 149. His untimely contempt of Agésilas, ibid. c. Causes him to forsake him, 620, note. Deposed, and flies to Persia, 149, d.
Tahmurash, 4th king of Persia, according to oriental writers, 177, a.
Talusius blockades Corinth, 512, e. Attempts the pyrræum, 613, c.
Tanagra described, 718, note. Taken and razed, 489, a.
 — the battle of, 487, & seq.
Tanais river parts the two Scythias, 266, e, and note.
Tanara, a promontory in Lacedamon, described, 396, c, and note (C).
Tantalus, king of Sipylus in Phrygia, 296, b. His resentment against Tros, 313. Subdued by Ilus, 315.
Tarsus, a city in Cilicia Propria, 340, f. By whom built, ibid. & seq. Taken by Alexander, 158, b.
Tartary, part of ancient Scythia, 267.
Tartesa in Spain, Jupiter defeated at by the Titans, 262, a, and note.
Taurian Scythians described, 277.
Tauris, the ancient Ecbatane, 2, note (B).—Famed for its excellent wines, 4, a.
Taurus, mount in Scythia, 267, d. The biggest in all Asia, 338, b.
Taygeta, daughter of Atlas, ravished by Jupiter, 395, note (A).
Tegæa, metropolis of Arcadia, 379. Orestes buried at, 380, a, and note. The battle of, 380, 560.
Tegean women, their bravery, ibid.
Telamon's ill usage of Hesione, 317, b. 318, c.
Telephus king of Sparta's character and reign, 569, & seq.
Telephus, the son of Hercules, king of Mysia, 327, b. The tale of him, 329, note (1).
Telestes, last king of Corinth, murdered, 392, e.
Teleucius slain by the Olynthians, 614, f.
Telias the soothsayer's stratagem against the Thebans, 367, b.
Telissilla's bravery against the Lacedamonians, 585, note.
Tellus, the Athenian, why the happiest man, 335, d.
Telmessus, a city in Lycia, 337. Famous for soothsayers, 301, b.
Temenus, one of the Heraclida, made king of Argos, 360, c. Murdered, ibid.
Tempe, the valley of, in Thessaly, described, 381, d.
Temples of Greece plundered and destroyed by Darius, 109, d. 112, a. 127, e.—By Xerxes, why, 471, f. Pundered by Sylla, 738, a.
 — of Therma, burnt by Antigonus, 658.
 — none among the Scythians, 272.
Tenedean piper, a proverb, 308.
Tenedos, island, described, 307, d. So called from Tenes, ibid. His character, ibid. & seq. and note (D).
Tennes, king of Sidon, betrays his country, 152, c. Put to death, ibid.
Teos, by whom founded, 369. The state of it, 752, & seq.
Tereus, the fable of. 389, note.
Tesamenes, king of Thebes, 375, b.
Tethys, goddess of the sea, her care for her son Achilles, 385, b.
Teucer supposed the first king of Troy, 308, a. 311, c.
 — the son of Telamon, settles in Cyprus, 321, f.
Teucris. Vide Troas, 308, b.
Teuthras, king of Mysia, 327, a.
Thais, an Athenian harlot, causes Xerxes's palace to be burnt, 168, d.
Thalana, a city in Lacedamon, 397, b.

Thales, the Milesian, divides the year, 434, note. Converses with Solon, 445. His prophecy about the Milesians, 757, e.
 — a lyric poet, companion of Lycurgus, 559, c.
Thasians reduced by Cimon, 483, & seq.
Thasus taken from the Athenians, 529, c.
Theano, wife of Antenor, chief priestess of Pallas, 315, d.
Theban kingdom, part of ancient Greece, 344, b. By whom founded, 372. Government, monarchs, &c. ibid. & seq. Dissolution, 375, e. War, the cause and success of it, 358, & seq. Its fatal catastrophe, 374, & seq.
Thebans, their treachery to the other Greeks, 122. Part of them join with the Ionians in quest of new settlements, 369.—War with the Athenians, 488, c. Defeated, ibid. Surprise Plataea, 500. Their kindness to the fugitive Athenians, 551. Subdued by the Lacedamonians, 539, e. Reluctant to join in the peace, 441, d. Make a separate one, with Persia, ibid. d. Make war with them, 542. Subdued by the Lacedamonians, 614, e. By the Romans, 696, c. The rest, see under the next article of Thebes, capital of Boeotia, by whom founded, 372, a. Why so called, ibid. note (C). Gives name to the Boeotian kingdom, ibid. b. Fort fired by Amphion, 373, c. Destroyed by the Epigoni, 375, b. Pundered by Cambyzes, 97, f. By Alexander, 549. Betrayed to the Lacedamonians, 614, c. Abandoned to the Romans, 696, c.
 — of Phthiotis, taken by Alexander, 662.
Theft, a great crime among the Scythians, 270.
 — Solon's laws against it, 433, a. How far allowed by the Lacedamonians, 564, f.
Themistocles chosen admiral against the Persians, 460, & seq. 124, f. His power against Attilides, 466, & seq. Chosen general against Xerxes, 468. His stratagem to retain the fleet at Salamis, 123, c. 472. Outwits and defeats the Persians, ibid. & seq. Highly rewarded by the Athenians, 124, f. 476, b. Outwits the Lacedamonians, 477, & seq. Why banished Athens, 480, b. Goes into Persia, ibid. & seq. His speech to Artaxerxes, reception, and death, 481, note.
Theopompus, king of Lacedamon, invades Messenia, 571, & seq. Creates the ephori, 574, and note. Takes Ithome by stratagem, 576, a. His character and death, ibid. c, d.
Theoclymenus, king of Lydia, 332.
Theramenes, Athenian admiral, 526. His treachery to his colleague, 528, & seq. One of the thirty tyrants, 530. Put to death, ibid.
Therma surprised and burnt by Antigonus, 658.
Thermodon, the famous battle of, 279, note.
Thermophoria, one of the feasts of Ceres, 731, note.
Thermophoria, what, ibid.
Thermopyla, the straits of. Vide Oeta, 371, a.
 — the battle of, 583, and note.
Thermus, metropolis of Ætolia, described, 410, b. Why called Panastolium, ibid.
Thersander, king of Thebes, killed before Troy, 375, h.
Thesens, where born, 364, c. His first adventures, ibid. and note. Arrives at his father's court, ibid. Sails with the unhappy victims in a Cress, 365. Kills the Minotaur, and releases the Athenian captives, ibid. Forgets to hang out the victorious flag, ibid. Succeeds his father, 366, a. Divests himself of the regal power to follow Hercules, ibid. His famous pillar on the isthmus, ibid. d. Expedition against the Amazons, ibid. note (K). Saves Helen away, ibid. His dangerous attempt upon Proserpine, 367, a. Undermined at Athens by Alcibiades, ibid. Repulsed by the Athenians, ibid. His death, ibid. Cruelty to his son Hippolytus, ibid. note (M). Supposed the founder of the Isthmian games, 391, note (G). His temple at Athens, 436, c. Made a sanctuary, 428. His tomb discovered, and bones brought to Athens, 482.
 9 Q Thesmela,

I N D E X.

- Theſmoteſta*, at Athens, their office, 417. 443.
Theſſia, a city in Boeotia, 371, a.
Theſſians, brave warriors and horſemen, 382, c.
 o. Their government, 383. a. Kings, ibid. & ſeq. Drive the Boeotians out of their country, 386, a. Their native hatred and wars againſt the Phocians, ibid. & ſeq. Highly rewarded by Alexander, 161. Treachery to the Athenians, 487, & ſeq. Punished by Myronides, 489, a.
Theſſalotis, part of ancient Greece, 344. b. Part of ancient Theſſaly, 381, a.
Theſſaly, part of ancient Greece, 344. b. Whence ſo called, 381. Its diviſion, ſituation, &c. ibid. b. c. Famous for good horſemen, oxen, &c. 382. Its government, kings, &c. Vide ſub Theſſalians.
Theſſalus, the ſon of Græcus, 381, a.
 — a name uſed by ancient poets for poiſonous drugs, &c. 382, a.
Thetes the loweſt rank of Athenians, 430, a.
Thoutus, one of the names of Mercury, its etymon, 264, note (A).
Thiaſus, a river in Lacedæmonia, 397, c.
Thous, king of Corinth, 334, note (M).
 — prætor of Ætolia, oppoſes the Romans, 711. Convenes the general aſſembly in favour of Antiochus, 712. His haughty answer to the Roman conſul, 713. b. Sent to ſurpriſe Chalcis, 314, b. Diſappointed, 715. Goes over to Antiochus, ibid. c.
 — river in Ætolia. Vide Achelous, 409.
Tomyris, queen of Scythia, her encounter with Cyrus, 87. 283. Her bloody revenge, ibid.
Thraſybulus victorious at ſea, 526. Endeavours to reſcue Attica, 531, b. Recovers Pyreum, ibid. Makes peace with Lacedæmon, ibid. f. & ſeq. His hopeful expedition into the Helleſpont, 537. Sain at Appendus, 538, a.
 — tyrant of Miletum, his ſtratagem to obtain a peace, 334, c. His advice to Periander, 758, b.
Thraſydras, of Elis, procures a peace with Sparta, 600, a.
Thraſyllus unjuſtly put to death, 528, & ſeq.
Thronium, metropolis of Loeris Epichnam, 413, a.
Thucydides commands in Macedon, 511. Saves the city of Ione, ibid. f.
Thurium, in Sybaris, whence ſo called, 493, ſub fin. not. (E).
Thya, a feaſt of Bacchus, deſcribed, 406, note (D).
Thyatira, a city in Lydia, 329, a.
Thyestes, brother of Atreus, his inceſt, 336, b. & note.
Thynbria, by whom founded, 312, b.
Tibyrea taken by the Athenians, 510, f.
Timea, the wife of Agis, debauched by Alcibiades, 600, c.
Timotheus, Athenian general, his character, 540. Bears the Lacedæmonians at Leucada, ibid. & ſeq. His ſucceſs in Macedonia, 541. Diſgrace and death, 543, b.
Tiribafſus, Persian general, invades Cyprus, 145. Recalled and diſgraced, 146, c. Saves Artaxerxes and his army, ibid. Reſtored, 147, b. c. Put to death for conſpiracy, 149, & ſeq.
Tiſamenes, king of Lacedæmonia, outſid by the Heraclida, 433, c.
Tiſamenus, king of Mycenia, 357, f. Killed in Achaia, 416, b.
Tiſſaphernes's expedition againſt Greece, 140, c. Is influenced by Alcibiades, 521. His cowardice, 141, b. Treachery to Ageſilanus, ibid. d. Put to death, 142, c. 610, a.
Tir, the Celtic name for the earth, 159, a. and note.
Titan, brother of Saturnus, conteſts the crown with him, 260, d. With Jupiter, 261, & ſeq.
Tiranic war, 261, & ſeq.
Tirans, ancient Gomerians, 245, b. War againſt Jupiter, 261, & ſeq. Deſeated in Spain, 262.
Tirea, the jealous wife of Uranus, 259, & ſeq.
Tithraſtes embroils the Grecian ſtates, 610, b.
Tithonus, the ſon of Laomedon, 315, f. His bravery, ibid.
Titanus, king of Lydia, 332. 318.
 — mount, ibid.
Tolmides Athenian general's expedition into Lacænia, 489, a. Deſeated and killed in Boeotia, 491, d.
Torch-bearers at Athens, their office, 464, note.
Torone taken by the Athenians, 542, a.
Toxata, at Athens, their office, 443, c.
Tragedy, by whom invented, 446, d.
Trapeſa made the metropolis of Arcadia, 379, d.
Trinacſus, a ſea-port in Lacedæmon, 396, c.
Triopas, king of Argos, 353, a.
Tripſalians invaded by the Achaans, 655, and note.
Treas, where ſituate, 288, c.
 — called Phrygia Minor, 304. Deſcribed, ibid. Its cities, rivers, ſoil, &c. ibid. & ſeq.
Treas, Alexandria deſcribed, 306, c.
Troæſen, in Argos, the ſeat of Pittheus, 351, b.
Trojan kingdom, its extent, 304, c. Origin, &c. 308. Blended with other nations, 309, b. Its government, religion, &c. ibid. & ſeq. Kings, 311.
 — war, the cauſe of, 318. The fatal end of, 321, c.
 — horſe, how explained, ibid. d.
Trophæus, Jupiter, his temple built by the Dares, 414, a.
Trophonian cave in Boeotia deſcribed, 371, a. and note.
Tros, king of Troas, founder of Troy, 305. His unſucceſſful war with Tantalus, ibid. & ſeq. Numerous progeny, 314, b.
Troy, by whom built, 305. Deſcribed, ibid. Different fates, 206, a. 313, & ſeq. — Its walls, how, and by whom built, 317, a. and not. Taken and burnt, 321. By whom rebuilt, 323, a.
Tubal, whether he peopled Spain, 244, note (E). 266, c.
Turk, the ſon of Japhet, an account of him from oriental writers, 239, b.
Turks, whence ſo called, 381, f. Their wars with Persia, ibid. & ſeq. Conquered by them, 197, b.
Tydeus's ſucceſs at Argos, 358, a. Bravery againſt the Thebans, ibid. c. Wounded by Menaliſſus, 411. Eats his brains, ibid. b.
Tyndareus the father of Helen's oath to her ſuitors, 318, f. Made king of Lacedæmonia by Hercules, ibid. & ſeq.
Tyras, river in Scythia. Vide Nieſter, 268, c.
Tyrants xxx. of Athens, 530. Expelled, 331, d.
Tyre taken by Alexander, 162, a.
Tyrin, the kingdom of, ſeſtered from Argos, 354, c.
Tyrrenians, whence ſo called, 331, d.
Tyrræus, the lame Athenian ſchoolmaſter, appointed general of Sparta, 577. His wiſdom and courage, 578, b. 579, b.

V.

- Venus*, the worſhip of, introduced into Persia, 71. Condemned by their magi, ibid. Worſhipped by the Scythians, 272, (B). The Trojans, 310. Her temple at Aſcalon plundered, 282. At Aphrodiſia a ſtately building, 410, c. At Cyprus, by whom built, 379, d. At Sparta, 402, and note (M). Statue, why bound with chains, ibid. 2.
Veſta worſhipped by the Scythians, 272, a. Challenged as their progenetrix, 283, c. Worſhipped by all the Greeks, 310, a.
Virgins, Phrygian, obliged to waſh in the Scamander before marriage, 307, b.
 — Spartan undecently dreſt, 363, a.
Viſtula, a river in Sarmatia, 368, c.
Ulyſſes's adventures, 322, b.
Umbrians, a branch of the Gomerians, 246. Firſt inhabitants of Italy, ibid. c. & ſeq.
Volga, a river in Scythia. Vide Rha, 267.

I N D E X.

Uranus, father of Saturn, second king of the Celtes, 259, a. Why so called, ibid. Imprisoned by his son Jupiter, ibid. Breaks his heart, ibid.
Uxians reduced by Alexander, 167, c.

W.

WAR, holy, in Greece, why so called, 388, & seq. Theban, 358, & seq. Peloponnesian, 499, & seq. Ægean, 484. Macedonian, 542. Social, ibid. Messenian, 470. The second, 577. Bæotian, 615. Cleonic, 630. Confederate, 652.

Wards and Water } Solon's laws concerning them, 432, d, f.

— mineral, of Hierapolis, 293.

— Thermopyla, 371, b.

Whips, why presented by the Moscovite women to their husbands, 283, note.

Wills, Solon's laws concerning them, 431, d.

Wine, the invention of, ascribed to Bacchus, 373, note (D). How, and when introduced into Persia, 177, c. Muscat of Tenedos famed, 308, supra fin. note (D). Of Lampascus, 324, d. Of Tmolus, 329, c. Of Lydia, 330, c.

Wolves, reward for killing of them, 432, d. Neurians fabled to turn into wolves, 278, b.

Wool, of Laodicea, famed, 291, c. Of Carmania drops off the sheep, 28, note.

Women, Solon's laws concerning them, 431. Against the infamous sort, ibid.—Esteemed great prophetesses among the Celtes and Scythians, 278, note. Held in common among some Scythians, 278, a. Of Scythia, their martial bravery, 273, c. 276, a. Their way of preserving their beauty, 277.

— of Sarmatia, their martial genius, ibid. c. Treachery to their husbands, 282. Punishment, 283.

— Spartan, their dress, 563, a. Hardiness, 565, a. Bravery, 566, d.

— Arcadian, their bravery, 376, c.

— Tegean, defeat the Lacedæmonians, 350. Of Argos, beat the Spartans from it, 585, note.

X.

XANTHIANS, why so called, 338, a.

Xanthippus, Athenian general, defeats the Persians, 126, & seq. 475, f. Conquers the Thracian Chersonesus, 128. Takes Sestos, 476, c. Impales Arctayles for sacrilege, 476, f.

— the son of Pericles, dies of the plague, 503, c.

Xanthus king of Bæotia's contest with the Athenians, 368, c.

— river of Troas, 306, c. The same with Scamander, 307, a.

Xenarchus, Achaean prætor, declares for Perfes, 686, b.

Xenias, an Eleen, expelled by Thrasylorus, 579.

Xenoi, strangers so called at Athens, 438, b.

Xenoclides's descent on Corcyra, 496, c.

Xenon's speech to the Roman deputies, 688, & seq.

Xenophon's noble retreat out of Persia, 139, & seq.

Xerxes succeeds his father Darius, 114, & seq. Confirms all his father's grants to the Jews, 115. Dissuaded by his uncle from invading Greece, ibid. Pushed on it by a threefold dream, 116. Allies with the Carthaginians, ibid. Grows insolent, 117. His army and fleet, 118, e, & seq. Defeats the Spartans at Thermopyla, 121, & seq. Engages the Athenians at sea, ibid. 124. Outwitted by Themistocles, ibid. His fleet defeated at Salamis, ibid. Flies to Sardis, ibid. The hardship of his army, ibid. Goes into Persia, 127. Burns all the Grecian temples, ibid. Loves his brother's wife, ibid. His wife's cruelty to that princess, ibid. & seq. His barbarity to his brother, 129. To the body of the Lacedæmonian king, 588, d. Is killed by Artabanus, 129, d.

— II. his short reign, 134, b. Murdered by Sogdianus, ibid.

Xuthus, grandson of Deucalion, 363. Adjudges the Athenian crown to Cecrops, ibid. d. 414, d. Settles in Achaia, ibid. c.

Xyffos, or Olympic stadium, of Elis, described, 405, c, and note.

Y.

YEMEN, the king of, his war with Keykams, king of Persia, 192, c.

Yezad, one of the Persic names of God, 76, c.

Yezdan, the same with Yezad, 207. Some account of him, ibid. note.

Youth, how educated at Sparta, 363, d, & seq.

Z.

ZAB, king of Persia, 187, d.

Zabians corrupt the Persic religion, 71, a.

Zacynthus peoples the island of that name, 313, a.

— island, described, 677, note. Reduced by the Athenians, 489, c. Wasted by the Peloponnesians, 504. Bought by the Achaens, 677, c. Given to the Romans, ibid.

Zal-zar, the father of Ruslan, his history, 184. Recovers the Persian crown from the Turks, 187, d.

Taken prisoner by the king of Persia, 223, c.

Zannara, queen of the Sacca, a great heroine, 13, f. Her exploits and stately monument, ibid. and note.

Zembla, north part of ancient Scythia, 267, c.

Zenderoud, a Persian river, described, 32.

Zende-vasta, the book of, 26, a, and note (O).

Zengita, the third rank of Athenians, 430, a.

Zeno, where born, 759, a.

Zeibus, Theban tyrant, killed by his own mother, 373.

Zeuxidas, prætor of Acarnania, attached to the Romans, 745, c. Deposed, ibid.

Zeuxippus, last king of Sicyon, 350, c.

— a Roman, kills the Bæotian prætor, 744, b.

Zoak, tyrant of Persia. Vide Dehoc, 179.

Zopyrus's stratagem to betray Babylon to Darius, 105. Amply rewarded, ibid. f.

Zoroaster, al. Zerdusht, introduces learning into Persia, 62, c.

Reforms the Persic religion, 71, note (C).

Had his own from the Mosaic writings, 74, b.

His life, doctrine, and character, according to oriental writers, 204, & seq.

Said to have been brought up under one of the prophets, 207.

Converts the king of Persia, 211, & seq.

His miracles, ibid. Religion, 214, & seq.

Liturgy, 215, d. Laws and writings, ibid. & seq.

Foretold the coming of the Messiah, 217. His death, 218.

Zoub, king of Persia. Vide Zab, 187, d.

Zuxidamus, king of Sparta, 576, c, f.

F I N I S.

